Thereupon Ariston the Prætor began again; Achæans! said he, you do not want counsel more than tongues; but every one of you is loth to consult the publick good with the hazard of your own safety. Perhaps I also should hold my tongue, if I were a private person. But now, as I am Prætor, I consider that either we should not have given the Embassadors their Audience in a publick Council, or not sent them thence without an Answer. Yet how can I make an Answer, but by having your resolutions upon the matter? And since never an one of you either will or dare give his opinion, let us take the Speeches made yesterday by the Embassadors instead of your opinions; as if they had not requested what was for their own advantage, but persuaded us to what they thought for our interest only. The Romans, the Rhodians, and Attalus desire an Alliance and a Friendship with us; and think it just for us to assist them in the War which they are now engaged in against Philip. Philip on the other side puts us in mind of our Alliance with him, and the Oath that we took, requiring one while that we be of his side, and telling us another while that he is content we should not concern our selves at all of either side. Does no body know, why they that are not yet our Allies desire more than he that is? Why, this proceeds not from Philips modesty, nor the impudence of the Romans. No; the Achæan Ports both add to and diminish the confidence of the Demandants. We see nothing belonging to Philip except one Embassador; but the Roman Fleet lies at Cenchræa, with the spoils of all the Cities in Eubœa, besides, that the Consul and his Legions are divided from us by nothing but a small Arm of the Sea, and over-running all Phocis and Locris. Do you wonder, why Cleomedon, Philips Embassador, treated so diffidently with us of late, to induce us to take up Arms for the King: when, if according to that very League and Oath that he pretends we are obliged by, we should demand of him the assistance of Philip against Nabis, the Lacedæmonians and the Romans, he would not only not be able to find a Guard to defend us, but not know even what to say in answer thereto. No more than Philip himself the last Year, who having tried, by promising to levy War against Nabis, to draw all our Youth hence into Eubœa, when he saw that we would neither allow him that assistance, nor be concerned in the Roman War, forgot that alliance he now brags of, and left us as a prey and spoil to Nabis and the Lacedæmonians. Besides, I did not think Cleomedons Speech to be at all consistent in it self. For he slighted the Roman War, and said the event of it would be the same as that of the former War, that they had with Philip. Why then does he at a distance desire our aid rather than present defend us, his old Allies, at once from Nabis and the Romans? Us did I say? Yea, why did he suffer Eretria and Carystus to be so taken? Why so many Cities of Thessaly in the same manner? Why Locris and Phocis? Or why does he let Elatia be so attack'd at this time? Why went he from the streights of Epirus, and those impregnable Barriers upon the River Aous? Was it force or fear, or his own choice that made him quit the Post that he was in there, and march quite away into his own Kingdom? If upon his own inclination he left so many Allies to be pillaged by their Enemies, how can he deny but that his Allies ought to look to themselves? If for fear, he ought to pardon our fear also. If he retreated because he was Conquer'd, why then, how is it likely, Cleomedon, that we Achæans should endure the shock of the Roman Arms, which you Macedonians were not able to bear? Shall we believe you, that the Romans do not come against us now with greater Forces than formerly, rather than believe our own Eyes? They then assisted the Ætolians with a Fleet; but had neither a Consular General, nor an Army to carry on that War. The Sea-Port Towns belonging to Philip's Allies were in a fright and an uproar. But the Inland places were so secure from the Roman Arms, that Philip pillaged the Ætolians, when 'twas in vain for them to implore the Romans aid. But now the Romans having made an end of the Punic War, which they endured for sixteen years within the very Bowels, as it were, of Italy, did not only send Auxiliaries to the Ætolians to assist them in their War, but were themselves Commanders in person both by Sea and Land against Macedonia. This is now the third Consul that makes War upon that Country with all the strength he can. Sulpicius engaged in Macedonia it self with the King, and defeated him, laying waste the most opulent part of his Kingdom. And now of late Quintius, when Philip was posted at the Barriers of Epirus, relying relying upon the nature of the place, the Fortifications thereof, and the Army that was with him, forced him from his Camp; and then pursuing him into Thessaly, took the Kings Garisons and Cities that were his Allies, almost before the Kings own Eyes. Admit that to be false which the Athenian Embassadors just now said touching the Kings Cruelty, Avarice and Lust, nor let us concern our selves for what wicked actions he was guilty of in Attica, against all the Gods Cœlestial and Infernal; much less for what the Cicianians and Abydenes have endured, who are so far from us: Yea, if you please, let us forget even our own Wounds; the slaughter and plunder committed at Messena in the middle of Peloponnesus; and how Garitenes, a Gentleman that entertained him very kindly at Cyparissia was kill'd, contrary to all right and reason, almost in the very midst of a Feast; as likewise, how Aratus, both Father and Son, of Sicyon (though he used to call the unhappy old Gentleman Father) and the Sons Wife also carried away into Macedonia, to be his Whore: besides which let all his other violations both of Virgins and Matrons be buried in Oblivion. Supposing Philip to be free from all these Vices, for fear of whose Cruelty is it, that you are all so silent? Let us imagine that we were discoursing with Antigonus an extraordinary mild and just King, who deserved very well of us all; would he, think you, desire us to do what even in that case were impossible? Peloponnesus is a Peninsula, joining to the Continent by a narrow neck of Land called an Isthmus, and exposed to nothing more than a Naval War. If an hundred Ships of War, and fifty of a lighter sort with open Decks, with thirty Issack Barks, should begin to waste the Sea-Coast, and attack the Cities that lie unguarded, even upon the very shore, shall we betake our selves into the Inland Countries, as though we were not harassed with an intestine War, that gnaws almost our very bowels? When Nabis and the Lacedæmonians press so hard upon us by Land, and the Roman Fleet by Sea, where shall I find the Kings assistance, and the Macedonian Guards? Or shall we our selves defend with our own Arms, the Cities that shall be attacked? For we defended Dymæ very bravely in the former War. The misfortunes of other people afford us Examples enough: and therefore let us not seek how we may prove an Example to them. Do not refuse, because the Romans voluntarily desire our Friendship, to grant them that which you ought to have wished and sued for by all means. For they being forced, you see, by fear in a Foreign Country, and having a mind to lie under the umbrage of your aid, fly to your Alliance for protection, that they may be received into your Harbours, and make use of your provisions. They have the Sea at their Command, and make whatever Land they arrive at immediately their own Dominions. That which they desire, they can force; but because they have a mind to spare you, they will not suffer you to give any cause for your own ruine. For as to what Cleomedon said just now, as the middle and the safest way for you to take, that is to say, that you should be quiet, and not take up Arms, that is not a middle, but no way at all. For besides that you must either accept of, or condemn the Roman Alliance; what shall we be (without adhering firmly to some side, as men that wait for the event of things, so as to apply our Counsels to the fortune of the War) but a prey to the Conquerour? Do not disdain what is offered you, though so freely, since it is that which you ought to have wished for with all your hearts. It will not be always in your power to do, as now you may, either one or the other. The same occasion will not often nor long present it self. You for a long time have rather wished than dared to deliver your selves from Philip. But now those people who would set you at Liberty, have crossed the Seas without any pains or danger to you, with great Navies and Armies. If you despise their Alliance, you are mad; for you must necessarily have them either for your Friends or Enemies.

XXII.

After this speech of the Prætors there was an humm set up, by some, to signifie their assent, and by others to reprove those that did assent. And now not only each particular Person, but all the Nations were at variance among themselves: besides that, between the Magistrates of that Nation (they call them Demiurgi, being ten in number) there was as brisk and hot a dispute as between the Mobile. Of whom five said, They would propose the making of an alliance with the Romans, and give their Votes accordingly; whilst the other five said, There was a Law, that made it criminal either to propose before the Magistrates, or decree anything in Council, that was contrary to an alliance with Philip. And this Day too was spent in brangling; so that there was but one Day of the due time for a Council to last, remaining (for the third Day the Law ordered that the Decree should pass) upon which they were so very hot, that Parents could scarce keep their hands off of their Children. One Rhisiasus of Pellene had a Son called Memnon, a Demiurgus [one of those ten Officers] of that Party; which was against reciting of the Decree, or having their opinions all ask'd. He therefore having a long time conjur'd his Son, To let the Achæans consult the publick safety, and not go about by his stubbornness to ruine the whole Country: seeing his intreaties did no good, he swore he would kill him with his own hand, and not look upon him as a Son but an Enemy; till he at last by threats so far prevailed over him, as that the next Day he sided with those that were for proposing the business. Who being now a good many, all the several Nations almost approving of it, and declaring what they were going to decree, the Dymeans and Megalopolitans with some of the Argives, before the Bill was pass'd, rose up and left the Council; nor did any Body either admire at, or disapprove of what they did. For Antigonus had restored the Megalopolitans, who in the memory of their Grandfathers had been beaten thence, into their Country; and to the Dymeans, who were lately taken and rifled by the Roman

N n n n z

Army,

Army, Philip (giving order that they should be redeemed where-ever they were in slavery) gave back not only their Liberty, but their Country too. And as for the Argives, they, besides that they believe the Macedonian Kings to be come originally from them, were many of them obliged to Philip upon several private accounts, and by familiar friendship. For these reasons, because the Council was inclined to make an Alliance with the Romans, they went out, and they were pardoned for so doing, because they had been obliged, not only very much, but very lately too, by several kindneses that the Macedonians had done them.

XXIII. The rest of the Nations belonging to the Achaens, when their opinions were demanded, confirmed an alliance with Attalus and the Rhodians by a present Decree just then, but deferred it to the Romans, because without the Peoples consent it could not be ratified, till such time as Embassadors could be sent to Rome. At the present they agreed to send three Embassadors to L. Quintus, and remove all the Achaean Army to Corinth, which City it self Quintus was then attacking after he had taken Cenchreae. And they indeed encamped over against that Gate, which leads to Sicyon. The Romans fell upon that side of the City toward Cenchreae, and Attalus leading his Men over through the Isthmus attack'd it first more slowly from Lechaum, the Port of the opposite Sea, as hoping to see a mutiny between the Townsmen and the Kings Guards. But seeing that they all defended it, the Macedonians as though it had been their own common Country, and the Corinthians by making Androsthenes Governour of the Garrison, whom they obeyed for his humanity and justice in his Office, as if he had been one of their own Citizens and chosen by majority of Votes; so that the Assaults only hopes now lay in force, Arms and Works, and therefore they raised vast Mounds before the Walls on every side. A Ram on that side where the Romans made their Attack, had beaten down some part of the Walls. To which place, because it was now bereft of all fortifications, the Macedonians ran in throngs to defend it, upon which there happened to be a bloody Battel between them and the Romans. And first of all, the Romans were easily kept off by mere Multitude, but when the Auxiliaries belonging both to the Achaens and Attalus were slain, the fight was pretty equal, nor could any body doubt, but the Romans would easily force the Macedonians and Greeks to quit their Ground. There were a great number of Italian Fugitives, who, part of them out of Annibals Army came over for fear of being punished by the Romans, and followed Philip, and part of them were Sea Men, who having left their Fleets revolted to the hopes of a more honourable Warfare. Despair of being pardoned, if the Romans overcame, made these Men rather mad than bold. There is the Promontory of Juno over against Sicyon, which they call Asrae, that runs a great way out into the Sea: from whence Philocles, one of the Kings Praefects, having passed over to Corinth, almost seven Thousand Paces, led fifteen Hundred Men after him through Bootia. There were Barks ready from Corinth to take that Guard in and carry them to Lechaum. Whereupon Attalus advised them, To set fire of their Works and presently quit the Siege. But Quintus was more pertinacious in the Enterprize. Yet even he, when he saw the Kings Guards posted at every Gate, so that it was not easie for them to sustain the shock of a sally out of the Town, was of Attalus's opinion. Thus without effecting their design, and having dismiss'd the Achaens, they returned to their Ships; Attalus went for Piraeus, and the Romans for Cercyra.

XXIV. Whilst these things were carried on by their Naval Forces, the Consul having pitched his Camp in Phocis near Elatia, endeavoured to do the business first by way of Parley and Conference with the Nobility of that City; but when they told him, They had not power to do any thing at all, for that the Kings Men were more numerous and strong than the Townsmen, then he attacked the City with Works and Arms on every side. When he applyed the Ram to the Wall, as much of it as between the Towers was knock'd down, having left the City defenceless, and that with a great crash and noise as it fell; not only the Romans march'd in through the new breach, but also from all parts of the Town ev'ry one left their stations, and ran together to that place that was so throng'd by the Enemy. The Romans at the same time clamber'd over the Ruines, and brought their Ladders up to the standing Walls: and whilst the heat of the fight fix'd not only the Eyes but the Minds of the Enemies upon that one part only where the conflict was, the Wall was scaled in several other places, and the Soldiers clamb over into the City. Upon the hearing of which tumult, the Enemy, being affrighted at it, left the place which they, so many of them together defended, and fled all for fear into the Castle, with the unarm'd Rabble at their heels. By this means the Consul took possession of the City. Which when he had rifled, he sent certain Persons into the Castle, who were to promise the Kings Men their lives, if they would go away without their Arms, and their liberty to the Elatians; upon which having given his solemn word for the performance he after some few days was Master of the Castle.

XXV. But when Philocles, the Kings Praefect, came into Achaia, not only Corinth was free'd from the Siege, but the City of the Argives also was betrayed to Philocles by certain Princes, or Noblemen therein, after they had first try'd how the vulgar stood affected. They had a custom, on the first day of their Assemblies, as an Omen, for the Praetors to pronounce the Names of Jupiter, Apollo, and Hercules; to which Law, there was an addition made, That King Philip should be joined with them; whose name seeing the Cryer did not add, now that they had had made a Peace with the Romans, there was first an hum set up by the multitude; and soon after a great noise made by those that pronounced Philips name, as being willing he should enjoy his legal honour, till at last his name was repeated with a general assent. In confidence of this favour, Philocles being sent for thither in the night time seized an Hill, that stood above the City (which Castle they call Larissa) and planting a Guard there, as he went down to the Town below it by break of day, in an hostile posture, an Army ready in Battalia met him. For there was a Garison of Achaens lately put into that place, consisting of about five hundred Youths chosen out of all their Cities. Over which Enesidemus a Dymaan, was chief Commander. To him the Kings Praefect sent this advice; that he would march out of the City: (for that they were not equal even to the Townsmen only, who were of the Macedonians side, much less when the Macedonians were added to them, whom even the Romans themselves could not endure to cope with at Corinth) which though at first it not at all moved either their Captain or them, yet sometime after, when they saw the Argives come arm'd on the other side in a great Body, foreseeing nought but certain destruction, they nevertheless seem'd resolv'd to undergo any hazard, if their Commander had but stuck to them. But Enesidemus, for fear all the flower of the Achaean Youth and their City should be lost together, having bargained with Philocles that they might march off, himself continued in the same place where he was arm'd, and with a very small number to attend him. Whereupon when Philocles sent a Messenger to ask him, what he meant? he, standing mute with his Shield before him, made Answer, That he was resolv'd to die arm'd in defence of that City which was committed to his charge. Thereupon by the Praefects Order the Thracians threw their Darts in upon them and kill'd them every man. So that after the alliance was made between the Achaens and the Romans, two of the most famous Cities in the World, Argi and Corinthus, were in subjection to the King.

XXVI. These things were performed by the Romans in Greece by Sea and Land that Summer. But in Gaul there was no memorable exploit done by Sex. Julius the Consul: who though he had two Armies with him in that Province, one which he kept still, but ought to have disbanded (that had been under the Command of L. Cornelius the Pro-Consul) of which he made C. Helvius the Praetor, General, and another that he brought thither; yet he spent almost the whole year in reducing the Cremoneses and Plancontians back into those Colonies, from whence by the fortune of War they had been dispersed. Now as Gaul that Year was at quiet beyond all expectation, so about the City [of Rome] there had like to have been an Insurrection made by the slaves. For the Carthaginian Hostages were then in Custody at Setia, and had with them, as being Noblemens Sons, a great number of Slaves: who were the more, not only by reason of the late African War, but because the Setines also themselves had bought several Captives of that Nation which were taken Prisoners. When therefore they had formed their Conspiracy, they sent some of that number to sollicite the other Slaves, that were in the Country near Setia, as well as about Norba and Circeii. And when they had gotten all things in a readiness, they had resolv'd to set upon the people, when they were intent upon seeing certain Games, which were to be in a day or two at Setia: and when they had taken Setia by slaughter, and that sudden tumult, to make themselves Masters of Norba and Circeii. News was brought to Rome of this their design, to L. Cornelius Merula, then Praetor [or Governour] of the City. Two Slaves came to him before day, and told him in order all that had been, or was intended to be done. He therefore, having Commanded them to be kept in Custody at his own House, and called a Senat to whom he declared what the Informers said, was immediately ordered to go and inquire into, and suppress that Conspiracy. Accordingly he went with five Lieutenants, and by the way forced all he met with an Oath to take up Arms and follow him. By means of which tumultuary Levy having raised almost two thousand men, he came, without telling any of them whither he was a going, to Setia. Where having soon laid hold upon the Heads of the Conspiracy, he so surpris'd them, that the Slaves ran all out of the Town: But he sent a Party to pursue and find them out all over the Country. In this affair the service of the two informing Slaves, and one Freeman, was very extraordinary; to the latter of which the Senat ordered an hundred thousand pounds for a Reward; and to the Slaves twenty five thousand pounds, with their Liberty, which was paid them out of the Treasury. Not long after, out of the remains of that same Conspiracy, news was brought, that the Slaves were like to seize Prenefte. Thereupon L. Cornelius the Praetor marching thither, punished nigh five hundred persons that were in that Plot. Mean while the City was in a fright, that the Carthaginian Hostages and Captives should attempt such things; insomuch that there were Watches kept at Rome in every street, of which the inferiour Magistrates were to take care, and the Triumviri injoin'd to have a stricter Eye over the Prison belonging to the Stone-quarries, [whither Slaves, &c. were sent to work.] Besides which the Praetor sent Letters all over Laticium, to Command, that the Hostages should be kept in private, and not suffered to stir abroad; and that the Captives being bound in Fetters of no less than ten pound weight, should be in no other than the publick Gaol.

That year Embassadors from King Attalus laid up as an offering in the Capitol, a golden Crown of two hundred forty six pound weight, and gave the Senat thanks, for that Antiochus, chus, by the persuasions of the Roman Embassadors, had drawn his Army out of Attalus's Dominions. The same Summer there came two hundred Horsemen, ten Elephants, and two thousand Bushels of Wheat from King Masiniſſa to the Army that was in Greece. There were also sent out of Sicily and Sardinia great quantities of Provision and Cloths to the same Army. M. Marcellus at that time was Governour of Sicily, and M. Porcius Cato of Sardinia; who, though he were a religious and an innocent man, was lookt upon as a little too harsh in restraining of Usury. For he expelled all Usurers out of that Island, and either retrenched or quite took off the charge which the Allies were usually at to maintain the Prætors. At this time Sext. Ailius the Consul being come back out of Gaul to Rome, to hold the Assembly [for chusing of Consuls] made C. Cornelius Cethegus, and Q. Minucius Rufus Consuls. Two dayes after, the Assembly was held for chusing of Prætors: in which there were (more than ever before) six chosen, the Provinces did so increaſe, and the Empire grew so much larger. Their names were L. Manlius Vulſo, C. Sempronius Tuditanus, M. Sergius Sillus, M. Helvius, M. Minucius Rufus, and L. Atilius. Of whom Sempronius and Helvius were Ædiles of the People, as Q. Minucius Thermus, and T. Sempronius Longus were the Curule [or chief] Ædiles. The Roman Games were performed four times that Year.

XXVIII.

Now Cn. Cornelius and Q. Minucius being Consuls, their first business was to dispose of the Provinces between themselves and the Prætors. But the Prætors had the precedence in that transaction, whose choice was to be managed by lots. In which affair Sergius happened to have the jurisdiction of the City, and Minucius a Foreign one: Atilius to have Sardinia, Manlius Sicily, Sempronius the hither Spain, and Helvius the farther. But when the Consuls were ready to part Italy and Macedonia between them, L. Oppius, and Q. Fulvius, Tribunes of the people obstructed it; for that Macedonia was a Province that lay a great way off: nor had any thing to that day been a greater obstacle to the War, than that the former Consul was recalled before he had well begun his business, in the very moment when he strove to carry on the War. That it was now four years since the War with Macedonia was resolv'd upon. That, in seeking out the King and his Army, Sulpicius had spent the greatest part of that year. That Villius, even when he was going to engage the Enemy, was recall'd without doing what he design'd. That Quintius was kept at Rome the better part of his year upon the score of Religion; yet that he ordered his affairs so well, that if he had either come sooner into that Province, or the Winter had been a little later, he might have made an end of the War. Nay even now, though he were ready to go into his Winter Quarters, he was making such provisions (people said) for the War, that, unless a Successor disturb'd him, he would in all probability perfect it the next Summer. By these kind of Speeches they so far prevailed; that the Consuls said, they would submit to the pleasure of the Senate, if the Tribunes would do the same. Wherefore seeing both sides gave way to a free debate; the Senate decreed that the Consuls should both have Italy for their Province; and continued T. Quintius in Commission, till a Successor should come. The Consuls had two Legions assign'd to them; being order'd also to make War against the Cisalpine Gauls, who had revolted from the Roman People. Quintius had a supply granted, to be sent into Macedonia, of five thousand Foot, three hundred Horse, and of Naval Allies three thousand, of all which L. Quintius Flaminius, he that was Admiral of the Fleet, was made Commander. The Prætors had eight thousand Allies and Latines assign'd them to go for Spain, and four hundred Horse; that they might dismiss the old Souldiers which were there; with a Command, that they should settle the bounds of the farther and the hither Province: whilst P. Sulpicius and P. Villius, who had been Consuls in that Province, were sent as supernumerary Lientenants into Macedonia.

XXIX.

But before the Consuls and Prætors went into their Provinces, they thought fit to take some care about the Prodigies [that then happen'd.] For the Temple of Vulcan and Pluto, at Rome, as the Wall and the Gate of Fregella, were fired by Lightning; it grew light of a sudden at Frasino in the night time; there was a Lamb at Asculum with two Heads and five Feet; at Formia two Wolves came into the Town, and tore some people that they met to pieces; and at Rome there was a Wolf that came in not only to the City, but even the very Capitol it self. At that time C. Atilius, Tribune of the People propos'd, That five Colonies might be sent to the Sea-Coast; two to the mouths of the Rivers Vulturnus and Liternus: one to Puteoli, and one to the Castle or Garrison of Salernum; to which they likewise added Buxentum. Thirty Families were ordered to be sent in each Colony, and three persons chosen to carry them thither, that should continue in that Office three years together, whose names were M. Servilius Geminus, Q. Minucius Thermus, and T. Sempronius Longus. Then both the Consuls having made an end of the Levy and other Affairs, divine and humane, which they had to do, went into Gaul. Cornelius straight toward the Insubrians, who were then in Arms, and assist'd by the Cenomanes; but Q. Minucius to the left side of Italy, toward the lower Sea; where drawing his Army away to Genoa, he began the War in Liguria. The Towns of Clasidium and Litubium, which both belonged to the Ligurians, with two Cities of the same Nation called Celela and Cerdicia, surrendered themselves. And now all places on this side the Po, except the Boii, belonging to the Gauls, and the Ivates, belonging to the Ligurians, were under his Command: of whom they said, that fifteen Towns, and twenty thousand Souls surrendred themselves.

From

From thence he led his Legions into the Territories of the Boii, whose Forces were not long before gone over the Po, where they had joyned the Insubrians and the Cenomanes; for they had heard, that the Consuls resolv'd to unite their Legions, and therefore they also were willing to strengthen their Army by putting themselves and their Allies into one Body. But when they happened to be told, that one of the Consuls was burning the Country of the Boii, they were streight all in a tumult. For the Boii desired, that they would all come in to their assistance; and the Insubrians said, they would not forsake their own Country. By which means their Armies were divided; and whilst the Boii went home to defend their own Dominions, the Insubrians with the Cenomanes sat down together upon the Banks of the River Mincius. Below that place five Thousand Paces did the Consul Cornelius likewise encamp upon the same River. From whence sending spies into all the Villages of the Cenomanes, and to Brivina, which was the chief City of that Nation, when he found, that the young men had taken up Arms without the consent of the Seniors, and that the Cenomans had not sided with the Rebels by publick allowance of all the Insubrians, he procur'd a Conference with the head men among them, in which he began to discourse, and did all he could to make the Cenomans revolt from the Insubrians, so as, that they should either take up their Ensigns and return home, or come over to the Romans. But though that would not be granted, yet this they promis'd the Consul, that they would either stand Neuters in the Field, or more than that, if there were occasion, would assist the Romans. The Insubrians knew nothing of this Agreement; and yet they had some suspicion, that their Allies would prove false to them. For which reason, when they had led their men out into the Field, they durst not commit either of the Wings to the Cenomans, lest if, through treachery, they should have given back, they might turn the whole Fortune of the day, and therefore placed them behind the Ensigns in the Rear. The Consul in the beginning of the Battle vow'd to build a Temple to Juno Sospita [Juno the Preserver of, &c.] upon condition that their Enemies were that day routed and put to flight. Whereupon the Souldiers gave a shout, saying, they would make the Consul perform his Vow, and with that ran in upon the Foe. The Insubrians were not able to bear the first assault; for some Authors say, that the Cenomans also, who in the midst of the fight on a sudden set upon their Rear, put them into a double fright both before and behind; and that there were slain in the middle between both Armies thirty five thousand men; five thousand seven hundred taken Prisoners (among whom was Amilcar, General of the Carthaginians, who had been the cause of the War) an hundred and thirty military Ensigns carried off, besides above two hundred Waggons. The Towns that had complied with the Revolters, surrendered themselves to the Romans.

XXXI.

Minucius the Consul had first over-ran the Boian Territories with extraordinary devastations; but, when they had left the Insubrians, and were come back to defend their own, kept himself within his Camp, supposing he must then have a set Battle with the Enemy. Nor had the Boii declined the fight, had not the News, which was brought them, of the Insubrians being defeated, quite damped their Spirits. Wherefore leaving their General and their Camp, they disperſed themselves about their Villages, each man to defend what he had, and totally altered the Enemies measures in the manage of the War. For having now no hopes of determining the matter at one bout, he began again to plunder the Country, burn the Houses, and take the Towns. At that time Clasidium was set on fire: and from thence were the Legions led toward the Ligurian Iuates, who were the only people that would not submit. And that Nation too, as soon as they heard, that the Insubrians were Conquer'd, and that the Boii were thereupon so affrighted, as that they durst not so much as try the fortune of a Battle, made their Surrender. About that time there were Letters brought from the Consuls to Rome concerning their success in Gaul; which M. Sergius the City Prætor read first in the Senate, and then, by order of that House, to the People: upon which there was a Supplication appointed to be made for four dayes together.

It was now Winter, and just at that time, when T. Quintius, having taken Elatia, was gone into his Winter Quarters in Phocis and Locris, that a sedition broke out at Opus. In which one Faction sent to the Ætolians who were the nearer, and the other, the Romans [to assist them.] The Ætolians came first, but the stronger Faction, shutting out the Ætolians, and sending a Messenger to the Roman General, continued Masters of the City till he came. A Garrison of the Kings had possession of the Castle; who could not be induced to stir from thence either by the menaces of the Optimians, nor the Authority of the Roman Consul who commanded it. The reason, why they were not presently Besieged, was this; that an Herald came from the King, to desire time and place for a Parley. That was a request which the Consul could very hardly grant: not but that he desir'd that the War might seem to be made an end of, partly by force of Arms, and partly upon conditions too. For he did not yet know, whether he should have a Successor sent him out of the new Consuls, or (which he had ordered his Friends and Relations, as much as possible, to endeavour) whether he should be continued in Commission. However he thought a Parley might be convenient; that he might have his choice either, if he staid, to dispose things toward a War, or, if he went off, toward a Peace. For this purpose therefore they chose the Seashore in the Malian Bay, near Nicea. And thither came the King from Demetrius with five Barks and one Man of War; attended by the Macedonian Nobility, and a famous Achaean who was banish'd his Country, call'd Cycliadas. With the Roman General there was King Amynder, Dionysodorus, Attalus's Embassador, Agessimbrotus, Admiral of the Rhodian Fleet, Phaneas Prince of Ætolia, and two *Achaean*s, Aristamus and Xenophon. Among these persons the Roman marching on to the extremity of the breach, and seeing the King come only into the Prow of his Ship, that stood at Anchor there, told him, We may discourse with, and hear each other more commodiously when we are nearer, if you will but come a shore. To which the King making Answer, that he should not take his advice, Quintius reply'd; Why, who is it, that you are afraid of? The King made this proud and King-like return; I fear no person, but the immortal Gods; but I dare not trust all those that I see about you, and, of all, the *Ætoli*ans least. Why, said the Roman, All men that meet to parley with an Enemy, are in equal danger as to that, that they may be betray'd. That's true, said the King, but then the reward of their treachery is not equal, if they should deceive each other, Phaneas and Philip. For it is not so hard for the *Ætoli*ans to put another Governour in the place of Phaneas, as it is for the Macedonians to find another King when I am gone.

XXXII.

shore

XXXIII. After these words had past, they were all silent, till the Roman began and said, he thought it fitting for him to speak first, who desired the Conference: to which the King reply'd, That it was his part to begin, who prescribed, not who accepted the terms of peace. Whereupon the Roman told him, He would be very plain with him; for he design'd to say such things, as that unless he perform'd them, there was no likelihood of a Peace. That the King must draw his Guards out of all the Cities in Greece; restore their Captives and Fugitives to all the Allies of the Roman people; deliver back to the Romans those places in Illyrium, that he had taken possession of after the peace was concluded on in Epirus; and give up those Cities to Ptolomy King of Ægypt, which he had invaded after the death of Ptolomy Philopator. That these were the terms which he and the Roman People would make: but that it was also very just, that the demands of their Allies too should be heard. For King Attalus's Embassador demanded the Ships and Captives that were taken in the Sea fight at Cius; complaining that Nicephorium and the Temple of Venus, which he had plundered and laid wast, were restored as though they had never been violated. The Rhodians demanded back Peræa (a Country upon the Continent, opposite to their Island, to which it anciently belong'd) and required, that his Garrisons should be drawn out of Jassus, Bargyllæ and Euromie, and in Hellepont from Sestus and Abydos: as also, that Panopolis should be restored to the Byzantians with all its ancient immunities, and that all the Mart-Towns and Ports of Asia should be set at liberty. The *Achaean*s redemanded Corinth and Argi: but as Phaneas, Prætor of the *Ætoli*ans, who desired much what the same thing as the Roman, (that the Macedonians should depart out of Greece) and that those Cities that were formerly theirs might be restored to the *Ætoli*ans; a certain Nobleman of Ætolia, call'd Alexander, who (among them) was reckoned a very Eloquent Person, went on with his Speech and said, He had held his tongue a great while, not that he thought they had done any thing to the purpose in that Conference, but for fear of interrupting any of his Allies who was a speaking. But now he could not forbear to tell them, that Philip did neither talk of Peace with any sincerity, nor ever make War with true Courage. That in his Parleys he was deceitful, and sly: that in War he durst not come to a fair push for it, or fight a pitch'd Battle, but running away used to burn and plunder all the Towns before him, and though he were Conquer'd, destroy the reward of those that got the Victory. That the ancient Kings of Macedonia did not use to do so, but were wont to engage in the open Field, to spare the Cities as much as they could, that their Empire might be the more opulent. For what policy was it by destroying those things, for the sake whereof a War is Proclaimed, to leave a mans self nothing but blood and slaughter? That Philip had wasted more Cities in Thessaly the year before, that belong'd to their Allies, than all that ever were Enemies to that Country. Nay, that he had taken more from the *Ætoli*ans themselves when he was their Ally, than since he was their Enemy. That he had possessed himself of Lyfimachia, after he had beaten out the Governour and the Garrison belonging to the *Ætoli*ans. That he had likewise utterly ruined and razed Cius, a City under their jurisdiction. That by the same fraud he now also had Thebes, Phthiæ, Echinus, Larissæ and Pharissalus.

XXXIV. Philip, being moved at what Alexander said, put his Ship nearer to the Shore, that he might be the better heard. But when he began to inveigh most bitterly against the *Ætoli*ans, Phaneas interrupted him, and said, The business did not depend upon words; they must either conquer, or obey better Men than he was. Ay, answered Philip, one that cannot see his way before him; deriding the imperfection of Phaneas's eye-sight. For he was naturally more apt to gibe, than becomes a King: nor could he even when he talk'd of the most serious matters forbear scurrility. But then he began to be very angry, That the *Ætoli*ans, as though they were Romans, should bid him depart out of Greece, who could not tell which were the bounds of it. For in Ætolia it self, the Agæzi, the Apodeotæ, and the Amphilochi, who are a great share of it, were not properly any part of Greece. Can they justly complain, that I did not let their Allies alone? when they themselves observe this ancient custom as a Law; to let their Youth go for Soldiers even against their own Allies, save that they do not publicly allow of it: and the adverse Armies on both sides have many times Ætolian Auxiliaries on both sides? Nor did I take

Cius,

Cius, but only assisted Prulias, my Friend and Ally, who was besieging of it: and defended Lyfimachia from the Thracians. But because necessity forced me from keeping of that City to look after this War, the Thracians are now possessed of it. So much for the *Ætoli*ans. Now to Attalus and the Rhodians I do not rightfully owe the least thing in the World. For the War was first raised not by me, but by them. Yet, out of the respect I have for the Romans, I will restore Peræa to the Rhodians, and his Ships to Attalus, with all the Captives that shall appear. But as to the restoring of Nicephorium, and the Temple of Venus; what can I answer to such demands? unless (which is the only way that Groves and Woods can be restored) that I'll be at the charge of planting them afresh: since the Kings are pleased to desire an Answer to all their several demands. The latter end of his Speech was against the *Achaean*s; in which, beginning first with Antigonus, and then proceeding to what he himself had deserved of that Nation, he bid them read over their decrees, which contain'd all honours, both divine and humane [to be paid to him] to which he added [by way of comparison] their late resolution concerning the Army, wherewith they had revolted from him [to the Romans] inveighing bitterly against their perfidiousness; but yet, he said he would give them Argos again. That he would discourse with the Roman General concerning Corinth, and desire to know of him, whether he thought it reasonable, that he should quit those Cities only, which he himself had taken in time of War, and was in that right still possessed of, or even those also, which he had received from his Ancestors.

As the *Achaean*s and *Ætoli*ans were going to reply to what he had said, it being nigh Sun- XXXV. setting, the Conference was adjourn'd till next day, and Philip return'd into the Harbour from whence he came, as the Romans and their Allies did into their Camp. The next Morning Quintius came to Nicea (for that was the place agreed upon) at the time appointed. But there came not so much as any Messenger from Philip for several hours: till at last, when they despair'd of his coming, the Ships on a sudden appear'd. And then Philip told them; That, seeing such hard and unworthy things were imposed upon him, he, not knowing what to do, had spent all that day in deliberating about that affair. But it was generally believed, that he deferred his coming till that time of day on purpose, that the *Achaean*s and *Ætoli*ans might not have time enough to make their Answers. And indeed he himself confirm'd that belief, by desiring, that all others might be sent away (lest the time should be taken up in wrangling) and he alone be admitted (to make some end of the business) to speak with the Roman General. That proposal at first was not accepted of, lest the Allies should seem to be excluded: but afterward, seeing he would not be deny'd, the Roman General by universal consent, removing all the rest, walkt along with Appius Claudius, Tribune of the Soldiers to the very Sea side, and the King, with two, that he had with him the day before, came a shore. Where when they had discoursed each other privately for some time, they parted. Now it is not certainly known, what account Philip gave his people of that interview; but Quintius made this report to his Allies: That in regard to the Romans, Philip would retire from all the Borders of Illyricum, would send back the Fugitives, and all the Captives that he could find. That he would restore to Attalus his Ships, and with them the Seamen that were taken in them: and to the Rhodians that Country which they call Peræa: but would not stir from Jassus and Bargyllæ. That he would give the *Ætoli*ans Pharissalus and Larissæ again; but not Thebes. And in justice to the *Achaean*s, would not only quit Argos, but Corinth also. But this design of his pleased none of all the Allies, out of whose Dominions he either would or would not depart. For they said, they lost more than they got by it; nor should they ever lay aside their animosities, till he had drawn his Guards out of all Greece in general.

The whole Assembly so loudly declar'd this, (one striving to out-roar the other) that XXXVI. Philip, though he stood a great way off, heard what they said. Wherefore he desir'd of Quintius, That he would defer the whole matter till the next day; at which time he would certainly either persuade them, or be himself persuaded into another opinion. Thereupon the shore near Thronium was appointed for their meeting; to which they came very early. And there Philip desired Quintius with all that were then present, not to destroy his hopes of peace, and at last desired time, to send Embassadors to the Senate at Rome, telling them, that he would either obtain a peace upon these conditions, or accept of any terms that the Senate should offer. That did not by any means please the rest; for they said, His design was only to gain time, by that delay, to reinforce himself: and Quintius also said, That was very likely indeed, if it had been Summer, and a season fit for action. But that now, since the Winter was come, they could lose nothing by giving him time to send his Embassadors to Rome. For neither would any of those things, which they agreed upon with the King, stand good, without the approbation of the Senate; and besides that, he had an opportunity (whilst the Winter continued, and made it necessary for them to lie still) to learn of the Senate what they resolved to do. To this his Opinion, the rest also, who were the principals of the Allies, submitted; and granting a Truce for two Months, resolved themselves likewise to send, each of them, Embassadors, to advise the Senate, that they might not be circumvented by the Kings Politicks. But it was added, as Surplusage to the Truce, that the Kings Guards should be all immediately drawn out of Phocis and Locris. Quintius sent Aminander, King of the Athamans, and (to make a shew of an Embassy) Q. Fabius (his Sisters Son) Q. Fulvius, and Appius Claudius along with the Embassadors of the Allies.

Oooo

When

XXXVII. When they came to Rome, the Embassadors from the Allies, were heard before those from the King. Now the rest of their Speeches was spent in invectives against the King; but they moved the Senate most of all, by demonstrating the situation of the Sea and Land in that Country: so far that it appeared to all of them, That if the King were Master of Demetrias in Thessaly, of Chalcis in Eubœa, and of Corinth in Achaia; Greece could not be free: and that Philip himself did not more contumeliously, than truly, call those Cities the Fetters of Greece. Then the Kings Embassadors were admitted, who at the beginning of a long Speech, had this short question put to them, Whether the King would quit those three Cities, or no? which interrupted them; they denying, that they had any Commission to answer to that particular point. Thus were the Kings men dismissed without concluding of a Peace; and Quintius had full power granted him to make either Peace or War, as he thought good. When therefore it sufficiently appear'd, that the Senate were not weary of the War, he himself also, being more desirous of War than Peace, would never grant Philip the favour of a Conference after that time, nor admit of any Embassy, but what should tell the Senate, that Philip's Forces were departed out of all Greece.

XXXVIII. Philip, seeing that he must needs fight for it, and that he ought to muster up as much force as he could from all parts; especially from the Cities of Achaia, a Country far remote from Macedonia (though he were yet more solicitous for Argos than Corinth) he thought it his best course to let Nabis, Tyrant of Lacedæmon, have Argos in Trust, as it were; so as that he should restore it to him again, if he happen'd to be Victorious, but keep it himself, if any thing happened contrary to his hopes or expectations. In order whereunto he writes to Philocles, who was Governour of Argos and Corinth, to go and wait upon the Tyrant. Accordingly Philocles, besides that he carried a Present along with him, added, as a pledge of the future Friendship between the King and the Tyrants, that the King had a mind to marry his Daughters to Nabis's Sons. The Tyrant at first said, He would not accept of that City on any other terms, than that the Argives themselves by their Decree would send for him to the relief of their City. But afterward, when he heard that they in full Assembly, not only despised, but also abominated the very name of a Tyrant, thinking with himself, that he had got a sufficient reason now to pillage them, He bad Philocles deliver the City into whose hands he pleas'd. Thereupon, in the night time, when all people were secure, the Tyrant was received into the City: where at break of day he seiz'd all the chief places, and shut the Gates. Some few of the Nobility escaped upon the first commotion; whose Fortunes were plundered in their absence: and those that staid there, had their gold and silver taken from them. Great Impositions were laid upon the Inhabitants, and those that paid their money readily were dismissed without any affront or corporal torture; but those that were suspected to hide or keep back any thing, were punished with all the severity that slaves could undergo. After which, he called an Assembly, and proposed two Laws; one, for the remitting of old Debts, and another for dividing of the Lands equally to each man his proportion: which were two Firebrands to them, that were studious in innovation to kindle and incense the Mobile against the Nobility.

XXXIX. Now when Argos was in the hands of Nabis, the Tyrant never minding from whom, or upon what condition he had received that City, sent Embassadors to Quintius at Elatia, and to Attalus, who wintered at Agina, to tell them, That Argos was now in his possession; and that, if Quintius would come thither to a conference, he did not doubt but all things would go according to his mind. Quintius, that he might deprive Philip of that Garrison also, having consented to come, sent to Attalus, to come from Agina and meet him at Sicyon, whilst he himself crossed over from Anticyra with ten five-bank'd Gallies (which at that very time his Brother L. Quintius had by chance brought thither from their Winter Quarters at Coreyra) to the same Port. Attalus was already there, who by saying, That the Tyrant ought to come to the Roman General, not the Roman wait upon the Tyrant, brought Quintius over to his opinion, not to go into the very City of Argos. Not far from the City there is a place called Mycenica, in which they agreed to meet. Quintius came with his Brother and some few Tribunes of the Soldiers; Attalus with a Kingly retinue; and Nicostratus, Prætor [or Chief Magistrate] of the Achaens, with a small number of Auxiliaries. There they found the Tyrant waiting for them with all his Forces; and as he marched forth arm'd, with a Guard about him, almost into the middle of a plain that lay between them, so Quintius, with his Brother and two Tribunes, and Attalus, attended only by the Achæan Prætor, and one of his Nobles, came unarm'd to meet him. The beginning of the Tyrants speech to them was an excuse, that he should come to the Conference arm'd, and with a Guard of armed Men about him, when he saw the Roman General and the King without Arms. For he said, he did not fear them, but the banish'd Argives [that were under their Command]. Then when they began to talk of terms of friendship, the Roman requir'd two things; the one, That he would make an end of the War with the Achæans; and the other, That he would send Auxiliaries along with him against Philip. To which last thing he consented; but instead of Peace with the Achaens, they had only a Truce granted them, till the War with Philip should be made an end of.

XL. There was also a Debate, rais'd by King Attalus, concerning Argos; the King affirming that that Nabis, when Philocles had Knavishly betrayed the City to him, as basely kept it; and Nabis, that he was sent for by the Argives themselves to defend them. Thereupon the King requir'd, that an Assembly of the Argives might be summoned, to know the truth of that matter. Nor did the Tyrant refuse it: but the King said, He ought to draw all his Guards out of the City, and leave the Assembly free, without any Lacedæmonians mingled among them, to declare what the Argives sentiments were. To which the King reply'd, That he would not; so that this Debate came to no issue; but they departed from the Conference; the Tyrant giving the Roman six hundred Cretans, and making a Truce between him and Nicostratus, Prætor of the Achaens, for four months. From thence Quintius went to Corinth; and came up to the Gate with his Regiment of Cretans, that Philocles the Governour of that City might see, the Tyrant was revolted from Philip. Then Philocles himself also came to a Parley with the Roman General: who advising him to go immediately and deliver up the City, receiv'd such an Answer, that he might perceive, he had rather deferred it, than that he denied the doing of it. From Corinth Quintius went over to Anticyra; and thence sent his Brother to make an attempt upon the Acarnanians. Attalus went for Argos to Sicyon. And there not only that City augmented the former honours which the King had with the addition of new ones; but the King also, besides that he had sometime before redeemed for them a piece of Land, sacred to Apollo, with the expence of a great sum of money, at that time too, left he should pass by a City that was in amity and alliance with him, without some mark of his munificence, presented them with ten Talents of Silver, and sixty thousand Bushels of Corn: and so he went back to the Fleet at Cenchrea. In the mean time Nabis, having set a strong Guard upon Argos, return'd to Lacedæmon; where considering that he himself had sufficiently plundered the Men, he sent his Wife to Argos to pillage the Women. Accordingly she, sending sometimes for the Ladies one by one, and sometimes several of them, that were related, together to her House, by Flatteries and threats got from them, not only all their gold, but, at last, all their Cloaths too, and fine Attire.

DECADE IV. BOOK III.

The E P I T O M E.

TIT. Quintius Flaminius the Pro-Consul made an end of the War with Philip, whom he defeated in a pitched Battle at Cynocephala in Thessaly. L. Quintius, the Pro-Consul's Brother admitted the Acarnans to a Surrender, after he had taken Leucas, their chief City. C. Sempronius Tuditanus the Prætor was slain, with his whole Army, by the Celtiberians. Attalus, who by reason of his sudden indisposition was carried from Thebes to Pergamus, died. Peace was granted to Philip upon his request, and liberty thereby given to all Greece. L. Furius Purpureo, and Claudius, being Consuls, subdued the Boii, the Insubrians, and the Gauls: for which Marcellus triumphed. Annibal having in vain endeavour'd to raise a War in Africa, for which he was accus'd to the Romans by Letters from the heads of the contrary Faction, for fear of the Romans, who had sent Embassadors to the Carthaginian Senate about that affair, went over to Antiochus, King of Syria, who at that time was providing for a War against the Romans.

THese things pass'd in the Winter; and in the beginning of the Spring, Quintius having sent for Attalus to Elatia, and being desirous to subdue Bœotia, which to that time was in a wavering condition, went through Phocis and pitched his Camp five thousand paces from Thebes, which is the Metropolis of Bœotia. From thence the next day, with the Souldiers belonging to one Ensign, Attalus, and the Embassadors that were come to him in great numbers from all places, he went forward toward the City, commanding the Spearmen of that Legion (which were two thousand) to follow him at the distance of a thousand paces. When he was about half way thither, Antiphilus Prætor of the Bœotians met him: the rest of the Inhabitants waiting, to see him and the King come, upon the City Walls. There were but a small number of Arms and Souldiers in sight to attend them; for the windings of the Roads and the Vales, that lay between, covered the Spearmen, who came after. When he was now come near to the City, he slacken'd his pace, as though he would salute the Company, that came forth to meet him. But the true reason of his so doing was, that the Spearmen might overtake him. The Townsmen, since the Lictors drove the Crowd before them, saw not the Body of armed men, who immediately followed, before they came to the Generals Inn. Then, as though their City had been betrayed and taken by the contrivance of Antiphilus the Prætor, they all stood amazed. For it was manifest, that the Bœotians had no room left for a free consultation in that Assembly, which was appointed to be on the next day. However they concealed their grief, which to no purpose, and not without some danger, they must have shewn. In the Assembly Attalus spoke first.

II. He began with what his Ancestors and he himself had deserv'd, not only of all Greece in general, but particularly of the Bœotians: but being now more crazy and infirm, than to endure the fatigue of making Speeches, he stopt of a sudden and fell down. Thereupon, whilst they carried the King away, the proceedings were interrupted. After him Aristæus Prætor of the Acheans, was heard with so much the more Authority, in that he perswaded the Bœotians to nothing else, but what he had formerly told the Acheans. Some few things were added by Quintius too, who extolled the Roman integrity more than their Arms or Wealth. Then a Bill, which was preferred by the Dicæarch [Chief Justice] of Plataeæ, and read, concerning an Alliance to be made with the Romans, was accepted and passed by the Votes of all the Cities of Bœotia, none daring to oppose it. Quintius having tarried at Thebes so long, as Attalus's unexpected circumstances requir'd, when he saw that there was no present danger of his Life, but only of a weakness in his Limbs, left him behind till he was well, and returned to Elatia, from whence he came. Where, having now made the Bœotians, as the Acheans formerly, his Allies (seeing he had all things secure and quiet belind him) he bent all his thoughts against Philip, and the remaining part of the War.

III. Philip likewise, at the beginning of the Spring, finding that his Embassadors brought him no hopes of Peace from Rome, made a Levy through all the Towns in his Kingdom, though he had but very few young men left. For their continual Wars for many years together, had so taken off the Macedonians, even in his time, that a great number of them were destroy'd, not only in the Sea-fights against the Rhodiens, and Attalus, but in the Land-fights too against the Romans. For this reason he was fain to list Boyes of sixteen years of Age for Souldiers, and recall some that were discharg'd from the Wars, if they had any strength left, to their old imployment. By which means having filled up his army, he at the Vernal Equinox muster'd all his Forces at Dium; where, being Encamp'd, he waited for the Enemy, but spent all his time in exercising of his men. In the mean time coming from Elatia, passed by Thronium and Scarpheæ, to Thermopylæ. There he called an Assembly of the Ætolians, which was summon'd to Heraclea [a place hard by] to consult what Auxiliaries they should follow the Romans with to the War. When he knew his Allies resolutions, he went forward upon the third day from Heraclea to Xymia, and Encamping on the Confines of the Ænians and Theffalians, staid for the Ætolian Auxiliaries. The Ætolians made no delay; but two thousand Foot, and four hundred Horse came after him under the Command of Phaneas. Thereupon, lest they should doubt of what he had waited for, Quintius immediately remov'd his Camp. And when he was got over into the Phthian Territories, five hundred Gortinians of Creet, under the Conduct of Cydatus, and three hundred Apollonians, all arm'd much alike, came and join'd him; as Amynander also with twelve hundred Athamans not long after did. Philip, hearing that the Romans were gone from Elatia, and being now to fight for all he had, thought it his best way to encourage his men; and therefore, having minded them oftentimes of the valour of their Ancestors, and the glory which the Macedonians had gain'd in War, he came now to those particulars which then were most dreadful to them, and to raise them even in those circumstances into some hopes of Victory.

IV. To the defeat which they receiv'd in the Straights near the River Amu, when the Alacædonian Phalanx [a Body of sixteen thousand Foot, peculiar to that Nation] was in a Contention, he oppos'd the Romans being beaten by main Force to Atrææ: and yet even there too, that they did not keep possession of the streights of Epirus, which they had blocked up, it was the fault, first, of those who were negligent in their Watches, and secondly, in the fight it self, of the Light-arm'd and mercenary Souldiers. For the Macedonian Phalanx would not only have stood their ground, but for ever continued invincible then had the place been convenient, and the fight regular. They were sixteen thousand men, and those the very strength of the Kingdom. To which were added two thousand Half Moon-Shield-Men, whom they call Peltastæ, with a like number of Thracians and Illyrians (out of Tral-lia) besides almost a thousand hired Souldiers from several Nations, that came in as Auxiliaries, and two thousand Horse. With these Forces the King waited for the Enemies coming. And the Romans had almost an equal number; only in the quantity of their Horse (because the Ætolians join'd them) they out-did the Macedonians.

V. Quintius having removed his Camp to Thebes in Phthioris, where he had some hopes that the City would be betrayed to him by Timon, who was Governour of it, came up to the Walls with a few of his Horse and Light-arm'd men. But there his hopes were so much frustrated, that he was fain not only to fight those that fallied forth, but to run a great hazard also, had not the Foot and Horse both been quickly alarm'd and come in time to his assistance. Seeing therefore that nothing succeeded according to his rash Conceptions, he desisted from making any farther attempt upon the City at that time: but knowing very well that the King was in Theffaly, though he had not yet certain notice which part of it he was come into, he sent his men all over the Country to cut and prepare Palisadoes for the making of Mounds and Fences. Now the Macedonians also and the Greeks too used Palisadoes, or stakes; but not such as were either with any convenience portable, or fit for Fortification.

Fortifications. For they cut down bigger and more branchy Trees than the Souldiers could well carry along with their Arms, and when they had fortified their Camp by placing such Trees before it, 'twas an easy matter to spoil their Fence. For seeing that the Trunks of those great Trees stood very thin, and that a great many strong Branches came out of them, which a man might easily take hold of, two or three young Fellows, at most, joining together might pull out one Tree. Which being done, the Fence lay open, like a Gate, nor could they easily stop the gap. On the contrary, the Romans for the most part cut light and forced stakes, of three, or, at most, of four Branches; not only that the Souldiers, hanging their Arms at their backs, might well carry several of them at a time, but they likewise fix and weave the Boughs into each other so thick, that it can neither be discern'd which is the particular Sprig of each stake, nor do the sharp Spars, being let in one through another, leave room enough for ones hand to go between; so that you can neither take hold of any one of them to pull it out, nor if you could, were it possible for you to remove it, the Boughs do so bind and fasten one the other: Besides that, if one should chance to be pluck'd out, it maketh not so great a breach but that 'tis easily fill'd up with another.

The next day Quintius (his Souldiers carrying each of them a stake that they might be ready to Encamp in any place) going forward a little way, and sitting down about six thousand Paces from Pheræ, sent Scouts to see in what part of Theffaly the Enemy was, or what he was a going to do. The King was near Larissa, where being inform'd that the Roman was removed from Thebes to Pheræ, he had a desire to have the Conflict over as soon as might be, and therefore drawing on toward the Enemy, he pitch'd his Camp about four thousand paces from Pheræ. The next day they both march'd forth as fast as they could to take possession of the Hills above the City, but stopt at almost an equal distance from that Summit, which they design'd for, within sight of one another; where they waited patiently till the Messengers came again, whom they had sent back into their Camp, to advise what they should do, now that the Foe had so unexpectedly met them. And that day indeed they never fought at all but were recall'd into their Camp. The next day about the same Hills there was an Engagement of Horse: in which the Kings Party were put to flight through the signal performances of the Ætolians, and forced into their Camp. The Fields thereabout being planted with great numbers of Trees, was a great hinderance to both of them, as were the Gardens also, in those Suburban places; besides, that the wayes were streightned with heaps of Stones, and in some places block'd up. Wherefore the Generals both at once resolv'd to depart out of that Region, and, as though they had agreed upon't, both went to Scotussa: Philip, in hopes of having Corn from thence; and the Roman, that by getting there first he might have an opportunity to spoil the Enemies Foraging. For a whole day (the Hills running between them with a continued ridge all the way) they march'd without seeing one another in any place. The Romans Encamp'd at Eretria in Phthiotis, and Philip upon the River Onchestus: nor did they even the next day (Philip having pitch'd his Camp at Melambium, as they call it, near Scotussa, and Quintius about Theridium in Pharsalia) certainly know, either one or the other, where the Enemy lay. The third day there was first some Rain, and then a Fog as dark as night, which put the Romans in fear of an Ambuscade.

Philip, that he might hasten his Journey, shewed no sign at all of fear, though after the rain, such a darkness covered the ground, and therefore order'd his Ensigns to be born forward. But such a thick darkness had enveloped the day, that neither the Ensign-Bearers could see their way, nor the Souldiers the Ensigns: infomuch that the whole Army wandering in nocturnal maze, as it were, after uncertain clamours, was all put into disorder. When they were got over the Hills call'd Cynocephala, having left a strong Guard there of Foot and Horse too, they pitch'd their Camp. Mean while, though the Roman kept in the same Camp at Theridium, yet he sent ten Troops of Horse and a thousand Foot to see where the Enemy was; admonishing them, to have a care of Ambuscades, which that obscure day even in open places would hinder them from discovering. When they came to the Hills where the Enemy lay, both Parties, being mutually frighted at each other, stood still as so many Statues. But soon after, having sent Messengers back to the Generals at their several Camps, and when the first terrour, which proceeded from their unexpected sight of one another, was over, they no longer declined the fight. The Battle was first begun by some few that ran out before the rest, and after that augmented by fresh reserves of those that defended them who were beaten. In which, when the Romans, who were by no means equal to the Foe, had sent Messenger upon Messenger to their General, to tell him how hard they were put to it, five hundred Horse, and two thousand Foot, most of them Ætolians, with two Tribunes of the Souldiers, that were speedily sent, recover'd their declining Fortune: so that the Macedonians, upon this turn, being sore prest, were fain, by Messengers, to implore the Kings assistance. But he, who expected nothing less that day than Battle, by reason of the darkness that so universally over-spread the air, having sent great part of his men of all sorts a foraging, was for some time at a stand, and knew not what to do; though not long after, the Messengers being very urgent with him, now that the Clouds were were dispers'd from off the tops of the Mountains, and the Macedonians were in view, who were forced among the rest into a very high Mountain, where they defended themselves more by the situation of the place than with their Arms, supposing (be it how it would be) that it was best for him to put all upon one push, rather than lose one part by not defending of it, sent Athenagoras, who commanded the hired Souldiers, and all his Auxiliaries (except the Thracians) together with the Macedonian and Thessalian Cavalry. At their arrival the Romans were beaten off the Hill, nor did they make any resistance till they came down into the more even Vale. But to hinder their flying in disorder, the Aetolian Horse contributed very much: They being then the best sort of Horsemen in all Greece; though for Foot they were out-done among their Neighbours.

VI.

VII.

VIII. This news was told with more joy than the success of the fight would bear; for many of them ran one after another, back out of the fight, and cry'd out, that the Romans being consternated were put to flight: which affirmation of theirs induced Philip (though before he were unwilling and dilatory, saying, that it was rashly done; and that he did not like the time nor place) to draw all his Forces out into the Field. The Roman also, perswaded more by necessity than opportunity, did the same. He left the right Wing in the Reer, having placed the Elephants before the Ensigns, and with the left, join'd to the Light-armour, march'd up to the Foe: telling them at the same time; That they were to fight with the same Macedonians, whom at the streights of Epirus, when they were hedg'd in with Mountains and Rivers, they (conquering the natural difficulty of those places) had forced from their Post and utterly routed: with them, whom formerly, under the Conduct of P. Sulpicius, they had overcome, as they lay in the Avenue going into Eordæa. That the Kingdom of Macedonia had been supported by Fame, not by strength: but that that Fame too was now at last quite vanished. By this time they came to their own Party, who stood in the bottom of the Vale, and, upon the approach of the Army and the General renewed the fight, making a sudden Effort, whereby they forced the Enemy to give way. Philip with the Shield-men, and the right Wing of the Foot (the strength of the Macedonian Army, whom they call'd [a Phalanx]) march'd up as fast as he could to the Enemy; Commanding Nicanor, one of his Nobles, immediately to follow him with the other Forces. When he came first up to the top of the Hill, and saw by some few Bodies and Arms of the Enemies which lay there, that the fight had been in that place, that the Romans had been beaten thence, and were now giving Battle near the Enemies Camp, he was exceeding glad of it: though not long after, when his men gave way, and the consternation was turn'd the other way, being uncertain whether he should secure his Forces in his Camp again, he was for some time at a stand. But when he had paused a while, seeing the Enemy drew near, and, besides that they were all slain that turn'd their backs, nor could be saved unless they were defended, yea that he himself had not leisure safely to retreat, he was forced, before some part of his men were come up, to run the risque of the whole business of the War, and therefore placed his Horse, and Light-armour, that had been in the fight, in the right Wing: commanding the Shield-men and the Macedonian Phalanx, to lay by their Spears, whose length was an hinderance to them, and use their Swords. And at the same time also, left the Body of them should be easily broken in upon, he took half of them from the Front inward, and made them doubling to stretch out their Ranks, so as that the Body of them might be long, rather than broad: he ordered them likewise so to close their Ranks, that all the men and arms might join to one another.

IX. Quintius having taken those, that were in the fight, in between the Ensigns and the Ranks, gave the signal with a Trumpet. Whereupon they say there was seldom ever heard such a shout as at the beginning of that fight was rais'd. For it happen'd that both the Armies set up their Huzza together: and not only those, who at that time were engaged, but the reserves also, and those who then were coming into the fight. In the Right Wing the King (whose chief help was the circumstance of place) fighting from the higher ground, had the better of it: whilst in the left, even then when the Reer of the Phalanx was at hand, being it was in disorder and not compos'd for fighting, they were in a consternation. The main Body, which was nearer to the Right Wing, stood and lookt on as if they had not been concern'd in the Battle: and the Phalanx that came up, more like an agmen than an acies, as being more fit for a March than an Engagement, was scarce got up to the top of the Hill. Quintius therefore, though he saw his own men in the Right Wing give way, put the Elephants first upon the Enemy, and attacked them as they stood thus discompos'd; supposing that the routed part of them would draw the rest along with them. And so it proved, for the Macedonians immediately turn'd their backs, being frighted with the first view of the Beasts. The rest also follow'd them, when one of the Tribunes of the Souldiers, joining with all the Souldiers belonging to twenty Ensigns, and leaving that part of their own Forces, which must in all probability needs win the day, wheeled about with a short Circuit, and set upon the Right Wing of the Enemy, that was running away. He might indeed have put any Army into disorder by setting upon them in the Reer: but besides that, their general consternation was so much the greater, in that the Macedonian Phalanx being heavy and immoveable, could neither turn themselves about, nor would the Romans (who (who a little before when they fought against the Front of them, gave way, lying then very hard upon their Reer) let them. But besides this, they were the less able to make resistance upon the score of the place too; for they had quitted the top of the Hill, from which they first fought (whilst they pursued the Romans) to the Enemy that was wheeled about upon their Reer. They therefore for some time were slain in the midst between the Enemies, but soon after a great many of them throwing down their Arms ran away.

Philip with a few Foot and Horse first took an higher Hill among the rest, to see what fortune his men in the left Wing had: but when he saw they were all running away as fast as they could, so that all the Hills round about glitter'd with Ensigns and Arms, he himself also went out of the Field. Quintius having pursued them very close, when he of a sudden saw the Macedonians advancing their Spears, not knowing what they intended by it, was concern'd at the novelty of the thing, and stop't his Ensigns: but when he heard that it was the custom of the Macedonians so to do, if they had a mind to surrender themselves, he design'd to give them quarter. But the Souldiers, being ignorant, not only, that the Enemies declin'd the fight, but likewise what the Generals mind was, made an attack upon them, and killing the foremost, put the rest into a confused flight. Mean while the King made toward Tempe as fast as he could; where he halted at Gonni for one day, to receive those that happen'd to escape alive out of the Battle. The Roman Conquerours in hopes of Booty, thronged presently into the Enemies Camp; but they found it for the most part already rifled by the Aetolians. There were that day slain eight thousand of the Enemies, and five thousand taken Prisoners; with the loss of about seven hundred Romans. If we will believe Valerius, who extravagantly augments the accounts of all things, there were forty thousand of the Enemies that day slain, and (which is a more modest lie) five thousand seven hundred taken, with two hundred forty one military Ensigns. Claudius also tells us, that there were thirty thousand of the Enemies slain, and four thousand three hundred taken Prisoners. Now I have not given the greatest credit to the least number, but follow'd Polybius, who gives an accurate account, not only of all the Roman affairs, but more especially of all great actions that have been done in Greece.

Philip having muster'd up all those, that by the various Fortune of the Fight, being scatter'd about, had yet made a shift to follow him, and sent several Messengers to Larissa, to burn the Royal Records, lest they should fall into the hands of the Enemy, retired into Macedonia. Quintius having sold the Captives and the Booty, part of which he gave to the Souldiers, went to Larissa, before he yet well knew what Country the King was gone into, or what he intended. Thither came an Herald from the King, under pretence, to desire a Truce, till such time as they could bury the dead, that were slain in the Battle, but really and truly to beg leave that he might send Embassadors [to him.] The Roman granted both these requests; and likewise bad the Herald tell the King, He would have him be of good Courage. Which words most mightily offended the Aetolians, who were fill'd with indignation, and complain'd, That the General quite alter'd by being Victorious. That before the fight he used to communicate all things both great and small with his Allies, who now were privy to none of his Counsels: for he did all things as he pleased himself; seeking an occasion to contract a private friendship with Philip; and though the Aetolians had born all the brunt of the War, the Roman would turn all the benefits of Peace to his own peculiar advantage. They indeed did not question but they had lost some honour; but why they should be neglected, they could not tell. They believ'd that Quintius, who was a man of a Soul invincible against such desires, had a mind to some of the Kings gold: and he on the other side was very angry (and that deservedly too) with the Aetolians for their insatiable covetousness of Booty, and their arrogance, in taking all the glory of the Victory to themselves; a vanity, whereby they offended the Ears of all men that heard them; besides that, when Philip was taken off, and the strength of the Macedonian Monarchy broken, he foresaw that the Aetolians would be reckon'd Lords of all Greece. For which reasons he was very diligent and industrious to make them cheaper and of less esteem among all Nations.

There was a Truce granted to the Foe for fifteen dayes, and a Conference appointed to be had with the King himself: before which time he call'd the Allies to an Assembly. Where having declar'd to them what terms of Peace he thought fit to make, Amynder King of the Athamans gave his opinion in brief thus; That he ought so to make a Peace, that Greece, even in the absence of the Romans, might be strong enough to maintain both that and its liberty. But the Aetolians were somewhat rougher; who having made some small Preface, said, The General did well and regularly in communicating his Counsels touching peace to them, who had been partakers with him in the War. But he was utterly mistaken, if he thought that he should either leave a lasting Peace to the Romans, or liberty to Greece, unless he either slew Philip, or at least drove him out of his Kingdom: both which he might very easily do, if he would use his fortune. To which Quintius reply'd; That the Aetolians did neither remember what the Romans custom was, nor indeed talk consonantly to their opinion: for that they themselves in all former Councils and Conferences had always discourst of conditions of Peace, for that they had no mind to fight it out even to the death; and the Romans, besides their ancient custom of giving quarter to those they had conquer'd, had given an extraordinary instance of their clemency in granting a Peace to Hannibal Hannibal and the Carthaginians. But to pass by the Carthaginians, as oft as they came to any Conference with Philip himself, they never proposed, or mention'd his quitting of his Kingdom: was the War grown now unexpiable [not to be atoned for] because he was conquer'd in a set Battle? That they ought to engage an armed Enemy with minds full of malice, but that in respect to a Conquer'd Foe, he had the greatest Soul that was the most merciful. That the Kings of Macedonia seemed to obstruct the liberty of Greece; yet, if that Kingdom and Nation should be removed, that the Thracians, Illyrians, and, after them, the Gauls, unciviliz'd and savage people, would overrun all Macedonia and Greece; and at last perswaded them, Not to remove those that were next to them, thereby to make room for greater and more grievous Enemies to come upon them. Whereupon when Phaneas, Prætor of the Ætolians, interrupted him and said, if Philip escap'd that time, he would e're long renew the War with much greater force, He reply'd, Do not raise a tumult, when you should advise with us. He shall be ty'd up to such terms of Peace, that it shall not be in his power to make War.

XIII.

This Council being dismiss'd, the next day the King came to the streights, that go into Tempe; that being the place appointed for the Conference: and the third day there was a full Assembly of the Romans and their Allies. In which Philip very prudently omitting those things (which in the former Conference had either been commanded by the Romans, or required by the Allies, and) without which no Peace could be obtain'd, of his own free will rather than to have them extorted from him, said, he would grant them all, and refer the rest to the Senate. By which concession, though he seem'd to have stop't the mouths of his greatest Enemies, yet Phaneas, the Ætolian, when all the rest were silent, ask'd him, But, Philip! What say you to us? Will you give us back Pharsalus, Larissa, Cremaste, Echinus, and Thebes in Phthiotis? Whereupon when Philip answer'd, that he would not hinder them from having it again; there arose a dispute between the Roman General and the Ætolians concerning Thebes: for Quintius said, it belong'd to the Roman people by the Laws of War; for that, when they were yet disengaged from all sides, he brought an Army to their City Walls, and invited them to enter into an Alliance, whilst they were free to revolt from the King, but they prefer'd the Kings Friendship before that of the Romans. Phaneas on the other side thought it reasonable, that according to the rules of Confederacy, all that the Ætolians had before the War, should be restor'd to them, and said, it was so at first provided in the League, that the Booty of the War, and all that could be carry'd or driven off, should be the Romans, but the Lands and Cities that were taken should be the Ætolians. But you your selves, said Quintius, brake the Laws of that Alliance, when you left us and made a Peace with Philip: which if it still continu'd, yet that would be the Law of the Cities which were taken; That the Cities of Thessaly came and voluntarily submitted to our jurisdiction. This was spoken with the assent of all the Allies, though it were not only grievous at present for the Ætolians to hear, but was soon after also the cause of a War, and of great mischiefs to them. Quintius therefore agreed with Philip, that he should give him his Son Demetrius and some of his Friends, as Hostages, with two hundred Talents; and for other things, that he should send Embassadors to Rome. For this purpose there was a Truce granted of four months continuance; in which time, if they could not obtain Peace of the Senate, Quintius engag'd to return the Hostages and money back to Philip again. They say, that the Roman General had no greater reason to hasten the Peace, than for that it was well known, Antiochus was providing for a War, and design'd to come over into Europe.

XIV.

At the same time, and, as some say, the same day at Corinth the Achæans routed the Kings General Androsthenes in a set Battle. For Philip resolving to make that his defence against the rest of Greece, had not only detain'd all the chief of them (whom he call'd forth under pretence of conferring with them, touching how many Horse the Corinthians could supply toward the War) as Hostages, but likewise, besides five hundred Macedonians, and eight hundred that were made up of all sorts of Auxiliaries, who had been there before, had sent thither a thousand Macedonians, twelve hundred Illyrians, with eight hundred Thracians and Cretans, who fought on both sides. To these were added Boeotians, Thessalians, and Acarnans, to the number of a thousand, all with Shields, and of the Corinthian youth as many as made up six thousand armed men; all which gave Androsthenes the Courage to go into the Field. Niceratus, Prætor of the Achæans, was at Sicyon with two thousand Foot and one hundred Horse, but seeing himself too weak both in the number and the sort of his Souldiers went not out of the Walls. The Kings Forces, both Foot and Horse, stragling about, wasted the Pellenian, the Phliasian, and the Cleonean Dominions; till at last upbraiding the Enemy with their Cowardise, they went over into the Sicyonian Confines: besides that they sailed about and plunder'd all the Sea-Coast of Achaia. But whilst the Enemy were so extravagant, and, as people, that think themselves secure, use to be so careless of what they did, Niceratus having some hopes of attacking them before they were aware of him, sent a secret Message through the Neighbouring Cities, what day, and how many armed men he would have meet him out of every City at Apelaurnum, a place in Stympalia. Accordingly they were all ready at the day appointed, and he, setting out immediately from thence went through the Phliasian Territories, in the Night, to Cleone, before any of them knew what he intended. Now there were with him five thousand Foot, consisting sisting partly of Light-armour, and three hundred Horse. Out of which number having sent a Party to see which way the Enemy were bent, he waited till they came back to inform him.

Androsthenes knowing nothing of all this, went from Corinth, and Encamped at Nemea, which is a River, that parts the Corinthian and the Sicyonian Borders. And there, having dismissed the one half of his Army, he divided the other half into three parts, commanding all the Horse to straggle about and pillage the Pellenian, Sicyonian and Phliasian Dominions. Now therefore these three Parties went several wayes. Which when it was told to Niceratus at Cleone, he sent a strong Band of mercenary Souldiers before, to seize the streights through which you go into the Corinthian Territories, planting Horse to march before the Ensigns, and himself immediately follow'd with a double Body of men. For on the one side march'd the mercenary Souldiers, with the Light-armour, and on the other, the Shieldmen, with the strength of the Forces of all the other Nations. And now the Foot and Horse were not far from the Camp, when some of the Thracians making an attack upon the Enemies, that were stragling and wandering about the Fields, put all the Camp into a sudden fright. The General trembled, who having never seen the Foe, but very rarely (upon the Hills before Sicyon, from whence they durst not come down into the Plains) could not believe that they would ever have approach'd so near Cleone. Wherefore he order'd that the straglers should be recall'd by sound of Trumpet, and himself straight giving the word of Command to his men to handle their Arms, march'd out at the Gate with a thin number of Souldiers, whom he marshall'd upon the River. But being that the rest of his Forces could scarce be got together and disciplin'd, they could not bear the first onset of the Enemies. The Macedonians were not only more than any of the rest about the Ensigns, but they made the hopes of Victory for a long time doubtful: till at last being left destitute by the flight of the rest, and seeing that two Armies prest them several wayes, the Light Armour on the Flank, and the Shieldmen and Targeteers in the Front, they also finding themselves over-born, at first gave ground; and then, being still pursued with the same force, turn'd their backs, and throwing away their Arms (since they had now no hopes left of defending their Camp) made toward Corinth. Niceratus sending the mercenary Souldiers to pursue these, and the Horse, with the Thracian Auxiliaries, against those that were pillaging the Sicyonian Dominions, made a great slaughter on every side, full as great as in the fight it self. Some also of those that had ravaged Pellene, and Phlius, coming back in disorder, and knowing nothing of the matter, as they return'd toward their own Camp, fell into the hands of the Enemies; and part of them imagining what the business was, by their running to and fro, had so divided themselves all over the Fields, that they were circumvented and taken by the very Hinds themselves as they wander'd about the Country. There fell that day fifteen hundred men, three hundred were taken; and all Achaia was then delivered from a great fright.

XV.

Before the Battle at Cynoscephale, L. Quintius having sent for the Nobility of Acarnania to Corcyra, which was the only Greek Nation that had continued in amity with the Macedonians, made there some progress toward a commotion. But there were two very great reasons, that kept them to their Alliance with the King; the one, their natural fidelity, and the other, their fear and hatred toward the Ætolians. The Council was appointed to meet at Leucas. But neither did all the people of Acarnania come thither, nor were all those that did meet, of the same mind. However the Nobility and Magistrates together so far prevailed as to make a private Decree for an Alliance with the Romans. That all, who were absent, took very ill, and amidst this disturbance and dissatisfaction of the Nation, there were two Noblemen of Acarnania, (Androcles, and Echedemus by name) sent from Philip, who not only prevailed to abrogate that Decree concerning an Alliance with the Romans, but also, that Archelaus and Bianor, both Noblemen of that Nation (for that they had been promoters of that opinion) should be condemn'd in the Council for Treason, and that Zeuxidas the Prætor, for having proposed that matter, should be turn'd out of his Office. The persons condemn'd did a rash, but, as it fell out, a very successful action. For when their Friends perswaded them to submit to the present juncture of affairs, and get them gone to the Romans at Corcyra, they resolv'd to throw themselves upon the mercy of the Mobile, and either by that means to mitigate their anger, or to undergo what fortune should offer. Whereupon when they came into a full Assembly, at first there arose a murmur and a grumbling noise from such as admired to see them come in; but by and by there was as deep a silence, as well out of reverence to their former dignity as pity to their present condition. Then having leave likewise granted them to speak, they began very humbly, but in the process of their Speeches, when they came to acquit themselves of the crimes laid to their charge, discoursed with as much confidence as innocence would afford. At last taking the boldness even to make some complaints, and to reprove not only the injustice, but the cruelty that had been put upon them, they so far moved the Audience, that they unanimously annull'd all those Decrees, that had been made against them; not that they thought themselves ever the less obliged to retain their Alliance with Philip, and refuse all Friendship with the Romans.

XVI.

XVII. These things were decreed at Leucas, which was the Metropolis of Acarmania, where all the people met in Council. Wherefore when the news of this sudden change was brought to Corcyra, to Lieutenant Flaminius, he immediately set out with a Fleet for Leucas, and came to an Anchor at a Port which they call Herens. From thence he came up to the Walls with all sorts of Instruments and Engines, that are used in the taking of Cities; supposing that he might make them submit upon his first terrible appearance. But when he saw no sign of Peace, he began to form Engines, erect Turrets [to make an Assault] and to plant his battering Ram near the Walls. Now all Acarmania, lying between Stolia and Epirus, looks toward the West, and the Sicilian Sea. Leucadia, which is now an Island, divided by a narrow arm of the Sea, which was cut through by Art, from Acarmania, was then a Peninsula, joining Westward by a small neck of Land to Acarmania. That neck of Land was almost five hundred paces long, though not above a hundred and twenty broad, and upon this streight was Leucas built, upon an Hill Eastward and toward Acarmania; but the lower part of the City was plain, and lay to that Sea, whereby Leucadia is divided from Acarmania. For that reason 'tis to be taken either by Sea or Land. For not only the narrow Chanel, which parts that and the Continent, is more like to a Pool than a Sea, but the Plains all thereabout are fit for Tillage, and easy to raise works upon. Wherefore the Walls in several places at once were either undermin'd or knock'd down with the Ram. But the City was not more liable to an Assault, than the resolutions of the Enemy were Invincible. For they laboured day and night to repair the breaches, and fill up the gaps that were made in the Walls; being very eager to engage in the fight, and to defend their Walls with their Arms rather than themselves with their Walls. And they had protracted that Siege beyond the expectations of the Romans, had not some banish'd persons of Italian Extract, who lived at Leucas, let the Souldiers into the Castle. Yet then also (though they ran down in a great tumult from that higher place) did the Leucadians for some time resist, with a Body, form'd as for a pitch'd Battle, in the Market-place. In the mean time not only the Walls were scaled and taken in several places, but they got over the heaps of Stones and Ruins into the City. By which time also the Lieutenant himself had with a great number circumvented those that were a fighting; of whom part were slain in the middle between the Enemies, and part, throwing down their Arms, surrender'd themselves to the Conquerour. And some few days after, when they heard of the Battle that was fought at Cynocephale, all the people of Acarmania came and surrender'd themselves to the Lieutenant.

XVIII. At the same time now that fortune inclin'd all things at once the same way, the Rhodians also (to regain that part of the Continent from Philip, which they call Perea, and had been long possess'd by their Ancestors) sent Pausistratus, the Prætor, with eight hundred Acheans, that were Foot Souldiers, and about nineteen hundred more, that were Auxiliaries gather'd up out of several Countries, and in different Habiliments of War, Gauls, Nisians, Pisians, Tamians, Areans, out of Africa, and Laodiceans out of Asia. With these Forces Pausistratus lay at Tendebe, a place very convenient in the Territories of Stratonicea, whilst the Kings men, that were at Thera, knew nothing of it. There came also very seasonably, as an addition to that aid, which he had gotten, a thousand Achean Foot with a hundred Horse; commanded by Theoxenus. Dinocrates the Kings Prefect, in order to recover the Castle, first remov'd his Camp to the very Wall of Tendebe, and from thence to another Castle, which was in the Territories of Stratonicea likewise, call'd Astragon. Where summoning all their Forces out of the Garisons, who were mightily disabled, together with the Thessalian Auxiliaries from Stratonicea it self, he march'd forward toward Alabanda where the Enemy then lay. Nor did the Rhodians decline the fight; but being both their Camps were near to each other, came presently into the Field, Dinocrates placed five hundred Macedonians in the right Wing, and the Agrians in the left; taking into the main body those that he had muster'd up out of the several Garisons, who were most of them Carians, and cover'd the Wings with the Horse. The Rhodian Regiment had the Cretan and Thracian Auxiliaries in the right Wing, and in the left the mercenary men, who were a chosen Band of Foot: in their main Body the Auxiliaries made up of several Nations, all the Horse and Light armour that were, being set about the Wings. That the two Armies only stood upon the Bank of a Torrent, that flow'd between them with a small stream; and, having thrown some few Darts, retired into their Camps. But the next day, being march'd in the same order, they had a far greater fight than was proportionable to the number of those that were engaged in it. For they were not above three thousand Foot, and about a hundred Horse; who fought not only with equal numbers, and Armour all alike, but with proportionable Courage too, and equal hopes. The Acheans first having got over the Torrent, made an attack upon the Agrians; whereupon almost the whole Army ran over the River. But the fight continu'd for a long time doubtful, till the Acheans who were themselves a thousand in number, made four hundred of the Enemy give way. Then all the right Wing began to yield; though the Macedonians, as long as they kept to their ranks, and stood like a close Phalanx, could not be stir'd. But when their left Flank being unguarded, they began to throw their Spears round about them upon the Enemy, who came came athwart to attack them, they were presently put into disorder, and making first a tumult among themselves, soon after turn'd their backs; till at last, throwing away their Arms, and running for it as fast as they could, they made toward Bargylla. Dinocrates also fled the same way: and the Rhodians, having pursued them as long as 'twas day-light, retreated to their Camp. Now it is very evident, that, if the Conquerours had gone immediately to Stratonicea, that City might have been taken without any more ado. But they lost that opportunity, whilst they spent time in recovering the Castles and Villages of Perea. In the mean time, the minds of those that were Ingarison'd at Stratonicea, were fortified; besides, that Dinocrates also not long after enter'd their Walls with those Forces that were left. For from that time it was to no purpose to besiege or attack that City; nor could it be taken till some time after by Antiochus. These things pass in Thessaly, Achaia, and Asia about the same time.

Philip hearing that the Dardans were come into his Dominions out of contempt to him for having relinquish'd his Kingdom, and had wast'd the upper parts of Macedonia; though he were hard put to it in almost all the World, now that Fortune was so severe to him and his Party, yet thinking it worse than death to be forced from the possession of Macedonia, he made a sudden Levy through the Cities of that Kingdom, and with six thousand Foot, and five hundred Horse, near Stobus in Paonia, surpriz'd the Foe. And there he slew a great number of men in the fight, but a greater, that were stragled about the Country for plunder. Those that could readily escape, and did not so much as try the fortune of the day, return'd into their own Country. He therefore having made that one Expedition much more successfully than to answer the rest of his Fortune, had thereby repaired the Courage of his men, and went back to Thessalonica. Now the Punic War was not so seasonably made an end of, left at the same time they should be forced to engage with Philip also, as, since Antiochus was now raising War in Syria, Philip was overcome. For besides, that it was more easy to cope with them severally, than if they had join'd their Forces into one Body; Spain too at the same time put themselves into a posture of War. Antiochus, though, having the Summer before reduced all the Cities, belonging to Ptolomy, in Celestria, into his own hands, he was gone to Winter at Antioch, yet was not afterward for all that the more at ease. For he with all the strength of his Kingdom, having muster'd up vast Forces both by Land and Sea, and sent before him, in the beginning of the Spring, his two Sons, Arduus and Mithridates, with an Army by Land (whom he order'd to stay for him at Sardis) himself set forth with a Fleet of a hundred men of War, and other small Vessels to the number of two hundred, designing not only to make some attempts upon the Cities that lay upon the Sea-Coast of Cilicia and Caria, which were surrender'd to Ptolomy; but likewise, to assist Philip (for the War was not yet made an end of) both with his Land and Sea Forces.

The Rhodians did many brave exploits as well by Sea as by Land, according to the fidelity they profess'd toward the Roman People, and the Dignity of the Greek Nation in general: but there was nothing more magnificent, than that they, that Summer, being no way frighted at the fatal War which then hung over them, sent Embassadors to the King, That they would meet him at Nephelida (a promontory of Cilicia, famous for an ancient League made with the Athenians) if he would not keep his forces there; not out of any hatred to him, but that he might not joy with Philip, and be an obstacle to the Romans whilst they were setting Greece at liberty. Antiochus at that time was besieging Coraceum; for that Town unexpectedly shut their Gates and kept him in action, after Zephyrium, Soli, Aphrodisias, Corycum, Selinus (to which he pass'd by a promontory of Cilicia, called Anemurium) with all the other Castles upon that Coast had, either for fear, or freely, without fighting for it, surrendered themselves. There the Rhodians had their audience; whose Embassy, though it were such as it might have incensed the King, yet he restrained his passion, and told them, That he would send Embassadors to Rhodes, with Commission to renew that ancient friendship with that City, which he himself and his Ancestors had formerly contracted, and to bid them not to fear the Kings coming. For it should not be any damage, or disadvantage to them or their Allies, since he was resolv'd not to incur the displeasure of the Romans. Of which, not only his late Embassy to them, but the honourable decrees of the Senate, and their answers to him were a good argument. At that time it happened, that the Embassadors came back from Rome, who had their audience and were dismiss'd, according as the time required, whilst the event of the War against Philip was yet uncertain. As the Kings Embassadors were transacting of this affair in the Rhodian Assembly, there came a Messenger, That the War was made an end of at Cynocephale. Whereupon the Rhodians, being freed from all fear of Philip, resolv'd to meet Antiochus with a Fleet. But yet they did not neglect that other business, of defending the liberty of the allied Cities belonging to Ptolomy, which were in danger of a War from Antiochus. For they sent Auxiliaries to some of them, admonishing and advising the rest concerning the Enemies designs; and were the cause of liberty to the Cainians, Minidians, and Halicarnassians and Samians. But it is not worth while to prosecute the whole relation of what particular things were done in these places, since I am scarce able to give you an account of those actions which more properly concern the Roman War.

At the same time also, King Attalus, who was sick at Thebes, being carried to Pergamus, died.

died in the seventy first year of his Age, after he had Reigned forty four Years. To this man fortune had given nothing that might make him hope for the Kingdom, excepting riches. But by using them at once both prudently and magnificently he so brought it about, that he himself first, and afterward others also, thought him not unworthy of the Kingdom. He therefore, having conquer'd the Gauls in one Battle (which Nation was by reason of their late arrival there more terrible than ordinary to Asia) took upon him the name of King, to the greatness of which he always made his spirit equal. He govern'd his Subjects with the greatest justice imaginable; and religiously kept his promise with his Allies. He left behind him a Wife and four Children; being mild and munificent to his Friends. He left his Kingdom so firm and stable, that the possession of it defended to the third Generation.

XXII. This being the state of things in Asia, Greece, and Macedonia, when the War with Philip was scarce yet ended, nor a Peace thoroughly concluded on, there arose a great commotion in the farther Spain; which was then the Province of M. Helvius. He thereupon by Letters acquainted the Senate, that the two petty Kings Colcas and Luscinus were up in Arms; that seventeen Towns resolv'd to rise with Colcas, and with Luscinus, those strong Cities, Cardo and Bardo, besides all the Sea Coast, who, having not yet declar'd themselves, were resolv'd to second their Neighbours motions. When this Letter was read by M. Sergius the Prætor, whose jurisdiction lay between the Citizens and Foreigners, the Senate decreed, that, after the Assembly for Prætors was over, that Prætor who happen'd to have Spain for his Province, should make report to the Senate as soon as possible concerning the War in Spain.

XXIII. About the same time the Consuls came to Rome, who, holding a Senate in the Temple of Bellona, and desiring to triumph for their successful Achievements in the War, has this request return'd upon them by C. Atinius Labeo, and C. Ursinius, Tribune of the people, That they might treat touching a triumph separately; for they would not endure that such a thing should be proposed in common, lest their honour should be equal, where their merit was disproportionate. And when Atinius said, that Italy was the joint Province of them both, where he and his Colleague did every thing by common consent and agreement; to which Cornelius added, That the Boii who came over the Po against them, to assist the Insubrians and the Cænomans, were by his Colleague, who wasted all their Villages and Country, turn'd back to defend their own Territories; the Tribunes reply'd, That Cornelius, they confessed, had done such mighty things in the War, that they could no more doubt that he ought to triumph, than that they ought to pay due honours to the immortal Gods; but yet that neither he nor any body else was so powerful, either in their favour, or his own abilities, as that when he had obtain'd a triumph for himself, he should impudently grant the same honour to his Colleague upon a bare request. That Q. Minucius had been engaged in some light skirmishes, scarce worth the mentioning, in Liguria; and had lost a great many Souldiers in Gaul. And then they named two Tribunes of the Souldiers, T. Invenicius, and Cneus, Labeo's Brother; who, in an unfortunate Battle, with many other stout men, both of their own Country and Allies, were slain: [saying] That some few Towns were indeed surrender'd, but that was only for a blind and a colour at that present juncture, there being no caution given along with them. These Debates between the Consuls and the Tribunes lasted two days, till the Consuls, overcome by the perseverance of the Tribunes, propos'd their business separately one after the other.

XXIV. Cneus Cornelius had a triumph decreed him by general consent, the Placentines and Cremoneses conferring their favour also upon him, and giving him thanks, whilst they remember'd, that they were freed from a siege by his assistance, and many of them, that were with the Enemy, redeemed from slavery. Q. Minucius, when he had hardly begun to propose his triumphing, seeing all the Senate against him, said, He would triumph in the Alban Mount, not only according to the privilege of a Consular General, but by the example of many brave men. Cn. Cornelius triumph'd over the Insubrians and Cænomans whilst he was yet in his Office. At which time he carried along with him many military Ensigns, and a great quantity of Gallick spoils, in Waggons that he had taken through [the streets.] Many noble Gauls were led before his Chariot, among whom some say, Amilcar, General of the Carthaginians, was one. But that which caus'd the Placentines and Cremoneses to gaze so much upon him, was the crowd of Husbandmen, with Caps on, that follow'd his Chariot. He brought in this triumph along with him two hundred thirty seven thousand five hundred Ounces of brass money, and of Silver, with the Picture of a Chariot stamped upon it, seventy nine thousand two hundred. He also gave his Souldiers, Centurions and Horsemen each man as much as his Colleague had given them.

XXV. After this triumph the Consular Assembly was held; in which L. Furius Purpureo, and M. Claudius Marcellus, were created Consuls. The next the Prætors were made; Q. Fabius Buteo, Tib. Sempronius Longus, Q. Minucius Thermus, Manius Acilius Glabrio, L. Apustius Fullo, and C. Lælius. At the latter end of that year there came a Letter from T. Quintius, That he had fought with Philip a pitch'd Battle in Thessaly; in which the Enemies Army was routed and put to flight. This Letter was first read in the Senate by Sergius the Prætor, and afterward by consent of the Senate, in a publick Assembly of the People. With that there was a supplication order'd to continue for five days, upon the account of their success in the War:

War: and in a short time after Embassadors came both from T. Quintius and the King. The Macedonians were carried out of the City into the Villa publica [a publick place in the Campus Martius] where they were splendidly entertain'd; and at the Temple of Bellona there was a Senate held. There was not much said, before the Macedonians declar'd, that their King would do whatever the Senate thought fitting. Thereupon there were ten Embassadors pitch'd upon (according to ancient custom) by whose advice L. Quintius the General was to propose terms of Peace to Philip, it being added as a Proviso in that Decree, that P. Sulpicius and P. Villius should be two of them, who had, when they were Consuls, been Governours of the Province of Macedonia. At that time the Cossanes requested that the number of their Colony might be increased, and a thousand were accordingly order'd to be added to them: provided, that there should be never a man amongst them who had been an Enemy after M. Cornelius and T. Sempronius were Consuls.

The Roman Games or Playes were that year not only set forth in the Circus and the Theatres, by the Curule Ediles, P. Cornelius Scipio, and Cn. Manlius Vulso, more magnificently than ever, but were also beheld with more joy by the people, upon the score of their success in the War; and whereas those were all acted over three times, the Plebeian sports were seven times repeated; being made by Acilius Glabrio, and C. Lælius. Out of the silver paid for mulcts, there were three brazen Ensigns made, that were consecrated to Ceres, Liber, and Libera. Now at the beginning of the Consulship of L. Furius, and M. Claudius Marcellus, when they came to treat concerning the several Provinces, and the Senate decreed, that they should both of them have Italy as their joint Province, they desired, that they might have Macedonia too. Marcellus, who was the more desirous of the two to have that Province, by saying, that the Peace [made with the Macedonians] would prove a Cheat, and was nothing but a pretence; for that the King, if the Army were once carried thence, would renew the War, had stagger'd the Senate in their opinions. And perhaps the Consuls had carried it, if Q. Marcins Rex, and C. Atinius Labeo, Tribunes of the People, had not said they'd interpose: unless they themselves had first propos'd to the people, whether they were for having peace with Philip. That propos'd was first made to the Commons in the Capitol, where all the thirty five Tribes consented to it. And that they might the more generally rejoice at the establishing of a Peace in Macedonia, there was sad news brought out of Spain, and a Letter publish'd, That C. Sempronius Tuditanus the Pro-Consul was defeated in a Battle in the hither Spain, where his Army was routed and put to flight, many famous men falling in the field: and that Tuditanus, who was carried out of the fight with a grievous wound, not long after expired. To both the Consuls the Senate therefore decreed the Province of Italy with the same Legions that the former Consuls had, and that they should raise four new Legions; two to be sent whither the Senate thought good, and the other two to go along with T. Quintius Flaminius, who was to rule his Province with the same Army, being continued in Commission by a Decree the year before. Then the Prætors chose their Provinces; L. Apustius Fullo had the City jurisdiction, Manius Acilius Glabrio, that between the Citizens and Foreigners, Q. Fabius Buteo the further Spain, Q. Minucius Thermus the hither, C. Lælius Sicily, and Tib. Sempronius Longus Sardinia. It was also decreed, that the Consuls should give Q. Fabius Buteo, and Q. Minucius, who happen'd to have the Spains for their Provinces, each of them a Legion, out of those four that they had rais'd, which they thought fit; with four thousand Foot, and three hundred Horse of the Allies and Latines. All which were order'd to go into those Provinces as soon as possible. The War brake out in Spain five years after the Punick War, and all commotions there had been once made an end of.

But before these Prætors went to the War (which was almost a new one, seeing the Spaniards then first took up Arms on their own heads, without any Punick Army or General) or that the Consuls stirr'd from the City, they were order'd, as it is the custom, to take some care of the Prodigies which were related. L. Julius Sequestris going into the Country of the Sabines, was, he and his Horse too, struck dead with a Thunderbolt. The Temple of Feronia in Capena was burnt with Lightning; at the Temple of Moneta the Heads of two Spears were on fire; and a Wolf, that came in at the Gate called Porta Esquilina, the most populous part of all the City, when he was come down into the Forum, had escap'd almost untouched out of the Vicus Tuscus [the Tuscan-Street] and Equimelium, through the Gate call'd Porta Capena. These Prodigies were atoned for with the greater sort of Sacrifices.

At the same time Cn. Cornelius Lentulus, who had been Governour of the hither Spain before Sempronius Tuditanus, having enter'd the City Ovant [i. e. with a lesser sort of triumph] by order of Senate, carried before him fifteen hundred and fifteen pound of gold, twenty thousand pound of Silver, with thirty four thousand five hundred and fifty pound of coined silver Deniers. L. Stertinius, though he did not so much as attempt to triumph, brought into the Treasury, out of the farther Spain, fifty thousand pound of silver; and out of the spoils made two Arches in the Beast-Market, before the Temple of Fortune, and of the Goddefs call'd Mater Matuta, and one in the Circus maximus, great cirque or ring, setting golden Ensigns upon the top of each of them.

These things pass'd in the Winter. Quintius at that time Winter'd in Athens, of whom seeing

XXVI.

U. C. 354.

XXVII.

XXVIII.

XXIX.

seeing the Allies demanded many things, the Bœotians desir'd, and obtain'd their request, that those who were of their Nation, and in Philip's service, might be restored to their own Country. That they easily gained of Quintius, not that he thought them worthy of such a kindness, but because now that Antiochus was grown suspicious, he ought to make all the interest he could in the several Cities for the Roman side. But when the Captives were return'd, it soon appear'd, how little the Bœotians were obliged by it. For they not only sent Messengers to Philip, to give him thanks for the restitution of their men, as if he and not Quintius, or the Romans, had deliver'd them; but likewise in the next publick Assembly that they had, they made one Brachyllas Captain General of all Bœotia, for no other reason, than that he had been Colonel of those Bœotians that fought under Philip; passing Zeuxippus, Pisistratus and others, who had been promoters of an Alliance with the Romans. That these men not only took very ill at present, but were afraid also for the time to come, when they saw such things done even now whilst the Roman Army sat just at their Gates; what would become of them, when the Romans were gone into Italy; if Philip were so near, to assist his Allies, and plague all others of a contrary party.

XXX. Wherefore whilst they had the Roman Arms so near them, they resolv'd to take off Brachyllas the chief of all the Kings Faction. And having taken a convenient opportunity for it, as he came home again drunk from a publick Feast, attended by a parcel of effeminate Fellows, who for mirth sake had been at the same place, he was set upon by six men in Arms (of which three were of Italian Extract, and three Ætolians) and kill'd. His Company ran away, and upon an outcry which they made there was a great tumult all over the City, of people running up and down with lights in their hands. But the Murderers escaped at the next Gate. At break of day there was a full Assembly summon'd by the Crier into the Theatre, as though some discovery had been made who were the Assassins. But it was openly declared there, that he was kill'd by his own Company, and those obscene Fellows that were about him: though in their minds they design'd to make Zeuxippus Author of the murder. Notwithstanding at present they thought fit to get them laid hold on that had been with him, and examine them first. Who whilst they were upon their Tryal, Zeuxippus coming into the Assembly with the same intention to purge himself of that imputation, said, they were mightily in the wrong who thought that such effeminate Fellows could be guilty of so barbarous a murder. And having argued very much to that purpose, he made some people believe, that if he had been guilty he never would have expos'd himself to the Mob, nor have mention'd any murder when no body provok'd him to it: though others did not doubt, but that by offering himself so freely, and impudently speaking of it first, he had a mind to obviate the suspicion of his being guilty. The innocent Wretches, who not long after were tortur'd, knowing how all the people stood affected, made use of their sentiments for a discovery; and named Zeuxippus and Pisistratus, without giving any reason, why they should be thought to know any thing of it. Yet Zeuxippus fled with one Stratonides in the night time to Tanagra, standing in fear more of his own Conscience, than the information of such men as knew nothing of the matter. Pisistratus despising the Evidence, staid at Thebes. Zeuxippus had a Servant who was his confidant and instrument in all the whole affair, who Pisistratus so much fear'd would turn Informer, that by his very fear he made him so. He sent a Letter to Zeuxippus, to take off his Servant, who was conscious of their crimes: for he did not think him so fit to keep counsel, as he was to do the business. Now he that carried this Letter was order'd to deliver it as soon as possible to Zeuxippus; but he, because he could not readily come to speech with Zeuxippus, deliver'd it to that very Servant, whom he believed to be of all others the most faithful to his Master, telling him, it came from Pisistratus, concerning a thing that mightily concern'd Zeuxippus. The Servant being smitten in Conscience said he would deliver it presently, but open'd it, and having read it over ran in a fright to Thebes. Whereupon Zeuxippus being concern'd at his mans running away in that manner, went to Athens, as a place more secure for a person in banishment. Pisistratus was put upon the Rack, and to some torment, whereby he was punish'd for his fault.

XXXI. That murder incens'd all the Thebans and Bœotians into an execrable hatred of the Romans, That Zeuxippus, one of the chief Men in their Nation, should be guilty of such an action. But they had neither strength nor a General fit to renew the War. Wherefore (which was next to making War) they turn'd Robbers, and fell upon some Soldiers, that were their Guests, and other that were straggling about their Winter Quarters upon several occasions; laying ambuscades upon the Roads at such and such cunning places with which they were well acquainted, whilst some part also were carry'd into Inns that were left empty on purpose and there made away with. At last they did those kind of things not out of hatred only, but for the lucre of booty also; because most of the Soldiers that had Money in their pockets were by permission of their Officers wandering to and fro where they saw good [or had a Furlow to go where they pleas'd.] But when at first some few, and then more still were daily missing, all Bœotia began to get an ill name, and the Soldiers were more afraid to go out of their Camp than they would have been in an Enemies Country. Thereupon Quintius sent Embassadors over all the Cities to inquire into their Robberies, who found many Foot.

Foot-Soldiers about the Fenn near Cope, where they took up several dead Bodies out of the Mud and Marshes, that had stones or other things tied to them to make them by the weight thereof sink to the bottom. Many exploits were found to have been done at Acrophia and Coronea. With that Quintius first order'd the offenders to be deliver'd up into his hands; and for five hundred Souldiers (so many were made away with) that the Bœotians should pay as many Talents. But they refusing to do either one or the other, and excusing their Cities with words only, to wit, that there was nothing done by publick consent, he sent Embassadors to Athens, and into Achaia, to declare before his Allies, that he was about to persecute the Bœotians with a just and a pious War: and having order'd P. Claudius to go with part of the Forces to Acrophia, he with the other part beset Coronea; the Country being first ravaged by the two Armies that went from Elatia two several ways. The Bœotians being mightily dishearten'd at this misfortune, when they had fill'd all places with terror and confusion, sent Embassadors [to him:] who were kept so long without the Camp, till the Achaens and Athenians also came thither. Now the Achaens had more authority in their requests, and resolv'd, if they could not have obtain'd a Peace for the Bœotians, to assist them in the War. By help of the Achaens therefore the Bœotians had the liberty to go and talk with the Romans, who, having order'd them to deliver up the Criminals, and pay thirty Talents for a Fine, granted them a Peace; and so retreated from the Siege.

A few dayes after there came ten Embassadors from Rome, who by common consent granted Philip a Peace upon these terms following; That all the Greek Cities, whether in Europe or Asia, should enjoy their liberty and their own Laws. That look which of them had been under the jurisdiction of Philip, he should draw all his Forces out of them; out of those that were in Asia, as Eumomus, Pedasa, Bargyllæ, Jassus, Mycina, Abydus, Thallus and Perinthus: for they would have them also to be free. Concerning the liberty of the Cians, that Quintius should write to Prusias, King of Bithynia, what the Senate and the ten Embassadors would have done. That Philip should restore their Captives and Fugitives to the Romans, and deliver up all his Ships of War: yea and one Royal Ship also of an almost unweildy bigness, which was rowed with sixteen Banks of Oars. That he should not have above five hundred armed men, nor so much as one Elephant. That he should not make any War beyond the Confines of Macedonia, without the Senates consent. That he should give to the Roman People a thousand Talents; the one half in hand, and the other half by several payments within ten years then next ensuing. Valerius Antias sayes, that he was to pay a Tribute of four thousand pounds of silver for ten years, and in hand thirty four thousand two hundred and twenty pounds. The same Author sayes, it was moreover put as a particular and exprefs Proviso in these Articles, That he should not wage War with Eumenes Attalus's Son, who was then newly come to the Crown. In confirmation of all this there were Hostages taken, among whom was Demetrius Philips Son. Valerius Antias sayes farther, That Attalus, though absent, had the Island Ægina, and Elephants presented to him, the Rhodiens Stratonicea in Caria, with other Cities that had been in Philip's hands: and that the Athenians had Parus, Imbrus, Delus and Scyrus surrender'd to them.

Now though all the Cities of Greece approved of this Peace, yet the Ætolians above all others were privately discontented at the Decree of the ten Embassadors, and said, That they in what they did had only made a vain pretence of liberty. For why must some Cities be deliver'd up to the Romans without being named? and others be named, which yet without being deliver'd up were order'd to be free? unless they would have those in Asia to be free, which are by the very distance of them more secure; but those in Greece not particularly taken notice of, as Corinth, Chalcis, Oreum, Eretria and Demetrias. Nor was their accusation altogether vain. For there was some doubt made concerning Corinth, Chalcis, and Demetrias; because in the order of Senate, by which the ten Embassadors were sent from Rome, the other Cities of Greece and Asia were freed without all dispute; but about these three Cities the Embassadors were bid to resolve what they in their own Conscience thought most conducive to the good of the Common wealth. At this time there was King Antiochus; who, they did not doubt, would come over into Europe as soon as ever his affairs were put into a posture that he liked. Wherefore they had no mind that such convenient Cities as those should lie open for him to take footing in. From Elatia Quintius crossed over to Anticyra with the ten Embassadors, and thence to Corinth: where he held a Council of them and said over and over, That Greece must be set at liberty, if they meant to rebate the Ætolians tongues, or ever desired to see the Roman name truly loved and valued by all men: and that, if they would believe him, he came over the Sea to deliver Greece, not to transfer the Sovereign Power from Philip to himself. The rest said nothing against that, touching the liberty of the Cities; but that it was safer for them to remain some little time under the protection of the Roman Empire, than instead of Philip to have Antiochus for their Lord and Master. At length it was thus decreed; That Corinth should be restored to the Achaens, and yet there should still be a Garrison in the Castle; that Chalcis and Demetrias should be retain'd till their care concerning Antiochus was over.

The time appointed for the Isthmian Games was now come; which were always used to be very much frequented, not only by reason of the natural inclination the Nation hath to that sort of shoves, in which you may see all kind of Exercises and Tryals, either of sleight, or strength, or nimbleness; but likewise because there was a general meeting of all

Greece;

Greece, which upon the score of the places convenience, through two opposite Seas, at that time flock'd thither. Now therefore being all big with expectation, what condition Greece was like to be in, and what their Fortune would be, some did not only muse in silence, but spoke out also. The Romans fate together to see the show: whilst the Cryer, with a Trumpeter, as the custom is, march'd forth into the midst of the Space, where in a solemn form the Games are usually Proclaimed, and having commanded silence, with his Trumpet pronounced these following words: The Senate and People of Rome, together with Quintius their General, bid all the Corinthians, Phocians, Locrians, and the Island Eubœa, with the Magnetians, Thessalians, Perrhæbians, Achæans, and Phthians (now that King Philip and the Macedonians were conquer'd) be at liberty, and live without any Laws but their own. He reckon'd up all the Nations that had been under Philip's jurisdiction: and at the hearing of the Cryers Voice there was more joy than the people could well contain. They could scarce believe they heard what was Proclaimed; but stood in admiration one looking at the other, as if they had been in a Dream. As to what concern'd each single man, they not believing even their own Ears, enquir'd of those that were next to them. Whereupon the Cryer was call'd back again (every one desiring not only to hear but to see the Proclaimer of their liberty) and order'd to pronounce the same words a second time. By which means their joy being now grounded upon a sure foundation, there was such a shout, with such applause set up, and so often repeated, that it was very apparent, there is nothing which the World calls good, more grateful to the multitude, than liberty. After that the Games were huddled over in haste, so as that no mans mind or eyes were fix'd upon the Show: one tide of joy upon that single account had so much over-whelmed the sense of any other pleasures.

XXXV. But when the Games were over, they almost all ran toward the Roman General: inasmuch that whilst the crowd rush'd in upon him, out of a desire to do him reverence, or kiss his hand, and threw Crowns with Ribbands to them toward him, he was himself in danger. But he was thirty three years old, and therefore not only the vigour of his youth, but the joy that he conceiv'd from the signal glory which he had gain'd, supply'd him with strength enough. Nor was joy of all people extraordinary at the present only, but they recall'd and continu'd it for many dayes by grateful thoughts and Speeches: That there was a Nation in the World, which waged War at their own charge, and with the hazard of their own Lives, to set others at liberty. Nor did they do so to such as border'd upon their Confines, their next Neighbours, or Countries that were upon the Continent with them; but cross'd the Seas; lest there should be any Government in the World that were not just, and that natural, moral and civil right might every where get the upper hand. That by the single Voice of a Cryer all the Cities of Greece and Asia were set at liberty. Which to hope for was an argument of a bold Spirit; but to effect a demonstration of great Courage and Fortune.

XXXVI. After this Quintius and the ten Embassadors gave Audience to the Embassies of the several Kings, Nations and Cities. But first of all King Antiochus's Embassadors were call'd in; who having said much what the same that had been said at Rome, that is, made a fair and specious pretence without any reality, receiv'd now no perplex'd Answer, as they had done before, when Philip being secure and potent, things were in a doubtful condition, but were plainly told, That their King must march out of all those Cities in Asia, that had belong'd either to Philip or Ptolomy; nor meddle with any that were free, or Greek Towns. But above all, that he must not either come over into Europe himself, or send his Forces over. Having dismiss'd the Kings Embassadors, they began to call a Convention of the several Nations and Cities. Which was done so much the sooner, for that the Decrees of the Ten Embassadors particularly mention'd, the several Cities concern'd. To the Orestians (which are a people of Macedonia) for that they first revolted from the King, were restored their own Laws. The Magnesians also, the Perrhæbians and the Dolops were declared to be free. To the Thessalians, besides the liberty that was granted to them, the Phthians, Achæans were likewise put in subjection, save only Thebes and Phalsalus, two Towns in that Region. But they refer'd the Ætolians (who desir'd that Pharsalus and Leucas might be restored to them according to their League) to the Senate at Rome. They granted leave to the Phocians and Locrians to act jointly as before, by virtue of a Decree: and the Achæans had Corinth, Triphylia and Hærea, (which is also a City of Peloponnesus) restored to them again. The ten Embassadors gave Oreum and Eretria to King Eumenes, Son of Attalus: but Quintius being against it, the matter was referred to the Senate, who gave their liberty to those Cities, and to Carystus besides. Lycus and Partheni were given to Pleurathus, which are two Cities of Illyrium formerly under Philip: Amynder being order'd to keep those Castles that in the time of the War he had taken from Philip.

XXXVII. The Convention being dismissed, the ten Embassadors, when they had divided their Provinces among themselves, went each of them several wayes to set the Cities at liberty: P. Lentulus to Bargylla, L. Stertinus to Hephestia, Thasus and the Cities of Thrace; P. Villius and L. Terentius to King Antiochus, and Cn. Cornelius to King Philip. Whom when he had enjoined to some other things of less moment, he ask'd him, Whether he could admit of advice, that was not only profitable but for his security also? To which when the King reply'd, that he would not only take it, but thank him too, if he said any thing that might be for his advantage; age; he perswaded him very earnestly, that since he had obtain'd a Peace, he would send Embassadors to Rome, to desire an Alliance and a Friendship with the Senate; lest if Antiochus should stir one way or other, he might seem to have waited for, and catch'd at an opportunity to make War. Philip was met at Tempe in Thessalia; where he made an Answer, that he would presently send Embassadors; and thereupon Cornelius came to Thermopyla, where a full Assembly of all Greece (called the Pylaicum) is usually on set dayes held. There he admonish'd the Ætolians more than any others, that they would continue faithful and constant in their friendship to the Romans. Upon which some of the Ætolian Nobility complain'd, that the Romans did not shew the same affection to their Nation since the Victory, as they had done in the War: whilst others more vehemently accused and upbraided him, saying, That it was not only impossible for the Romans to have conquer'd Philip without the Ætolians to assist them, but they could not so much as have come into Greece without them. To which the Roman forbore to Answer, lest the matter should have proceeded to a quarrel, and only said, they would be sure to have all the justice imaginable done them, if they sent Embassadors to Rome. Whereupon by his advice they pitch'd upon Embassadors: and thus was the War with Philip made an end of.

Whilst these things pass in Greece, Macedonia and Asia, a Conspiracy of the Servants had like to have put Etruria into a Warlike posture. But Manius Acilius the Prætor (who had the jurisdiction between Citizens and Foreigners) being sent to inquire into, and suppress it, with one of the two City Legions, overcame some of them that were gather'd to an head, in open fight (of which many were slain, and many taken) but drubbing others who were the chief Conspirators, hang'd them up upon Crosses; restoring the rest to their former Masters. The Consuls went into their Provinces. But when Marcellus was just got into the Confines of the Boii, and since his Souldiers were now quite tired with marching a whole day together, was Encamping upon a certain Bank, Corolamus King of the Boii, set upon him with a great Army, and kill'd to the number of three thousand men. In that tumultuary Battle there fell some very eminent persons; among whom were the Prefects of the Allies, T. Sempronius Gracchus, M. Junius Sullanus, and two Tribunes of the Souldiers of the second Legion, A. Ogulnius and P. Claudius. Notwithstanding the Romans made all the haste they could to finish the Fortifications of their Camp, and kept it, so that the Enemy, though they had been successful in the late fight, attempted it to no purpose. After that for some dayes together, Marcellus kept in the same Post, till he had cured his wounded men, and recover'd his Souldiers Courage from the fright they had been put into. Thereupon the Boii being a Nation that cannot endure to stay long in a place, got away into their Forts and Villages: and Marcellus immediately passing the Po, march'd into the Territories of Comum, where the Insubrians, who had perswaded the Comians to take up Arms, were then Encamped. The Legions join'd Battle upon the rode: in which the Enemy at first charged up so briskly, that they made the Antesignani [those Souldiers that were before the Ensigns] give way. Which when Marcellus perceived, he fearing lest if they were once removed they might be absolutely routed, opposed the Marsian Regiment, and sent all the Troops of Latine Horse out to meet the Foe. By whose first and second effort the violence of the Enemy was so far rebated, that the rest of the Roman Army being thereby encourag'd, first stood their ground, and then fell fiercely on. Nor could the Gauls any longer endure the shock, but turn'd their backs and ran away as hard as they could drive. Valerius Antias tells us, that in that fight there were above forty thousand men slain; four hundred and seven military Ensigns taken, with four hundred thirty two Waggon, and a great many gold Chains, one of which being of a great weight, Claudius sayes, was laid up as an offering in the Temple of Jupiter in the Capitol. The Gallick Camp was that day taken and rifled; and so was Comum within a few dayes after. After that twenty eight Castles revolted to the Consul. But this also is a doubt among Writers, whether the Consul led his Army first into the Country of the Boii, or the Insubrians, to obliterate the memory of an unfortunate, with a successful Battle; or whether the Victory gain'd at Comum were disparaged by the defeat which he receiv'd among the Boii.

About the time that these things were transacted with such variety of Fortune, L. Furius Purpureo, the other Consul, came through Umbria into the Boian Dominions. Where when he was got near to a Castle called Mutilum, fearing lest he might be hedg'd in by the Boii and Ligurians together, he marched back the same way that he came, till by a long Circuit about (through an open, Champaign Country, which was for that reason the more secure) he met with his Colleague; who joining his Forces with him, they first of all ravaged all the Boian Territories as far as the Town called Felsina. But that City, the other Castles, and most of the Boii, except the youth, which were in Arms upon a very great occasion (and then were retired into the pathless Woods) came and submitted to them. Then they led their Army into Liguria, whether the Boii, supposing that they might surprize the Romans (who were negligent in their marching) because they themselves seem'd to be at a great distance from them, follow'd through by wayes. But not over-taking them, they presently cross'd the Po in Boats, and having pillaged the Lævians and the Libyans, as they return'd back again, in the very Confines of Liguria, laden with the spoil of the Country, they light upon the Roman Army. With that they engaged more suddenly and sharply than if they had come prepared to fight at a time and place appointed for it. There it appear'd, what force passion had to instigate mens minds. For the Romans were so much more desirous of slaughter than of Victory, that they scarce left the Enemy a Messenger to carry the news of their defeat. For that action upon the receipt of the Consuls Letters at Rome, there was a Supplication order'd for three dayes together. Soon after Marcellus came to Rome, and had a triumph granted him by general consent of the Senate: so that he triumph'd in the time of his Office over the Insubrians and Comians. But he left the hopes of a triumph upon the score of the Boii to his Collegue; for that though he himself had been unfortunate in a Battle against that people, his Partner had met with better success. Many spoils were brought along in the Enemies Waggon that he had taken, with many military Ensigns, three hundred and twenty thousand pounds of brasse money, and of silver stamped with a Chariot, two hundred thirty four thousand pound. Out of which he gave to each Foot-Souldier eight hundred Asses, and three times as much to every Horseman and Centurion.

XL. The same Year King Antiochus, happening to Winter at Ephesus, endeavoured to reduce all the Cities of Asia to their old form of Government: for the rest, he supposed, either because they were situated in Champaign Places, or that they had but little confidence in the Walls, Arms, or Youth, would easily receive his Yoke. Smyrna and Lampsacus were then at Liberty; and therefore there was some danger, lest, if he should wink at them, whom he fear'd, the other Cities in Aeolus and Ionia would follow the example of Smyrna, and those in Hellepont of Lampsacus. He therefore sent from Ephesus to besiege Smyrna, and commanded, that the Forces which were at Abydus, save only a small guard that they should leave there, should be drawn out to attack Lampsacus. Nor did he only terrifie them by force, but by his Embassadors also, speaking kindly to them, and rebuking them for their rashness and stubbornness, endeavoured to make them hope, That they should shortly enjoy what they desired; and said, That then it would be sufficiently evident not only to them, but to all others, that they had gain'd their liberty of the King very fairly, and not by any subtilty or surprise. To which they replied, That Antiochus ought not either to wonder or be angry, if they could not well endure to have their hopes of liberty differ'd. After this, in the beginning of the Spring he setting sail from Ephesus went to Hellepont, but sent his Land Forces over to Madytum, a City of Chersonesus, where he joyn'd his Sea and Land Army into one Body. And seeing that they had shut their Gates, he invested the Walls with Soldiers; but as he was making his Works ready, and planting his Engines against them, they surrendered, being followed by all the other Cities of Chersonesus, who through the same principle of fear were induced to do the same thing. Thence he went with all his Land and Sea Forces together to Lyfimachia; which when he found deserted and almost all turn'd into heaps of rubbish (for the Thracians had taken, and sack'd, and burnt it some few Years before) he was desirous to repair so noble a City that was so well situated. Whereupon he began with all the care imaginable, not only to rebuild the Walls and Houses [that were down] but likewise, partly to redeem the Lyfimachians that were in slavery, and partly to seek out and get together such as were fled and scattered about Hellepont and Chersonesus; besides that he added new Inhabitants also, through hopes of advantage which he propos'd to them, and used all means he might to make it populous. And that he might remove their fear of the Thracians, he himself went with one half of his Land Forces to plunder the adjacent parts of Thrace, leaving the other half and all his Seamen to assist at the rebuilding of the City.

XLI. At this time also C. Cornelius, who was sent to decide the Controversies between the two Kings, Antiochus and Ptolomy, resided at Selymbria; and, of the ten Embassadors, P. Lentulus from Baryllis, with P. Villius and L. Terentius from Thassus came to Lyfimachia; where L. Cornelius likewise from Selymbria, and after a few days Antiochus too out of Thrace came and met him. The first interview between him and the Embassadors, as their invitation also afterward, was kind and hospitable. But when they began to talk of their business and the present state of Asia, their minds were exasperated. The Romans said, That all he had done, since he set sail with his Fleet from Syria, was contrary to the Senates inclinations, and that they thought it reasonable, he should restore to Ptolomy all those Cities, that had been subject to him. Nor did they think it tolerable that he should have those Cities neither, which, when they were in Philip's possession, Antiochus had seized whilst Philip was employed in the War against the Romans; that is, that the Romans should have taken so much pains, and undergone so many dangers for so many Years together, and Antiochus have the reward of it. But though his coming into Asia might be winked at by the Romans, as not at all concerning them, yet now, when he was come with all his Sea and Land Forces over into Europe, how far was he from declaring open War against the Romans? But he indeed, though he came into Italy it self, would deny [that he had any such design].

XLII. To this the King replied, and told them, He saw very well long before that time, that the Romans were very inquisitive into the Actions of King Antiochus; but never considered, how far they themselves ought to go by Land and Sea: That Asia did not at all belong to the People of Rome; nor ought they any more to inquire, what Antiochus did in Asia, than Antiochus, what the Roman People

People did in Italy. As to Ptolomy, from whom they complained that he had taken such and such Cities, he not only was at present Ptolomy's Friend, but endeavour'd also shortly to contract an affinity with him. Nor did he seek for any spoils out of Ptolomy's broken Fortune, or was come with his Army into Europe, to oppose the Romans, but to recover the Cities in Chersonesus and Thrace. For he was the rightful Lord of them, it being originally the Kingdom of Lyfimachus: upon whose defeat all that had been his, and by the Law of Arms became Seleucus's, he thought belong'd to him. That, when his Ancestors were taken up with looking after other things, Ptolomy first had possess'd himself of some part of them, and then Philip usurp'd the rest; as some of the nearest parts of Thrace, which without doubt belonged to Lyfimachus. That he came to reduce those places to their ancient condition: and to rebuild Lyfimachia, which the Thracians had demolished, that his Son Seleucus might make that the seat of his Kingdom.

When these disputes had continued for some days, there was a report spread abroad, XLIII. without any known Author for it, concerning the Death of Ptolomy, so that there was no end made of those discourses. For both sides pretended that they heard so. Thereupon L. Cornelius, who was sent Embassador to the two Kings, Antiochus and Ptolomy, desired a convenient space of time to go and speak with Ptolomy; that he, before any disturbance was made in the new possession of that Kingdom, might come into Egypt; whilst Antiochus thought that Egypt would be his, if he had then an opportunity. He therefore, having dismiss'd the Romans, and left his Son Seleucus with his Land-Forces to rebuild Lyfimachia, according to his design, himself sail'd with all his Fleet to Ephesus; where having sent Embassadors to Quintius, who should pretend to treat with him concerning an Alliance, he coasted along by Asia, and came into Lycia. But there though he knew that Ptolomy dwelt then at Patara, yet he omitted the design of sailing into Egypt. Notwithstanding he went toward Cyprus; but when he was past the Chelidonian Promontory was laid for some small time, by a mutiny among his Seamen, in Pamphylia, near the River Eurymedon. From thence he was going to the head (as they call it) of the River Sarus, but a mighty tempest arose and drown'd both him and all his Fleet. Many of his Ships were cast on Shore, and many others so swallow'd up by the Sea, that never a man escap'd to the Land. A great number of men were lost at that time, not only of Sailors, and private Souldiers, but even of his most eminent Friends. Wherefore having gather'd up the reliques of the wreck, seeing that he could not possibly get to Cyprus, he returned to Seleucia with a much less Army than he brought from home. There when he had order'd his Ships to be haled up into the Docks (for it was now Winter) he himself went on to winter at Antiochia. And in this posture were the two Kings affairs.

That was the first year that ever there were Triumviri Epulones [i.e. Three Officers created to take care of the sacred Feasts at the time of Sacrificing] made at Rome; whose names were C. Licinius Lucullus, T. Romuleius (who propos'd the Law for their being created) and P. Porcius Leca. To these Triumviri also, as to the chief Priests, was allow'd by the same Law the wearing of a white Gown guarded with Purple, called Toga praetexta. But the City Questors, Q. Fabius Labeo, and L. Aurelius, that year had a great contest with all the Priests in general. They had need of money, because they were to pay the last payment of the money lent toward the carrying on of the War to those private persons [of whom it was borrow'd.] The Questors therefore demanded of the Augurs and Priests the arrears of contribution which in the time of the War they had not paid. Thereupon the Priests appealed to the Tribunes, but all in vain; for the stipend or aid-money was exacted from them for all those years that they had not paid it. The same Year two of the chief-Priests dy'd, and two more were put in their rooms, M. Marcellus the Consul in the place of C. Sempronius Tuditanus, who died, whilst he was Praetor, in Spain, and L. Valerius in the room of M. Cornelius Cethegus. Q. Fabius Maximus also, the Augur, or Soothsayer died very young, before he had served an Office in the State; nor was there any Augur that year put in his place. Then the Consular Assembly was held by M. Marcellus the Consul, in which there were created Consuls L. Valerius Flaccus and M. Porcius Cato. After that they chose the Praetors, who were C. Fabricius Luscinus, C. Atinius Labeo, Manlius Vulso, Ap. Claudius Nero, P. Manlius and P. Porcius Leca. The Curule Aediles, who were M. Fulvius Nobilior, and C. Flaminius, distributed ten hundred thousand Bushels of Wheat among the people at two Asses the Bushel; which Corn the Sicilians had brought to Rome out of respect to C. Flaminius himself, as well as to his Father. But Flaminius let his Collegue partake with him in the peoples thanks for it. That year the Roman Games were not only magnificently set forth but perform'd quite through thrice over. The Aediles of the people, Cn. Domitius Aenobarbus, and C. Scribonius, chief Curio [i.e. Alderman] brought a good many Graziers to justice before the people; of whom there were three condemn'd: and out of their Fines they built a Temple to Faunus in an Isle [that was in the Tiber.] The Plebeian Games were celebrated for two days, and there was a Feast upon the same account.

When L. Valerius Flaccus, and M. Porcius, the day that they enter'd upon their Office, XLIV. had propos'd to the Senate the division of the several Provinces, the Senate thought fit, that since there was a War bro'g out in Spain only, for which reason of consequence they should want both a Consul General, and a Consul Army, the two Consuls should either agree between themselves concerning the hither Spain and Italy for their Provinces, or cast Lots for them. He that happen'd to have Spain, should carry along with him two Legions, five thousand Allies of the Latine Nation, and five hundred Horse, with twenty long Ships. That the other Consul should raise two Legions, which were enough to keep the Province of Gaul in awe, since the Insubrians and Boians were subdu'd the year before. Cato chanced to get Spain, and Valerius Italy: and then the Prætors chose their Provinces. C. Fabricius Luscinus had the City, C. Atinius Labeo the Foreign jurisdiction, Cn. Manlius Vulso Sicily, Ap. Claudius Nero the farther Spain, P. Porcius Leca Pisa (that he might be on the back of the Ligurians) and P. Manlius was sent as an assistant to the Consul into the hither Spain. T. Quintius, now that not only Antiochus and the Atolians, but Nabis also, Tyrant of Lacedemon, was suspected, was continu'd in Commission a year longer, and to have two Legions. To which if there was any supplement wanting, the Consuls were order'd to raise men, and send them into Macedonia. Ap. Claudius the Prætor had leave to raise (besides the Legions which he had of Q. Fabius) two thousand Foot and two hundred fresh Horse. And the like number of new Horse and Foot was granted to P. Manlius for the service in the hither Spain, with the Legion that had been commanded by the Prætor Minucius. P. Porcius Leca also had two thousand Foot, and five hundred Horse out of the Gallick Army, allotted him for the defence of Etruria about Pisa; Sempronius Longus being continu'd in Commission at Sardinia.

XLVI. The Provinces being thus divided, the Consuls before they went from the City, did sacrifice upon the score of the Spring, by order of the chief Priests: that being a thing which A. Cornelius Mammula the Prætor had vow'd to do by the Senates approbation, and the peoples consent, and was done twenty one years after it was vow'd, when Cn. Servilius and P. Flaminius were Consuls. At the same time C. Claudius, Son of Appius [surnamed] Pulcher, was chosen Augur in the place of Q. Fabius Maximus, who died the year before, and was then inaugurated [i. e. install'd.] Now when all people were admiring, that the War rais'd in Spain should be neglected: there was a Letter brought from Q. Minucius, That he had fought a successful pitch'd Battle, at a Town call'd Turba, with Budares and Belsides, the Spanish Generals, in which he had slain twelve thousand of the Enemies, taken Budares Prisoner, and routed all the rest. Which Letter being read, they were in less fear of Spain, from whence they expected a mighty War. But all their cares, after the arrival of the ten Embassadors, were employ'd upon King Antiochus. For they told them (after they had first given an account of the transactions between them and Philip, and upon what terms they had granted him a Peace) that there was no less fear of a War to come upon them yet from Antiochus. That he was come over with a vast Navy, and a great Land Army into Europe: and that unless the vain hopes he had (which arose from a vainer rumour) of invading Egypt diverted him, all Greece would shortly be in a flame. Nor would the Atolians themselves be at quiet, being not only by nature a restless sort of people, but now also offended at the Romans too. That there was another mischief likewise that stuck in the very Bowels of Greece, and that was Nabis, who was at present Tyrant of Lacedemon, and would be soon, if he might, sole Lord of all Greece, being as covetous and as cruel as all the Tyrants that ever were heard of. That if he were suffer'd to keep Argos as a Guard and a check upon Peloponnesus, when the Roman Armies were carried away into Italy, Greece would be freed from Philip to no purpose at all: for instead of a King, that lived a great way off, it would have a neighbouring Tyrant to be its Lord and Master.

XLVII. When the Senate heard this, not only from grave Authors, but men that spoke of their own knowledge, whatever brought the King into Syria, they thought fit first to hasten the consultation touching the Tyrant. And when they had a long time debated, whether there was yet reason enough, that T. Quintius should be appointed to manage the matter, as to Nabis of Lacedemon, they gave him liberty to do what he thought best for the Commonwealths interest: because they supposed it to be such an affair, as whether hasten'd or delay'd, would not prove of any great moment to the main concern of Rome: but that they ought rather to observe, what Annibal and the Carthaginians were like to do, if they should have a War with Antiochus. Those of the Faction, contrary to Annibal, wrote several Letters to the great men of Rome, who were their particular Friend, to inform them; That there were Messengers and Letters sent from Annibal to Antiochus, and that Embassadors came privately to him from the King. That he, like some wild Beasts, would never be tamed, so savage, and implacable was that mans mind. That he complain'd, the City [of Carthage] was enfeebled by sloth, ease, and want of employment, nor could be rowzed up [to their former activity] without the clashing of Arms. The remembrance of the former War, which was carried on as well as first rais'd by him alone, made all this probable: not but that he had also exasperated the spirits of a great many Noblemen too by what he had lately done.

XLVIII. The Judges of Carthage at that time bore the Sovereign sway, and that chiefly for this reason, because they were perpetual. The Estate, Credit, and Life of every man was in their power; and he that had one of that rank, had all of them against him: Nor was there any accusers wanting before those angry Judges. But whilst they exercised this their Tyrannical and Arbitrary Power (for they did not use it like Citizens) Annibal being chosen Prætor, Prætor, call'd the Questor to him: though the Questor valu'd not the Summons, as being of the contrary Faction; besides that, considering men were made Judges (the most powerful Order of Citizens) that had been Questors, he was proud to think what a mighty Fellow he should shortly be. But Annibal taking it for an affront, sent an Officer to seize the Questor, and bringing him into the publick Assembly, accused not him more than the whole Order of Judges, through whose Pride and Riches there was in effect neither Laws nor Magistrates: and observing that the people were pleas'd to hear him (for their Pride and Tyranny was grievous, even to the meanest of the Citizens) he immediately propos'd and carried a Law, That the Judges should be chosen every year; and that no man should continue in that office two years together. But what good will he gain'd among the Commonalty by so doing, he lost with great part of the Nobility. He likewise did another thing, which though it were for the publick good, procur'd him a great many Enemies. The publick Revenues were partly through negligence decay'd, and partly made a prey and a dividend to some of the great men and Magistrates; besides that the money which was to be paid every year to the Romans toward maintaining their Armies, was then lacking; so that private men were in danger of an heavy Tax. Annibal therefore having learnt what the Revenues were both by Sea and Land, and upon what occasions they were laid out; together with how much of them the ordinary expences of the Commonwealth came to, and what they were cheated of in the publick accounts, he declar'd in the Assembly and made his words good, That (if the remainder of the publick stock were collected, though the Tax upon private persons were remitted) the Commonwealth would be rich enough to pay their tribute to the Romans. But then those who had lived for several years upon cheating the publick, as though their own goods had been taken from them, and not what they had stoln out of the Exchequer, extorted out of their hands, being incens'd and angry instigated the Romans (who had themselves a mind to find some ground for a quarrel with him) against Annibal.

Wherefore though Scipio Africanus were for a long time against such proceedings, because he thought it did not consist with the dignity of the Roman People to favour their animosities and accusations against Annibal, or to interpose their publick authority between the Carthaginian Factions; nor to be content to have conquer'd Annibal, unless, like Informers, they swore Calumnies against him, and call'd his honour in question; yet they at last so far prevail'd as to get Embassadors sent to Carthage: who before the Senate there might prove, that Annibal conspired with King Antiochus about raising of a War. There were three Embassadors sent, whose names were C. Servilius, M. Claudius Marcellus, and Q. Terentius Culleo; who, when they came thither, by advice of Annibals Enemies, asking the reason of their Embassy, bid them give out, that they came to decide the controversies between Masinissa, King of Numidia, and the Carthaginians. That report was generally believed; but Annibal knew well enough that he was the only man, whom the Romans aimed at; and that the Carthaginians had a Peace granted them on no other account, but that they should maintain an irreconcilable War against him. Wherefore he resolv'd to give way both to the times and to Fortune; and having before-hand prepared all things for his escape, he came that day into the Forum, or Market-place, to avoid suspicion; but as soon as it was dark, in a Lawyers habit, got out at the Gate with two men to attend him, that knew nothing of his design.

His Horses being ready at the place appointed, he past in the night by a certain Region of the Volan Territories, and the next day in the Morning came to his own Tower between Acholla and Thapsus. There a Ship, prepared and furnished with Oars [for a Voyage] took him in; and so Annibal left Africa, but pitied his Country more than himself. That day he arrived at the Isle Cercina. Where finding in that Port certain Merchant Men with Wares on board of them, who came and saluted him at his landing; seeing they enquired what his business was that way, he had his Men tell them, He was going Embassador to Tyre. But fearing lest any of those Ships, setting out in the Night, should carry the News to Acholla or Thapsus, that they had seen him at Cercina, he ordered a sacrifice to be prepared, and the Masters of the Ships with the Merchants to be invited [to the Feast;] as also, that his Men should borrow all the sails and sail yards out of the several Ships, to make a Tent upon the Shoar which might be shady (for then it was Midsummer) for them to sup in. As much as his affairs and the time would suffer, the entertainment of that Day was prepared and set out with all solemnity; and the Company drank till late in the Night. But Annibal, as soon as he had an opportunity of getting away unknown to them that were in the Port, weighed Anchor. The rest, who were asleep, when they rose the next Day still full of last Nights debauch (too late to do any good) spent some hours in placing their Oars in their Ships, and sitting up their tackling. At Carthage also the rabble, that used to frequent Annibals House, ran to the Porch thereof; and when they heard he did not appear, came thronging into the Forum, and enquired after the Governour of their City, some of them saying, That he was fled (which was true,) and others, That the Romans had kill'd him, which they were more pleas'd at, though you might have seen several Faces there which look'd very differently like Men in the City that favour this or that Faction. But at last the News came, That he was seen at Cercina.

When

- LI. When the Roman Embassadors had told the Senate [of Carthage] That the Roman Senate were certified, not only that King Philip was formerly very much excited by Annibal to make War upon the Romans, but that now also there were Letters and Messengers sent from him to King Antiochus; and that he would never be quiet till he had set the whole World in an uproar. Upon which account he ought not to scape unpunished, though the Carthaginians should satisfy the Roman People, that nothing of all this was done either by their order, or publick approbation. The Carthaginians replied, That they would do whatever the Romans thought fitting. In the mean time Annibal arrived very safe at Tyre, where he was entertain'd by those that built Carthage [i. e. the Tyrians or Phœnicians] as in another native Country, being a person so renowned for all sorts of honours, and having staid there some few Days, sailed thence to Antioch. There, finding that the King was already gone away, he went to wait upon his Son, who was celebrating a solemn sort of Games at Daphne; and having been kindly received by him, made no stop nor stay in his intended Voyage. At Ephesus he overtook the King, who yet was wavering in his mind, and unresolved as touching the Roman War. But Annibal's coming gave him no small encouragement to prosecute that design; besides, that at the same time the Ætolians also were revolted from their alliance with the Romans; for that the Senate referr'd their Embassadors (who came to demand Pharsalus and Leucas with some other Cities according to their first League, to Quintus.

DECADE IV. BOOK IV.

The E P I T O M E.

1, 2, &c. The Law call'd, Lex Oppia, which C. Oppius, Tribune of the People had introduced, for the restraining of Womens habits to such and such fashions, was abrogated with the greatest zeal imaginable: though Porcius Cato were against the abolishing of it. 8, 9, &c. He going into Spain quitted all the hither Province of it by a war, which he began at Emporia. 22, &c. T. Quintius Flaminius made an end of the war, that he had managed with success against the Lacedæmonians and their Tyrant Nabis, giving them such terms of Peace as he thought good, and freeing Argos, which was in subjection to the Tyrant. 43. That was the first time, that the Senate ever was at Plays in a place distinct from the people: for the procuring of which, Sex. Ælius Pætus and C. Cornelius Cethegus the Censors interposed, to the great displeasure of the people. 44. Several Colonies were planted. 45. M. Porcius Cato's triumph over Spain. 46. Their prosperous achievements in Spain are further described, with what success they had against the Boi and Insubrian Gauls. 51. T. Quintius Flaminius, who had conquer'd Philip, King of Macedon, and Nabis, Tyrant of Lacedæmon, and had freed all Greece, for his numerous and great exploits triumph'd three days together. 59. The Carthaginian Embassadors came and told [the Romans] that Annibal, who was fled to Antiochus was helping him to raise a war. 60. Now Annibal had endeavour'd by means of Ariston, a Tyrian, whom he sent without Letters to Carthage, to make the Carthaginians renew the war.

- I. AMidst the concern that they had for great Wars, which either were not yet well ended, or just hung over them, there intervened a thing but very small to speak of, but such as by the several Factions grew up to a mighty Controversie. M. Fundanius and L. Valerius, Tribunes of the People, proposed to the Commons the abrogating of the Oppian Law. C. Oppius, a Tribune of the People had made it, when Q. Fabius, and T. Sempronius were Consuls, in the very heat of the Punic War, [and it was] That no woman should have more than half an Ounce of gold about her, nor wear any party-coloured Garment, nor ride in a Chariot with two Horses, either in the City, or any other Town, or within a thousand paces from it, unless it were upon the account of publick and religious solemnities. M. and P. Junius Brutus, Tribunes of the People stood up in defence of this Law, and said, they would not have it abrogated. Besides whom many of the Nobility also came forth to perswade and dissuade the people one way and the other. The Capitol was fill'd with a crowd of men that partly favour'd, and partly oppos'd it: nor could the Matrons be kept at home, either by authority, modesty, or the Commands of their Husbands, but beset all the streets of the City, and the Avenues going into the Forum, desiring the men as they came that way, that now the Common-wealth flourished, and the private fortune of every man daily increased, they would let the matrons also have their ancient Ornaments again. This concourse of the Women was every day more and more. For they came likewise out of the several Towns and Burroughs: and were at last so bold as to go and desire the Consuls, the Prætors and other Magistrates [to stand their Friends] though they could do no good with one of the Consuls, M. Porcius Cato, who for the Law which they would then have abrogated, made this Speech.
- II. If every one of us, Romans, had resolv'd to keep up majesty and Prerogative of an Husband over his own Wife, we should not have had all this trouble with the Women in general. But now our liberty being restrain'd at home by the Tyrant of our own Women, 'tis intrenched and trampled upon here here also in the Forum: and we, because we could not endure them singly, are frighted at them all together. Truly I thought it was a Fable and a feigned Story, that such a number of Husbands were taken off by a Conspiracy of Women in the Island of Lemnos. But indeed there is the same danger to be fear'd from any sort of people, if you admit of Cabals, Councils and secret Conspirits. Nor can I hardly tell, whether the thing it self be worse or of worse Example: the one of which concerns us Consuls, and all other Magistrates, and the other you, Romans, more especially. For you who are to vote, are to judge, whether that which is proposed to you be for the benefit of the Common-wealth or no. Now this tumult of the Women, whether it arose of it self, or by your advice, (M. Fundanius, and L. Valerius) yet since it certainly layes a blame upon the Magistracy, I cannot tell whether it be more reflective upon you Tribunes, or upon the Consuls: upon you, if you now moved the Women to stir up tribunitian seditions; and upon us, if as heretofore of the people, so now by means of a secession of the Women, we must have Laws imposed upon us. Truly I came not without blushing just now through a great Troop of Women into the Forum: and if I had not been restrained by the respect I bore to some of them for their quality and modesty, more than I did to all of them in general; I would have hinder'd their being saluted by the Consul, and said: What a fashion is this, of running out into the streets and calling to other Womens Husbands? Could you not each of you desire the same thing of your Husbands at home? Are you more obliging in publick than in private, and to other Womens than your own? Although you ought not, even at home, if Matrons would keep within the bounds of modesty, as they should do, to concern their selves what Laws are either made or abrogated in this place. Our Ancestors would not suffer Women to do any private business without the advice of a man, but to be at the disposal of their Parents, Brethren or Husbands. But we (forsooth) now advise let them manage even the Common-wealth it self, and to come into the Forum to all publick Assemblies, and other meetings. For what else do they at present do in the streets and cross wayes, but some of them perswade the passing of what the Tribunes propose, whilst others are of opinion that such and such a Law ought to be abrogated? Give way to their unruly nature, to the untamed animal [called Woman] and then hope that they'll set bounds to their own liberty without your help. But this is the least thing of those that the Women take so hainously, as being injoin'd either by Custom or Law. They desire a liberty, yea an unlimited Licence (if we would say the truth) to do all manner of things. For what will they not attempt, if they gain this point?

Pray call to mind all the Female Laws, by which our Ancestors have restrain'd that Sex, and whereby they have made them subject to their Husbands, and yet though they are tied up by all these, you can hardly keep them in order. What if you should suffer them to carp at particulars, and extort such and such things from you, so as to make themselves equal to you; do you think they would be tolerable to you? No, as soon as ever they are equal, they will be above you. But now forsooth they defend themselves, lest any new thing should be put upon them. They do not seek to evade that which is Law, but an injury. Yes indeed, that Law, which you admitted of, which by your Votes you have consented to, which by the use and experience of so many years you have approved, they would have you abrogate: that is, that by abolishing of one Law you may invalidate all the rest. No Law is suitable to all peoples humours and interests; this being the only question, whether it be good for the greater part [of the Community] and in the main; if it destroys and removes all that which is injurious to private persons; for what does it signifie to propose Laws to the people in general, which they, for whom they are made, can presently abrogate? Yet I have a mind to hear what the reason is, why the Matrons run thus out into the streets, and scarce keep from even the Forum and publick Assemblies. Is it to get their Captive Parents, Husbands, Children or Brothers redeemed from Annibal? Oh! no, that fortune is far, and may it ever be so, from our Common-wealth, though when it was so, you denied their pious Petitions. But it is not piety or solicitude for their Friends, it is Religion, may be, that has drawn them together. What, are they to receive the Goddess Cybele again at her arrival from Pessinus in Phrygia? What modest word, I'd fain know, can any man say in defence of this Female Sedition? Oh! we, say they, would shine in gold and purple, and when we had made their Votes our own, ride both on holy and working dayes, in Chariots through the City, in triumph, as it were, over the vanquish'd and abrogated Law: that there may be no bounds set to our expences or luxury.

You have often heard me complain, not only of the prodigality of Women, but of men too, and those as well Magistrates as private persons; and that the City labours under two different Vices of Avarice and Luxury, which have been the bane of all great Empires. As to these, the better and more prosperous the fortune of the Common-wealth each day becomes, the more the Empire thrives; now that we are also got over into Greece and Asia, which are fill'd with all allurements to Vice, and begin to handle the Kings Treasure too; I am so much the more afraid, lest they should rather catch us than we them. Believe me, the Syraculans did this City a great deal of injury. And now I hear there are too many at Corinth and Athens, who praise and admire the several Ornaments there, but laugh at the Earthen Statues of the Roman Gods that are fixed up before [your Temples.] But I would rather have these propitious Gods, as I hope I shall find them, if we can suffer them to continue where they are. Within the memory of our Fathers, Pyrrhus, by his Embassador Cyneas, tempted not only our men, but our Women also with presents [that he sent them] before the Oppian Law, for restraining Womens Luxury was made; but never an one of them accepted [what he offer'd.] What do you think was the reason of it? Why even the same that our Ancestors had, had, not to make any Law touching this affair; that is, there was no luxury then to be restrained. For as it is necessary the distemper should be first known before you can know the Cure of it, so extravagant desires must shew themselves before there can be Laws to restrain them. What caused the Licinian Law, that no man should have above five hundred Acres, but a mighty desire that men had of still increasing their Estates? What the Cincian Law, concerning gifts and presents, but because the people now began to be tributary and stipendiary to the Senate? Wherefore 'tis no wonder, that neither the Oppian, nor any other Law was wanting at that time, to set limits to the expences of Women, when they would not receive gold and purple which was freely presented to them. If Cineas should now go about with those presents [which he then offer'd] he would find the Women standing in the streets to receive them. Now for my part I cannot imagine what is the cause or reason of some desires. For as it carries something perhaps of natural shame and indignation with it, that the same thing which another may do, you may not, so when the habits of all people are alike, why should any of you be afraid to be seen in such a garb? I must confess, to be niggardly or poor, are the worst of causes why a man should be ashamed; but the Law, in this Case, frees you from both these imputations, when you have not that which you cannot lawfully have. But sayes a great Lady, I cannot endure this very levelling and equality; why should not I appear all glittering with gold, and clothed in purple? Why should the poverty of others lie hid under the umbrage of this Law; so as that what they cannot have, they, if it were lawful, should seem to be able to buy? Will you, Romans, give your Wives occasion to contend in this manner; that the rich Women shall desire to have, what no Woman else can purchase? and the poorer sort, lest for this very reason they should be contemn'd, to stretch beyond their abilities? If so, then certainly, as soon as they are once ashamed of what they ought not, they will not be ashamed of what they ought. She that can out of her own stock, will purchase [the thing she lacks] and she that cannot, will ask her Husband. And woe be to that man who either does or does not grant their requests! when he shall see that which he himself would not give her, given by another man. Now a-dayes they commonly ask other Womens Husbands [to give them such or such a thing, or do them this or that kindness] yea, and which is more, desire them to make a Law and give their Votes [in favour of the Women] and of some they obtain their desires, though toward thee, thy Estate and [children they are inexorable. As soon as the Law ceases to set bounds to thy Wives extravagancy, thou wilt never be able to do it. Romans, do not suppose that you shall be in the same condition, as you were before this Law was made. For as it is safer not to accuse an ill man, than to have him upon the accusation acquitted; so luxury would have been more tolerable had it never been meddled with than it will be now; being like a savage Beast by its very bonds first enraged and then let out. For my part, I do not think the Oppian Law ought to be abrogated by any means. But do you what you please, and Heaven direct you in it.

III.

IV.

- V. After this the Tribunes of the people also, who professed that they would interpose, having added some few words to the same purpose, L. Valerius to promote the Law which he had proposed, made this Speech: If private persons only had come forth to speak both for and against that which we now propose; I also, since there have been enough said on both sides, should have with silence expelled their Votes. But now, seeing so grave a person as M. Porcius Cato, the Consul, hath opposed our Bill, not only by his authority, which though silent, would have been prevalent enough, but in a long and accurate Oration also, I must of necessity make some short answer to him: though he has been at the expence of more breath to chastize the Matrons, than in arguing against our Bill, and has strove to make a doubt of it, whether the Matrons had done what he found fault with on their own accord, or by our advice. But I'll defend the cause not our persons; upon whom the Consul has thrown these things rather verbally, than fix'd any real accusation upon us. He has call'd it a Caballing, Seditions, and sometime a secession of the Women, that the Matrons should ask you in the open streets, to abrogate a Law made against them in the time of War, now in the happy and flourishing times of Peace. I know there are great words (not only these but others also) that may be found out to aggravate the matter: and we all know that Cato is an Orator, not only grave, but sometimes also severe, though naturally he be very mild. For what new thing, I pray, have the Matrons done, in going out great numbers of them together into the streets, upon a business that concern'd them? Did they never appear in publick before? I will turn over your own Book (Cato!) called Origines, against you. See there how oft they have done it, and that also for the publick good. In the very first Age when Romulus reigned, and the Capitol being taken by the Sabines, there was a set Battle in the midst of the Forum, was not the fight made an end of by the Matrons running in between the two Armies? What? After the Kings were driven out, when the Volscinian Legions had Encamped at the fifth stone [five miles from Rome] under the Conduct of Coriolanus, did not the Matrons divert that Army, which would have otherwise destroy'd this City? When the City was taken by the Gauls, how was it redeemed? Why, the Matrons brought in their gold to the publick stock by general consent. In the next War (not to mention old stories) when money was short, did not the Widows moneys augment the treasury? and when new Gods also were sent for to assist us in our doubtful circumstances, all the Matrons went to the Seaside to receive the Goddess Cybele. But the causes, you'll say, are not alike. Nor did I design to make them parallel. 'Tis enough if I prove this to be no new thing. Now can we wonder that they should do, in a case that so nearly concern'd them, what no body admired that they did in affairs that equally belonged to all Men and Women both? But what have they done? Really, Gentlemen,

men, we have very proud Ears, if when Masters do not reject the Petitions of their Slaves, we cannot endure to be intreated by freeborn, virtuous Women.

I come now to that which is the main point, in which the Consul said two things. For he was neither willing that any Law at all should be abrogated, nor that especially that had been made to restrain the luxury of Women. One part of his Speech seemed to defend all Laws in general, and the other was against Luxury, very agreeable to his severe behaviour. Wherefore it may chance, that unless we inform you what mistakes there are in both parts, you may be deceiv'd into a false opinion. For I, as I confess, that I would have none of those Laws, (which were not made for any particular time, but, being of perpetual advantage, to stand for ever in full force) abrogated; unless either experience refuses it, or some state of the Common-wealth has made it of no use: so those Laws which were occasion'd by such and such junctures of affairs, I see are mortals (if I may so say) and changeable as the times themselves. Those that were made in Peace, War many times abrogates; and those that were made in War, Peace, as in the management of a Ship, some things are of use in a calm, and others in a storm. Now seeing these things are in their nature so distinct, of which sort, I pray does that Law seem to be that we would abrogate? Is it an ancient Kingly Law, enacted at the first founding of the City? or is it (which is the next in dignity) written by the Decemviri, who were created to make Laws in the twelve Tables? or such an one, that since without it our Forefathers did not think the honour of Matrons could be prefer'd, we also ought to fear, lest with it we may abrogate and destroy the modesty and chastity of our Women? But who knows not, that it is a new Law, made twenty years ago, when Q. Fabius, and T. Sempronius were Consuls? without which, since our Matrons lived so many years very regular, what fear is there, I'd fain know, that upon our abrogating thereof, they should run out into such luxury? For if this Law was therefore made, that it might restrain the exorbitance of Women, we ought to fear, lest being abrogated it might increase it: but why it was made, the very time then shew'd. Annibal was in Italy Victorious at Cannæ; having Tarentum, Arpi, and Capua already in his possession; and seemed in all probability resolv'd to bring his Army to Rome. Our Allies were revolted: we had not Souldiers to supply [our necessities] nor Seamen to defend our Navy, nor money in our Treasury: we were forced to buy Slaves, to make Souldiers of, upon condition to pay their Masters for them when the War was over; the Publicans [i.e. Farmers of the Customs] undertook to procure Corn and other things convenient for the carrying on of the War, for which they were to be paid at the same time: we furnish out Servants to row, every man according to his Estate, whom we brought in together with our aid money: we contributed all the gold and silver we had (the Senators giving us the first Example) toward the publick charges: and not only Widows but Orphans too brought their moneys into the Treasury. There was care taken, that no man should have above such a quantity of gold or silver that was coined, nor above so much silver and brass money in his House. At that time the Matrons were grown to a great height of Luxury and Pride, insomuch that to restrain them, the Oppian Law was much wanted: for, seeing that the Sacrifice to Ceres, for which all the Matrons mourn'd, was intermitted, the Senate order'd their lamentation to be made an end of in thirty dayes. Now who does not plainly see, that this Law, which was made upon account of the necessity and misery of the City, (for that all the money which private men had, was to be converted to the publick use) was to continue only so long, as the reason of it should remain? For if what the Senate at that time decreed, or the people consented to, to serve the present occasion, must have been always observ'd, why do we pay back their money to private persons? why do we not now let out the publick Revenues for ready money? why do we not now buy Slaves to make Souldiers of? why do we not, every private man, supply Rowers, as we then did?

Shall all other ranks, all other sorts of people be sensible how much the state of the Common-wealth is alter'd for the better, and shall our Wives only not share in the benefits of peace and tranquillity? Shall we men use purple, and wear the Prætecta [a white Gown, guarded with purple] in our Magistracies and Priesthoods: shall our Children have Gowns guarded with purple, shall the Officers in Colonies and Burroughs, and here at Rome, the meanest sort, even the Overseers of the streets [or Scavengers] have the privilege of wearing a guarded Gown, and that not only whilst they live, but be burnt in such a Robe of state, when they are dead too; and yet shall we forbid our Women only the use of purple? And when you, who are the Husband, may make your Horse-Cloth of purple, will you not suffer your Wife to have a Mantle of the same? will you let your Horse be better clothed than your Bedfellow? I must own indeed in the case of purple, which is subject to wear and decay, I perceive there is some reason for your tenacity, though it be an unjust one; but in gold, wherein, besides the use of the money paid for it, there is no loss, what hurt can be? That is rather a security to you both in publick and private cases, as you have often found. [Cato] said there was no emulation among them, when never an one of them had the use of it. But then, alas, they are all grieved and enraged to see the Wives of our Allies, the Latines, wear those Ornaments, which they are abridged of; to see them glittering in gold and purple, them carried about the City, whilst they themselves follow on foot, as though their Cities and not Rome were the Seat of the Empire. This would vex the Souls even of men; what then, think ye, is it like to do in Women, whom small things so much disturb? The Women cannot bear Offices in the Common wealth, nor be Priests, nor triumph, nor have the Ensigns of authority, nor presents, nor spoils taken in War: neatness, and finery, and good apparel are the only distinctions belonging to Women: with these then

Rrrr

they please themselves and glory in them, and this our Ancestors called Mundus muliebris [Women's Ornaments.] What do they do but lay aside their gold and purple when they mourn? or what else, when their mourning's over, do they resume? What do they add to their dress in times of congratulation, or publick Thanksgivings [to the Gods] but their best apparel? But you think, that if you should abrogate the Oppian Law, it will not be in their power to forbid anything, which that Law now forbids. Your Daughters, Wives and Sisters too will not be so much at their disposal. [But let me tell you] A Woman's subjection is never at an end as long as her relations [as Parents, &c.] are alive: and they themselves abhor that liberty which is occasion'd by loss of Husbands or Parents. They would rather have their habit to be at their disposal than regulated by Law: and you on the other side, ought to keep them under the like careful Guardians, and not in slavery; chusing rather to be called Fathers or Husbands by them, than Lords or Masters. The Consul just now made use of odious terms, when he call'd it a sedition, or a secession of the Women. For there is great danger, I'll warrant you, lest they, like the enraged Commons, should go up into the Sacred Mount, or the Aventine. We must bear with this infirmity, what ever you think of it; and the more you are able to do, the more moderate you ought to be in the exercise of your power.

VIII. When these things were said, both against and for the Law, there was a greater concourse of Women in the streets the next day: and all of them in one Body throng'd to those Tribunes Doors, who interposed against the Bill that was brought in by their Collegues; nor did they stir thence, before the Tribunes disclaimed what they had done. Yet after that there was no doubt but all the Tribes would abrogate that Law: and abrogated it was in the twentieth year after it was made. M. Porcius the Consul, after the Oppian Law was abrogated, went immediately with twenty five long Ships, of which five belonged to their Allies, to the Port of Luna, where the Army was order'd to meet him; and having sent an Edict over all the Sea Coast, by virtue of which he muster'd up all sorts of Vessels, he, as he was going from Luna, Commanded them, to follow him to the Port of Venus Pyrenæa; for thence he resolv'd to go with a numerous Fleet against the Enemy. They therefore, passing by the Ligurian Mountains and the Gallick Bay, met him at the day appointed. Thence they came to Rhoda, and routed the Garison of Spaniards, that were in the Castle, by main force. From Rhoda they sail'd with a fair Wind to Emporia: where all the Forces, except the Seamen, were put on shore.

IX. At that time Emporia was two Towns, divided by a Wall; the one inhabited by Greeks from Phocæa, whence the Maffilians also came; and the other by Spaniards. But the Greek Town lay to the Sea, the Wall whereof was at least four hundred paces about: and the Spaniards Wall, being more remote from the Sea, three thousand paces in Circuit. To these there was a third fort of men added, as a Colony by Augustus Divus Caesar after he had Conquer'd Pompey's Sons. Now they are all incorporated into one Body; the Spaniards having been first, and at last the Greeks also made Denizens of Rome. He that should have seen the Greeks at that time exposed on the one hand to the open Sea, and on the other to the Spaniards, a fierce and a Warlike Nation, would have wonder'd, what it was that preserv'd them. But it was their Discipline indeed, the guard of Infirmity, which among those that are stronger [than their Neighbours] fear best protects. That part of their Wall next the Fields they fortified very well, having made but one Gate on that side, of which some one of their Magistrates was the constant Keeper. In the night a third part of the Citizens watch'd upon the Walls: nor that only for fashions sake, or because the Law obliged them to it, but they kept their Watches, and went their rounds with as much care, as if an Enemy had been at their Gates. They admitted no Spaniard into their City: nor went themselves inconsiderately out of it. But to the Seaward there was an outlet from all people. They never went out at the Gate, toward the Spanish Town, but in great numbers (almost a third part of them) and those such as had watch'd the night before upon the Walls. Now the reason of their going out was this: the Spaniards had Commerce with them, as being themselves unskillful in Sea affairs; and desired not only to buy such Foreign Commodities as were imported thither, but to vend the product of their own Country. The mutual use therefore that they made of each other, caused the Spanish City to lie open to the Greeks. They were also so much the safer, in that they lay under the umbrage of the Romans Friendship; which as they retaliated with less force than the Maffilians, so with equal fidelity. At that time also they entertained the Consul and his Army with great respect and kindness. But Cato, having staid there some few dayes, till he found where the Enemy was, and what Forces they had; that in his very stay there he might make some progress toward his design, he spent all the time in exercising of his Souldiers. It happen'd to be the time of year, when the Spaniards had their Corn in their Barns, and were a thrashing of it. Wherefore he forbid the Purveyors to buy any Corn, and sending them to Rome, said, The War shall maintain it self. So marching from Emporia he burnt and wasted the Enemies Country, filling all places with distraction and terror.

X. At the same time, as M. Helvius was going out of the farther Spain, with a guard of six thousand men, which was given him by Ap. Claudius the Prætor, the Celtiberians met him in a great Body at a Town called Illiturgum. Valerius says, They were twenty thousand sand fighting men; of which twelve thousand were slain, the Town of Illiturgum taken, and all their youth of mans estate kill'd. Thence Helvius came to Cato's Camp; and because that part of the Country was now secure from the Enemy, having sent his guard back into the farther Spain, he went to Rome, where he for the success he had met with in the management of his affairs, went ovan into the City. He brought into the Treasury fourteen thousand seven hundred thirty two pounds of Silver Bullion, and seventeen thousand three pounds of coined Silver, stamped with the sign of a Chariot, with twenty thousand four hundred thirty eight of Oscan silver. The reason why the Senate deny'd him the honour to triumph, was, because he had fought by the direction of another, and in another mans Province. But he came back two years after, for that when he had deliver'd up the Province to his Successor Q. Minucius, he had been detain'd there all the year following by a long and a tedious sickness. Wherefore Helvius came into the City ovan only two months before his Successor Q. Minucius triumphed. He also brought along with him thirty four thousand eight hundred pounds of silver, seventy eight thousand pieces stamped with a Chariot, and of Oscan silver two hundred seventy eight thousand pounds.

In the mean time the Consul was encamped in Spain, not far from Emporia; whither there came three Embassadors from the petit King of the Ilergetes, one of which was his Son, to complain, that their Castles were attacked; nor had they any hopes to make resistance, unless the Romans would assist them. That five thousand Souldiers were enough for the Enemies, who if such a number of men should once appear, would not stay. To which the Consul replied, That he was concern'd very much for the danger and fear which they were in; but that he had not near so many men, as that now there was a great body of the Enemies not far off, with whom he expected every day to engage in a set Battle, he, by dividing his Army, could safely impair his Forces. When the Embassadors heard that they cry'd, and threw themselves down at the Consuls Feet, desiring, That he would not desert them in such dangerous circumstances; for whither should they go, if they were repulsed by the Romans? they had no Allies, nor any other hopes in all the World. That they might have been out of that danger, if they would have revolted from their Allegiance, and conspired with other Nations. But they were not moved by any threats, nor any other Bug-bears, as hoping that the Romans would be a sufficient help and assistance to them. Which if they failed to be, and the Consul denied them his aid, they called both Gods and men to witness, that they would revolt, though fore against their wills, and for pure necessity, lest they should suffer the same as the Saguntines did: and would die with the rest of the Spaniards rather than perish alone. And that day they were thus dismissed without an Answer.

The next night the Consul was mightily troubled in mind, being loth on the one hand to desert his Allies, or to diminish his Army on the other: because it might either defer his fighting, or make it dangerous for him to engage. At last he resolv'd, not to lessen his Forces, lest the Enemy in the mean time should do him any hurt or dishonour: but thought it best for him to give his Allies hopes instead of reality. For he said, that shams, in War especially, had often passed for truth; and that he who believ'd he had such or such assistance, was many times preserv'd through his mere confidence by hoping and attempting. But the next day he told the Embassadors, that though he was afraid that by lending his Forces to others, he might weaken his own party, yet he had a greater regard to them and their present dangerous circumstances, than to himself. So he order'd notice to be given to the third of his Souldiers in every Regiment, that they should prepare Victuals to carry with them on board the Ships, and the Ships to be made ready against the third day after that. Then he had two of the Embassadors go tell Bilistages and the Ilergetes what he said; but kept the Kings Son with him by entertaining him civilly, and presenting him with several gifts. The Embassadors did not depart before they saw the Souldiers Ship'd, but then they brought certain news of what they had seen; which fill'd not only their own men, but the Enemies also with the rumour of the Roman Auxiliaries coming.

The Consul when he had done enough to make a show of, order'd the Souldiers to be recall'd out of the Ships: and himself, when the time of year drew nigh, in which he might conveniently carry on his affairs, pitch'd his Winter Camp a thousand paces from Emporia; from whence, as occasion serv'd, he drew forth his men, sometimes one way, and sometimes another (leaving a small Guard in the Camp) to plunder the Enemies Country. They went out for the most part in the night time, not only that they might have opportunity to go as far as possible from the Camp, but in order to surprize the Enemy; by which method of his, as he exercised his fresh Souldiers, so he took a great many of the adverse party; who now durst never move out of the Fortifications of their Castles. But when he had sufficiently tryed the inclinations and courage, not only of his own men, but of the Enemy too, he order'd all the Tribunes, Prefects and Horsemen to be summon'd together, and told them, The time that you wished for, is now come: in which you should have an opportunity of shewing your valour. Till this time you have behaved your selves more like Robbers than Souldiers, but now you shall engage with the Enemy man to man in a set Battle. Now you shall no longer ravage their Country, but drain the wealth of their Cities. Our Forefathers, when the Carthaginian Generals were with their Armies in Spain, where they themselves had no Generals nor any Souldiers, were yet resolv'd to put this condition also into their League, that the River Iberus should be the boundary of their Empire. But now though there are two Prætors, a Consul, and three Roman Armies in Spain, where there hath been never a Carthaginian for almost these ten years, we have lost our Dominions about Iberus. This you ought to recover by your Arms and Courage, and force this Nation that renews the War by rashness more than constant fighting, to resume that Yoke which it hath shaken off. Having spoken much to this purpose, he declar'd, that in the night he would march toward the Enemies Camp; and so dissuad'd them to refresh their Bodies.

XIV. At midnight, having consulted the Soothsayers, he went out, to take what place he thought fit, before the Enemy was aware of him, and wheeling round their Camp, at break of day, having set his Army in Battalia, sent three Regiments up to their very Bullwark. The Barbarians admiring that the Romans appear'd behind them, ran every man to their Arms: whilst the Consul spoke to his own men in this manner: Fellow-Souldiers, said he, there is no hopes left save in your Courage, and indeed I did what I could to have it so. For the Enemies are in the middle between us and our Camp. Behind us is the Enemies Country. Now as it is most glorious, so it is most safe, to have all our hopes placed in our valour. With that he order'd the Regiments to retire, that by pretending to fly he might tempt the Barbarians out: and, as he believ'd, so it fell out. For they, supposing that the Romans were afraid, and therefore retired, sallied forth at their Gate; filling all the space between their Camp and the Enemies Army with armed men. But whilst they were in an hurry to set their men in Array, the Consul, who had every thing ready and in order, set upon them whilst they were in confusion, leading the Horse in both the Wings first into the fight. But they being presently beaten, and giving ground in the right Wing, put the Foot also into a fright. Which when the Consul saw, he order'd two chosen Regiments to be drawn about from the right flank of the Enemy, and to shew themselves behind, before the Foot were engaged. That put the Foe into such a fright, that it made the Battle, which before was like to be lost through the Romans fear, pretty equal again. Notwithstanding the Horse and Foot in the right Wing were so disorder'd, that the Consul himself took some of them with his own hand, and turn'd them towards the Foe. By this means the fight was not only doubtful as long as they fought with Darts [or other Weapons to throw at a distance] but now also in the right Wing, where their fright and flight began, the Romans could scarce maintain their ground. The Barbarians were hard put to it in the left Wing and in the Front; looking back upon the Regiments that were behind them with great consternation. But when they had thrown away all their Iron Javelins and Fire-Darts they drew their Swords, and thereby as it were, renew'd the fight; wounding each other not at a distance with uncertain strokes at unawares, but setting Foot to Foot, placed all their hopes in their courage and strength.

XV. When his Men were now tired the Consul brought the Regiments of reserves out of the second Division of the Army into the fight, whereby to animate their drooping hearts: and then they being now made a new Army, the fresh men with their new Weapons setting upon the tired Enemies, first broke in upon them with a brisk effort in form of a Wedge, as it were, and soon after routed them, so that they ran over the Fields as fast as they could back to their Camp. When Cato saw all places fill'd with the flying Enemy, he rode back to the second Legion that was in the Rear, and ordering the Ensigns to be carried before him, commanded them to march with all speed and attack the Enemies Camp. But if any of them ran too eagerly out of their ranks, not only he himself smote him with a Dart, but bad the Tribunes and Centurions to correct them for it. And now they were besieging the Enemies Camp, when the Romans were repell'd with stones and stakes, and all sorts of Weapons from the Bullwark. But when the new Legion came on; then not only the Besiegers were the more encouraged, but the Enemy also more fiercely defended their Bullwark. The Consul took a view of all places quite round, to get an opportunity of breaking in upon them where they made the weakest resistance. At the left Gate he saw them very thin, and thither therefore led he the Vanguard and the Spear-men of the second Legion. The Guard that was at the Gate could not endure the shock of them: and the rest also, when they saw the Enemy within the Bullwark, being forced from their very Camp, threw down their Ensigns and Arms and were kill'd in the very Gates by their own men that could not all get out at such narrow passages: whilst the Souldiers of the second Regiment gauged them behind, and the rest rifled their Camp. Valerius Antias says, that there were above forty thousand of the Enemy that day slain: and Cato, who was never backward to praise himself, says, there were a great many kill'd, but does not mention the exact number of them.

XVI. He is thought to have done three very commendable things that day: the one in that having led his Army about, a good way from his Fleet and Camp, where they could have no hopes but in their valour, he began the fight amidst his Enemies; the other, in that he set the Regiments upon the Enemies Rear: and the third, for that he order'd the second Legion (when all the rest were dispers'd to pursue the Enemy) to march regularly in Rank and File, under the Ensigns up to the Gate of the Enemies Camp. Nor did he lie idle after he had got the Victory: but having given the signal for a retreat and brought his men back all laden with spoils into the Camp, he gave them some few hours of that night to take their rest in, and then led them forth to plunder the Country. And there indeed they were very extravagant in what they did, the Enemy being all routed and dispersed: which which forced the Emporitan Spaniards and their Neighbours to a surrender no less than the unfortunate Battle the day before. Many also of other Cities, that had fled into Emporia, surrender'd themselves: all which, when he had saluted them very kindly, and refresh'd them with Wine and Victuals, he sent to their own homes. Then presently he removed his Camp from that place; and which way soever his Army went, Embassadors met him from Cities, that surrender'd themselves. But when he came to Tarraco, all Spain on this side Iberus was already subdu'd, and the Captives, (as well Romans as Allies of the Latine Race) who were oppress'd in Spain by several misfortunes, were brought back as a present to the Consul. After that there was a report, that the Consul would lead his Army into Turdetania, and a false rumour also spread, that he would go toward the inaccessible and desvious mountains. Upon this vain report, without any authority for it, seven Castles belonging to the Bergistans revolted: and that people, the Consul, (bringing down his Army upon them) subdu'd without any memorable Engagement. But, not long after, the same Nation, when the Consul was gone back to Tarraco (and before he went forward any way from thence) fell off again: But were a second time reduced, though they had not the same kind usage as before, being all sold for slaves, that they might never more disturb the Peace.

In the mean time P. Manlius the Prætor, having received the old Army from Q. Minucius, whom he succeeded, and likewise join'd to it Ap. Claudius Nero's old Army out of the farther Spain, went into Turdetania. Now the Turdetans are accounted the most effeminate of all the Spaniards. Yet relying upon their multitude they went to meet the Roman Army. But the Horse being sent in upon them immediately put their Army into disorder. The Foot conflict had no difficulty in it at all; for the old Souldiers understanding very well the Enemies methods, and the Discipline of War made no question of the Victory. And yet they did not end the War with that fight. The Turdetans hired ten thousand Celtiberians and prepared for the War with Foreign Arms. In the mean time the Consul being concern'd at the Rebellion of the Bergistans, and supposing that the other Cities would, upon occasion, do the same thing, disarm'd all the Spaniards on this side Iberus. Which thing they took so very ill, that many of them made away with themselves; for being a Warlike Nation, they thought it not worth while to live without Arms. Which when the Consul heard, he order'd the Senators of every City to be called before him, and told them; It is not more our interest, than yours, that you should not rebel. For that hath hitherto been always done with greater disadvantage to the Spaniards, than trouble to the Roman Army. But I suppose there is one way to prevent that, by putting you out of a capacity to rebel. And I am resolv'd to bring that about the mildest way I can. Pray do you also assist with your Counsel in the affair; for I'll follow no advice more willingly than what you your selves shall give me. Whereupon they being silent, he told them, he'd give them some few dayes time to consider of it. But when, being summon'd again, they held their tongues at the second Council also; he in one day pull'd down all their Walls; and then marching toward those that were not yet reduced, as soon as he came into every Country, admitted all the people that dwelt there round about to make their Surrenders: save that he took Segestica, a great and opulent City, with Engines, and Galleries [like Pent-Houses, made of Boards and cover'd with raw Hides, &c. to keep off Arrows, &c. from the Souldiers, whilst they made their approaches to the Walls of a Town.]

Now he found it so much the more difficult to subdue his Enemies, then than, those that first came into Spain: because, to his Predecessors the Spaniards revolted, as being weary of the Carthaginian Yoke; but by him were to be vindicated or judicially challeng'd, as it were, from their usurped liberty into slavery: wherefore he found all things in such confusion, that some of them were in Arms, and others by being besieged were forc'd to revolt: nor had he not come in time to assist them, could they have held out any longer. But the Consul had so much wit and courage together, that he us'd to make one himself in every thing that was done, whether greater or lesser: nor did he consider only and give order for that which was convenient, but himself also transacted several things in his own person: never shewing his authority more gravely or severely upon any one than upon himself. For he vied with the meanest of his Souldiers in Parsimony, watchings, and pains-taking; nor had he any thing in the Army more than another man, excepting honour and the command of it.

The Celtiberians, who, as I said before, were hired by the Enemy, made the War in Turdetania the more difficult to P. Manlius the Prætor: Wherefore the Consul, for whom the Prætor sent a Letter, led his Legions thither. When he came there (now the Celtiberians and the Turdetans had two distinct Camps) the Romans running into their stations began to make some light Skirmishes with the Turdetans; coming off with Victory, though their attempt was never so rash. Then the Consul order'd the Tribunes of the Souldiers to go and talk with the Celtiberians, and to carry them their choice of three conditions [of Peace:] the first, that they would come over to the Romans, and accept of double the pay which they were to have from the Turdetans: the next, that they would depart to their own homes, upon the publick word and promise, that their joining with the Romans Enemies should be no disadvantage to them: and the third, that if they delighted in War, they would appoint a time and place, where they they might fairly fight it out. But the Celtiberians desired time to consult of it. Thereupon a Council was held, at which there were several Turdetans present, with a great Tumult, that hinder'd their resolving upon any one point. Now though it were uncertain, whether they should have Peace or War with the Celtiberians, yet the Romans, as in times of Peace, carried in Provisions out of the Country and Castles of the Enemies: and, besides that, went often into their Fortifications, as if they had agreed upon a Commerce with them by virtue of a private Truce. But the Consul, finding that he could not tempt the Enemy to fight, first of all, led some of his most active Regiments, under their several Banners, into that part of the Country, that was yet unpillaged: where having an account, that all the Baggage and Carriages of the Celtiberians were left at Seguntia, he went forward with his Army to attack that place. But seeing that nothing would provoke them, he, having paid off not only his own men, but the Prætors also, and left all the Army in the Prætorian Camp, himself with seven Regiments went back to Iberus.

XX. With that force, though so small, he took several Towns; besides that the Sedetans, Ausetans, and Sueffetans revolted to him. But the Lacetans, who lived in a pathless, woody Country, were still in Arms, not only by reason of their natural inclination to War, but because they were conscious that whilst the Consul and his Army were employ'd in the Turdetan War, they had plunder'd the Roman Allies by sudden incursions which they made upon them. Wherefore, to attack their Town, the Consul led not only the Roman Regiments, but the youth of those Allies who were so justly incensed at them. Their Town was very long, and not high so broad: from whence he set up his Standard about four hundred paces. And, leaving there a guard of certain chosen Regiments, he order'd them, not to stir out of that place, till he himself came to them: but led the rest of his Forces round to the farther side of the City. The Sueffetan youth were the greatest part of all his Auxiliaries; whom he commanded to approach and attack the Wall. The Lacetans knew by their Arms and Ensigns, who they were; and therefore, remembering, how often they had over-ran their Country, how often they had routed and defeated them in set Battles, on a sudden open'd their Gates, and sallied out all together upon them. The Sueffetans could scarce endure the shout that they set up, much less their violent Effort: which when the Consul (as he thought before-hand he should) saw come to pass, he gallop'd up to the Wall of the Enemies, to the Regiments: and taking them hastily along with him (whilst all the Lacetans were in eager pursuit of the Sueffetans) led them into the City, at a place where there was silence and no Company [to defend it] taking all the whole Town before the Lacetans came back. They therefore soon afterward, having nothing but their Arms, surrender'd themselves to him.

XXI. From thence he presently march'd victorious to Vergium, a Fort so called; which was for the most part a refuge for Robbers; who from thence made incursions into the peaceful parts of his Province. Thence fled the Prince, or Governour of the Town, and came to the Consul, beginning to excuse both himself and his Country-men [in this manner.] That the Government of that Town was not in their hands: but that a Company of Robbers, that were taken in, had made the whole Garrison their own. Thereupon the Consul bad him go home again, but frame some plausible excuse for his absence; and when he saw him under the Walls (the Thieves being then also intent to defend them) that then, with the men of his own Faction, he should be sure to seize the Castle. Accordingly he went and did as he was order'd: which put the Romans on the one hand (whilst they were climbing the Walls) and the Barbarians on the other hand (to see the Castle taken) into a sudden consternation. The Consul having got possession of this place, commanded that all those, who were in the Castle, with their Relations, should have their liberty and Estates; order'd the Questor to sell the rest of the Townsmen, and punish'd the Robbers [as he thought fit.] Having quieted the Province he impos'd great Taxes upon the Iron and Silver Trades, out of which the Province grew every day still richer and richer: and for these exploits of his in Spain the Senate decreed a Supplication of three days continuance.

XXII. The same Summer the other Consul L. Valerius Flaccus fought a second set Battle with the Boii in Gaul, near the Litan Wood: in which, they say, there were eight thousand Gauls slain, and that the rest, quitting the War, escaped into their Villages and other parts of the Country. The Consul, the rest of the Summer, kept his Army near the Po, at Placentia and Cremona, and repaired those places which in those Towns were demolish'd in the War. Now this being the state of affairs in Italy and Spain, T. Quintius (who had so spent his Winter in Greece, that excepting the Ætolians (whose rewards for their Victory were not answerable to their expectations; besides that they would not long be pleas'd with Peace and quietness) all Greece, enjoying the advantages at once of Peace and Liberty too, were very well satisfied with their condition; nor did they more admire the Courage of the Roman General in War, than his Temperance, Justice and Moderation even in Victory) had an order of Senate brought to him, to declare War against Nabis of Lacedæmon. Which when Quintius had read, he by Embassadours summon'd a Convention at Corinth of all the associated Cities upon such a day: where when the great men from all parts were met together, so as that even the Ætolians did not fail to come, he made this Speech to them: The Romans and the Greeks were not more unanimous, and agreed in their making War against Philip, than they had both of them reason to be. For he had forfeited the Romans Friendship, not only by assisting the Carthaginians, their Enemies, but here also by opposing our Allies; and behaved himself so toward you, that the injuries done to you, though we should forget our own, would be to us a sufficient ground for a War. This dayes consultation depends wholly upon you. For I refer it you, whether you will suffer Argos, which you know to be now in Nabis's possession, to continue in subjection to him; or whether you think it reasonable, that a very famous and ancient City lying in the middle of all Greece, should be restor'd to its liberty, and be in the same condition with the other Cities of Peloponnesus and Greece in general. This consultation, you see, is about a thing that wholly relates to you only: for it does not at all concern the Romans, save only in this, that one Cities being in slavery hinders the glory of having set Greece at liberty from being full and perfect. But if neither your care for that City, nor the example, nor the danger of it be so prevalent with you, as to make you stop the progress of that contagious evil, we are content. For I consult you in this affair, resolving to stand by what the majority of you shall think fit to be done.

Romans

After the Roman General had made this Speech, they began to sum up the opinions of the others also. Among whom when the Athenian Embassadors had extoll'd (as much as he was able) the merits of the Romans toward Greece, by giving them many thanks, and saying, that being desir'd they lent their assistance against Philip; but now, without asking, freely offer'd their aid against the Tyrant Nabis: and seem'd to be very angry, that such great deserts should be by some people lessen'd, who calumniated what was to come, when they ought rather to have paid their thanks for what was past, it plainly appear'd that he meant the Ætolians. Wherefore Aminander the chief Magistrate or Prince of that Nation, inveighing first against the Athenians, who though they were once the Assertors and Authors of liberty, did now, to gratify their own flattering humour, betray the common cause; and then complaining, that the Achæans, who were formerly Souldiers under Philip, though at last they revolted from his declining fortune, had already taken Corinth, and endeavour'd all they could to get Argos also: but that the Ætolians, though they had been Philips first Enemies, perpetual Allies to the Romans, and had bargain'd by League that the Cities and Lands, when Philip was conquer'd should be theirs, were cheated of liberty they kept Garrisons in Chalcis and Demetrias; though when Philip deserv'd the drawing of his Guards thence, they us'd to object and say, that Greece would never be at liberty as long as Demetrias, Chalcis and Corinth were in his possession: and lastly, that they pretended the reason why they staid with their Armies in Greece, proceeded from Argos and Nabis. But let them carry their Legions into Italy; and the Ætolians would undertake that Nabis should draw his Guards out of Argis, either upon their terms, and when they pleas'd, or they by force of Arms would compel him to submit to the unanimous resolutions of all Greece in general.

This vain boast of his first mov'd Aristæus, Prætor of the Achæans; who said; Great Jupiter, and his Queen Juno, (in whose protection Argos is) forbid, that that City should be as a booty between the Lacedæmonian Tyrant, and those Thieves the Ætolians, and in such danger, that we should have it again in a worse condition, than when by him it was taken. T. Quintius! The Sea that lies betwixt, does not defend us from those Robbers: What would become of us then, if they had a Castle in the middle of Peloponnesus? They have only the language of Grecians, as they have the shape of men: but they use manners and customs more rude than any Barbarians, yea than the most Savage Beasts. Wherefore we desire you, Romans, not only to recover Argos from Nabis, but likewise so to settle the affairs of Greece, as to leave these parts secure from the rapine of the Ætolians. The Roman seeing all the Assembly on every side did so much blame the Ætolians, said, he would have answer'd them, had he not seen them all so incens'd against that Nation, that they ought rather to be reconciled than provoked. Wherefore he said, that, being content with that opinion, that they had of the Romans and Ætolians, he refer'd it to them, what they thought of making a War against Nabis, unless he restor'd Argos to the Achæans. Whereupon when they all had voted for a War, he desired, that each City would send what Auxiliaries they could. He also sent an Embassadour to the Ætolians, to discover their inclinations more than out of any hopes he had of their assistance.

Then he Commanded the Tribunes of the Souldiers to send for the Army from Elatia: and at the same time gave Antiochus's Embassadors that came to treat concerning an Alliance, this Answer, that he could not resolve upon any thing whilst the ten Embassadors were absent, but they must go to Rome to the Senate. When his Forces were come from Elatia he himself led them on to Argos, and Aristæus, Prætor of the Achæans, met him about Cleona with ten thousand Achæans [Foot] and a thousand Horse; not far from which place they join'd their Armies into one Body and Encamped. The next day they march'd down into the Argive Plains, and took a place for their Camp about four thousand paces from Argos. Pythagoras was Governour of the Lacedæmonian Garrison there, who was the Tyrants Son-in-Law, and his Wives Brother. He, just as the Romans were a coming, put strong Guards, not only into both the Castles (for there were two at Argos) but in all other places too, which were either opportune [for the Enemy] or suspected [to be less tenable.] But whilst he was a doing so, he could not by any means hide the fear that he was put into by the arrival of the Romans: besides, that to his outward terrour there was an addition made of inter-

XXIII

XXIV.

XXV.

stings

fine Sedition. There was one Damocles of Argos, a youth of greater Courage than Conduct; who having first agreed with certain persons fit for his purpose (and bound them under an Oath too) about expelling the Garison, whilst he endeavour'd to add new strength to his Conspiracy, was too regardless of the fidelity [of his Accomplices.] Wherefore an Officer, that was sent from the Prefect, came and summon'd him as he was talking with his Associates: and then he perceived his Plot was discover'd. With that he encouraged the Conspirators that were present, rather than die in torment, to take up Arms with him; and so he went with some few Companions into the Forum; crying out, That all those, who were for the safety of the publick Weal, should follow him as the Author and Captain of their liberty. But he prevailed not upon any of them, because they saw no hopes near at hand, much less any thing, in which they could put any sure trust. Wherefore, as he was bawling aloud in this manner the Lacedemonians came about him, and kill'd not only him but his Companions also. After which there were some others also laid hold on; of whom many were slain, and some few put in Prison; though several of them the next night, being let down the Wall by Ropes, ran over to the Romans.

XXVI.

Quintius, when they told him, If the Roman Army had been at the Gates, that bustle had not been without effect; and that if he would remove his Camp a little nearer, the Argives would not yet be quiet; sent a party of his nimblest Horse and Foot, who, about Cylabaris (which is a place for exercise not quite three Hundred Paces from the City) engaged the Lacedemonians that sallied out at the Gate, and with no great difficulty forced them back into the City; so that the Roman General pitch'd his Camp in that very place where they fought. When he had so done, he watched one Day, to see whether any new tumult would arise. But when he perceived, that the City was all in a consternation, he call'd a Council to advise about the taking of Argos. All the Princes of Greece, except Aristonius, were of the same opinion, that since that was the only cause of a War, they ought to begin it there, though Quintius did not like their counsel, but hearken'd with approbation to what Aristonius said, even against the consent of all the rest; adding of himself, that since the War was undertaken for the Argives, against the Tyrant, what could be more disagreeable than to leave the Foe and attack Argos? wherefore he would lend all his force toward Lacedemon, and the Tyrant which was the original and chief ground of their quarrel. So having dismiss'd the Council, he sent his nimblest Regiments a foraging: who reaped and brought in all the Corn that was ripe quite round the Country, treading down and spoiling all that was green, lest the Enemy soon after might enjoy it. Then he removed his Camp, and having the Mountain Parthenus, pass'd by Tegae and encamped the third day at Carya. There, before he enter'd into the Enemies Country, he staid for the Auxiliaries from his Allies; who accordingly came, fifteen hundred Macedonians from Philip, and four hundred Thessalian Horse. Nor did the Auxiliaries, who were numerous enough, now stay the Roman, but the Provisions that were expected from the neighbouring Cities. There came also a great many Seamen thither too; for L. Quintius was arrived from Leucas with forty Sail of Ships: besides eighteen Rhodian men of War; whilst King Eumenes at the same time was cruising about the Cyclade Islands with ten men of War, thirty Barks and other lesser Vessels. A great many likewise of the Lacedemonians, that were banish'd by the Tyrant, in hopes of regaining their Country, came into the Roman Camp. Now they were numerous, as having been driven out of their own Habitations, some at one time and some at another, for several years, since Tyrants had usurp'd in Lacedemon. The chief of the banish'd persons was Agessipolis, who had a right by his birth to the Kingdom of Lacedemon; but was sent away whilst he was yet an infant, after the death of Cleomenes the Tyrant Lycurgus, who was the first that set up for arbitrary Government in Lacedemon.

XXVII.

Now though the Tyrant was so hard beset, both by Sea and Land, and when he compar'd his own Forces to those of the Enemy, had scarce any hopes at all left, yet he went on with the War: for he raised a thousand of their best young men out of Creet too, having another thousand of them before hand, besides three thousand mercenary Souldiers, and a thousand of his own Country-men, with the Country-Garison men who were in Arms; and fortified the City with a Trench and a Bullwark. And lest there should happen any intestine disturbance, he awed their minds by the fear and severity of punishments [that he made them believe he would inflict upon them, if they would not be quiet.] For seeing he could not hope that they should wish him well, whilst he suspected some of their Fellow Citizens; he drew all his Forces out into the Field [for exercise] called Dromos, and commanding them to lay down their Arms, order'd the Lacedemonians to be summoned to an Assembly, about which he planted a party of his Guards all in Arms. Then having made a short Speech to them before hand, and told them, why they ought to pardon him for being so timorous and cautious of every thing at such a time as that was: and how much it was for their advantage, if the present juncture of affairs had render'd any persons suspicious, that those who had any design on foot should be rather hinder'd from being able to carry it on, than punish'd for being taken in the attempt: wherefore he would keep some certain men in custody, till the storm, that was at hand, were over; and when he had repelled the Foe (of whom there would be the less danger, if they were secured from treachery among themselves) would presently let them out again, he he order'd the names of about eighty of the chief young men in the City to be called over, and as each of them answer'd to his name, committed them to Jail, where the next night they were all kill'd. After that some of the Ilores (who are a Country breed of Garison Souldiers that have been very ancient in that Nation) being accused for an intention they had to have revolted to the Enemy, were whip'd through all the streets, and so put to death. This put the Mobile into such a fright, that they desisted from all endeavours of making any innovation. Mean while he kept his Forces within the Fortifications; for that he neither thought himself strong enough, if he had a mind to engage the Enemy in a pitch'd Battle; nor dar'd to leave the City when all people were in such suspense, and so unfetled in their minds.

Quintius having now prepared all things for his march decamped, and the next Day came XXVIII! to Sellasia which lies upon the River Oenus, where Antigonus King of Macedonia was said to have fought a set Battle with Cleomenes, Tyrant of Lacedemon. Thence (hearing that the ascent was difficult and the way narrow) he went round about over the Mountains (but sent a party before him to secure his passage) in a Road that was broad and open enough, to the River Eurotas, which runs almost under the very Walls [of the Town.] At which place as the Romans were encamping, the Tyrants Auxiliaries set upon them and Quintius himself also, who went before with the most active Horse and Foot, at such a rate that they put them into a fright and confusion, they expecting no such thing, because they had met no body all the way they came, but had pass'd as it were through a conquered Country. For sometime therefore they were at a loss (the Horse calling to the Foot and the Foot the Horse [for assistance]) since none of them had any confidence in their own abilities. At length the Legions came up; and when the Regiments of the Vanguard were engaged in the fight, those who so lately had been a terror to them, were forced to fly for fear into their City. The Romans having retired so far from the Wall, as to be out of Darts cast, stood for some time in Battalia: but anon, when they saw none of the Enemies would come out to oppose them, return'd to their Camp. The next day Quintius went forward with his Army all in Array, along by the River side, by the City, and under the Mountain Melanaus. The Legionary Regiments went foremost, and the Light-armour with the Horse brought up the Reer. Nabis had the mercenary Souldiers, in which he reposed all his trust, in Battalia, and ready under their Ensigns within the Walls, to set upon the Enemy behind. When therefore the last Company was just gone by, they sallied out in the same confusion that they had done the day before. Ap. Claudius brought up the Reer: who having prepar'd the minds of his men for what was likely to come to pass, (that it might not surprize them) commanded the Ensigns immediately to face about, and so turn'd all the whole Army upon the Foe. By which means, as though two form'd regular Armies had join'd Battle, they fought for some time upon an even lay; till Nabis's Souldiers at last inclined to run; though that they had not been so sure to have done, had not the Acheans, who knew those parts very well come upon them. But these made a great slaughter [among them] and disarm'd a great many that were dispers'd in their flight all over the Country. Then Quintius encamp'd near Amylea: where when he had plunder'd all places round the City (which stood in a populous and pleasant Country (seeing that none of the Enemies would come out of their Gates, removed his Camp to the River Eurotas; from whence he march'd into the Vale that lies under Taygetus, laying waste both that and all the Country as far as the Sea-side.

At the same time L. Quintius reduced the Towns upon the Sea-Coast, partly by voluntary XXIX! Surrender, and partly through fear or by force. And then being inform'd, That the Town of Gyttheum was the receptacle of all the Lacedemonians maritime provisions; and that the Roman Camp was not far from the Sea; he resolv'd to attack it with all his Forces. It was at that time a strong City for the multitude of its Inhabitants, as well as its being furnish'd with all kind of Warlike Preparations. Now, as Quintius was going about this difficult business, King Eumenes and the Rhodian Fleet came very seasonably in to his assistance: and the vast multitude of Seamen, muster'd up out of the three Fleets, in few dayes accomplish'd all those works, that are necessary for the attacking of a City so well guarded, both by Sea and Land. The Wall therefore was soon overturn'd, when they once applied their Tortois'es to it, being batter'd by their Rams also. For by the repeated strokes of them was one of the Towers thereof demolish'd, and all the Wall about it by the fall of that knock'd down: so that the Romans endeavour'd to get in, not only at the Gate, where the passage was more plain (in order to distract and draw the Enemy from defending the breach) but at the place which they had broken down. Nor did they much miss of making way, where they design'd; only the hope they had that the City would be surrender'd retarded their motion; though it was soon frustrated. For you must know, that there were two Governours of that City, called Dexagoridas and Gorgopas, who were in equal authority over it. Of whom Dexagoridas had sent a Message to the Roman Lieutenant, That he would surrender the City: but when they had agreed upon the time and way to do the business, the Traitor was kill'd by Gorgopas; and the City more vigorously defended by one alone. By which means the attack had now been more difficult, had not T. Quintius come up with four thou-

S I F F

fand

and choice Souldiers. But when he had shown his Army from the brow of an Hill not far from the City, and that L. Quintius with his works lay hard upon them both at Sea and Land, then real despair forced Gorgopas also to take that course which he had reveng'd with death upon the other. He therefore, on condition, that he might carry off those Souldiers, that were in Garison there, surrend'rd the City to Quintius. But before Gythium was surrend'rd, Pythagoras the Governour of it left Argus, and committing the care of that City to Timocrates the Pellenian, went with a thousand mercenary Souldiers, and two thousand Argives, to Nabis at Lacedemon.

XXX. Nabis, as he was startled at the first arrival of the Roman Fleet, and the surrender of the Towns upon the Sea Coast, so, though he were comforted with the small hopes of Gythium being still in the possession of his Friends, when he heard that that too was deliver'd up to the Romans, seeing that the Enemy lay all round the City to the Landward, which spoiled all his hopes, and that to the Seaward also he was intercepted, thought it the best way to yield to Fortune, and therefore sent an Herald first into the Camp to know, whether they would suffer him to send Embassadors to them. Which when he had got leave to do, Pythagoras came to the General with no other Message, but to desire, that the Tyrant might come and talk with the General. Thereupon a Council was presently call'd, who being all of opinion, that they ought to admit of a Conference, the time and place was appointed for it. And when they came with some small Forces following them to the Hills that are in the middle of that Region, leaving their Regiments of both sides, thereupon the Mountains within view, Nabis, with some chosen men to guard his person, and Quintius with his Brother, King Eumenes, Sofians of Rhodes, Aristenus, Prætor of the Acheans, and some few Tribunes of the Souldiers, came down [to meet each other.]

XXXI. Then, having his choice given him, whether he would speak first, or hear Quintius before him, the Tyrant thus began: "If I (T. Quintius and all you that are here present) could of my self have found out any reason, why you should either declare, or actually wage War against me, I should have silently expected the issue of my Fortune. But, as the case now stands, I could not persuade my self, but I must needs know, before I dy'd, what I had done to deserve death. And truly, if you were such persons, as, they say, the Carthaginians are, who have no regard to the sacred obligations of Friendship and Alliance, I should not wonder to find you careless what you did to me. But now I see you, and know that you are Romans, who bear a most religious respect to the obligations of divine constitutions, and to the Friendly compacts that are made between you and others, looking back upon my self, I hope I am worthy not only to be concern'd publicly, with the rest of the Lacedemonians, in that ancient League between you and them; but upon my own particular account also to maintain that Friendship and Alliance which was so lately renew'd in the War against Philip. But I [you'll say] have violated and overthrown that union, by being possessed of the City of Argos. How shall I defend this action? By matter of fact or by the occasion? The matter of fact affords me a double defence. For I received that City from their own hands, who call'd me [in] to their assistance, and deliver'd it to me; nor did I take possession of it, or get it, when being on Philips side it was not in Alliance with you. Besides which, the time also clears me, in that, though I at the same time had Argos in my hands, I was their Ally; and you contracted with me to send you aids, for the War, not to draw my Garison out of Argos. But to say truth, in this controversy concerning Argos I have the better of you, both as to the equity of the thing it self (in that I took, not a City that was yours but the Enemies; and that by consent not by force) and by your confession too, for that, in the conditions of Alliance, you left me Argos [to do what I would with.] But the name of Tyrant, and my actions lie heavy upon me; inasmuch as I make the slaves free, and carry the poor Commonalty into the Country. But as to the name I can answer, that I, whatever I am, continue still the same man that I was, when you, T. Quintius, your self made the Alliance with me. Then I remember you called me King, though now I see I am stiled a Tyrant. Wherefore if I had changed my name of Government, I ought to be accountable for my inconstancy; but seeing you change it, you ought to be so for yours. As to the number of the Commons being increas'd by making the slaves free, and the division of Lands among the poorer sort, I can even in this point also defend my self upon the score of the time. I had done all this, what ever it be, before you enter'd into an Alliance with me, and when you receiv'd my Auxiliaries that I sent you in the War against Philip. But if I had done them even now lately; I cannot say, what injury I should have done you in it, or how far I should have forfeited your Friendship; but this I can affirm, that I should have done according to the custom and prescript of our Ancestors. Pray do not you measure what is done at Lacedemon by your Laws and Customs. There is no necessity to compare all particulars. You chose an Horse or a Foot Souldier by his condition in the state, and making some few very rich will needs have the Commonalty to be subject to that small number; but our Law-giver would not have the Common-Wealth to be in the hands of a few, whom you call a Senate; nor suffer one rank or other in our City to be above the rest; supposing that by an equality of fortune and dignity it would

"would be so brought about, that many would bear Arms for their Country. I confess I have been more prolix than the short way of speaking in our Country allows, and might have told you in brief, that I, since I contracted a Friendship with you, have done nothing to make you repent of it.

To this the Roman General reply'd; "We never contracted any Alliance or Friendship with Thee, but with Pelops, the just and lawful King of Lacedemon. Whose right the Tyrants also, who afterward by force had made themselves Masters of Lacedemon (when they were employed sometimes in the Punick Wars, sometimes in the Gallick Wars, and sometimes elsewhere) usurped; as thou too in this Macedonian War hast now done. For what would be more absurd, than for us, who waged a War against Philip to set Greece at liberty, to contract a Friendship with a Tyrant? and that such a Tyrant too, as is more cruel and violent against his own Country-men, than any one that ever was before him? But we, though thou hadst not taken, nor didst not keep Argos by fraud, since we pretend to deliver all Greece, ought to restore Lacedemon also to its ancient liberty and Laws: of which you (as though you would vie with Lycurgus) just now made mention. Shall we take care that Philips Guards be drawn out of Fassus and Bargylla, but leave Argus and Lacedemon, two such famous Cities, once the glory of all Greece, in thy hands, to diminish the honour of our having deliver'd all Greece by their being still in slavery? But the Argives (you say) were on Philips side: very good, but we'll pardon you in this point, though you are not angry on our behalf. We know very well, that two or three at most, and not the whole City were guilty of that fault; as well as that, when you and your guard were sent for and taken into the City, there was nothing done by publick advice or consent. We know that the Theffalians, Phocians and Locrians, were all unanimously for Philip: and yet, now that we have deliver'd all the rest of Greece, what do you think we'll do with the Argives, who are innocent of any publick design? You said the crimes of having freed the slaves, and divided the Lands among the poorer sort of people, were laid to their charge, and truly they are no small ones; though they are nothing to those exploits that you and your party do every day one on the neck of another. Call a free Assembly at Argos or Lacedemon, if thou hast a mind to hear the true objections that may be made against thy most Tyrannical Government. To pass by all other things of longer standing, what a barbarous murder did that Pythagoras thy Son-in-Law commit at Argos almost before my Face? and what an one didst thou thy self commit when I was now almost in the Territories of the Lacedemonians? Come, come, give order that those persons whom you laid hold on in the publick Assembly, and, in the hearing of all their Fellow Citizens, declar'd you would keep in Prison, be brought forth with their Bonds about them, that their wretched Parents may see, that they, who have been so mistakenly by them lamented, are still alive. But though these things are so as I say, yet [you'll reply] what's that to you, Romans? And will you say so to the deliverers of Greece? to them, who to put themselves in a capacity of freeing it, cross the Seas, waging War both by Land and Water? Yet I, say you, have not properly injur'd you, nor violated your Friendship. How often will you have me prove that you have done it? But I shall not use many words; I'll tell you in short. What is it then that violates Friendship? Why, they are chiefly these two things; if you take my Allies for your Enemies, or join with my Enemies [against me.] Now both these things you have been guilty of. For you not only took Messene, which was Allied to us by the same League, as Lacedemon was (though your self our Ally) by force and Arms, but you likewise contracted with Philip our Enemy, not only a Friendship, but an affinity, forsooth, by means of Philocles his Prefect, besides that you waged War against us, and infested all the Sea about Malea with Piratical Ships; taking and killing full as many Romans as Philip ever did; inasmuch that the Coast of Macedonia was more secure for our Ships that were to bring in provisions for our Armies, than the Promontory of Malea. Wherefore forbear, I pray, to brag of your fidelity and right to an Alliance with us, and, leaving off your popular way of haranguing, speak like a Tyrant and an Enemy.

Hereupon Aristenus one while advis'd, and another while beg'd of Nabis; "that, whilst he might, whilst he had an opportunity; he would consult his own good: and then he began to repeat the names of the Tyrants in each particular neighbouring City: "who, having laid down their command, and restored their liberty to their Countrymen, had lived not only to a secure, but even an honourable old age among their Fellow-Citizens. Whilst these things were said and heard on both sides, night approached and ended the Conference. But the next day Nabis said, "that, since the Romans would needs have it so, he would quit Argos, and draw his Garison out of it, restoring the Captives and the Fugitives to them again. But if they had any thing else to demand, he desired that they would give it him in writing, that he might deliberate about it with his Friends. So, not only the Tyrant had time given him to advise in, but Quintius also held a Council consisting of his chief Allies. In which the greatest part were of opinion; "They ought to go on with the War and take off the Tyrant: for the liberty of Greece would never be otherwise secure. That it had been much better for them no War had ever been rais'd against him.

"him, than that it should be let fall when it was once set on foot. That he would not only, "as it were by their approbation, be after that more firmly settled in his Throne, when the "people of Rome should seem to consent to his unjust Dominion, but likewise by his Example "would incite many more in other Cities to ensnare the liberty of their Fellow-Citizens. The Generals own inclinations were most toward Peace. For he saw, now the Enemy was forced into his Walls, there was nothing remaining but a Siege; and that would be tedious. "For they were not to attack Gythium, which notwithstanding was surrendered, though "they could not take it; but they were to besiege Lacedemon, a City that was very strong "both in men and Arms. That the only hope they had left was the possibility of creating "some dissension or Sedition among the Besieged, as they made their approaches: but when "they saw the Ensigns almost at their very Gates, never a man of them stirred. To which he added, "that the Peace they had with Antiochus also stood upon a very false bottom; for "Vilius, the Lieutenant, who came from thence brought word, that he was come over into "Europe with much greater Forces than before, both by Sea and Land. Now therefore if the "Siege of Lacedemon should detain his Army there, what other Forces should they have to "wage a War against so mighty and so puissant a King? This he spake aloud, but was privately in himself afraid, lest a new Consul should happen to have Greece for his Province, and by that means his Successor have the honour of ending the War which he had begun.

XXXIV. But seeing that by all his opposition he could not move the Allies to the least compliance, he, by pretending to come over to their opinion, made them all of his own side. "Well, said he, let us Besiege Lacedemon then, since you will have it so. But since the attacking of Cities is, as you yourselves know, a thing so tedious, and make the Besiegers oftentimes sooner weary than the Besieged: you must now resolve upon wintering about "the Walls of that City. In which affair, if there were only labour and danger to be undergone, I would exhort you to prepare your minds and bodies for the enduring of it. "But now we want a great sum of money too, to make the Works, the Engines, and "Warlike Instruments, wherewith such a great City is usually attack'd, and for procuring "of Provisions both for us and you against the Winter. Wherefore, lest you should either "on a sudden be dishearten'd, or quit the thing, when 'tis once begun, before you have "made an end of it, I think you ought first to write to your several Cities, and see, what "condition they are in as to courage and strength for the carrying of it on. I have Auxiliaries enough and to spare; but the more we are, the more necessities we shall want. The "Enemies Country at this time hath nothing in it but the bare ground: besides, that the "Winter draws on, in which 'tis difficult to carry things together from places very distant. This Speech of his made them all first to consider their several domestick misfortunes; "the sloth and envy of those that staid at home against such as went into the Wars; their liberty "of Speech and Judgment, which made it so hard for them all to consent: the publick "wants, and their slackness to contribute out of their own Estates. Wherefore they immediately alter'd their minds, "and let the General do what he thought best for the Commonwealth of Rome, and the advantage of his Allies.

XXXV. Thereupon Quintius, with the advice of the Lieutenants only, and the Tribunes of the Souldiers wrote down these conditions upon which he would have a Peace concluded with the Tyrant: "That there should be a Truce of six months between Nabis, the Romans, King "Eumenes and the Rhodians. That T. Quintius and Nabis should presently send Embassadors "to Rome, to get the Peace confirm'd by authority of the Senate. That the day, on which "the terms of Peace were given out to Nabis, should be the beginning of the Truce; and "that between that day and the tenth day following, all his Guards should be drawn out of "Argus and the other Towns, that were in the Argive Dominions: so as that they should "be deliver'd up quite empty and free to the Romans: as likewise, that no slave of the *Kings, "either publick or private should be taken thence; or if any had been before that time so "taken away, they should be faithfully restored to their Masters. That he should send "back the Ships which he had taken from the Maritime Cities; nor should himself have "any Ship excepting two Pinnaces, that should not be rowed with above sixteen Oars. That "he should re-deliver their Captives and Fugitives to all the Allies of the Roman People, and "to the Aessenians all things that appear'd, or the Masters [of such goods] knew to be "theirs. That he should also restore to the Banish'd Lacedemonians their Children and Wives "that had a mind to go along with their Husbands: but that no man should be forced to "go with any banish'd person against her will. That all the goods belonging to Nabis's "mercenary Souldiers, who were gone away either to their own Cities, or over to the Romans, should be carefully restored unto them. That he should not have any City in the "Island of Creet, and that those, which he had, he should surrender to the Romans. That "he should make no Alliance with any Creetan City, or any body else, nor wage War with "them. That he should draw his Guards out of all those Cities, that either he himself had "restored, or had surrender'd themselves and all they had, up to the protection and government of the Roman People, keeping himself and all that belong'd to him from ever "meddling with any of them. That he build no Town or Castle, either in his own, or any

* That is, Nabis's.

"Foreign

"Foreign Dominions. That he should give five Hostages for the performance of all this, "such as the Roman General should approve of, and among the rest his own Son for one; "with a hundred Talents of silver at present, and fifty every year for eight years together.

These terms being written, his Camp was removed more near to the City, and they sent XXXVI. to Lacedemon: though none of them, to say truth, pleas'd the Tyrant; save that beyond expectation there was no mention made of bringing back the banish'd persons. But that which most offended him was, that the Ships and Maritime Cities were taken from him. For the Sea brought him in great profit, being that he infested all the Coast from Malea with Piratical Ships. Besides, that he had all the youth of those Cities to supply him with the far best sort of Souldiers. These conditions, though he consider'd of them in private with his Friends, were notwithstanding the publick Discourse; his Guards being very apt, as in other matters of trust, so to betray his Secrets. Yet they did not all in general find fault with the whole, but each man with those particulars which more immediately concern'd him. Those that had married banish'd mens Wives, or had any of their goods, were very angry, as if they had been to lose and not to restore them. The Slaves that were freed from the Tyrant, did not only think their freedom would be of no consequence to them, but their thralldom much worse than before; now they were to return into the hands of their incens'd Masters. The mercenary Souldiers also were not only troubled that their stipend would come to nothing in time of Peace, but likewise saw, that there was no returning for them into their own Cities, which hated the Guards belonging to Tyrants as much as the Tyrants themselves.

When they had first talk'd thus in Crowds among themselves, they straightway ran and XXXVII. took up their Arms. By which tumult when the Tyrant saw the Mobile were of themselves sufficiently provoked, he order'd an Assembly to be forthwith summon'd. Where when he had declar'd, what the Roman General had impos'd upon him, to which he had added some things more grievous and more unworthy of his own head, at each of which sometimes all of them, and sometimes a part of the Assembly shouted, he ask'd them, What they would have him answer to those Proposals, or what he should do? to which they almost unanimously reply'd, That he should make no answer at all, but prepare for the War: bidding him, each man for himself, (as the Mobile use to do) be of good Courage, and hope the best; for fortune always favour'd the Valiant. With which words the Tyrant was so animated, that he cry'd out, Antiochus and the Ætolians would assist him: and that he had Forces enough to hold out the Siege. By which means they had also forgot that there had been any mention made of Peace, and ran to their several Posts, resolving no longer to be quiet. Whereupon the excursions of some few that came out to provoke the Romans, with the Darts that they threw, put the Romans soon past all doubt but they must necessarily fight; and from that time, for the space of four dayes, they had light Skirmishes at first, without being able certainly to know what would be the issue of it. But the fifth day the Lacedemonians were forced into the Town in such a consternation, that some of the Roman Souldiers falling upon the Rear of them that fled, got into the City through the gaps (as things then stood) that were in the Wall.

Then Quintius, having sufficiently restrain'd the Enemies Excursions by the fright he then XXXVIII. put them into, and supposing that nothing now remained for him to do, but to attack the City itself, sent certain persons to fetch all the Naval Forces from Gythium, whilst he himself in the mean time, with the Tribunes of the Souldiers, rode round the Walls to view the situation of the Town. Now Sparta [you must know] was formerly unwall'd: but the Tyrants of late dayes had built a Wall in the open and plain parts thereof: defending the higher places, that were less accessible, with guards of armed men instead of Fortifications. When he had taken a satisfactory prospect of every thing; supposing that the best way to take it, was to invest it, he posted all his men quite round the City; whose number was, of Romans, Allies, Horse and Foot, with Land and Sea Forces all together full fifty thousand fighting men. Some of which brought Ladders, others Fire, and others other things, wherewithal not only to attack the City, but to affright the Besieged. Then he commanded to set up an Huzza, and all begin the Assault at the same time, to the end, that the terrified Lacedemonians might not know where first to make resistance, and which part to assist, being in a general consternation. The strongest part of the Army, which was divided into three Battalions, he order'd to make their Assault, one of them on the side of Phæbeum, [a place dedicated to Phæbus] the other near Dilymneum [a Temple of Diana] and the third at that place which they call Heptagonia [for its being seven corned] these being all open parts of the City without any Wall. Now seeing that the People were all in such a fright, the Tyrant first of all being startled, not only at the sudden shouts, but the trembling Messengers [that brought him news of what the Enemy was a doing] as every place most stood in need of assistance, either went himself in person to meet the Foe, or sent some others. But soon after, being quite confounded with fear, he was so distracted, that he could neither tell nor hear what was for his advantage; being not only destitute of advice, but almost out of his wits too.

The

XXXIX. The Lacedemonians at first kept out the Romans pretty well in narrow places; and three Parties fought at the same time in several places. But when the Conflict increased, the Battle was by no means equal. For the Lacedemonians fought with Darts [to throw from them] from which the Romans not only easily defended themselves by the bigness of their Shields, but likewise forasmuch as some of their Darts miscarried, and others hit to very little purpose. For by reason that the place was so narrow, and the crowd so great, they not only wanted room to throw their Weapons running, which makes them fly with more force; but, had not so much as a free and a steady place to stand upon when they hurled them. By which means the Darts that were thrown directly at them stuck none of them in their Bodies, and few in their Shields. But some there were wounded by those that stood round in the higher parts of the City: and anon as they went forward there were not only Darts, but Tiles also thrown down upon them from the Houses before they were aware. Wherefore they held their Shields over their Heads, and join'd them so close one to another, that there was no room, not only for Darts thrown at a distance to hit them, but they were not to be pierced even hand to hand; and under that Tortoise of Shields they made their approach. At first the narrow passages fill'd with the crowd of them, and the Enemy for a little time kept them out. But when they had forced the Foe into a broader street in the City, and by degrees got somewhat farther, their strength and force was no longer to be born. Whereupon when the Lacedemonians had turn'd their backs, and ran as fast as they could to the higher parts of the City; Nabis, who trembled as if the City were taken, lookt about him to find which way he himself might escape. But Pythagoras, who in all other things did the part of a General that had both Courage and Conduct, was at that time the sole cause why the City was not taken. For he order'd the Houses next the Wall to be set on fire: which being all in a moment on a blaze (forasmuch as they who at other times used to help to quench a fire, were themselves the Incendiaries) the Houses began to fall upon the Romans Heads: nor did the Tile shards only but burnt Rafters also hit the Souldiers; the flame increas'd far and wide every way; and the smoak also grew more terrible than it was dangerous to them. Wherefore not only the Romans that were without the City, making at that time the fiercest attack, retreated from the Wall; but those likewise who were got in, lest they might be intercepted from the rest of their Army by the fire breaking out behind them, retired. Quintius also, when he saw how the case stood, order'd them to sound a retreat: and so being call'd off, when the City was now almost taken, they return'd to their Camp.

XL. Quintius being more encouraged by the Enemies fear, than from the thing it self, for the three dayes following continued to scare them: provoking them one while to light Skirmishes, and another while blocking up certain passes, that they might have no way to fly out. The Tyrant forced by these menaces sent Pythagoras a second time in quality of an Envoy; whom Quintius at first so slighted that he bid him be gone out of the Camp: though afterward, upon his humble Petition and falling down before him, he had his Audience. At which the first Speech he made was to declare that they left all to the pleasure of the Romans; but seeing that such vain and ineffectual Proposals would do no good, the matter was brought to this Issue, that a Truce should be made upon the same conditions which a few dayes before had been set forth in writing: and the money and hostages also taken. In the mean time whilst the Tyrant was thus besieged, the Argives, who had Message upon Message, that Lacedemon was even almost taken, were themselves also encouraged, and therefore seeing that Pythagoras was gone forth with the strongest party of that Garison, contemning those few that were in the Castle, they, under the command of one Archippus, drave out all the Souldiers that were in it. But they sent out Timocrates the Pellenian, because he had govern'd them with great clemency, upon honour alive. As they were rejoicing for this their deliverance, Quintius arrived there, having granted a Peace to the Tyrant, dismissed Eunenes and the Rhodians from Lacedemon, and sent his Brother L. Quintius to the Navy.

XLI. The City being over joy'd appointed the day which with them is the most solemn, for the celebration of the noble sports called the Nemean Games, which had been omitted by reason of the War, against the arrival of the Roman Army and its General [Quintius] whom they made Agonotheta or Regulator of the performance. But there were many other causes also, that enhans'd their mirth. For their Citizens were brought back from Lacedemon, whom Pythagoras of late, and whom, before him, Nabis had carry'd thence: besides that those also were come back, who, after the Plot was discover'd by Pythagoras, and the slaughter now begun, had made their escape: having a prospect of liberty from a long interval, and seeing the Romans who were the Authors of it, to whom they themselves had been the occasion of making War with the Tyrant. The Argives also upon the very day of the Nemean Games were declared to be absolutely free. But look how much joy the restitution of Argus brought the Achaeans and the whole Assembly of Achaia, so much did Lacedemons being left in Slavery, and the Tyrants sticking to the side of it, diminish their satisfaction. Upon which account the Etolians were very invective in all their publick meetings [and said] The War with Philip was not made an end of before he departed out of all the Cities in Greece: but a Tyrant was left at Lacedemon; whilst the lawful King, who was in the Roman Camp, and the rest of the principal Citizens were like to live in banishment. So that the People of Rome were become the Lifeguard to Nabis. Quintius carry'd back his Forces from Argus to Elatia, from whence he came to the Spartan War. Now there are, who say, the Tyrant did not come far out of the Town to fight, but lay in a Camp [just without the Walls] over against the Roman Camp: And that when he had linger'd a great while, expecting the Etolian Auxiliaries, he was forced at last to engage with them in a set Battle, seeing the Romans fell upon his Foragers; and being in that fight not only overcome but forced from his Camp likewise, desir'd a Peace, after he had lost fifteen thousand men, and that above four thousand were taken Prisoners.

out

About the same time there were Letters brought [to Rome] from T. Quintius concerning what he had done at Lacedemon, and from M. Porcius the Consul, out of Spain. Whereupon in the name of them both there was a Supplication decreed by the Senate to be made for three dayes together. L. Valerius the Consul, when he had defeated the Boii near the Litane Wood, and thereby quieted that Province, return'd to Rome to hold the [grand] Assembly: and created for Consuls P. Cornelius Scipio Africanus (a second time) and Ti. Sempronius Longus; whose Fathers had been Consuls the first year of the second Punick War. After that the Pratorian Assembly was likewise held: in which, there were chosen [for Prators] P. Cornelius Scipio, and the two Cn. Cornelius's, Merenda and Blasio, Cn. Domitius Aenobarbus, Sex. Digitius, and T. Juvencius Thabna. When the Assembly was dissolv'd the Consul return'd into his Province. A new privilege was that year aimed at by the Ferentines: That all those Latines, who had given their names into a Roman Colony should be Citizens of Rome. Now there were several persons added to Putoli, Salernum and Bruzantium, who had given their names, and for that reason pretended to be Roman Citizens; but the Senate did not esteem as such.

At the beginning of that year in which P. Scipio Africanus (a second time) and Ti. Sempronius Longus were Consuls, there came two Embassadors from the Tyrant Nabis to Rome. To whom there was an Audience granted without the City in the Temple of Apollo; they coming to desire that the Peace made with T. Quintius, might be confirm'd, which they accordingly obtained. After that, when the business concerning the [division of the] Provinces was proposed, the Senate were most of this opinion; that since the War in Spain and Macedonia was made an end of, both the Consuls should have Italy for their Province. But Scipio thought that one Consul was enough for Italy: and that the other ought to have Macedonia. That there was a grievous War like to befall them from Antiochus. For what could they think he'd next do, who was already come over, of his own accord, into Europe? especially when the Etolians, who were undoubtedly their Enemies, on the one side, and Annibal, who was a General so famous for having kill'd so many Romans, incited him to a War? But whilst the Consuls Provinces were in Debate; the Prators also took their Lots. Cn. Domitius happen'd to have the City jurisdiction; T. Juvencius the Foreign; P. Cornelius the farther Spain, and Sex. Digitius the hither; of the two Cn. Corneliuses, Blasio Sicily, and Merenda Sardinia. They were not for transporting a new Army into Macedonia; but that that which was already there should be brought back into Italy by Quintius, and disbanded. So also, that the Army which was with M. Porcius Cato in Spain, should be disbanded. That both the Consuls should have Italy for their Province betwixt them, and carry two Legions raised out of the City thither with them; so that when those Armies were disbanded, which the Senate had appointed so to be, the Roman Legions might be but eight in all.

The Spring had been hallow'd the year before, when M. Porcius and L. Valerius were Consuls. Which when P. Licinius the High Priest declared, (first to the College, and then by authority of the College to the Senate) not to be rightly perform'd, they order'd it to be done over again according to the direction of the High-Priests; and that the Grand Games [called Ludi Magni] which were at the same time vow'd, should be set forth with as much money as was usual. But that the Ver Sacrum [or hallowing of the Spring] seemed to be a Beast that was born between the first of March and the last of April, when P. Cornelius Scipio, and T. Sempronius Longus were Consuls. After that the Assembly for choosing of Censors was held: in which were created Sex. Aelius Patus, and C. Cornelius Cethegus, who chose P. Scipio the Consul President of the Senate, as the former Censors had also done: passing by but three Senators in all, though none that had ever gone in a Chariot of State [to the House.] They likewise gained great favour with that Order, forasmuch as at the Roman Playes, they commanded the Curule Ediles to divide the Senators places from those of the Commonalty: for before that they all sat promiscuously. They also took their Horses from very few of the Knights; nor were they severe upon any order at all. The Porch of Liberty, and the Villa publica [or publick place for exercise in the Campus Martius] was by them two repaired and enlarged. The Spring was hallow'd, and the Games, that Ser. Sulpicius Galba when Consul had vow'd, perform'd. And when the minds of all people were intent upon the sight of them; Q. Pleniinus, who, for his many hainous offences both against the Gods and Men at Locri, had been put in Prison, got a Company of Fellows to set the City on fire in the night time at several places; to the end that when the City was consumed alternated by the nocturnal tumult, he [and his Complices] might break open the Prison. But the Conspirators, some of them, detected the design, and it was told the Senate; [by whose order] Pleminius was thrown into the Dungeon, and there put to Death.

XLV. There were Colonies of Roman Citizens that year carry'd to Puteoli, Vulturnum, Literum, three hundred men to each of them: as there were such like Colonies also carry'd to Salernum and Buxentum. They were carry'd thither by a Triumvirate, who were T. Sempronius Longus (then Consul) M. Servilius, and Q. Minutius Thermus. That Land which formerly belong'd to the Campanians was divided. Three others also, that is to say, D. Junius Brutus, M. Babius Tamphilus, and M. Helvius carried another Colony of Roman Citizens to Sipontum, in that part of the Country which formerly belong'd to the Arpines. There were also Colonies of Roman Citizens carried to Tempsa and Croton. The Tempsan Territories were taken from the Bruttii, the Bruttii had expell'd the Greeks, and the Greeks at that time were in possession of Croton. The Triumviri, Gn. Octavius, L. Aemilius Paulus, and C. Pletonius carried [the Colonies] to Croton; as L. Cornelius Merula, and C. Salonius did to Tempsa. There were moreover several Prodigies seen that year at Rome, and several others that they were told of. In the Forum, the Comitium [Assembly House] and in the Capitol there were drops of blood seen: and it rained Earth several times; and Vulcan Head was all on a flame. [Besides which] it was reported, that at Interamna, there was a River of Milk: that at Ariminum there were divers ingenuous Boyes with out either Eyes or Nose: and that in the Picene Territories there was one Born without either Hands or Feet. All which Prodigies were expiated by order of the High Priests, and a Sacrifice of nine dayes made, for that the Adrians had reported, that in their Dominions it had rained Stones.

XLVI. In Gallia L. Valerius the Pro Consul fought a pitch'd Battle near Millain, with the Insulrian Gauls and the Boii, who under the Command of Dorulacus, were come over the Po to raise the Insulrians; in which there were ten thousand of the Enemies slain. But at the same time his Colleague M. Porcius Cato out of Spain triumph'd, bringing in at the same time [to the Treasury] twenty five thousand pounds of Silver Bullion, of Bigates [pieces stamped with a Chariot] a hundred twenty three thousand, and of Oscan [Silver] five hundred and forty: besides fourteen hundred pound of gold. To his Souldiers he gave each of them two hundred and seventy [Alles] of Brass, and treble to an Horsenman. T. Sempronius the Consul going into his Province, led his Legions first into the Country of the Boii. Boiorix who was then their King, having with his two Brothers excited all the Nation to Rebel, pitch'd his Camp in a convenient place; that it might appear, they were resolv'd to fight, if the Enemy came into their Confines. The Consul, when he perceiv'd, what the Enemies strength was, and what confidence they had in it, sent to his Colleague to desire him, that, if he pleas'd, he would hasten his coming: for he would protract the whole affair by delays till his arrival. Now the same reason that the Consul had to delay, the Gauls had to hasten (save that the delay of the Enemies increas'd their Courage) that they might dispatch their business, before two Consuls had join'd their Forces together. Yet for two dayes they did nothing but stand ready to fight, if any one came forth to oppose them; but the third day they march'd briskly up to the Bullwark, and attack'd the Camp on every side at the same time. Whereupon the Consul order'd his men immediately to take up their Arms: but kept them for some time in the same place after they were armed; that he might not only augment the foolish confidence of the Foe, but likewise have opportunity to marshal and instruct his Forces, at which Gates he would have each party fall forth. Two Legions were order'd to march out at the principal Gates: though the Gauls stood so thick before, that they block'd up the pafs. They fought along time in those narrow places; nor did they do more Execution with their Hands and Swords, than they did by thrusting with their Shields and Bodies: the Romans to carry their Ensigns out; and the Gauls, either themselves to get into the Camp, or to hinder the Romans from coming forth. Nor could the two Armies stir either the one or the other way, before Q. Vitorius, Captain of the Vanguard, and C. Atinius, Tribune of the Souldiers; the latter belonging to the fourth, and the former to the second Legion (as a thing in difficult cases often tried) took the Ensigns from the Ensign-Bearers, and threw them among the Enemies. Whereupon, as they strove with all their force to regain their Ensign, those of the second Legion threw themselves first out at the Gate.

XLVII. These therefore now fought without the Bullwark, whilst the fourth Legion stuck in the Gate, when at the same time another tumult arose on the back side of the Camp. For the Gauls had broken in at the Questorian Gate, and making a stout resistance had kill'd L. Postumius the Questor, furnamed Tympanus, with M. Atinius, and P. Sempronius, who commanded the Allies, besides almost two hundred private Souldiers. By which means the Camp on that side was taken, till an extraordinary Regiment, whom the Consul sent to defend the Questorian Gate, not only kill'd part of them that were within the Bullwark, and drove the rest out of the Camp, but hinder'd those that were a breaking in. About the same time the fourth Legion also with two extraordinary Regiments got out at the Gate. So that there were three Engagements at the same time about the Camp in several places: and the different shouts that were set up at the uncertain Casualties that happen'd to their side, took off the the minds of the persons engaged from the present Conflict. Till Noon they fought with equal strength, and almost with equal hopes. But when the fatigue and heat together had forced the Gauls, with their tender and fluid Bodies, that cannot endure thirst, to quit the Field, the Romans made an Effort upon those few that remained, and having routed, forced them into their Camp. Then the Consul gave the signal for a Retreat; at which the greater part retired; but the rest out of love to fighting, and hopes of enjoying the Enemies Camp, stood their ground at the Bullwark. The Gauls, contemning their small number fallied all out of their Camp, and routed the Romans: so that they were forced for fear and dread to repair to their Camp, to which at the Consuls order they would not go. Thus was the Victory one while, and anon their flight, very various on both sides: though of the Gauls there were eleven thousand slain, and of the Romans five thousand: after which the Gauls betook themselves into the most Inland parts of all their Confines.

The Consul led the Legions to Placentia: though some say, Scipio having join'd his XLVIII: Army with that of his Colleague, went to ravage the Territories belonging to the Boii and Ligurians, as far as the Woods and Fens would suffer him: others, that, having done no memorable action, he return'd to Rome to hold the Assembly. This same year T. Quintius spent all the Winter at Elatia (where for that season he quarter'd his Forces) in doing of Justice; and altering those things that had been in those Cities, either by the licentious inclination of Philip himself, or any of his Prefects; when, by increasing the strength of men that were of his own Faction, he took away the rights and liberties of others. In the beginning of the Spring he came to Corinth, where he had appointed an Assembly: and there applying himself to the Embassadors of all the Cities, who stood in a ring about him, he began first with the Friendship which the Romans had contracted with the Greek Nation, together with the exploits that the Generals before him had done in Macedonia, and his own achievements also. All this was heard with great approbation, till he came to mention Nabis: For it did not seem agreeable for one that deliver'd Greece to leave a Tyrant behind him, who was not only a grievance to his own Country, but to be fear'd by all the Cities round about, and stuck in the bowels (as it were) of a famous City.

Nor was Quintius ignorant how they stood affected; and therefore confess'd, that if it XLIX: could have been done without the ruine of Lacedaemon, He ought not to have hearkned to any terms of Peace. But now, seeing he could not be subdu'd any otherwise than by the fatal ruin of that City, he thought it better to leave the Tyrant weaken'd and deprived of almost all his power to hurt any body else, than to let such a City be destroy'd by remedies too violent for it to bear, and perish even whilst he asserted its liberty. But to the remembrance of what was past he added; that he designed to go into Italy, and carry all his Army along with him. That they should bear within ten dayes, that the Garisons at Demetrias and Chalcis were drawn out: that he would deliver Acrocorinthus immediately before their Faces empty up to the Achaens: to the end that all people might know, whether the Romans or the Etolians were us'd to lie; who had given out that their liberty was very unwisely trusted in the hands of the Roman People, and that their Macedonian Masters were only chang'd for Roman Lords. But that they never cared what they said, or what they did. That he advis'd the other Cities, to value their Friends not by their words, but their actions: and learn to know, whom they ought to believe, and whom to have a care of. That they would use their liberty with moderation: for when it was temperate, it was wholesome both for each particular person and the communities in general too; but being extravagant was headstrong and unruly, as well to them that had it, as it was grievous to others. That the Nobility in every City, and the several orders of men among themselves, with all the Cities in common, should study Concord. For there was no King or Tyrant could be strong enough to oppose them if they agreed one with another: but that discord and sedition made all things easy to those that have a mind to ensnare them; when that side which is the weaker at a domestick conflict, engages rather in a Foreign one, than they will yield to a Fellow-Citizen. That they would keep and preserve the liberty, which was gotten by external force, and restored by others love to them, very carefully: that the Roman People might know they had given liberty to those that deserv'd it, and that their favours were well placed.

When they heard these words, as if they had come from a Father, they all cry'd for joy, so that they confounded even him also whilst he was a speaking. But some time after they hum'd to signify their approbation, and advis'd each other, that they would suffer those words, as though they were utter'd from an Oracle, to sink into their breasts and minds. And then having commanded silence, desired of them, That they would send all the Roman Citizens, whom they could find among them in slavery; within two months to him in Thessaly. For it was not honourable, even for themselves, that in a Country just set at liberty the very deliverers of it should be in servitude. Thereupon they all cry'd out, that they gave him thanks, among other things, for this also, that they were put in mind to do so pious and necessary an office. For there was a vast number of such as were taken in the Punick War, whom Annibal, being they were not redeemed by their own Countrymen, had sold. To prove which, Polybius writes, that that business cost the Achaens a hundred Talents, five hundred Deniers being set upon each ones Head, to be given back to their several Masters. For at that rate there were in Achaia twelve hundred. Now do you reckon proportionably how many it was likely that that all Greece contain'd. The Convention was not yet dissolv'd, when they saw the Garrison, descending forthwith down from Acrocorinthus, march to the Gate and so away. In Reer of whom the General follow'd, attended by all the People, who with Acclamations call'd him their Saviour and Deliverer: and when he had saluted and disbanded those men, return'd to Elatia the same way that he came. From thence he sent away Sp. Clandius the Lieutenant with all his Forces; bidding him go through Thessaly and Epirus to Oricum, and there stay till he came. For from that place he design'd to transport his men into Italy. He wrote also to L. Quintius his Brother Lieutenant, and Admiral of the Fleet, to get the Ships of burden together from all the Coasts of Greece into that Port.

LI. He himself going to Chalcis, and drawing the guards not only out of that place, but of Oreum and Eretria likewise, held there a convention of all the Eubœan Cities; and having told them, In what state he found them, and in what condition he left them, dismiss'd the Assembly. Then he went to Demetrias, where having drawn forth the Garrison, he went forward, attended by all the People as at Corinth and Chalcis, into Thessaly; in which the Cities were not only to be set at liberty, but from a general mixture and confusion to be reduc'd into some tolerable form. For they were put in disorder, not only by the vices of the times, and the violence as well as licentiousness of the King; but even by their own mutinous inclination also; having not held either an Assembly, Convention, or any Council, though they were not concern'd in any sedition or tumult, from that time to this our present age. He therefore chose a Senate and Judges for them according to every Mans estate; and made that part of the Cities most powerful, whose greatest interest it was to have all things safe and quiet.

LII. When he thus settled Thessaly, he came through Epirus to Oricum from whence he was to cross over. From Oricum all his Forces were transported to Brundisium; from whence they marched in triumph through all Italy almost to the City [of Rome] with no less a train of things that they had taken, than of what was their own, before them. When they came to Rome, there was a Senate granted to Quintius without the City, in which he might declare what exploits he had done; and a deserved Triumph decreed him very freely. He triumph'd three Days; on the first of which he carried forth the Arms, Darts, brazen and marble Ensigns; more whereof were taken from Philip than he had taken from the several Cities. The second Day [he produced] the Gold and Silver, tried and untried, with that Alia which was coined. Of untried Silver there was eighteen Thousand Pounds, and of tried two Hundred and seventy; a great many Vessels of all sorts, most of them imbosc'd, and some very curiously done; with many made of brass; besides ten silver Bucklers, and of coined Silver eighty four Thousand Attick Pieces [each of half a Crown value] which they call Tetradrachms, weighing about three deniers in Silver. There was also three Thousand seven Hundred and fourteen Pound of Gold, and one shield all of Gold, of Philips Coin [much like our Jacobuses] fourteen Thousand five Hundred and fourteen. The third Day the golden Crowns, which were the presents of the several Cities, were carried forth, being a Hundred and fourteen in number. There were Sacrifices likewise led along; and before his Chariot a great many Noble Captives, as well as Hostages, among whom was Demetrius King Philips Son, and Armenes the Tyrant Nabis's Son, of Lacedæmon. After all which Quintius himself rode into the City, whose Chariot was attended by a great Body of Soldiers, the Armies being drawn out of all the Provinces. Among them were divided five Hundred brass Pieces, to the Foot; as much again to each Centurion, and treble to an Horseman. They also, that followed with their Heads shaven (as being freed from slavery) added an Ornament to this Triumph.

LIII. At the end of this Year Q. Ailius Tubero, Tribune of the People, by order of the Senate proposed to the Commons, and they consented, That two Latine Colonies should be carry'd, the one into the Country of the Bruttii, and the other into the Thurine Territories. For the conveying whereof there were twice three Persons chosen, who were to govern the Bruttii for three Years, Q. Nevius, M. Minutius Rufus, and M. Furius Crassipes; and for the Thurine Territories A. Manlius, P. Ailius, and L. Apustius. Those two Assemblies Cn. Domitius the City Prætor held in the Capitol. There were some Temples that Year dedicated; one to Juno Sospita in the Herb-Market (which had been vowed and built four Years before by C. Cornelius Consul in the Gallick War; and was dedicated by the same Person being now Censor) and another to Fannus, which the Ædiles had two Years before ordered to be built out of the Fine Money, their names being C. Scribonius, and Cn. Domitius, by whom, as Prætor of the City, it was dedicated. Q. Marcus Ralla also dedicated a Temple to Fortuna Primigenia, on the Hill called Collis Quirinalis, being created Duumvir for that purpose. P. Sempronius Sophus had vow'd it ten Years before in the time of the Punick War, and built it when he was Censor. C. Servilius also the Duumvir dedicated a Temple in the Isle of Jupiter, which had been vowed six Years before in the time of the Gallick War by L. Furius Purpureo the Prætor, and was afterward ordered to be built by him when he was Consul. And these were the transactions of that Year.

LIV. P. Scipio returned out of his Province of Gaul to make new Consuls; and in the Assembly for that purpose there were chosen L. Cornelius Merula, and Q. Minutius Thermus. The next next day there were created for Prætors L. Cornelius Scipio, M. Fulvius Nobilior, C. Scribonius, M. Valerius Messala, L. Porcius Licinus, and C. Flaminius. C. Atilius Serranus, and L. Scribonius Libo, being the Curule Ædiles, were the first that ever set forth the Megalésia, Stage-Plays [in honour of Cybele.] And these were the first Ædiles in whose time the Senate sate, and saw the Roman Plays in a distinct place from the People; which gave occasion (as all novelties do) for some to say, that they had now at length paid the respect to that most noble order, which long before was due to them; though others thought, it was a diminution to the dignity of the people, whatever was added to the majesty of the Senate; and that all such distinctions between the several orders of men tended to the lessening and impairing of their concord and liberty both. That they had seen the Plays promiscuously for five hundred fifty eight years. What then was the reason all on a sudden, that the Senators would not have the commons mixt among them in the Boxes? Why should a rich man disdain to have a poor man sit by him? Which was a new and a proud humour never thought on, or set up by the Senate of any Nation ever before. But at last they say, that even Africanus himself repented for having been the Author of that discrimination: so far the best way it is not to alter old Customs; men being more inclined to adhere to their old fashions, unless where experience evidently corrects them.

In the beginning of that year when L. Cornelius and Q. Minucius were Consuls, they heard of so many Earthquakes, that the people were not only troubled at the thing it self, but also at the holy days that were appointed upon that account. For neither could any Senate be held, nor the Common-wealth lookt after, the Consuls being wholly taken up in Sacrificing and making expiations. At last the Decemviri being commanded to consult their Books, there was according to their answer a supplication made for three dayes together: during which time they paid their devotions at every Temple with Garlands on their Heads: and it was order'd; that all of the same Family should make their supplications together. The Consuls also by authority from the Senate made an Edict, that no man should bring news of any other Earthquake the same day that a former had been told of, and Holy-Dayes appointed for it. After this the Consuls first and then the Prætors shar'd the Provinces. Cornelius had Gaul, and Minucius Liguria. C. Scribonius the City jurisdiction, M. Valerius the Foreign, L. Cornelius Sicily, L. Porcius Sardinia, C. Flaminius the hither Spain, and M. Fulvius the farther.

Now though the Consuls expected no War that Year, yet they had Letters from M. Cincius (who was Governour of Pisa) that twenty thousand arm'd Ligurians who had enter'd into a Conspiracy through all the Burroughs of the whole Nation, having first pillaged the Territories of Luna, and from thence gone over into the Pisan Dominions, had over-ran all the Sea Coast. Wherefore Minucius the Consul, whose Province was Liguria, by consent of the Senate went up into the Rostra [the place for Orations] and gave order; that the two City Legions, which had been raised the year before should be within eleven dayes at Arctium: and said that he would raise two more City Legions in their stead. He also commanded the Allies and Magistrates, that were Latines, together with the Embassadors of such as ought to find Souldiers, to come to him in the Capitol. Out of whom he set down fifteen thousand and five hundred Horse, according to the number of their several young men: bidding them go from the Capitol to the Gate, and so, to hasten the business, away forthwith to make the Levy. There were allow'd as a supply to Fulvius and Flaminius three thousand Roman Foot; and a hundred Horse, besides five hundred Latine Foot and two hundred Horse; the Prætors being order'd, to disband the old Souldiers as soon as they came into their Provinces. Now whereas the Souldiers that were in the City Legions had gone to the Tribunes of the people in great numbers [to desire] that they would hear those men speak for themselves, who by reason of their age or sickness were excused from the War; a Letter from T. Sempronius put an end to that matter, in which he had written; That fifteen thousand Ligurians were come into the Placentine Dominions; which they had destroy'd even to the very Walls of the Colony, and the Banks of Po, with slaughter and fire. That the Boii also were inclined to Rebellion; and for that reason there was a tumult now on foot. Whereupon the Senate decreed, that they would not leave the Tribunes of the people try military causes, to hinder the men from meeting according to order: adding likewise, that those Latine Allies, who had been in the Armies of P. Cornelius, and T. Sempronius, and had been disbanded by them, when they were Consuls, should meet at the same day and the same place in Etruria that the Consul L. Cornelius had appointed: and that L. Cornelius had appointed: and that L. Cornelius, as he went into his Province, should raise arm and carry with him out of the several Towns and Countries, through which he was to march, what Souldiers he pleas'd; of whom he might again disband as many as he thought good, and that when he had a mind to it.

After the Consuls having made their Levy were gone into the several Provinces, then T. Quintius desired the Senate to hear him touching those things which he and the ten Embassadors had agreed upon; and, if they thought fitting, by their authority would confirm them. Which they would the more willingly do, if they had but once heard what the Embassadors, that came out of all Greece, great part of Asia, and from the several Kings, had to say. Those Embassadors therefore were introduced into the Senate by C. Scribonius the City Prætor, and had each of them a very kind Answer. But because the dispute with Antiochus was somewhat too long, it was referred to the ten Embassadors, part of whom had been in Asia, or at Lyfima chia with the King. Thereupon T. Quintius was commanded, taking them along with him, to hear what the Kings Embassadors could say; and to give them such an answer as might be suitable to the dignity and convenience of the Roman People. Now one Menippus, and one Hegesianax were chief of the Kings Embassy: of whom Menippus said; He could not tell what difficulty there could be in their Embassy, when they were come merely to desire a Friendship and contract an Alliance [with the Romans.] Now there were three sorts of Leagues, whereby States and Kings were united one to another. One, when those that were conquer'd in War had conditions set them. For when all things were surrender'd to him that was the strongest, it was his right and privilege to determine what part of such things the conquer'd should have, and what they should be deprived of. Another, when two that were equal in point of War agreed upon a Peace and Alliance on even terms. For then things were demanded and restored back by mutual compact, and if either party have been disturbed in the possession of what is their own, such differences are composed either by the rule of ancient Laws, or for the convenience of both sides. But there was a third kind; when those that never were Enemies came together to contract a mutual Friendship by a League of Alliance. That they did neither give nor receive conditions; that being the method between a Conqueror and him that was conquer'd. Now seeing that Antiochus was of this sort, he wonder'd, that the Romans should think fit to limit him, what Cities of Asia they would have to be free and unconfin'd, and what stipendiary; as also which of them he and his Guards must not enter into: for they ought to make Peace with Philip, who was their Enemy at that rate, and not a League of Alliance with Antiochus who was their Friend.

LVIII. To this Quintius reply'd, Since you are pleas'd to treat so distinctly, and to enumerate the several sorts of Leagues, I also will lay before you two conditions, besides which (you may tell him) there is no way for the King to contract a Friendship with the Roman People. The one, that if he would not have us concern our selves with any of the Cities in Asia, he himself meddle not with any part of Europe. The other, that if he keep not within the bounds of Asia, but come over into Europe, the Romans may lawfully not only preserve the Alliances which they already have with the Cities of Asia, but make new ones also: But there Hegesianax made Answer and said, It was such an indignity as ought not to be mention'd; That Antiochus should be forced out of the Cities of Thrace and Chersonesus: all which his great Grandfather Seleucus, after he had conquer'd and slain King Lyfimachus, with so much glory gain'd and left behind him, and (when they were partly possessed by the Thracians, and partly deserted, as Lyfimachia it self [for Example]) Antiochus recover'd with his Arms, and peopled as before; building up anew such places, as had been thrown or burn'd down, at a vast expence. What comparison therefore was there between Antiochus being driven out of that possession so gotten and so regain'd, and the Romans not meddling with Asia, which was never theirs? That Antiochus desired the Friendship of the Romans; but so, that it might, if obtain'd, be a glory, not a dishonour to him. To which Quintius made Answer, and said; If we talk of honourable things, as the supreme people of the whole World, and so great a King ought only, or chiefly at least to do; pray which seems most honourable, to desire that all the Cities of Greece may be free, or to make them slaves and tributary? If Antiochus thinks it a glorious thing for him again to enslave those Cities, which his great Grandfather indeed had by right of War, but his Father and Grandfather never challenged; the people of Rome also think they are obliged by the Laws of fidelity and constancy not to desert the Patronage of the Grecian Liberty. And as they deliver'd Greece from Philip, so they intend to free all the Cities of Asia, belonging to the Greeks, from King Antiochus. For those Colonies were not sent [by the Greeks] into Æolis and Ionia to be slaves to the King; but to encrease their breed, and propagate an ancient Nation all over the World.

LIX. Now Hegesianax being at a stand, could not deny but the name of Liberty made the Romans Cause more honourable, than that of slavery did Antiochus's; and therefore P. Sulpicius, the Eldest of the ten Embassadors told them, But we shall not trouble our selves to dispute thus; chuse one of the conditions, which Quintius just now so plainly proposed, or talk no more of an Alliance. No, said Menippus, we neither will, nor can enter into any League, that may lessen Antiochus's Dominions. The next day, when Quintius had introduced all the Embassadors of Greece and Asia into the Senate, for them to see, how the Roman People, and how Antiochus also stood affected toward the Cities of Greece; he declar'd both his own and the Kings demands: [bidding them] tell their Cities, that with the same valour and fidelity, wherewith they had vindicated them from Philip, they would deliver them from Antiochus also, unless he departed out of Europe. Thereupon Menippus desired of Quintius and the Senate, not to hasten that Decree wherewith they were like to disturb the whole World; nor only take time themselves, but give time to the King to consider of it. For he would either consider better of it, when he heard the conditions, and make some successful suit to them, or for peace sake consent to them. Thus the whole matter was deferred: and order was given that the same Embassadors should go to the King that had been with him at Lyfimachia, who were P. Sulpicius, P. Villius and P. Ailius.

LX. But they were scarce gone, when Embassadors came from Carthage, and brought word, that Antiochus was undoubtedly preparing for a War by the instigation of Annibal: and made the Romans fear, lest a Punick War should be at the same time raised. Annibal having ving fled his Country was come to Antiochus, as I told you before; and was in great favour with the King upon no other account, but that, when Antiochus was debating a long time about a Roman War, no man could be more fit to advise with than he was. Now his opinion continu'd still the same; to have the War in Italy. For Italy would afford both Provisions and Souldiers to a Foreign Enemy. If there were no commotion there, but the Roman People were free with their strength and Forces to wage a War without Italy, that neither the King nor any Nation in the World were equal to the Romans. Wherefore he desired a hundred men of War, sixteen thousand Foot and a thousand Horse; and with that Fleet he would first go into Africa, where he did not question but he should make the Carthaginians rebel. But if they were backward, that he would raise a War against the Romans in some part of Italy. That the King with all the rest ought to cross over into Europe, and post his Forces in some part of Greece; not to pass [into Africa] (but which was enough to make a shew and noise of a War) to be ready for such an Expedition.

When he had brought the King to this opinion, he thought fit likewise to prepare his Countrymens mind for the same thing, but durst not send Letters to them, lest being by any accident intercepted, they might discover his design. Wherefore having found one Aristo, a Tyrian, at Ephesus, whose cunning he had tryed in finaller affairs (after he had encouraged him with presents and hopes of reward, to which the King also assented) he sent him with his commands to Carthage, telling him the names of those he must needs speak with, and private tokens also wherby they might know, that those were his Commands. But when this Aristo was at Carthage, Annibals Enemies knew as soon as his Friends the reason of his coming; of which they first talk'd publickly in the Streets and at Feasts, as they did afterward also in the Senate, where they said, They had done nothing by banishing of Annibal, if he could make innovations even in his absence, and by disquieting the minds of men disturb the peace of the City. That there was one Aristo, a Tyrian stranger, come instructed with commands from Annibal and King Antiochus; That certain Men did daily keep correspondence with him, and talk with him in secret what was e'rlong like to break forth into their general destruction. Whereupon they all cry'd out together, That Aristo ought to be called before them, and be ask'd, why he came; which if he did not confess, he should be sent with the Embassadors to Rome: [for the Carthaginians] had suffered sufficiently by the rashness of Annibal. That therefore, though private men might offend at their own peril; yet the Commonwealth must be preserved not only without blame, but even from the very suspicion or imputation of it. Accordingly Aristo was call'd and began to clear himself, using the strongest defence he had, that he had brought no Letter to any Man. But as he was not very ready to give an account of his coming, so he was gravell'd most at this, that they said, he talk'd with none but Men of the Barchine Faction. Whereupon there arose a quarrel among them. Some desiring that he might be presently seiz'd and clapp'd up for a Spy, whilst others said, They had no reason to breed such a disturbance; but that it was of evil example to lay hold on strangers for nothing; for the same things might happen to the Carthaginians both at Tyre and in other places, to which they had frequent occasions to go. Wherefore the matter was deferr'd for that Day. But Aristo making use of a Punick trick in a Punick Nation, wrote upon a Tablet, which in the Evening he hung up over the daily feat of the Magistracy; getting himself at the third Watch on board a Ship, in which he made his escape. The next Day when the Suffetes [i. e. Judges] came to do Justice, seeing the Tablet, they took it down and read the Writing, which was this, That Aristo had no private commands to any Man, but publickly to the Seniors; for so they call'd their Senate. When the Crime was known, they were the less intent to inquire into it; yet they were willing that Embassadors should be sent to Rome to inform the Senate and the Consuls of it, and complain at the same time of the injuries done by Massinissa.

Massinissa when he perceived that the Carthaginians were not only infamous, but also at variance among themselves (the Nobility being suspected by the Senate upon the account of Aristo's discourses with them; and the Senate by the People, upon the score of what Aristo had discovered) supposing that a proper time to do them an injury, he not only pillaged all their Sea Coast, but likewise forced some tributary Cities of the Carthaginians to pay him a stipend. They call that part of the Country Emporia, being the Coast near the lesser Syrtis, and a fertile Soil. One City of it was Leptis, which paid the Carthaginians a Talent a Day for Tribute. This Country at that time Massinissa infested all over, and in some part had made it doubtful whether it were in his or the Carthaginians possession. But when he found that they were going to Rome, not only to clear themselves, but to complain of him also; he himself likewise sent Embassadors to Rome, not only to aggravate their Crimes with suspicions, but also to dispute the right of the Tributes [which they exacted]. The Carthaginians, who were first heard touching the Tyrian stranger, put the Senate in a fear, Lest they must be forced to engage with Antiochus and the Carthaginians together. The suspicion which most enhans'd their Crime was, that, whereas they resolved to lay hold of Aristo and send him to Rome, they had not seiz'd either him or his Ship. Then they begun to dispute with the Kings Embassadors concerning that part of the Country [which was then in question]. In which case the Carthaginians defended their Cause by pleading to the limits of their Dominions, That it was within those bounds which P. Scipio being Conquerour had set to that part of Africa.

LXI.

LXII.

frica which should belong to the Carthaginians; and by the Kings own confession, who when he pursued Aphires, a Fugitive, out of his own Kingdom, wandering with a Company of Numidians about Cyrenæ, begg'd leave of them to pass through that very Region, as undoubtedly pertaining to the Carthaginians. To which the Numidians reply'd, Not only that what they said concerning Scipio's making such bounds was altogether false, but likewise, that if any one would search into the true original of their right, what Region could they find in Africa that properly belong'd to the Carthaginians? Certain strangers had as much ground precariously given them to build a City upon as they could compass with a Bulls-hide cut into thongs; and all they have since gain'd without their ancient Seat called Byrsa, they got by force and Arms. For they could not prove, touching that Region now in dispute, not only that they have had it always, since they first took it, but not any considerable time; because sometime they, and sometimes the Kings of Numidia, had it in possession by turns, it being always his that had the longest Sword. That they would let the matter be in the same condition as it was before the Carthaginians were Foes, or the King of Numidia Friend and Ally to the Romans, nor would hinder them that could, from getting it. Whereupon the Senate thought fit to answer the Embassadors of both sides, That they would send Embassadors into Africa, to debate of the present case between the Carthaginians and the King. Accordingly they sent P. Scipio Africanus, C. Cornelius Cethegus, and M. Minutius Rutilus; who have heard and look'd into the matter, left all things in suspense, inclining in their opinions to neither side. But whether they did that of their own accord, or because they were so ordered, is not so certain, as it seems to have been proper for that juncture, that they should be left without any decision of the quarrel; for unless it were so, Scipio alone, either by his knowledge of the thing, or his Authority, having deserv'd so greatly of them both, might have ended the dispute even with a nod.

DECADE IV. BOOK V.

The E P I T O M E.

Pub. Scipio Africanus, Embassador to Antiochus, had a Conference at Ephesus with Annibal, who had join'd himself with Antiochus; to remove, if it were possible, that fear which he had conceived of the Roman People. Where when, among other things, he ask'd, whom Annibal thought the greatest General; he answer'd, Alexander, King of Macedon; for that with so small an Army he had defeated an innumerable Host: and because he had over-ran the very utmost Borders [of the world] which but to see was above all humane hope. And when he ask'd him again, whom he lookt upon to be the second; Pyrrhus, said he, for he first taught [Soldiers] how to Encamp; besides that no body took places, or disposed of his Guards with more cunning. Whereupon when Scipio demanded, whom he esteem'd the third; he reply'd Himself. At which Scipio laugh'd, and ask'd him, What would you have said, if you had conquer'd me too? Why then, said he, I should have preferred my self not only before Alexander, but Pyrrhus and all others. 21. Among other Prodigies, which were very numerous, 'twas reported, that an Oxe belonging to Cn. Domitius the Consul, spake [and said] Rome, have a care of thy self. 23. The Romans prepare for a War against Antiochus. 13, 25, &c. Nabis, Tyrant of Lacedæmon, incited by the Ætolians, who importuned both Philip and Antiochus to make War against the Romans, revolted from the Roman People, and waging War against Philopæmenes, Prætor of the Achæans, 35. Was kill'd by the Ætolians. 32. The Ætolians also revolted from their Alliance with the Romans. With whom Antiochus King of Syria having enter'd into a League and made War upon Greece, possess'd himself of many Cities among which Chalcis was one, besides all Eubœa. 3, &c. Contains the relation of what was done in Liguria, and the preparations for a war, made by Antiochus.

- I. AT the beginning of the year in which these things were done, Sex. Digitius the Prætor had more Conflicts than are worth the speaking of, in the hither Spain, (with those Cities, which, after M. Cato's departure had many of them rebelled) and most of those so unfortunate too, that he scarce deliver'd to his Successor the half of those Forces, which he had receiv'd. Nor is it to be question'd, but all Spain had revolted, if the other Prætor, P. Cornelius Scipio, the Son of Cneius, had not fought many successful Battles beyond the River Iberus: at which the people were so affrighted, that no less than fifty Towns submitted themselves unto him. Scipio had done these things whilst he was Prætor. But he also, when Pro-Prætor, set upon the Lusitanians (who, having pillaged all the farther Spain, were coming home again with a vast booty) upon the rode, and engaged them from the third hour of the day till the eight, without knowing who would have the better of it, being out-done by them in point of number, but superiour in all other circumstances: for he had oppos'd them, not only with a close well-order'd Army against a long train of men, that were encumber'd with a crowd of Cattle too, but with fresh Souldiers against such as were tired with a tedious march. For the Enemies had set out at the third Watch, and travailed till three hours of the day were past: nor had they any time to rest themselves, before the Battle seconded the Fatigue of their Journey. Wherefore in the beginning of the the fight they had some vigour in their Bodies and Minds, so that they put the Romans into disorder; but afterward the fight was by degrees brought to an equal lay. At this critical juncture, The Proprætor vow'd Games to Jupiter, if he routed and slew the Enemy. At last the Romans bore more briskly up to them, and the Lusitanians gave way, till soon after they totally turn'd their backs, and, whilst the Conquerours pursued them very close, were twelve Thousand of them slain; five Hundred and forty, who were most of them Horse, being taken, with one Hundred thirty four military Ensigns; though of the Roman Army there were lost but seventy three. This fight was not far from the City Illipa; to which P. Cornelius led back his Victorious Army, with a rich Booty, which was expos'd to view before that City, and leave given to the owners to see what was theirs; the rest being delivered to the Quællors to be sold, and what Money was made of it divided among the Soldiers.

C. Flaminius the Prætor was not yet come from Rome, when these things were done in Spain. Wherefore not only the fortunate but the unfortunate events there, were very much magnified both by him and his Friends; besides that he had tryed (seeing a mighty War was broke out in his Province, where he was like to receive but a very small remnant of an Army from Sex. Digitius, and that too full of fear and ready to run away) to make the Senate Decree him one of the City Legions; to which when he had added the Soldiers raised by himself, that he might choose out of the whole number three Thousand five Hundred Foot and three Hundred Horse; for with that Legion (there being but little hopes in Sex. Digitius's Army) he'd do the business. But the Senate replyed and said, They must not make Decrees for vain stories raised by private Persons to please Magistrates. For nothing ought to be look'd upon as authentick, but what either the Prætors wrote out of their Provinces, or Embassadors brought word of. If there were an Insurrection in Spain, they would consent, that the Prætor should raise tumultuary Souldiers without Italy. The Senate intended, that those tumultuary Soldiers should be mustered up in Spain; though Valerius Antius says, that C. Flaminius went over into Sicily also to make his Levy; and as he went from thence into Spain, being driven by a Tempest into Africa, list'd the straggling Soldiers that remained of P. Africanus's Army, adding to the Levys in those two Provinces a third when he came into Spain.

Nor did the Ligurian War increase more slowly in Italy. For they were now posted about Pisa with forty Thousand Men, besides that a vast Multitude flock'd to them every Day through the fame of the War, and the hopes they had of a good Booty. The Consul Minutius came to Arretium on the Day that he had appointed the Souldiers to meet him. From thence he led them in a square Body to Pisa, and since the Enemy had removed their Camp a thousand Paces from the Town beyond the River, the Consul entered into the City, which was, no doubt of it, preserv'd by his arrival. The next Day he himself also encamped beyond the River about five Hundred Paces from the Enemy. From thence by light skirmishes he defended the Country of his Allies from being pillaged. But he durst not march out into the Field, because his Soldiers were new Men, and mustered up out of several Countries, not yet so well acquainted among themselves as to trust one another. Mean while the Ligurians relying upon their Multitudes, not only march'd out into the Field, prepared to try a push for all they had; but they likewise sent out a great many parties every way (having Soldiers enough and to spare) to the utmost limits of the Country for plunder; who when they had got together a good quantity of Cattle and other Prey, there was a Guard ready for them to bring it through into their Castles and Villages.

Whilst the Ligurian War continued at Pisa, the other Consul, L. Cornelius Merula, led his Army through the very Borders of Liguria into the Country of the Boii, where the face of the War was quite another thing to what it was in Liguria. For there the Consul went out into the Field, whilst the Enemy declined the fight, and the Romans ran to and fro a plundering where no body came forth to meet them; the Boii being more willing to let them freely take what they found, than by defending of it to venture an engagement. But when that all things were sufficiently wasted by Sword and Fire, the Consul march'd out of the Enemies Country, and led his Army towards Mutina in a careless manner, being among a peaceful sort of People. The Boii, as soon as they perceived the Enemy to be gone out of their Confines, followed after with silence, and sought a place convenient to make an Ambuscade. In order whereunto, passing in the Night by the Roman Camp, they lodg'd themselves in a Wood, by which the Romans were to come. But having done it so as that they were discovered, the Consul, who was used to remove his Camp at midnight, lest the darkness should increase their fear in a tumultuary Fight, stayed then till Day. Nay and then too, though he did not remove till Day, yet he sent a Troop of Horse before to see what they must trust to. And when they brought him word back, what the Enemies Forces were, and where they were posted, he ordered all the Baggage of the whole Army to be thrown on one heap together, and that the Triarii should raise a mound about it, but went with the rest of his Army in Battalia up to the Foe. The Gauls also did the same, when they saw their Ambuscade was discovered, and that they must fight a regular and set Battle, where true Valour must win the Day.

About the second Hour they engaged; the left Wing of the Allies Horse, and the extraordinary fighting in the Front. They were commanded by two Consular Lieutenants, M. Marcellus

M. Marcellus and Tib. Sempronius, who was Consul the year before. The new Consul was one while in the Van, and anon keeping back the Legions in the Rear, that should not fall on, before the signal was given. The Horse, that was in those Legions, he order'd Q. and P. Minucius, Tribunes of the Souldiers, to draw forth into an open Plain, without the main Body of the Army: from whence, when he had given the signal, they might have room to charge. But as he was doing this, a Message came to him from Tib. Sempronius Longus, that the Extraordinaries could not endure the shock of the Gauls, and that a great many of them were slain, those that remain'd having partly through the Fatigue of it, and partly through their fear, remitted or slacken'd the ardour of the Engagement. That therefore, if he thought fit, he should send a supply of one of the two Legions, before they received any disgrace. Thereupon he sent the second Legion, and took back the Extraordinaries. Then therefore the fight was renew'd; and when not only fresh men, but a Legion whose ranks stood thick and close came into the place, the left Wing being withdrawn quite out of the Battle, and the right advanced into the Front; The Sun with sultry heat had almost burnt the Bodies of the Gauls, who cannot by any means endure such weather; yet they, leaning one while upon each other, and anon upon their Shields, sustain'd the violence of the Romans. Which when the Consul perceiv'd, he commanded C. Livius Salinator, who was Captain of the Alary Horse [Allies most commonly, that fought in the Wings of the Army, call'd Alae] to ride in with the swiftest part of his Cavalry, and put their ranks into disorder; but that the Legionary Horse should stand in the Rear. This storm of the Horse at first confounded and disorder'd, and then scatter'd the Gallick Army, though not so much as to make them turn their backs: for the Captains hinder'd it, who with their Spear-staves punch'd the wavering Souldiers on their backs, and would have forced them to return into their ranks; though the Alary Horse riding in between would not suffer them. The Consul therefore desired of his men, That they would strive a little; and, seeing the Victory was so near at hand, the Enemy being all in disorder and so consternated, that they would charge up briskly upon them; for if they gave them time to put themselves once more into rank and file, they must of necessity be again engaged in a fresh and an hazardous Conflict. Thereupon he order'd the Ensigns to march forward: and so all of them with one Effort, at last, repell'd the Foe. Who when they turn'd their backs and were utterly routed, were pursu'd by the Legionary Horse, whom he sent after them. There were that day slain fourteen thousand of the Boii, and a thousand ninety two taken Prisoners: two hundred twenty one of their Horse men, and three Captains, with two hundred and twelve military Ensigns [or Standards] and sixty three Waggons. Nor did the Romans escape without some loss of blood: for of them there were slain above five thousand either Romans or their Allies; twenty three Centurions, and four Captains of the Allies, with M. Genucius, and M. Marcius Tribune of the Souldiers, belonging to the second Legion.

VI.

About the same time there were Letters brought from the two Consuls; that is, from L. Cornelius concerning a Battle fought with the Boii at Mutina, and from Q. Minucius at Pisa; That it fell to his Lot to hold the Consular Assembly. But that all things in Liguria were in such suspense, that he could not depart thence without the ruine of his Allies and great damage to the Common-wealth. Wherefore, if the Senate thought fit, they might send to his Colleague; that he, who had made an end of his War, might return to Rome, and hold that Assembly: which if he were unwilling to do, because it was none of his business, that he himself would do what ever the Senate should determine: but desired them very seriously to consider, whether it were not more for the advantage of the Common-wealth to make an Interregnum [a time when there was no chief Magistrate in the Common-wealth, or present at least, to perform publick Offices] than that the Province should by him be left in that condition. The Senate therefore order'd C. Scribonius to send two Embassadors of the Senatorian Order to the Consul L. Cornelius; who were to carry along with them the Letter that his Colleague sent to the Senate, and to tell him, that unless he came to Rome to create new Magistrates, rather than Q. Minucius should be call'd away from a War that now lay fresh upon his hands, the Senate would suffer the making of an Interregnum. The two Embassadors being accordingly sent brought word back, that L. Cornelius would come to Rome to chuse new Magistrates. Now there was a dispute in the Senate about that Letter of L. Cornelius's, which he had written after the Battle with the Boii; because M. Claudius, his Lieutenant, had written privately to many of the Senators, That they might thank the good fortune of the Roman People, and the Courage of the Souldiers for the success they met with. For through the Consuls means they had not only lost some part of their men, but the Enemies Army also, which they had an opportunity to destroy, was got clear out of their reach. That so many the more of the Souldiers died, for that the supplies, that should have assisted them, advanced too slowly out of the Rear. And that the Enemies had escaped, not only because the signal was given to the Legionary Horse too late, but also in that they were not suffer'd to pursue the Foe.

VII.

Of that matter they did not think fit to determine any thing on a sudden; but deferred the Debate till they had a fuller Assembly. For there was another business in hand concerning the Cities being oppress'd by Usury: and since Covetousness was tied up to many Laws touching Usury, they had found out a fraudulent way of lending money to Citizens in the names of foreigners that were not bound by those Laws, by which means they taking what Interest they pleas'd, the Debtors were undone. Now the Senate being inquisitive after a method of restraining this practice, They pitch'd upon a certain day, viz. the last Feast call'd Feralia [on which they used to sacrifice to the Infernal Gods]; ordaining, that all those Allies, who since that day had lent Money to Roman Citizens, should declare it; and that for the Money which had been since that day lent, the Creditor should have right done him according to which Laws the Debtors would [whether Roman Laws or those of the Allies]. So when by their several Declarations it was discovered what a vast sum those Debts came to which had by this fraudulent means been contracted, M. Sempronius, Tribune of the People, by the Senates order propos'd to the Commons, and they agreed, That for Money lent there should be the same process in Law against an Ally or a Latine, as against a Roman Citizen. These things were done in Italy both at home and in the Wars; but in Spain there was not nigh so great a disturbance as had been talk'd off. C. Flaminius in the hither Spain took a Town call'd Ilucia belonging to the Oretanes, and then carry'd his Men into their Winter Quarters, where though in the Winter time they had some skirmishes, yet there were none worth the remembering, their Opponents being more like Thieves than Enemies, and their success very various, not without some loss of Men. But there were greater things done by M. Fulvius, who at a Town call'd Toletum fought a pitch'd Battel with the Vaccei, the Vellones and Celtiberians; in which, having defeated and utterly routed the Army, he took King Hilernus Prisoner.

names

Whilst these things were a doing in Spain, the Day for the Assembly was now at hand; and therefore L. Cornelius the Consul, leaving M. Claudius, his Lieutenant, behind him with the Army, came to Rome. Where after he had given a relation in the Senate of what he had done, and in what state the Province was, he complain'd to the House, That there was no acknowledgments of Praise and Honour paid to the Gods for his having made an end of such a mighty War in one fortunate Battel. And after that requir'd, That they would decree a Supplication and a Triumph both together. But before they could make report of that Affair, Q. Metellus, who had been Consul and Dictator, said, That the Letters brought at the same time from L. Cornelius, who was Consul, to the Senate, and from M. Marcellus to great part of the Senators, contradicted one another; and that the consultation [about that business] was therefore deferr'd, that it might be debated when the authors of those Letters were present. And for that reason they expected, that the Consul, who knew that the Lieutenant had written somewhat against him, seeing he himself must needs come to Rome, would have brought him also thither at the same time; especially when it was well known that he had delivered the Army to Tib. Sempronius, who had the Generalship more truly and really, than to the Lieutenant. Wherefore he seemed to be removed on purpose, lest he should declare or justify what he had written face to face; or give them an opportunity to reprove him if he told any thing that was false, and argue the case so long till they found out the whole truth of it. Upon which account he did not think fit that any one thing which the Consul demanded, should be, at that present, decreed him. But when he notwithstanding went on desiring, that a Supplication might be ordained, and that he might ride in Triumph into the City, M. and C. Titinius Tribunes of the People said, They would interpose, if there were any order of Senate made, concerning that matter.

VIII.

The Censors created the Year before were Sex. Aelius Petus, and C. Cornelius Cethegus; of whom Cornelius made a Lustrum [i. e. a survey of the People] at which the Pole of the Citizens came to one Hundred forty three Thousand seven Hundred and four. The Waters rose very high that Year, and the Tyber overflowed the plain parts of the City. About the Gate call'd Flumentana some Buildings fell down, and the Gate call'd Calimontana was burnt with Lightning, as was the Wall all about it also in many places. At Aricia, Lanuvium, and in the Aventine it rained stones; and from Capua news was brought, that a great swarm of Wasps flew into the Forum, and light in the Temple of Mars, where they were carefully gathered all together and burnt. Upon the score of these Prodigies, the Decemviri were ordered to consult their Books, and a sacrificing of nine Days continuance appointed, with a Supplication and a Lustration of the whole City. At the same time M. Porcius Cato dedicated the Chapel of Victoria Virgo [i. e. Victory the Virgin] near the Temple of Victory, two Years after he had vow'd so to do. The same Year a Triumvirate, whose names were Cn. Manlius Vulso, L. Apustius Fullo, and Q. Aelius Tubero (by whose Law it was done) carry'd a Colony into the Territories belonging to Thucium, consisting of three Thousand Foot; and three Hundred Horse, which for the quantity of ground was but a small number. They therefore might have given thirty Acres to each Footman, and sixty to each Horseman; but by advice of Apustius, a third part of the Land was set apart for them, when they pleas'd, to stock with new Planters, each Footman having twenty, and every Horseman forty Acres.

IX.

The Year was now at an end, and ambition shew'd it self all on a flame more than ever before in the grand Assembly. For many, and those very powerful men, both of the Patricians and Plebeians too, sued for [the Office]: as P. Cornelius Scipio, Son of Cneius, who came lately out of the Province of Spain, where he had done great things; and L. Quintus Flaminius, who Commanded the Fleet in Greece, with Cn. Manlius Vulso, all three Patricians; and for Plebeians, C. Laelius, Cn. Domitius, C. Livius Salinator; and Marius Acilius. But the Eyes of all people were cast upon Quintius and Cornelius. For they not only stood, being both Patricians, for the same place, but the glory which they so lately in War had gain'd commended them both. But that which enflamed their ambition more than any thing else, was their having two such near Relations, who were the most renowned Generals of their Age. Scipio's glory was the greater; and by how much the greater, so much the more obnoxious to Envy: though Quintius's was fresher, he having triumph'd that very year. Besides, the one had been now almost ten years in publick view (which is a thing that makes great men less venerable by their very frequent appearance among the People) having been a second time Consul, after he had conquer'd Annibal, and once Censor. But in Quintius all things were fresh and new to make him acceptable, he having neither desir'd nor gotten any thing of the people since the time of his triumphing: He therefore now told them, He petition'd them on the behalf of an own Brother not a Consu-german, for his Colleague and Partner in a War that was now ended: in which he mannaged the affairs by Land, and his Brother by Sea. By this means he got him prefer'd before the other Candidate whom Africanus recommended; whom the Cornelian Family attended (whilst Cornelius, who was Consul, held the Assembly) who before-hand stood so fair in the Opinion of the Senate, being lookt upon as the best man in all the City, who receiv'd the Goddess Cybele when she came from Pessinus to Rome. So L. Quintius and Cn. Domitius Aenobarbus were chosen Consuls: nor could Africanus prevail so much as for a Plebeian Consul, when he made what interest he could for C. Lelius. The next day the Prætors were Created. L. Scribonius Libo, M. Fulvius Centumalus, A. Atilius Serranus, M. Babius Tampilus, L. Valerius Tappus, and Q. Salonius Sarra. There were also two single Ediles that year, call'd M. Aemilius Lepidus, and L. Aemilius Paulus. In whose time there were many Graziers condemn'd; and out of the money in which they were mulcted gilded Shields were set up in the top of Jupiter's Temple. They likewise built one Portico without the Gate call'd Porta Trigemina (making an Exchange [or place for publick Negotiation] at the Tiber's side) and another from the Gate Fontinalis to Mars's Altar, to go through into the Field [of Mars.]

X.

V V V V

the

XI. For a long time there had been nothing done worth remembling; but at the end of that year their affairs were twice reduced into a very dangerous posture. For not only the Consul's Camp was attack'd, and with great difficulty maintain'd, but likewise, not long after, as the Roman Army march'd through a narrow pass, the Ligurian Forces having way-laid them, seeing they could not get through, the Consul fac'd about and would fain have gone back: but the Avenue was block'd up behind too by a party of the Enemies; insomuch that the memory of their Caudine misfortune was fresh, not only in their minds, but even before almost their Eyes also. He had near eight hundred Numidian Horse among his Auxiliaries: whose Colonel promised the Consul, that he would break out on which side he pleas'd with his men. Desiring him to tell him only, on which side there were most Villages. For he would set upon them, and burn their Houses the first thing he did; that the fright of that might force the Ligurians to quit the pass, which they were then possessed of, and run to assist their Country Friends. For which the Consul gave him commendations and great hopes of reward. So the Numidians mounting their Horses rode up to the Enemies Camp; though they offer'd no act of Hostility to any Body. Now there was nothing at the first view more contemptible; the Horses and men being very little and slender, the riders ungirt and unarm'd (save that they had Darts with them) and their Horses without Bridles, going very awkwardly, with stiff necks and their Heads thrust out. And this contempt they themselves also industriously augmented, slipping of their Horses and making sport on purpose to be taken notice of. Whereupon the Enemy, who had been at first intent and were ready, if they should be provoked, most of them now sat looking about them without their Arms. The Numidians rode up to them and then back again; but by degrees came nearer to the pass, as though their Horses had ran away with them. At last they set Spurs to them and broke through the middle of the Enemies, and being got into a wider place burnt all the Houses near the rode, setting fire to the next Town they came at, and destroying every thing with Fire and Sword. At first the smoke that arose, and then the noise that was heard from the several Towns, and at last both old and young running away [from their Habitations] made a tumult in the Camp: insomuch that without deliberation, or any orders for their so doing, each man for himself ran to defend his own, and in a moment of time the Camp was totally deserted; by which means the Consul being freed from the Siege, came to the place whither he design'd to go.

XII. But neither the Boii nor the Spaniards, with whom that year they had fought several Battles, were such pernicious Enemies to the Romans as the Ætolians were. For they, after the Armies were removed out of Greece, were first in hopes that Antiochus would come and take possession of that part of Europe, which was then deserted, and that Philip and Nabis would still be troublesome. But when they saw there was no commotion at all made, they thinking best for them to put things into some disorder, lest their designs should by delays be frustrated, call'd a Council at Naupactum. Where Thous their Prætor, complaining of the injuries done by the Romans, and of the state of Ætolia, that they were the least respected of all the Nations in Greece, even after that Victory of which they themselves had been the cause: thought thought fit to have Embassadors sent all about to the several Kings, not only to inquire into their inclinations, but to incite them everyone in particular to a Roman War. Damocritus was sent to Nabis, Nicander to Philip, and Dicaearchus, the Prætors Brother, to Antiochus. Damocritus told the Lacedemonian Tyrant, that now his maritime Cities were taken away, his Government was quite enfeebled; it being thence that he had all his Souldiers, Ships and Seamen: so that he, shut up almost within his own Walls, saw the Achæans lording it over Peloponnesus; being never like to have an opportunity of recovering his own again if he omitted that which then was in his hands. That there was no Roman Army in Greece, nor would the Romans think that upon the account of Gythium or other maritime Laconians they had reason sufficient to transmit their Legions again into Greece. These things were said to irritate the Tyrants mind; that, seeing Antiochus was come over into Greece, through his being conscious of having violated all Friendship with the Romans by injuring their Allies, he might join with Antiochus. Nicander also incited Philip with such another Speech. For which too he had more matter to work upon, the King being degraded from a much higher pitch of honour than the Tyrant was, and deprived of much more considerable possissions. Besides which, the ancient fame of the Kings of Macedonia, and their over-running of the whole World was placed to the account of the Victories of that Family. And then, that he gave him advice which was safe, both in the attempt and event too. For as he did not perswade Philip to stir, before Antiochus with his Army came over into Greece, so how could the Romans make any resistance against him, who without Antiochus held out in a War so long against both Romans and Ætolians, now that Antiochus should be join'd with him, and the Ætolians become his Allies, who would prove worse Enemies than the Romans? Adding, about the General Annibal, who was born an Enemy to the Romans, and kill'd more of their Captains and Souldiers than were still alive. Thus spake Nicander to Philip; whilst Dicaearchus said other things to Antiochus; and first of all, that the booty taken from Philip was the Romans, but the Victory the Ætolians; nor did any body but the Ætolians make way for the Romans to come into Greece, supplying at the same time strength to conquer. Then, how great an Army of Horse and Foot they would raise to assist Antiochus in the War; as also what places they would find him for his Land Forces, and what Ports for his maritime. Then of Philip and Nabis he told a bold untruth; that both of them were ready to renew their Wars; and would be glad to take the first opportunity of recovering what they had lost in War. Thus through the whole World at the same time did the Ætolians endeavour to raise a War against the Romans: though the Kings were either not at all, or very little moved at what they said.

But Nabis sent immediately into all the maritime Towns thereabout certain persons to stir up Seditions among the People, and brought over, by presents, some of the Nobility to his side; killing others who pertinaciously continu'd in the Roman Alliance. The Achæans had the care of defending all the maritime Laconians committed to them by T. Quintius. Wherefore they presently sent not only Embassadors to the Tyrant, to admonish him of his League with the Romans, and to warn him not to disturb that Peace which he so earnestly had desired: but aid likewise to Gythium, which was at this time attack'd by the Tyrant, and other Embassadors to Rome too, to tell what they had done. King Antiochus that Winter, having, at Raphia in Phœnicia, given his Daughter in Marriage to Ptolomy King of Ægypt; went back to Antioch, and then through Cilicia, over the Mountain Taurus, at the latter end of Winter, came to Ephesus. From whence in the beginning of the Spring, having sent his Son Antiochus into Syria to secure the utmost parts of his Kingdom, lest there should be any disturbance behind him when he himself was absent, he march'd with all his Land Forces to oppose the Pisidians, that dwell about Selga. At that time the Roman Embassadors, P. Sulpicius, and P. Villius, who were sent (as aforesaid) to Antiochus, being order'd to go first to Eumenes, came to Elea, from whence they went up to Pergamus, where the Kings Palace was. Eumenes was very desirous of a War against Antiochus; believing that he, if there were Peace, being a King so much more puissant would be an ill Neighbour, but, if there were a War raised, would be no more equal to the Romans than Philip had been: by which means he would either be utterly destroy'd, or, if they granted him a Peace, when he was conquer'd, that many things which were taken from him would fall to Eumenes's share: so as that from that time forward he should be able with ease to defend himself from him without any help from the Romans. Nay though any ill should befall him, that it was better to undergo any misfortune in alliance with the Romans, than either alone to suffer the Tyranny of Antiochus; or refusing it to be forced by main strength of Arms. For these reasons, as far as his authority and advice would go with them, he incited the Romans to a War.

Sulpicius being sick staid at Pergamus; but Villius, having heard at Pisidia that the King was engaged in a War, went to Ephesus; where staying several Days, he did what he could to have frequent conference with Annibal who then chanced to be there; not only to find, if possibly he could, his inclinations, but to remove that fear which he was in of danger from the Romans. By which means though he obtained nothing else, yet it followed, as it were, of its own accord, and as if it had been industriously sought after, that Annibal for that reason became less esteemed, in all points more suspected by the King. Claudius, relying upon the Greek Annals written by Acilius, says, that P. Africanus, being concerned in that Embassy, bally, had some discourse at Ephesus with Annibal. And he gives you one instance too of what they said, which was, that when Africanus asked Annibal, whom he thought to have been the greatest General in the whole World? that he answer'd, Alexander King of Macedon; for that with a small number of Men he had routed innumerable Armies, and because he had overrun the utmost Borders of the East, which even to see exceeds all humane hopes. Whereupon when he asked him again, whom he placed second? that he said Pyrrhus: for he first taught Men how to encamp; besides, that no Man took places with more Art, or better dispos'd of his Garrisons; wherewithal he had such a knack of winning upon Mens affections, that the Italian Nations were more willing to submit to his Government though a foreign Prince, than that of the Roman People, who had so long been Lords of that Country. After which, when Africanus went on and asked him, whom he look'd upon as the third? that he said, without all doubt, himself. And with that Scipio laugh'd and asked him, what wouldst thou say if thou hadst overcome me too? Why then, said he, I should think my self beyond not only Alexander and Pyrrhus, but all other Generals also. In which case Scipio provoked him to an answer, that was perplexed with Punick artifice and a kind of flattery; for that Scipio had separated himself from all the crowd of Generals as a Person inestimable.

XV. Villius went on from Ephesus to Apamea, where Antiochus also, having heard of the arrival of the Roman Embassadors, met him, and had almost such another debate as that was at Rome between Quintius and the Kings Embassadors. But the news of his Son Antiochus's Death, who, I told you even now, was sent into Syria, determined the Conference. For there was great sorrow in the Court, and every body was much concern'd for the loss of that Youth, he having given such a specimen of himself, that if he had lived, it was plainly seen he would have been a great and a just King. By how much the dearer therefore he was to all People, so much the more suspected was his Death, viz. that his Father, believing him to be an heavy Successour to tread upon the heels of his Old Age, took him off with Poyson by the help of certain Eunuchs, who are entertained by Kings to do such pieces of service. They also add this as another cause of that clandestine exploit; that whereas he had given his Son Seleucus Lyfimachia, he had ne'r another feat like that to give Antiochus, so as to send him too under pretence of honour a great way from him. Yet there was a general sorrow for some Days all over the Court; and therefore the Roman Embassador, lest he might offend them by staying there at such an unseasonable time, went to Pergamus, whilst the King, omitting the War which he had begun, return'd to Ephesus. There upon the account of their King being in mourning, the Palace was shut up, and the King had a private consultation with one Minio who was his most familiar friend. Minio being ignorant of all foreign Affairs, and valuing the Kings strength by what he did in Syria or Asia, believ'd that Antiochus was not only superiour to him in a just cause (for that the Romans demanded nothing that was reasonable) but that he would likewise overcome him in War. Minio therefore (though the King was not willing to come to a debate with the Embassadors, as having found it to no purpose before, or being confounded with his late grief) declar'd that he would say somewhat that should be for the Kings advantage, and prevailed to have the Embassadors sent for from Pergamus.

XVI. Sulpicius was now recovered of his sickness, so they came both to Ephesus; where the King being excused by Minio, the thing began to be debated in his absence; and Minio in an Oration which he had got ready before-hand, said thus, I see you Romans make use of the specious title of being deliverers of Greece, but your actions do not agree with your words; in that you set one Law to Antiochus, and use another your selves. For how are the Smyrneans and the Lampfacenes more Greeks than the Neopolitans, the Rhegines or the Tarentines, from whom you exact a stipend [for your Souldiers] and Ships according to the League made between you? Why do you send a Prætor every year with a Commission, Rods and Axes to Syracuse, and into the other Grecian Cities of Sicily? You have nothing else to say for your selves, but that, when you had conquer'd them, you imposed upon them such and such Laws. Pray accept of the same reason from Antiochus concerning Smyrna, Lampfacus, and the Cities that are in Ionia or Æolis. He would fain have them (since they were conquer'd in War by his Ancestors, and made stipendiary or tributary) reduced to their ancient constitution. Wherefore to these things I would have him answer'd, if you dispute upon equal terms, and the cause of the War be not inquir'd after. To which Sulpicius reply'd; Antiochus, said he, did very modestly, who if what was said would be no advantage to him, chose rather to have any body else say it than himself. For what likeness is there between the cases of those Cities which you have compar'd? From the Rhegines, Neapolitans and Tarentines ever since they came into our hands, we exact of them what by League they owe us according to one perpetual tenour of Law which has been always used. Now can you say, that as those people have not broke their League, either by themselves or any other, so the Cities of Asia, ever since they first became subject to Antiochus's Ancestors, have continu'd in the perpetual possession of their Kingdom? or that some of them were not under Philip, others under Ptolomy, and that others for many years, no body questioning their rights, enjoy'd their liberty? For if, because they once were Slaves when press'd to it by the iniquity of the times, you thence conclude it lawful to make them so still, what have we done in delivering Greece from Philip? his Posterity may as well pretend

send a title to Corinth, Chalcis, Demetrias, and all the whole Country of Thessaly. But why do I plead the cause of the Cities, which it is more reasonable they themselves should do before Us and the King himself.

Then he order'd the Embassadors of the several Cities to be call'd in, being prepar'd and instructed before hand by Eumenes; who thought whatever strength Antiochus lost each of them brought in sometimes their complaints, and sometimes their demands, mixing just actions and unjust all together, from a debate they fell to quarrelling. By which means having neither remitted; nor obtain'd any thing, the Embassadors return'd to Rome as little satisfied in all points as they came thither. The King, when they were gone, held a Council concerning a Roman War: in which one was fiercer than another: because by how much the sharper any one had been in speaking against the Romans, so much the greater hopes he had of [the Kings] favour. One inveigh'd against the pride of their demands, as if they would have imposed Laws, not only upon Nabis, whom they had conquer'd, but upon Antiochus too, the greatest King in all Asia: and yet they had given Nabis his Dominion again over his Country, and the same Country of Lacedæmon [to govern.] That it would seem dishonourable to Antiochus, if Smyrna and Lampfacus should do what was required of them. Others said, That those Cities were small and inconsiderable causes of a War to so great a King: but that men began from trivial things to gain far greater: unless they thought that the Persians, when they demanded Water and Earth from the Lacedæmonians, wanted a clod of Earth and a draught of Water. Now the Romans took the same method in treating for two Cities [in prospect] that the other Cities also, as soon as those two had shook off the Yoke, would revolt to the people who were the general deliverers [of Greece.] For though liberty be not better than slavery, yet 'tis more pleasant than any present condition for a man to be in hopes of changing his circumstances.

XVIII. Alexander the Acarnanian was in the Council, who had been formerly Philips Friend, but of late having left him had follow'd the more opulent Court of Antiochus: and having good knowledge in the affairs of Greece, nor being altogether ignorant of the Roman State, was so beloved by the King, that he was at all his very Cabinet Councils. He, as though they were consulting, not whether they should have a War, or no, but where and how they should manage it, said, he did not at all question their getting the Victory, if the King went over into Europe, and made some part of Greece the seat of the War. That he would now first find the Ætolians, who lived in the very heart of Greece, in Arms; and ready to be the Fortorn hope in all the sharpest adventures of War. That in the two Horns, as it were, of Greece, he would have Nabis, who would put all Peloponnesus into a commotion, in order to regain the City of Argus, with the maritime Cities, from which the Romans had expelled him, confining his power to the Walls of Lacedæmon: and from Macedonia, that Philip, as soon as he heard the signal given, would put himself in Arms. That he knew his Spirit and his very Soul; being well assur'd, that he, like savage Beasts, which are kept up in Dens or Toils, had for a long time conceiv'd great indignation in his Breast. That he likewise remembred how often he had used in the War to beseech all the Gods, that they would make Antiochus his assistant. Of which desire when he should now be possess'd, that he would make no delay in renewing the War. That the only way was not to defer things, or be slow: for the Victory depended upon their pre-possessing themselves of opportune places, and getting Allies. That Annibal also ought to be sent forthwith into Africa, to take the Romans off [the prosecution of their designs.]

XIX. Annibal was not admitted into the Council, as being suspected by the King, by reason of his Conferences with Villius; nor was he afterward in any esteem there. Which disgrace he at first took patiently, though some time after supposing it to be better for him not only to inquire into the reason of that sudden strangeness, but also to clear himself in due time, having barely ask'd and heard the reason of the [Kings] anger to him, said, My Father Amilcar, Antiochus! took me to the Altar, when I was yet a Child, and oblig'd me by an Oath (as he was sacrificing) never to be Friends with the Roman People. Under which Oath I was a Souldier for thirty six years; this brought me out of my Country in a time of Peace: this made me come, like a person banish'd, from my own Country to their Court; and under the conduct of this, if you disappoint my hopes, wherever I know that there is strength or arms, I'll find them, though I seek the whole World over for Enemies to the Romans. Wherefore if any of your Favourites think to make themselves greater by lessening of me, let them invent some other way of accomplishing their designs. For I both hate and am hated by the Romans: of the truth wherof I call my Father Amilcar and the Gods to witness. When therefore you think of a War against the Romans, take Annibal for one of your best Friends. But if any thing make you incline toward Peace, for that seek some body else to consult with. This Speech did not only move the King, but also reconciled him to Annibal: and the Council was dissolv'd with this resolution, that there should be a War.

XX. At Rome indeed they intended to make Antiochus their Enemy by their common Discourse, but they prepared nothing as yet in order to it, except animosity. Both the Consuls had the Province of Italy assign'd to them: so as that they should agree between themselves, or cast Lots, which of them should hold the [Consular] Assembly for that year. And that he, to whom that care did not belong, should be ready upon occasion to lead the Legions out of Italy. The same Consul was permitted to raise two new Legions, twenty thousand Allies and Latines, and nine hundred Horse. To the other Consul there were Decreed the two Legions, which L. Cornelius had when he was Consul the Year before, with fifteen thousand Foot, and five hundred Horse, of Allies and Latines out of the same Army. Q. Minucius was continu'd in Commission with the Army that he had in Liguria. To which there were added, as a supply, four thousand Roman Foot, and a hundred and fifty Horse, then newly to be raised, besides five thousand Foot and a hundred Horse exacted [as their Quota] from the Allies. Cn. Domitius had a Province out of Italy where the Senate had determin'd, and L. Quintius Gaul. Then the Prætorian Assembly was held: after which the Prætors chose their Provinces. M. Fulvius had that of the City, and L. Scribonius Libo the Foreign jurisdiction: L. Valerius Tappus Sicily, Q. Salonius Sarra Sardinia, M. Babius Tamphilus the hither Spain, and A. Atilius Serranus the farther. But these two last had, first by an Order of Senate, and after by another of the Commons, their Provinces chang'd: Atilius being to Command the Fleet and Macedonia, and Babius the Bruttii. Flaminius and Fulvius were continu'd in Commission in the Spains. Babius Tamphilus had two Legions assign'd him (which the year before belong'd to the City) to go into the Country of the Bruttii, with fifteen thousand Foot, and five hundred Horse, to be raised out of the Allies. Atilius was order'd to build thirty Ships of five Banks of Oars a piece, and to hale the old ones out of the Docks, if there were any fit for service, and to raise Seamen. The Consuls also were Commanded to give him two thousand Allies and Latines, and a thousand Roman Foot. So these two Prætors and two Armies, by Land as well as by Sea, were reported to make preparations against Nabis, who was now openly attacking the Allies of the Roman People. But the Embassadors sent to Antiochus were every day expected: before whose return, the Senate had forbidden the Consul Cn. Domitius to depart the City. The Prætors Fulvius and Scribonius, whose Province it was to regulate all affairs at Rome, were employ'd to provide an hundred and five Bank'd Ships, besides the Fleet that Atilius was to Command.

of

XXI. Now before the Consul and the Prætors went to their several Provinces, there was a Supplication appointed upon the Account of several Prodigies, [which were these.] It was reported from Picenum, that a Goat brought forth six Kids at one birth; and that at Arretium there was a Boy born with one hand: that at Amiternum it rained Earth: that at Formiæ the Gate and Wall was burnt by lightning: and (which was the most frightful of them all) that an Oxe belonging to the Consul Cn. Domitius spake, and said, Roma Cave Tibi, i. e. Rome have a care of thy self. For the other Prodigies therefore Supplication was made; but the Soothsayers order'd the Oxe to be kept with great care. Then also the Tiber, overflowing with more violence than before, came into the City and overthrew two Bridges, with many Houses near the Gate Flumentana. A vast Stone, which was removed either by storms or an Earthquake, so weak, that it could not otherwise be perceiv'd, fell out of the Capitol into the Vicus Jugarius [a street so called, because the Altar of Juno Juges [the Goddess of Marriage which is jugum, a Yoke] stood in it] and kill'd a great many people. In the Fields that were all under water the Cattle were carried away, and a great deal of mischief done to the Villages. Before L. Quintius the Consul came into his Province, Q. Minucius fought a pitch'd Battle with the Ligurians near Pisa: in which he slew nine thousand of the Enemies; driving the rest all into their Camp, which till night was attack'd and defended with great vehemence. In the night the Ligurians went privately out; and in the Morning, at break of day, the Romans enter'd their empty Camp: where they found but a small booty, because they ever and anon sent the spoils, which they had taken out of the Fields, home to their own Houses. Minucius from that time gave the Enemy no respite; but going out of the Pisane Territories into Liguria destroy'd their Castles and Towns by Fire and Sword: and there the Souldiers were loaded with Etrurian booty, which was sent thither by the Pillagers.

XXII. About that time the Embassadors return'd from the Kings to Rome. Who having brought with them nothing, that was a sufficient ground for expediting of a War, except against the Lacedemonian Tyrant; (who as the Achean Embassadors likewise complain'd, infested the Sea-Coast belonging to the Laconians, contrary to the League) Atilius the Prætor was sent into Greece with a Fleet to defend the Allies. Then the Consuls, seeing that there was no present fear of Antiochus, were both order'd to go into their Provinces. Domitius came the next way from Ariminum, and Quintius through Liguria into the Country of the Boii; where the Armies belonging to the two Consuls, going several wayes, made great havock of the Enemies Country. Thereupon first some few of their Horsemen with their chief Officers, and, after them, their whole Senate (yea at last, all persons of any Fortune or dignity to the number of fifteen hundred) came over to the Consuls. In both the Spains also, that year, all things went very well. For not only C. Flaminius took the Town of Libitabrum, which was well fortified and very rich, with Engines made of Hurdles and Row-Hides [that he planted against it] and their petit King Corribilo Prisoner; but M. Fulvius also the Pro-Consul fought two prosperous Battles with two Armies of the Enemies; and possess'd himself, by force, of two Spanish Towns call'd Vesclia and Holo, with many Castles, though though some surrender'd themselves voluntarily to him. Then going forward into the Ore-tane Confines, where he took two Towns, call'd Noliba and Cusibis, he went on to the River Tagus: near which there was a City named Toletum, small but well situated for defence. When he attack'd that place a great Army of the Vettones came in to assist the Toletans: With whom he fought a pitch'd Battle very successfully; and having routed the Vettones took Toletum with works.

But at that time those Wars that were then in hand gave the Senate less trouble than the expectation of a War that was not yet begun with Antiochus. For though they had sent Embassadors who made a diligent inquiry into the state of all affairs, yet there arose vain reports without any Authors for them, which adulterated the truth with many falsehoods. Among which it was told for one, that when Antiochus was come into Ætolia, he would send a Fleet immediately into Sicily. Wherefore the Senate, though they had sent the Prætor Atilius with a Navy into Greece; yet because it was necessary to have not only Forces, but authority also to keep up the spirits of their Allies, they sent T. Quintius and C. Octavius, Cn. Servilius, and P. Villius Embassadors into Greece; decreeing, that M. Babius should carry the Legions out of the Bruttian Territories to Tarentum and Brundisium, that, from thence, if occasion were, he might cross over into Macedonia: and that M. Fulvius the Prætor should send a Fleet of thirty Ships to defend the Coast of Sicily, of which he that conducted them thither should be Admiral (and that was L. Oppius Salinator, who the year before had been Ædile of the people) and that the same Prætor should write to his Colleague L. Valerius, that there was some danger; lest the Fleet of King Antiochus might come over out of Ætolia into Sicily: wherefore the Senate thought fit, that besides the Army which he already had, he should raise another of tumultuary Souldiers to the number of twelve thousand Foot, and four hundred Horse: to secure the Sea Coast of that Province which lay toward Greece. Now the Prætor did not make that Levy out of Sicily only, but the adjacent Islands also: and fortified all the maritime Towns that stand to Greece ward with Garisons. There was also an addition made to the former rumours by the arrival of Attalus, Brother to Eumenes, who brought word; that King Antiochus was come with an Army over the Hellepont: and that the Ætolians so prepared themselves as to be in Arms against his arrival. Whereupon there were thanks paid to Eumenes who was absent, as well as to Attalus who was present: for whom they order'd an House rent free, [at publick Shows or Playes] and splendid Entertainment, with presents of two Horses with Armour accordingly, silver Vessels of a hundred, and golden ones of twenty pound weight.

When several Messengers, one after another, brought news, that the War was now at hand, they thought it concern'd them, as soon as they could, to choose new Consuls. Whereupon an order of Senate was made, that M. Fulvius the Prætor should send a letter forthwith to the Consul, to let him understand that the Senate would have him deliver up the Province and the Army to his Lieutenants and return to Rome; and upon the Road to send an Edict before him, to give notice of the Assembly for choosing of Consuls. The Consul obeyed this letter, and having sent an Edict before him, came to Rome. That Year also there was great canvassing, three Patricians standing for the same place, whose names were P. Cornelius Scipio Son of Cneius (who the Year before had been repulsed) L. Cornelius Scipio, and Cn. Manlius Volscus. The Consulate was bestowed on P. Scipio, that it might appear the honour was only suspended, and not denied to such a Man as he was) whose Colleague was a Plebeian call'd Manius Acilius Glabrio. The next Day there were chosen for Prætors, L. Æmilius Paulus, M. Æmilius Lepidus, M. Junius Brutus, A. Cornelius Mammula, C. Livius, and L. Oppius, both of them fir-named Salinator. This was the same Oppius that had conducted the Fleet into Sicily. Now in the mean time whilst the new Magistrates were casting Lots for their Provinces, M. Babius was ordered to go over from Brundisium with all his Forces into Epirus, and keep them about Apollonia; M. Fulvius, the City Prætor, being employ'd to build fifty new five bank'd Ships or Gallies.

XXV. Thus did the Roman People prepare themselves for all the attempts of Antiochus. Nor did Nabis now defer the War, but with all the force he had attack'd Gythium; and pillaged all the Country of Achaia for sending aid to the Besieged. The Achaans for all that durst not meddle in the War before their Embassadors were come back from Rome, that they might know what the Senates pleasure was: but after the Embassadors were return'd, they not only summon'd a Council to meet at Sicyon, but sent Embassadors to T. Quintius for his advice. In the Council they were all inclin'd to make a War; though a Letter that came from T. Quintius put some stop to it; in which he told them, that he would have them stay for the Prætor, and the Roman Fleet. Now though some of the Nobility continu'd of the same opinion, and others thought it best to make use of his advice, whom they had consulted in the affair, the greatest number expected Philopemenes opinion, who at that time was Prætor, and excell'd all men of that age in prudence as well as authority. He therefore having first told them, it was a good custom among the Achaans, that the Prætor, when he consulted about a War, should not give his opinion in the case; but that they should resolve as soon as possible of what they pleas'd, their Prætor would put their Decrees in Execution with integrity and care; and endeavour, as far as lay within the power of humane industry, that they should not repent either of Peace or War. This Speech of his conduced more to the inciting of them to a War, than if by direct perswasion he had shewn his desire of managing their business. Thereupon by unanimous consent they resolv'd upon a War; leaving the time and method of carrying it on wholly to the Prætor. Philopæmen (besides that it was Quintus's advice to them) himself also thought fit to expect the Roman Fleet, which might defend Gythium toward the Sea: but fearing lest the thing would not admit of delay, nor that Gythium only, but the Forces also sent to secure that City, would be lost, fitted out the Ships belonging to the Achæans.

XXVI. The Tyrant also had gotten a small Fleet (to hinder any aids that might be sent in by Sea to the besieged) of three men of War with some Barks and long Gallies; having deliver'd his old Fleet, according to contract, up to the Romans. Now to try the agility of these new Ships, and that all things might be ready for an Engagement at the same time, he made them put forth to Sea, where he every day exercised the Rowers and the Souldiers with the imitation of a Sea-fight; supposing that the hopes of the Siege depended upon his intercepting the maritime succours. The Prætor of the Achæans, as he was equal to any of the famous Generals [that ever were] in the experimental part as well as the knowledge of Land fights, so in Naval affairs was very unskilful; being an Arcadian, that lived in an Inland Country, and ignorant of all Foreign matters, save that he had been a Souldier, and Commanded the Auxiliaries in Crete. Now there was an old Gally of four Banks, that had been taken eighty years before, as it brought Craterus's Wife Nicaea from Naupactum to Corinth; with the fame of which Ship he being taken (for it had been a signal Vessel formerly in the Kings Fleet) order'd it to be brought down from Egium, though it were very rotten and almost ready to fall in pieces with age. This therefore being at that time the Admirals Ship, and riding before all the rest of the Fleet, as Tiso of Patra who was Admiral sailed in her, the Laconian Ships from Gythium met them: and upon its first bearing up (being an old Vessel that was all over leaky) with a new, strong Ship, it was split, and all the men in her taken. Thereupon the rest of the Fleet (as fast as their Oars would give them leave) seeing the Admirals Ship lost, ran away. Philopæmen himself was in a small Scout-ship; nor did he stop in his flight till he came to Patra. But that accident did not at all dishearten him who was a military man and had gone through a great many misfortunes; but on the contrary, he said, that if he had offended in Sea affairs, of which he was ignorant, he had the more hopes of succeeding in those things which he was well acquainted with, and therefore would take care to make that but a short-lived joy to the Tyrant.

XXVII. Nabis being not only proud of his good fortune, but also taking it for granted that there would be no danger now from the Sea, had a mind with Guards to block up all the Land Avenues too. Thereupon drawing a third part of his Forces from the Siege of Gythium he Encamp'd at Pleia, which lies above Lenca and Acra, where he thought the Enemies Army would make their approaches. Now seeing he was posted there, where some few of his men having Tents, the common fort had made themselves Huts of Reeds bound together with green boughs that made them shady, Philopæmen, before he came in sight of the Foe, resolv'd to set upon him at unawares with an unexpected kind of an attack. He got together several small Vessels into a private Harbour in the Argive Dominions: into which he put some of his nimblest Souldiers, most of them with little Shields, Slings, Darts and other sorts of Light-Armour. Then coasting along the shore, when he came to a Promontory near the Enemies Camp, he landed, and going through places that he knew, arrived in the night time at Pleia: where finding the Sentinels all asleep, as being in no fear of any approaching danger, he set fire to their Huts all round the Camp. By which means many of them were consumed before they were sensible that the Enemy was come; nor could those that knew it lend them any assistance; so that all was destroy'd with Fire and Sword; save that some few of them escaped out of such calamitous circumstances into their grand Camp at Gythium. When Philopæmen had thus surpriz'd and routed the Enemy, he march'd forthwith to plunder Tripolis in that part of Laconia, which lies next to Megalopolis: from whence having driven away a great number of men as well as Cattle he departed before the Tyrant could send the Country any relief. Then mustering up all his Army at Tegea, and having summon'd a Council there of Achæans and their Allies (at which there were all the greatest men of Epirus and Acarnania) he resolv'd, seeing that as his own men were well recover'd from the disgrace of their maritime misfortune, so the Enemy were in a consternation, to march to Lacedæmon, supposing that to be the only way to draw the Enemy from the Siege of Gythium. First therefore he Encamp'd at Caria, in the Enemies Country, the same day that Gythium was taken: of which Philopæmen being ignorant removed his Camp forward to Barbosthene, a Mountain ten thousand paces from Lacedæmon. Nabis also, having taken Gythium, march'd thence with the nimblest part of his Forces, and passing by Lacedæmon with all speed possess'd himself of Pyrrhus's Camp, as they call it, being the place which he believ'd the Achæans were bound for. Then he met with the Enemy; who took up in length, by reason of the narrowness of the way, almost five thousand paces. The Horse and more particularly a party of the Auxiliaries brought up the Reer, because Philopæmen thought the Tyrant would attack his men behind with the mercenary Souldiers, in whom whom he had repos'd the greatest confidence. But two unlucky accidents at the same time surpriz'd him: the one, that the place he was going to was taken up before; and the other, that he saw the Enemy had met the Front of his Army; where, since he was to pass through rough places, he perceiv'd he could not make way without the help of Light-Armour.

Now Philopæmen was an extraordinarily cunning and experienced Person in leading an Army, and taking of places; nor had used himself to it in times of War only, but in Peace also. For when he was going any way, and came to a difficult narrow pass, he viewed the situation of the place quite round, and, when alone, considered with himself, as, if he had any Company, he ask'd them, If the Enemy should appear in that place, and attack him before, on this or that side, or behind, what they could best do? for they might meet him in Battalia, or they might come in disorder, and in such a posture as the way would admit of. After which, he went on thinking or asking, what place he himself should take; how many Soldiers, or what sort of Arms (for there was a great deal of difference in such cases) he should make use of, and how he should dispose of his Carriages, Baggage, and unarm'd men. With how great and what kind of guard he should secure them; and whether it were better to go on to the place he design'd for, or return thither from whence he came. So likewise what place he should take to Encamp in; how much of it he should fortify; where it was most convenient to water; where he should have supplies of Forage and Wood: which was the securest way for him to march the next day, and in what form he should put his Army. With these cares and thoughts he had so exercised his mind even from his youth, that nothing in such cases was new to him. At that time therefore he first drew up his men into a Body; sending the Cretan Auxiliaries, and those whom they called the Tarentine Horse, with each of them two Horses, into the Front; and bidding the other Horse follow after, till he came and posted himself upon a Rock, above a certain Brook where they might water. There gathering together all his Carriages, and the whole crowds of unarm'd persons that attended upon the Army, he planted them round about the Souldiers, and, as far as the situation of the place requir'd it, fortified his Camp. It was an hard matter to set up Tents in such rough places, and where the ground was so uneven. The Enemy were five hundred paces from him; both sides watering with a guard of Light-Armour, out of the same River: but before they could come to an Engagement (as is usual when Camps are so near) the night interven'd. The next day they saw it necessary for them to fight for their Waterers about the River: he therefore that night planted as many Shield-men, as the place would hold, in a Vale out of the Enemies fight.

XXIX. The next Morning the Cretan Light-Armour and the Tarentine Horse began the fight above the Brook, Letemastus a Cretan, being Commander of his own Country-men, and Lycortas of Megalopolis over the Horse. The Enemies Auxiliaries were likewise Cretans, and the same sort of Horsemen call'd Tarentines were the guard to their Waterers. The fight was for some time dubious, their men being of the same kind on both sides, and their Arms alike. But anon though the Tyrants Auxiliaries were more numerous, because Philopæmen had given order to his chief Officers, that when they had made some small resistance they should retire and draw the Foe to the place where his Ambuscade lay, the Lacedæmonians follow'd the Achæans so hastily through the Vale, that many of them were wounded and kill'd before they saw the hidden Enemy. The Shieldmen fate, as much as the breadth of the Vale would permit, in such a posture; that they could easily receive their flying men into the spaces between their ranks. Which when they had done, they themselves rose up together entire and fresh all in Battalia, and set upon the Enemy all in disorder, in an hurry, and tired with the fatigue of action as well as fainty by reason of their Wounds. Nor was the Victory doubtful; for the Tyrants men immediately turn'd their backs, and were driven into their Camp much faster than they had pursu'd the Achæans; many of them being kill'd and taken by the way. They had been scared in the Camp too, had not Philopæmen order'd his men to found a Retreat: fearing the rough places (that which way soever in that hurry he went, were very disadvantageous to him) much more than the Foe. Then guessing by the Fortune of the fight, as well as the general disposition, in what a fright he at that time was, he sent one of his Auxiliaries under the notion of a Renegado to him, to tell him for a certain truth; that the Achæans intended to march forward next day as far as the River Eurotas, which runs just by the very Walls, to intercept his passage: that the Tyrant might neither retreat to the City when he pleas'd, nor any provisions be brought thence into the Camp: and likewise to try, if any of the Enemies could be induced to revolt from the Tyrant. Now the Fugitive did not gain belief so much, as he gave the Tyrant, who was consternated with fear, a plausible reason to desert the Camp. The next day therefore, having order'd Pythagoras with the Auxiliaries and Horse to keep Guard before the mound, he himself as though he would have gone forth with the strength of his Army into the Field, Commanded the Ensigns to be born with speed into the City.

Philopæmen when he saw the Army march so fast along a way so narrow and steep, sent forth all his Horse and Cretan Auxiliaries to attack the station of the Enemies which was before the Camp. Who when they saw the Enemies so near, and themselves deserted by their own party, endeavour'd first to retire into their Camp: but soon after when the whole Army of the Achæans all in Battalia came up, they for fear of being themselves as well as their their Camp, all taken, they began to follow their own Army which was gone a little before. Thereupon the Shieldmen of the Acheans attack'd and rifled the Camp, whilst the rest went on in pursuit of the Enemy. Their passage was such, as that the Army could hardly go unmolested for fear of the Foe. But as soon as there was an attack made upon their Reer, and a terrible noise behind them was carry'd quite through up to their Front, they all ran, each man for himself, several wayes into the Woods thereabouts; so that in a moment of time the way was hedg'd up with a pile of Arms, and especially with Spears, which falling mostwhit direct, blockt up the pass as with a Bullwark. Philopæmen, having order'd the Auxiliaries to follow on as well as they could (for the Horse would not be able well to make their escape) himself led the heavier Souldiers a broader way down to the River Ennotus. Where being Encamped a little before Sunset, he staid for the Light armour which he had left to pursue the Enemy: who coming at the first watch and telling him, that the Tyrant with some few attendants was got to the City, but that the rest of his men scatter'd without their Arms all over the Forest, he order'd his men to refresh themselves; whilst himself immediately drew forth out of the other Forces (who, because they came first into the Camp, had eaten and slept) some choice men, that had nothing but their Swords about them, and at two Gate-wayes leading to Phœra and Barboſthenes set them in Array; supposing the Enemy would come that way. Nor was he deceiv'd in his guess. For the Lacedæmonians, as long as there was any day-light, kept themselves in by-wayes through the middle of the Wood. In the Evening, as soon as they saw light in the Enemies Camp, they lay over-against them in obscure places. But when they were got by them, supposing themselves now safe they got down into the more open wayes; where being surpriz'd by the hidden Enemy they were so general kill'd and taken, that scarce a fourth part of their Army escaped. Philopæmen, having shut the Tyrant up into the City, spent almost thirty dayes following to plunder the Laconian Territories, whence, when he had weaken'd and almost broken the strength of the Tyrant, he return'd home with such applause, that the Acheans not only compar'd him to the Roman General in point of honour for what he had done, but, in that which concern'd the Laconian War, even prefer'd him.

X x x x

XXXI.

Whilst the War lasted between the Acheans and the Tyrant, the Roman Embassadors went about the Cities belonging to the Allies, for fear, lest the Ætolians might have perverted the inclinations of any part thereof toward Antiochus, but spent very little time in soliciting the Acheans; supposing that because they were Enemies to Nabis, they would be faithful enough in all other points. They went first to Athens, then to Chalcis, and then into Thessaly; where having spoken to the Thessalians in a full Assembly, they went to Demetrias, at which City there was a Council of the *Magnesian*s then summon'd. There it was necessary for them to be somewhat more accurate in what they said; because part of the great men in that place being alienated from the Romans, were wholly devoted to Antiochus and the Ætolians: for that, when the news came, that Philips Son, who was an Hostage, was restor'd to him, and that the Tax impos'd upon him was remitted, it had been said, among other falsties, that the Romans were resolv'd to restore Demetrias also. Now to hinder that, Eurylochus Prince of the *Magnesian*s, and some others of his Faction, chose rather to make all the innovation they could by the arrival of the Ætolians and Antiochus. Wherefore with them it behoved the Romans so to Discourse, as that they might not by removing their vain fears diminish Philips hopes and make him their Enemy; whose Friendship might be of greater consequence to them than that of the *Magnesian*s. Only this they said; That as all Greece was oblig'd to the Romans for their liberty in general, so more particularly was that City. For in that there was not only a Garrison of the Macedonians, but a Palace built; that their Lord and Master might be always visible before their Eyes. Now all that was done to no end, if the Ætolians would bring Antiochus into Philips Palace, and take a new unknown King instead of an old one; of whom they had experience. They call their chief Magistrate Magnetarcha [Governour of the Magnetas] who at that time was Eurylochus. He therefore relying upon his authority said, He and the *Magnesian*s could not chuse but take notice, what the report was of a design that Demetrias should be deliver'd back into the hands of Philip. For the prevention whereof, the Magnetas ought to endeavour and adventure all they were able. And as he was going on very passionately, forgetting himself, he cast forth these words, That even at that time too Demetrias seem'd to be free: but in reality all things were order'd according to the pleasure of the Romans. At which words there was an hum given by the divided multitude, who partly assented, and partly were angry, that he should dare to say so. Quintius among the rest was so much enraged, that lifting his hands to Heaven, he invoc'd the Gods for witnesses of the ungrateful and perfidious humour of the *Magnesian*s. Whereupon they were all affrighted; but Zeno, one of the chief among them, and a person at that time of great authority, not only for his candid and gentle conversation, but because he had always undoubtedly been of the Roman Party, desir'd of Quintius and the other Embassadors, with tears in his Eyes, that they would not lay the madness of one single man to the charge of the whole City: Saying, that every particular person was mad at his own expence. That the Magnetas did not owe their liberty only, but even all other things, that were either sacred or dear to mankind, to Quintius and the Roman People. That no man could beg any thing of the immortal Gods, which the the Magnetas had not receiv'd from them: and that they would in a mad fit sooner tear their own flesh, than violate their Friendship with the Romans. His Speech was seconded by the Petitions of the whole Assembly.

Eurylochus ran out of the Council through by-wayes to the Gate, and thence straight into Ætolia. For at this time (and that more and more every day) the Ætolians discover'd their intention to revolt: and just then, as it happen'd, the chief of their Nation, called Thoas, whom they had sent to Antiochus, was come back; having brought along with him Menippus in quality of an Embassador from the King. These two, before they had an Audience of the Council, had fill'd all peoples Ears with the news of Land and Naval Forces: that a mighty Army of Horse and Foot were a coming: that there were Elephants sent for out of India: but above all (with which they fann'd the minds of the multitude would be most taken) that there was so much a bringing over, that it would buy the very Romans themselves. It was well known, what that report was like to do in the Council: for the Roman Embassadors were told, not only that they were come, but all their designs. And though the business was almost frustrated, yet Quintius thought it would be convenient, that some Embassadors from their Allies should be present at that Council, who might admonish the Ætolians of their Alliance with the Romans, and dare to talk their minds freely against the Kings Embassador. The Athenians seem'd fittest for that purpose, not only upon the score of their Cities dignity, but their ancient Alliance with the Ætolians. Quintius therefore desir'd of them, that they would send Embassadors to the Panætolian Council [i. e. the General Assembly or Parliament of the Ætolians]. First Thoas in that Council gave an account of his Embassy; and Menippus after him being advanc'd, said, It had been best for all people, who dwell in Greece and Asia, that Antiochus could have been concern'd when Philip was at his height; for then every man would have had his own, nor would all things have been subjected to the will and power of the Romans. But even yet, said he, if you resolutely bring your designs, which you have begun, to an Issue; Antiochus may be able, with the assistance of the Gods and his Allies the Ætolians, to restore all Greece, though at present in declining condition, to his former dignity. Now that consists in liberty, which stands upon its own strength, nor dependeth upon the will of another. The Athenians, who had leave to speak their minds first after the Kings Embassador, making no mention at all of the King, put the Ætolians in mind of their Alliance with the Romans, and T. Quintius's merits toward all Greece [advising them] that they would not rashly destroy it by being too precipitate in their Counsels. [And saying] That hot and bold Counsels were glorious at the first view, difficult in their management, and sad in their event. That the Roman Embassadors, and among them, E. Quintius was not far from thence. That therefore whilst all things were entire, they would rather undertake a verbal conflict about those things that were in question, than arm Asia and Europe for a fatal War.

The multitude being greedy of innovation were all for Antiochus; and thought the Romans ought not to be so much as admitted into their Council: though the great men (and those the Seniors of them more especially) by their authority prevailed to procure them an Audience. When the Athenians had given him account of this Decree, Quintius thought fit to go into Ætolia; for he thought, that thereby he should either gain somewhat of them, or that all the World would be witness, that the Ætolians were the occasion of the War: and that the Romans took up just and almost necessary arms. After he came thither, Quintius in the Council beginning from the original of the Alliance between the Ætolians and the Romans, and telling how often they had violated the League, discours'd a little of the right of those Cities that were then in debate: but yet that if they thought they had any equity on their side, how much better was it for them to send Embassadors to Rome, whether to dispute, or to Petition the Senate, than for the Roman People to fight with Antiochus (whilst the Ætolians stood by, like Prize-Masters, and set them on) to the great disturbance of mankind and the ruine of all Greece? Nor would any people be sooner sensible of the mischiefs of that War, than those who were the cause of it. But this the Roman, as though he had prophesied, spok'd to no purpose: and then Thoas with the rest of the same Faction, being heard with an universal assent, prevailed, that, without putting off the Council or expecting the Romans departure, a Decree might be made, whereby Antiochus should be sent for to deliver Greece, and decide the controversy between the Ætolians and the Romans. To this so proud a Decree Damocritus their Prætor added an insolent saying of his own too. For when Quintius ask'd him for that very Decree, he, not regarding the majesty of the person, said, he had some other thing, which was more urgent at present to dispatch; but he would in a short time give him the Decree and his Answer in Italy at his Camp, which he would pitch upon the Banks of the Tiber: So great a fury at that time possess'd both the Ætolians and their Magistrates.

Quintius and the Embassadors return'd to Corinth. From which time, what ever was said of Antiochus, the Ætolians were not any way in themselves concern'd, but seem'd only to sit still in expectation of the Kings coming. Now after the departure of the Romans they indeed had no Council of the whole Nation, but consulted among their Apocleti (so they call their Privy Council, which consists of certain select men) how they should make innovations in Greece. They all knew, that the chief men in the several Cities, and all the best were of the Roman side, and content with their present condition: but that the multitude and such whose condition did not suite with their desires, were for having all things quite alter'd. The Ætolians therefore resolv'd not only very boldly but even impudently too, to take Demetrius, Chalcis and Lacedæmon in one day: In order whereunto they sent one Nobleman to each of those Cities: Thoas to Chalcis, Alexamenus to Lacedæmon and Diocles to Demetrius: The last of whom Eurylochus, who was in banishment, (of whose flight and the cause thereof I told you before) assisted, as having no other hopes, than by that means, to return into his Country. Eurylochus in a Letter admonish'd his Relations and Friends, and those that were of the same Faction, to advise his Wife and Children to go into a full Assembly in forbid apparel and the guise of Suppliants, adjuring each man in particular, and all in general, not to suffer an innocent person to spend his age in banishment before he was condemn'd. Whereupon as well honest men were moved with pity, as ill and seditious persons by their hopes of confounding all things in an Ætolian tumult: infomuch that every one of them consented to recal him. Having made this preparation, Diocles with all his Horse (for then he was a Colonel of Horse) going under a pretence to bring home the banish'd Stranger, and having by travelling both day and night got a great way off, when he was six thousand paces from the City, at break of day, chose out three Troops (commanding the rest of the Horse to follow after) and went before. When he came near to the Gate, he commanded them all to dismount, and lead their Horses by their Bridle-Rains in some disorder, as much like Travellers as they could; that they might seem to be rather his Companions than his Souldiers. Then he left one Troop at the Gate, left the following Horse should be shut out, and in the middle of the City holding Eurylochus by the hand (whom many people met and congratulated) led him through the Forum [i. e. Market-place] to his own House. Soon after the City was full of Horsemen, and all the opportune places were seized; after which there were Souldiers sent into their several Houses to kill the heads of the contrary Faction.

XXXV. Thus was Demetrius subjected to the Ætolians. At Lacedæmon they could not well force the City, but were fain to take the Tyrant by treachery; who being dejected by the Romans of all his maritime Towns, and shut up then also by the Acheans within the Walls of Lacedæmon, whoever should first kill him, would be a man of the greatest esteem in all Lacedæmon. Now they had a pretence of sending to him, for that he tired them with his importunities, to send him Auxiliaries, he having renew'd the War upon their instigation. Thereupon Alexamenus had a thousand Foot and thirty Horse, chosen out of the youth, allotted him, whom the Prætor Damocritus, in the Privy-Council of the Nation before-mention'd, told, they must not think that they were sent to the Achaian War, or about any other business, that they might each of them in their own opinion devise: but that whatever sudden occasion Alexamenus should have, they should be ready to execute his command, though it were surprizing, rash, and bold, with all obedience; and should be as diligent, as though they knew they were sent from home to do nothing but that. With this preparation Alexamenus came to the Tyrant, whom he fill'd with hope (as soon as he arriv'd) that Antiochus was already come over into Europe, would shortly be in Greece, and fill all the Land as well as Sea with Arms and Men. That the Romans would not now believe they had to do with Philip; that the number of his Foot, and Horse, and Ships could not be told: and that the body of Elephants would beat the Enemy with their very appearance. That the Ætolians with their whole Army were ready to come to Lacedæmon, when occasion requir'd it: but that they had a mind to shew a good Army to the King at his arrival. That Nabis also himself should take care not to let the Forces which he had, lie idle, and grow effeminate at home; but should draw them forth, and make them exercise their Arms, preparing their minds as well as their bodies for the War. For by continual practice the fatigue would be the more easy; yea by the affability and courtesy of a General might be made not altogether unpleasant. Thereupon they were drawn forth in great numbers before the City into a Plain by the River Eurotas; the Tyrants Lifeguard standing in the middle, whilst he himself, with three Horsemen at the most, of which Alexamenus was most commonly one, rode before the Ensigns, and view'd the utmost Wings [of the Army.] The Ætolians were in the right Wing; not only those that had formerly been the Tyrants Auxiliaries, but the thousand also that came along with Alexamenus. Alexamenus had made it his custom sometimes to ride about with the Tyrant among the ranks; and to tell him what he thought best to be done; and sometimes to ride into the right Wing up to his own men: and then again, as though he had order'd what was necessary to be done, to retreat to the Tyrant again. But upon the day that he had design'd for doing of the fact, when he had rode a little way with the Tyrant, he went to his own Horsemen that were sent from home with him, and told them, Fellow-Souldiers! you must undertake a business, which under my conduct you were commanded forthwith to execute: wherefore prepare your minds and hands, so that none of you be backward to do what you see me do before you. He that delays, and by his own advice obstructs my design, let him know, he shall never return home again. With that they were all affrighted, remembering what a charge they had when they came forth. The Tyrant was coming from the left Wing; when Alexamenus commanded his Horsemen to hold down their Spears and look at him, who himself had but just recover'd his resolution, having been confounded with the thoughts of so great an attempt. When therefore the Tyrant drew near, he made at him, and running his Horse quite through knocked the Tyrant off. Thereupon the Horsemen came about him as he lay on the ground; and having given his Coat of Mail many a blow to no purpose, at last pierc'd through into his naked Body; so that he died before any relief came from the main Body of the Army.

he

Alexamenus with all his Ætolians went forward as fast as he could to seize the Palace. XXXVI. The guard-du-corps, seeing what was done, were all at first in a fright; but when they saw the Army of the Ætolians marching off, they ran together to the Tyrants Body which was left upon the place; so that the crowd of Spectators was made up of such as had been the keepers of his Life, and would be the revengers of his Death. Nor would any one have stirred, if they had presently laid down their Arms and call'd the Multitude to an Assembly, where a speech had been made suitable to the occasion, and a good quantity of Ætolians kept still in Arms without doing any body any hurt. But, as they needs must, in a design begun by fraud, they did all things to hasten the destruction of them that were actors in it. The General shut up in the Palace spent day and night in searching for the Tyrants Treasure; whilst the Ætolians, as though they had taken that City, which they would fain seem to have freed, employed their time in plundering. Whereupon not only the indignity of the thing, but the contempt also, animated the Lacedæmonians to assemble. Some said, They ought to turn out the Ætolians, and resume their liberty, which though it seem'd to be restored, was only intercepted; and others, that to the end they might have some head to undertake the affair, they ought to choose some one of the Royal Family for a show at least. Now there was a young Laconian Lad of that Race, who had been bred up with the Tyrants Children. Him therefore they set upon an Horse, and taking up Arms, kill'd the Ætolians that were stragling about the City. Then they went into the Palace, where they slew Alexamenus, who with some few others made resistance. The Ætolians, who were assembled about Chalciceos (a Brazen Temple dedicated to Minerva) were kill'd; though some few, throwing down their Arms, fled part to Tegea, and part to Megalopolis, where being apprehended by the Magistrates, they were sold for slaves.

Philopemen, having heard of the Tyrants Death, went to Lacedæmon; where finding all things disorder'd with fear, he call'd forth the Nobility, and in a speech, such as Alexamenus should have made, united the Lacedæmonians in an alliance with the Acheans; and that so much the more easily, for that at the same time, as it happened, A. Atilius came to Gythium with twenty four five-bank'd Gallies. At the same time Thoas met with far different success about Chalcis, (in what he attempted by means of Euthymidas a Nobleman that was banish'd (through the instigation of them that were of the Roman Party, after the arrival of T. Quintus and the Embassadors) and Herodorus a Cian Merchant (who was very powerful at Chalcis upon the score of his riches) though he prepared all those for the design that were of Euthymidas's Faction) from that by which Demetrius was seiz'd by means of Eurylochus. Euthymidas came from Athens (for there he had lived) first to Thebes, and then to Salganea. Herodorus to Thromium, not far from which place, in the Malian Bay, he had two Thousand Foot; and Thoas two Hundred Horse, with thirty small Merchant Ships; which together with six Hundred Foot Herodorus was ordered to carry over into the Island of Atalanta; that from thence, when he perceived that the Foot Forces were come near to Aulis and Euripus, he might cross over to Chalcis. But he himself led the rest of the Forces most part of the way in the night time with what speed he could to Chalcis.

Michio and Xenocides, who were then the chief Magistrates at Chalcis, since Euthymidas was expelled; whether they of themselves suspected any thing, or were told of the business at first, being affrighted, repos'd no hopes in any thing but flying for it. But some time after when their fear was allayed, and they saw that not only their Country, but the Roman Alliance also was betrayed and deserted, took this course. There was by chance at that time an yearly sacrifice performed at Eretria in honour of Diana Amarynthis; which is celebrated not only by a company of that Countrymen, but the Carystians likewise. Thither therefore did they send certain persons to desire the Eretrians and Carystians, That they would pity their condition as being born in the same Island, and have respect to the Romans alliance, so as not to suffer Chalcis to be subjected to the Ætolians. That they would have Eubœa if once they got Chalcis. That the Macedonians had been grievous Masters, but the Ætolians would be much less tolerable. Their respect to the Romans prevailed most upon the several Cities, who had experienced not only their Valour in War, but their justice and goodness in Victory too. Wherefore what stout young Men they had, each City arm'd and sent; to whom when the Townsmen of Chalcis had committed the defence of their Walls, they themselves sent, first an Herald, and then Embassadors to the Ætolians to ask them, For what word or action of theirs that Nation who were their Friends and Allies came to oppose them? To which Thoas General of the Ætolians reply'd, They came not to oppose, but to deliver them from the Romans. That now indeed they were bound with a more splendid, but a much heavier chain, than when they had a Garrison of Macedonians in their Castle. To which the Calcedesians made answer, That they neither were slaves to any man, nor did they need any Bodies assistance. Thereupon the Embassadors departed from the Conference back to their Camp. Thoas and the Ætolians, whose hopes consisted in the prospect of surprizing them, being not able by any means means to engage them in a set Battle, or to take a City so well fortified both by Sea and Land, return'd home. Euthymidas, when he heard that the Camp of his Countrymen was at Salganea, and that the Ætolians were gone, went back himself also from Thebes to Athens. And Herodorus, after he had waited several dayes with all diligence for the signal to no purpose; sent a Scoutship to know the reason of their delay; by which when he was inform'd that the Allies had deserted the Enterprize, he return'd to Thronium, from whence he came.

XXXIX. Quintius also, when he heard this, coming from Corinth by Sea, met King Eumenes in the streight call'd Enripus, near to Chalcis: where he order'd that King Eumenes should leave five hundred Souldiers for a Garison at Chalcis, and that he himself should go to Athens. Quintius went to Demetrius, whither he design'd, supposing that the delivery of Chalcis would be of some consequence with the Magnetes toward their renewing an Alliance with the Romans. And that the men of his party might have some kind of a Guard, he wrote to Eumenes the Prætor of the Theffalians, to arm all the youth, sending Villius before to Demetrius to try their inclinations, and resolving not to go about the business, unless some part of them were disposed to enter into their former Alliance. Villius arrived at the mouth of the Port with a Ship of five Banks of Oars: to which place seeing the whole multitude of the Magnetes were flockt out, Villius ask'd them, Whether they would rather have him come to them as Friends or as Enemies? To which their chief Magistrate Eurylochus reply'd; That he was come to people that were his Friends: but that he must keep out of their Port and let the Magnetians be in peace and at liberty, nor pervert the multitude under pretence of a Conference. Thereupon they began to scold, not to discourse: and whilst the Roman blamed the ingrateful Magnetes, foretelling what calamities were like to befall them; the multitude bawl'd out, accusing sometimes the Senate and sometimes Quintius. By this means Villius being frustrated in his design went back to Quintius, who, having sent a Messenger to the Prætor to bid him bring back the Forces, himself return'd again by Sea to Corinth.

XL. The affairs of Greece thus mixt with those of the Romans have taken me, as it were, out of my way: not because it was worth while to give an account of them, but because they were the occasion of the War with Antiochus. When the Consuls were chosen (for from thence I digress'd) L. Quintius and Cn. Domitius being the men, went into their Provinces: Quintius into Liguria, and Domitius against the Boii. The Boii were then at quiet; nay their Senate too with their Children, and their chief Officers with their Horfe (in all fifteen hundred) surrender'd themselves to the Consul. The Country of Liguria was ravaged far and near by the other Consul, and some Castles taken; out of which they got not only booty of all sorts and Captives, but retrieved some of their Countrymen also and Allies, who had been Slaves to the Enemies. This same year a Colony was carried to Vibo by order of the Senate, and consent of the Commons. There went three thousand seven hundred Footmen, and three hundred Horfe, which were carried thither by a Triumvirate, whose names were Q. Nevius, M. Minucius, and M. Furius Crassipes. There were fifteen Acres of Land given to each Footman, and as much again to the Horsemen. This Land lay next to the Bruttii, who had taken it from the Greeks. In Rome at the same time there were two extraordinary dreadful accidents happen'd; the one of some continuance and more flow: for the Earth quaked thirty eight dayes together (which by reason of the general sollicitude and consternation were all kept as Holy-dayes) upon the account whereof there was a supplication made three dayes one after another. That was no vain fear, but the real ruine of many men. A Fire which began in the Beast-Market, and continu'd a night and a day in the Houses that lie toward the Tiber, burnt all the Shops there with goods of great value.

XLI. The Year was now almost at an end; when the news of a War with Antiochus and the Senates care upon that account was encreased. Wherefore they began to debate the business of the Provinces belonging to the new Magistrates, to the end that all of them might be the more intent [upon the matter in hand.] They decreed, that the Consuls should have Italy and what other Region the Senate should order (all people knew that now there was a War against Antiochus) for their Provinces. That he, who happen'd to have the latter, should be allowed four thousand Foot of Roman Citizens and three hundred Horfe, six thousand Allies of the Latines, and four hundred Horfe. The present Consul L. Quintius was to raise them, that the new Consul might not be hinder'd from going as soon as he had Orders whither the Senate pleas'd. So also concerning the Prætors Provinces it was decreed; that the first Lot should be two jurisdictions, that of the City, and that call'd the Foreign one, between Citizens and Strangers: the second, the Bruttii; the third the Navy, to sail whither the Senate pleas'd; the fourth Sicily; the fifth Sardinia; and the sixth the farther Spain: L. Quintius the Consul had further Orders also to raise two new Legions of Roman Citizens, with twenty thousand Foot of the Allies and Latines, and eight hundred Horfe. That Army they assign'd to the Prætor who should have the Bruttii for his Province. There were two Temples dedicated in the Capitol that year to Jupiter: one of which L. Furius Purpureo, when he was Prætor in the Gallick War had vow'd to build, and the one when he was Consul. Q. Marcus Ralla the Duumvir dedicated them. There were that that year many severe judgments pass'd against Usurers, upon complaint made by the Curule Ædiles, M. Tuccius, and P. Junius Brutus, of private persons. Out of their Fines who were condemn'd there was a gilded Chariot set up in the Capitol in Jupiters Cell over the roof of the Chappel, and twelve gilt Shields, and the same persons help'd to build the Portico without the Porta Trigemina, among others that were Artificers in Wood [or among the Carpenters.]

Whilst the Romans were intent upon preparing for a new War, Antiochus also did not lie idle. For he was employ'd about three Cities, Smyrna, Alexandria, Troas, and Lampsacus: which he neither was able by force till that day to take, nor by any terms to make his Allies: nor was he willing, now that he was going over into Europe, to leave them behind him. He was likewise taken up by a deliberation touching Annibal: and first, the open deck'd Ships, that he had resolv'd to send with him into Africa were stopt: after which the question was put, whether he should be sent at all: especially by Thoas the Ætolian, who, when all parts of Greece were in an uproar, brought word that Demetrius was in their hands: so that with the same lies whereby he had rais'd the minds of many people in Greece, concerning the King whose Forces he so mightily extoll'd and multiply'd, he endeavours to blow up the Kings hopes also: that he was sent for by common consent, and that there would be a concourse to the shore, from whence they should see the Kings Fleet. He also was so bold as to endeavour to change the Kings mind which was now almost resolv'd and fix'd concerning Annibal. For he gave it out as his opinion, that neither any part of the Ships ought to be sent away from the Kings Fleet: nor, if they ought, that any man was less fit to command them than Annibal. That he was a banish'd person and a Carthaginian, to whom either his own condition, or his natural inclination might daily suggest a thousand new devices. And that the very glory of War, wherewith as with a Dower, Annibal was to be engaged, was too much for a Kings Admirer. That the King was the person upon whom all Eyes were fix'd, and ought to be the only General, or Commander himself. That if Annibal lost the Fleet or the Army, the damage would be the same as if it were lost by another man: but if they met with success, the glory of it would accrue to Annibal and not to Antiochus. If they had the good fortune to defeat the Romans through the whole progress of the War; what hopes was there, that Annibal would live under the King and be subject to one single person, who could scarce endure his own Country? That he had not so behaved himself from his youth up (having graspt in his hopes and thoughts the Empire of the whole World) as that he might seem willing to bear the impositions of a Master in his old Age. That the King had no necessity to make Annibal his General; though he might use him as a Companion and Counsellor in the War. That the small advantage which would arise from a man of his disposition might not be in that case either burdensome or inconvenient; but if he desired to be General of the War, that might prejudice the giver as well as the receiver.

No men are so prone to Envy as they do not make their Family and Fortunes equal to their minds; because they hate virtue and goodness in other people. Thereupon immediately the design of sending Annibal (which was the only thing which in the beginning of the War was thought upon to advantage) was laid aside; and then Antiochus being animated chiefly by the revolt of Demetrius from the Romans to the Ætolians, resolv'd no longer to defer his Expedition into Greece. But before he set Sail, he went up from the Sea to Ilium, that there he might Sacrifice to Minerva. From thence returning to the Fleet, he set out with forty men of War, and sixty open-deck'd, attended by two hundred Ships of burden, with all sorts of Victuals and other Warlike provisions. He first arriv'd at the Island of Imbrus; from whence he went over to Scyathus. Where having gather'd together the Ships which were cruising to and fro upon those Seas he came first to Pteleum, which lies upon the Continent. There Eurylochus, Governour of the Magnetes, and the Magnetian Nobility from Demetrius met him: at the sight of whose number he being pleas'd, the next day, put into the Port of that City. Not far from thence he landed his Forces; which consisted of ten thousand Foot, five hundred Horfe, and six Elephants; being scarce enough to seize Greece, if it had been naked, much less to sustain the shock of a Roman War. The Ætolians when they heard that Antiochus was come to Demetrius, appointing a Council decreed to send for him. But the King being already gone from Demetrius, because he knew they would make such a Decree, went on to Phalera in the Malian Bay. From thence, having receiv'd their Decree, he came to Lamia; where he was receiv'd with great kindness by the multitude; with applauses and shoutings, and all other acts, whereby the vulgar express their extraordinary joy.

As soon as he came into the Council, being with great difficulty introduced by Phaneas the Prætor and the Nobility, after silence was commanded the King began to speak. His first address to them was to excuse himself; that he was come into Greece with Forces so much less than all people hoped for and expected. But indeed that ought to be lookt upon as the greatest argument of extraordinary affection toward them, in that before he was sufficiently prepared in a point, and at a time unseasonable for sailing, he, upon the bare summons of their Embassadors, had readily obey'd, and thought, that when the Ætolians had seen him, they would believe all their security depended upon him alone. But he would abundantly satisfy the hopes even of them too, who now seem'd so much disappointed. For as soon as the Spring had made the Sea navigable, he would fill all Greece with Arms, Men and Horses, and all the Sea Coast with Ships; nor would he spare for cost, labour, or danger: till having forced the Roman Yoke off from their Necks, he had made Greece truly free, and in it the Ætolians above all others. That with his Armies there would also come out of Asia provisions of all sorts. But at present the Ætolians ought to take care, that his men had a sufficient supply of Corn, and a tolerable allowance of all other necessaries.

with

XLV. The King having spoken to this purpose with general applause, departed. After his departure there arose a Debate between two Princes of the Ætolians, Phœneas and Thoas. Phœneas was of opinion that they ought to use Antiochus as a Peace-maker and an Umpire concerning those things that were in controversy between them and the Romans, then as General in the War: saying, That his arrival and his Majesty would conduce more to the making of the Romans modest [in their demands] than his Arms would. For men, to avoid fighting, would voluntarily remit many things that by War and Arms could not be forced from them. To which Thoas answer'd, That Phœneas did not study Peace, but would fain disturb their preparations for the War, to the end that by delays not only the Kings Forces might be enervated, but that the Romans also might have time to make ready. For he had sufficiently experienced that no justice could be obtain'd from the Romans, though they had so often sent Embassadors to Rome, and so often treated with Quintius. Nor should they have desired Antiochus's aid, had they not been destitute of all hopes; who seeing he was now come before they expected, ought not to lie idle; but that they ought rather to beseech the King, that since (which was the greatest thing he could do) he was come to deliver Greece, he would also send for his Land and Sea Forces. That the King, when he was in Arms would surely gain some point: but being unarm'd would not be of any value among the Romans, not only in respect to the Ætolians but even to himself also. This opinion prevailed, and therefore they thought fit to give the King the Title of their General, choosing thirty Noblemen, with whom, when he pleas'd, he might consult. Then the Council being dismiss'd, all the multitude departed into their own Cities.

XLVI. The King, next day, consulted with their Apocleti [Select Counsellors] where he should begin the War: to whom it seem'd best, first to attack Chalcis, which had been lately in vain attempted by the Ætolians: and that there was more need of celerity in that affair than great pains taking or preparation. Wherefore the King with a thousand Foot, which follow'd him from Demetrius, march'd through Phocis: and the Ætolian Princes, having call'd forth some few of their Juniors, met him at Cheronea, and follow'd him with ten men of War. The King having Encamped at Salgamea, himself crossed over the Euripus with the Ætolian Princes, and when he was landed not far from the Port, the Magistrates also of Chalcis and the Nobility came out before the Gate. Some few on both sides came to a Conference, at which the Ætolians very earnestly perswaded the rest; that they would both preserve the Roman Friendship, and make the King too their Friend and Ally. For he came not over into Europe to make a War, but to deliver Greece; and that in reality, not in words and pretence only, as the Romans had done. But that nothing was more advantageous for the Cities of Greece, than to embrace both their Alliances. For by that means it would be always secur'd from the injuries of both, being protected and assisted by the one of them. If they did not make the King their Friend, they might see what they must shortly suffer; seeing the Roman Auxiliaries were a great way off, and Antiochus their Enemy, whose force they could not withstand, before their Gates. To this Miltio one of the Princes said, He wonder'd who it was, that Antiochus came out of his own Kingdom into Europe to deliver. For he knew no City in Greece that either had a Garrison in it, or paid Tribute to the Romans; or being oblig'd by an unjust League was under such conditions as were irksome to it. Wherefore that neither the Chalcidenses wanted any one to assert their liberty, being a free people already, nor any Guard, having Peace and their freedom through the favour of the same Roman People. That they did not despise the friendship of the King nor the Ætolians themselves. But in that they would shew themselves most like Friends, if they went out of the Island, and so quite away. For they resolv'd not only not to receive them within their Walls, but not so much as to enter into any Alliance but by consent of the Romans.

XLVII. These things were told the King at the Fleet, where he then lay; who for that reason at present (as having not strength enough yet come over to do any thing by force) resolv'd to go back to Demetrius. Where, since their first project had prov'd so ineffectual, the King consulted with the Ætolians what was next to be done. They thought fit therefore to try the Achæans and Amynder King of the Athamans: but believ'd that the Boeotians were averse to the Romans ever since the Death of Barchyllas and the accidents that happen'd thereupon. They also thought that Philopamen, Prince of the Achæans, through his emulation for glory in the Laconian War, was an utter Enemy and hateful to Quintius. Amynder had a Wife called Apamia, who was the Daughter of a certain Megalopolitan called Alexander; who, bragging that he was descended from Alexander the Great, had named his two Sons Philip and Alexander, and his Daughter, Apamia: whom, being she was now the Consort of a Kings Bed, the Elder of the Brothers, Philip, follow'd into Athamania. Now this man being as it happen'd, a person naturally vain, the Ætolians and Antiochus had put in hopes of being King of Macedonia (since he was really of that Royal Family [as he would be thought]) if he made an Alliance between Amynder King of the Athamans and Antiochus. And that vain promise prevailed not only with Philip, but with Amynder also.

In

In Achæia the Embassadors of Antiochus and the Ætolians had audience in a Council at XLVIII. Ægium before T. Quintius; Antiochus's Embassador being heard before the Ætolians. He therefore (like most Men, that are kept by the bounty of Kings) being a bragging Courtier fill'd all the Sea and Land too with an empty noise of many words, "That an innumerable Host of Horse were coming over the Hellespont into Europe, part of them in Coats of Mail (such as they call Cataphracts [i. e. arm'd Cap-a-pee]) and part of them using Armour on Horseback, from whom nothing was sufficiently secur'd, for that they hit their mark the more certainly backward as their Horse ran away from the Enemy. To these Horse Forces (though with these, he said, all the Armies of Europe mustered up into one Body might be defeated) he added a great many fots of Foot, and frighted them with the names of Nations scarce ever heard of before, whom he call'd the Dabæ, Medes, Elimæans and Cadusians. As for the Sea-Forces (whom no parts in Greece were able to contain) he said, That the Sidonians and Tyrians were planted in the right Wing, and the Arabians with the Sidetes out of Pamphylia in the left; which Nations no others had ever equal'd in naval skill or conduct. That it was needless at present to mention the Money and the other preparations for the War. That they themselves knew, the Kingdoms of Asia had always abounded in Gold. Wherefore the Romans were not now to deal with Philip or Annibal; the one chief but of one City, and the other confin'd to the narrow limits of Macedonia; but with the great King of all Asia and some part of Europe too. But yet that he, though he came from the utmost borders of the East to deliver Greece, desired nothing of the Achæans, wherein their fidelity towards the Romans, who were their former Friends and Allies, might be impaired. For he did not require that they should take up Arms with him against them; but that they would stand Neuters, wishing Peace to both Parties, as became indifferent Friends, but not concern themselves in the War. Archidamus Embassador from the Ætolians desired much the same thing; that they (which was most easy and safe for them) would be quiet; and being only Spectators of the War would wait the event of other peoples fortunes without any hazard to their own. Then he fell (being not able to govern his tongue) to railing, sometimes against the Romans in general, and anon at Quintius in particular: calling them ungrateful people, and upbraiding them, that not only the Victory over Philip was gain'd by the Courage of the Ætolians, but the Romans also kept alive: and that Quintius himself, as well as his Army, was preserv'd by their means. For what had he ever done like a General? That he saw him observing how the Birds flew or peck'd, and sacrificing, or making of Vows, like some ridiculous Soothsayer, whilst he himself expos'd his Body to the Enemies Weapons upon his account.

To that Quintius reply'd; "That Archidamus consider'd before whom rather than to XLIX. whom he spoke. For the Achæans knew very well, that all the Spirit of the Ætolians lay in words not in deeds, and appeared more in Councils or Assemblies, than in a Field. Wherefore they little valued the opinion of the Achæans to whom they knew themselves to be known; but that he boasted of himself to the Kings Embassadors, and by them to the King though absent. That if any one were ignorant before, what had made Antiochus and the Ætolians Friends, he might know by their Embassadors Speeches: who by lying and bragging of that strength which neither of them ever had, have bloated with vain hopes and puff'd up one the other: whilst they tell you that Philip was overcome by them, that the Romans were preserv'd by their valour, and so on as you just now heard: that you and the other Cities and Nations will be of their side: and the King on the other hand brags of whole Clouds of Foot and Horse; and covers the Seas with his Fleets. This is very like an Entertainment we had at Chalcis at a Friends House of mine, a very good man, and one that under stood eating: By whom being kindly entertain'd about Autumn, when we admired, how he got such variety of Venison at that time of Year, the man (not so vain as these persons are) smiling, said, that by several fots of Sawces and wayes of dressing, all that variety of counterfeit Venison was made of a tame Swine. The same might be fitly said of the Kings Forces that were just then so much boasted of. For all those several fots of Arms, and the many names of Nations unheard of (as Dabæ, Medes, Cadusians and Elymæans) were all Syrians; more fit to be Slaves than Souldiers, upon the score of their servile inclinations. And I wish, Achæans! I could lay before your Eyes this great Kings hasty march from Demetrius, one while to Lamia into the Council of the Ætolians, and anon to Chalcis. You should see the quantity of two small Legions, and those not compleat neither in the Kings Camp: you should see the King one while almost begging Corn of the Ætolians to give to his Souldiers, and anon borrowing money at life to pay his Army: another time standing at the Gates of Chalcis, and by and by excluded thence; and having seen nothing else but Anis and Euripus, returning into Ætolia. Truly not only Antiochus did ill to believe the Ætolians, and the Ætolians to hearken to his vanity; and therefore you ought not to be deceived, but to trust and rely upon the Romans honour and Friendship which you have so often experienced, and throughly tryed. For whereas they say, 'tis best for you not to intermeddle in the War, nothing is so contrary and foreign to your interest, or advantage: for without any thanks on either side, and without any honour too, you will be the prey of them that conquer.

Y y y

Nor

L. Nor did his Answer seem absurd to either party, besides that it was easy for his Speech to find a favourable Entertainment with them who were willing to hear it. For there was no dispute or doubt, but they would all look upon those to be either Friends or Enemies to the Achaens, whom the Roman People so esteemed: and would order a War to be proclaimed against Antiochus and the Atolians. They likewise presently sent Auxiliaries, whither Quintius thought fit, of five hundred men to Chalcis, and five hundred to Piræus. For there was like to be an Insurrection at Athens, by means of some who through hopes of reward endeavour'd to draw the Mobile with money (for which they are apt to sell themselves [and their Country too]) over to Antiochus, till Quintius was sent for by those of the Roman Party, and, upon the information of one Leon, Apollodorus, Author of their Revolt, was condemn'd and banish'd. Thus did the Embassadors return from the Achaens to the King with a sad Answer. The Bæotians gave no positive Answer, only said, that when Antiochus was come into Bæotia, then they would deliberate what to do. Antiochus hearing that both the Achaens and King Eumenes had sent to the Garison of Chalcis; supposed it his best way to make what hast he could, not only that his men might come thither before them, but that, if possible they might meet them on the way; and therefore sent Menippus with about three thousand Souldiers, and all his Fleet to Polyxenida; marching himself in a few dayes after, with six thousand of his own men, and, of that number which could be raised on a sudden at Læmia, not very many Atolians. The five hundred Achaens (a small aid) who were sent by King Eumenes, under the Command of Xenocides a Chalcidese, having got safe over the Euripus, before the wayes were beset, arrived at Chalcis. And the Roman Souldiers too, who were themselves also about five hundred, whilst Menippus lay incamped before Salganea, came to Hermæum, whence you pass over out of Bæotia into the Island of Eubæa. Miltio was with them in quality of an Embassador from Chalcis to Quintius, being sent to desire that very Garison. Who when he saw the Streights possess'd by the Enemy, went no farther toward Aulis, but turn'd toward Delium, with a resolution from thence to cross over into Eubæa.

LI. Delium is a Temple of Apollo, lying upon the Sea, five thousand paces from T. magra. And about four thousand paces from thence there is a passage over the Sea into the nearest parts of Eubæa. Where, both in the Temple and the Grove, which are as sacred as those places which the Greeks call Asyla [i. e. Sanctuaries] and before either any War was proclaimed, or so far begun, that the Romans had ever heard of drawn Swords, or any bloodshed, as their Souldiers, who had nothing else to do, were some of them gazing upon the Temple and the Grove, others walking without their Arms upon the Beach, and great part of them gone into the Fields to get Wood and Forage; Menippus set upon them on a sudden, as they were stragling about, and kill'd them, taking fifty alive. Some few of them escaped, among whom Miltio was one, being taken on Board a small Merchant Man. This accident, as it was a vexation to Quintius and the Romans upon the score of their having lost so many men, so it seemed to give them some farther right to make War against Antiochus. Antiochus, having brought his Armour to Aulis, and sent Envoys a second time, partly of his own men, and partly Atolians, to Chalcis, to treat of the same things that they had lately done (but with greater menaces) prevailed with ease, notwithstanding all that Miltio and Xenocides could do to the contrary, to have the Gates open'd unto him. Those that were of the Roman Party went out of the City a little before the Kings coming: whilst the Achaens and Eumenes's men kept at Salganea. And in Euripus some few Roman Souldiers fortified the Castle for security. Menippus began to attack Salganea, and the King himself the Castle of Euripus. Whereupon the Achaens and Eumenes's men having first contracted for their safe departure, march'd out of their Garison; but the Romans defended Euripus with more resolution. And yet they too, since they were besieged both by Sea and Land, and saw the Enemy bringing Engines and all Warlike Instruments together, could not hold out the Siege. Now when the King had got that which was the chief place in all Eubæa, the other Cities of that Island did not refuse to submit unto him. Which made him think he had begun the War very fortunately, seeing so great an Island as that, and so many convenient Cities were now become subject to him.

DECADE

DECADE IV. BOOK VI.

The EPI TOME.

19, 20. Manlius Acilius Glabrio, being Consul, with the assistance of King Philip, conquer'd Antiochus at Thermopylae, and drew him out of Greece, &c. 34. He also subdued the Ætolians. 36. P. Cornelius Scipio Nasica dedicated the Temple of Cybele, whom he had brought into the Palace, being judg'd by the Senate to be the best man [in the City.] 38, 39, 40. He likewise accepted of a Surrender made by the Boii in Gaul, whom he conquer'd, and triumph'd over them. 44. Gives an account of several prosperous Sea-fights against the Admirals of King Antiochus.

THE Consuls, Pub. Cornelius Scipio, Son of Cneius, and Manius Acilius Glabrio, as soon as they enter'd upon their Office, were order'd by the Senate (before there was Discourse of their several Provinces) to Sacrifice with the greater sort of Victims in all Temples, wherein there was used to be a Lectisternium [i. e. a sacred Feast] the greater part of the year: and to pray, that the Senate would be mindful of the new War; so that the same might prove successful to the Senate and people of Rome. All those Sacrifices were of good portent; the Gods being pleased with the first oblations, and the Soothsayers answer'd thus; that by that War the bounds of the Roman People should be propagated, and that they saw victory and triumph before them. This being said, the Senate, having now no farther thoughts of Religion, order'd a Bill to be prefer'd to the Commons, to know, Whether they were willing that a War should be enter'd into with King Antiochus, and all that were of his side: and if that Bill were pass'd, that then, if the Consuls thought good, they should refer the whole matter to the Senate. P. Cornelius got the Bill pass'd, and then the Senate decreed, that the two Consuls should have Italy and Greece for their Provinces: and that he to whose share Greece fell (besides that number of Souldiers, which L. Quintius by authority from the Senate had rais'd and commanded for and in that Province) should have that Army, which M. Babinus, when he was Prætor, had the year before, by order of Senate, carry'd over into Macedonia. He also had leave out of Italy, if occasion were, to accept of Auxiliaries from their Allies, so they were not above five thousand. They likewise thought fit to send L. Quintius, who the year before had been Consul, to that War. The other Consul, who was to have Italy, was order'd to make War against the Boii, with which he would of those Armies that the former Consuls had commanded, and send the other to Rome, that so those might be City Legions ready to march whither the Senate should think fit.

These things being thus decreed as to the disposing of the Provinces, they then thought good that the Consuls should proceed to their choice. In which, Greece fell to Acilius, and Italy to Cornelius: whereupon they made an absolute order of Senate, that whereas the Roman People at that time had consented to make a War against King Antiochus, and all his Subjects, the Consuls upon that account should proclaim a Supplication: and that Manius Acilius the Consul should vow to celebrate the great Games in honour of Jupiter, and to make offerings at every shrine. That Vow the Consul made, in words that P. Licinius the High-Priest said before him, to this purpose. If the War, which the People have order'd to be undertaken against King Antiochus, shall be ended according to the desire of the Senate and People of Rome: then to thee, Jupiter! shall the Romans celebrate the Grand Games for ten dayes together: and offerings shall be made in all Temples of what value the Senate shall think fit. Whatever Magistrate sets forth those Games, and when and wheresoever he does it, let the Games be rightly perform'd, and the offerings rightly made. Then the two Consuls order'd a Supplication to be made for two dayes. Now when the Consuls had chosen their Provinces, the Prætors also straight chose theirs. M. Junius Brutus happen'd to have both Jurisdictions [i. e. that between Citizen and Citizen, as well as that between Citizen and Foreigner:] A. Cornelius Mammula the Bruttii, M. Æmilius Lepidus Sicily, L. Oppius Salinator Sardinia; C. Livius Salinator the Fleet; and L. Æmilius Paulus the farther Spain: To these men the several Armies were thus disposed of. To A. Cornelius the new Souldiers rais'd the Year before by L. Quintius then Consul, pursuant to an Order of Senate; he being order'd to defend all the Coast about Tarentum and Brundisium. To L. Æmilius Paulus, for the farther Spain, they allowed, besides the Forces which he was to receive from M. Fulvius the Pro-Prætor, that he should take along with him three thousand new Foot, and three hundred Horse; so as that of them two parts should be Latine Allies, and the third Roman Citizens. The same supply was sent C. Flaminius, who was continu'd in Commission, into the hither Spain. M. Æmilius Lepidus was to have of L. Valerius, whom he was like to succeed, not only his Province but his Army too: but to keep L. Valerius, if he would, as his Pro-Prætor in the Province; as also so to divide the Province, as that one part of it should reach from Agrigentum to Pachynum, and the other from Pachynum to Tyndarium. And that L. Valerius should defend that Sea-Coast with twenty long Ships. The same Prætor was order'd to exact two Tithes of Corn: which he should take care to get carried to the Sea, and transported into Greece. The same thing was injoin'd by L. Oppius concerning two other Tiths in Sardinia; though they order'd their Corn to be convey'd, not into Greece, but to Rome. C. Livius the Prætor, to whose Lot the Navy fell, was order'd to go over into Greece with thirty Ships, that were already fitted out, as soon as possibly he could, to receive the other Ships from Avilius; whilst M. Junius was employ'd to refit and arm the old ones that were in the Docks, and to provide Seamen, that were Libertines: [i. e. Sons of men that had been Slaves] to man that Fleet.

III. Then were there three Embassadors sent into Africa to the Carthaginians, and into Nipponia to desire Corn to send into Greece: for which the Roman People would pay them. And so intent was the whole City upon their preparations, and so solicitous for that War, that P. Cornelius the Consul set forth an Edict; That no Senator, or any one that had a vote in the Senate, or other inferior Magistrate whatsoever should go any farther from Rome, than he could come back that day: and that five Senators should never be absent from Rome at one time. In hastening to set out the Fleet, a contest that arose with the Inhabitants of the Sea Coast, for some small time detain'd C. Livius. For they being prest to go to Sea, appeal'd to the Tribunes of the People; from whom they were refer'd back to the Senate. The Senate unanimously decreed, that those Country-Fellows should not be excused from the Sea-Service. The Towns that contend'd with the Prætor about this immunity were Hestia, Fregene, Castrum Novum, Pyrgi, Antium, Tarracina, Minturnæ, and Sinuessa. Then the Consul Manius Acilius by Order of Senate propos'd to the College of Herald, Whether it were sufficient to tell any particular Garrison belonging to Antiochus, that they declar'd War against him? and whether they would have the same Declaration made to the Ætolians apart? and whether they ought first to renounce all Alliance and Friendship with them, before they declar'd the War? To which the Herald made Answer; That they, when they were consult'd in the case of Philip, had formerly determin'd, that it was not at all material, whether the Declaration were made to him in Person, or to any Garrison. And that their Friendship with him seem'd to be sufficiently renounced, in that they had not thought fit either to restore such things as his Embassadors had so often demand'd back, or to make any satisfaction. That the Ætolians had voluntarily declar'd War against themselves, in having by force taken Demetrias, a City belonging to their Allies: attempt'd both by Sea and Land to make themselves Masters of Chalcis; and brought King Antiochus over into Europe to wage War against the People of Rome. When therefore they had gotten all things in due order, Manius Acilius the Consul made an Edict; that what Souldiers L. Quintius had rais'd, and those also that he had injoin'd the Allies and Latines to Levy, being to go along with him into his Province, with the Tribunes of the first and third Legions, should all of them Rendezvous at Brun-disium upon the Ides of May. After which he himself went from the City upon the sixth of May in a Warlike Robe: at what time the Prætors also departed into their Provinces.

IV. About the same time there came Embassadors from the two Kings, Philip and Ptolemy King of Egypt, to Rome; with promises of aid, money and Corn: besides that from Ptolemy were brought a thousand pounds of gold, and twenty thousand pounds of silver. But there was none of it accepted; only thanks return'd to the King [for his kind offer] And whereas they both promis'd to come with all their Forces into Ætolia, and be present in the War, Ptolemy was excus'd for that Engagement. To Philip's Embassadors they made this Answer; that he would mightily oblige the Senate and People of Rome, if he were not wanting to [assist] Manius Acilius their Consul. There came Embassadors likewise from the Carthaginians and King Massinissa: and the Carthaginians promis'd that they would bring a thousand Bushels of Wheat, and five hundred thousand of Barley to the Army, besides half as much to Rome: wherefore they desired, that the Romans would accept of it as a present from them: [said] that they would send out a Fleet of their own men; and pay all that Tribute, which they ought to do at several times for many years to come, then all at once. Massinissa's Embassadors said, their King would send five hundred Bushels of Wheat, and three hundred thousand of Barley to the Army in Greece; three hundred thousand Bushels of Wheat, and two hundred and fifty thousand of Barley to Rome, besides five hundred Horse, and twenty Elephants to Manius Acilius the Consul. As to the Corn they both receiv'd this Answer; That the Roman People would make use of it, upon condition that they would take money for it. As to the Fleet they excus'd the Carthaginians: except it were so, that they ow'd them any Ships by compact: but for the money, they would have none of it before the dayes [appointed for the payment thereof.]

V. Whilst these things were in agitation at Rome; Antiochus at Chalcis, lest he should be idle all the Winter time, partly himself solicited the several Cities by his Embassadors, as they on the other hand partly came of their own accord to him; as the Epirotes [for Example] by universal consent of that Nation, and the Eleans from Peloponnesus. The Eleans desired aid against the Acheans, who, they believ'd (since they had contrary to their mind declar'd War against Antiochus) would make the first attempt upon their City. He therefore sent them a thousand Foot under the Command of Euphanes a Cretan. The Embassy of the Epirotes shew'd no freedom or simplicity of inclination at all to any side: for they were willing to contract a Friendship with the King, but so, as not by any means to offend the Romans;

mans; desiring him, not disadvantageously to engage them in the matter, who were set up against Italy for all Greece, and should receive the first efforts of the Romans. But if he himself could defend Epirus with his Land, and Sea Forces, all the Epirotes would gladly receive him into their Cities and Ports. If he could not, they desired him, not to expose them naked and unarm'd as they were, to the Roman War. The design of that Embassy was evidently this, that whether (as they the rather believ'd he would) he abstain'd from Epirus, they might preserve an entire Friendship with the Roman Armies, having sufficiently reconciled the King, in that they would have receiv'd him if he came to them; or whether he came, they might that way also hope for pardon from the Romans; in that they, not expecting Auxiliaries from a place so distant, had submitted to his present force. To this so intricate an Embassy he having no ready Answer to make, said, He would send Embassadors to them, to treat of those things that concern'd both him and them in common.

Then he himself went into Boetia, which had such specious pretensions for their animosity against the Romans, as I told you; viz. the death of Barchyllas, and the War rais'd against Coronea upon the account of the Roman Souldiers that were there slain: the famous Discipline of that Nation being much decay'd from what it had been, and the present state of many being such, that they could not rest long without making some alteration in the Commonwealth. So, being met by throngs of the Boetian Nobility from all parts, he arriv'd at Thebes: where in a Council of the whole Nation (though he had begun the War not only at Delium by an attack upon the Roman Garison there, but at Chalcis also, and that with no small or doubtful acts of hostility, yet) he made the same Speech, that he had done in the first Conference at Chalcis, and by his Embassadors in the Council of the Acheans, desiring that they would enter into an Alliance with him, and not proclaim War against the Romans; but every body knew what the design was: However for a light verbal pretext thereunto, a Decree was made for the King against the Romans. When he had made this Country too his Allies, going back to Chalcis, from whence he sent a Letter before-hand, that the Ætolian Nobility should meet at Demetrias, for him to discourse them about the grand affairs of their State; he came thither by Sea on the day that was appointed for the Council. Not only Amynder was sent for out of Athamania to consult with them, but Annibal the Carthaginian also, who for a long time had not been admitted, was present at that Council. They consult'd concerning the Thessalians, and thought fit to try the inclinations of all such of that Nation, as were then present: only they were of different opinions in the case; some of them being perswaded that they ought to go immediately about their work; others, that they ought to defer it till the beginning of the Spring; others, that they ought only to send Embassadors; and others, that they ought to go with all their Forces, and put them into a fright, if they delay'd.

Now all the dispute being about this consultation, Annibal being particularly ask'd his opinion put the King and those that were present in mind of the whole War, with a Speech to this effect: If ever since the time that we came over into Greece, I had been made use of as a Counsellor; when we treated concerning Eubœa, the Acheans, and Boetia, I should have given the same opinion, that now, when we are debating about Thessaly, I shall. First of all I think we ought to engage Philip and his Macedonians to be our assistants in the War by any manner of means. For as to Eubœa, Boetia and Thessaly, who knows not, that they who having no strength of their own, and therefore always flustering those that are present, use the same fear, which they shew in their designs, to beg a pardon with, as soon as they shall see the Roman Army in Greece, they will turn to their usual Masters? and that it is no fault in them, that when the Romans were so far off, they would not try thine and thy Armies present strength? How much better then, and more advisable is it to make Philip than these People our Ally; who if he once espouses the cause, will not be able to disengage himself; and brings such a force with him, as will not only be an accession to the Roman War, but was able of late of it self to sustain the shock of the Roman Army? How can I, when he's our Friend (pardon the expression) once doubt of the event? When I see that the Romans themselves are now like to be oppos'd by those very persons, by whose assistance they overcame Philip. For the Ætolians who (as all people know) defeated Philip, will now fight on his side against the Romans. Amynder and the Athamans, whose assistance was of great moment in that War, will be of our side. Philip at that time, when you lay still, sustain'd all the weight of the War: now two mighty Kings of you, with the strength of all Asia and Europe will wage War against one Nation (to say nothing of both my sorts of fortune) which in the memory of our Fathers was not equal to the King of the Epirotes only, whatever he will be compar'd to you. What then gives me confidence that Philip may be join'd with us? One thing is, our common benefit, which is the greatest bond of Alliance: and another, that you Ætolians consent to it. For your Embassador Thoas here, among other things that he us'd to say to excite Antiochus against Greece, above all things constantly affirm'd this; that Philip murmur'd and took it ill that under a show of Peace he had the Laws of servitude impos'd upon him. He compar'd the Kings fury to a wild Beast bound or shut up, and desirous to break the Bars. Now if his disposition be such, let us untie those Bonds, and break those Bars: that his long restrain'd fury may break forth upon our common Enemies. But if our Embassy do not at all move him; yet let us take care, since we cannot make him our own Friend, that he may not join with our Enemies. Thy Son Seleucus is at Lyfimachia; who if with that Army that he has, he shall begin through Thrace to plunder the nearest nearest parts of Macedonia, he will easily divert Philip from assisting the Romans, and make him look more narrowly to his own. Thus you have my opinion concerning Philip: nor were you ignorant what I thought from the very beginning touching the whole manage of the War. Had I been then heard, the Romans should have had news, not that Chalcis in Eubœa was taken, and the Castle of Euripus seized, but that Etruria, Liguria, and all the Coast of Gallia Cisalpina was inflamed with War, and (which is their greatest terror) that Annibal was in Italy. Now too I am of opinion that you had best send for all your Land and Sea Forces: and let your Ships of burden follow the Fleet with provisions. For here as we are but a few in respect of what we are to perform in the War, so in regard to our want of provisions we are too many. When you have muster'd up all your Forces, dividing your Fleet you shall keep part of them in Harbour at Corcyra (lest the Romans should have a free and a safe passage) and send part of them over to the Coast of Italy that lies toward Sardinia and Africa; whilst you your self go forward with all your Land Forces into the Byline Territories; where you shall defend Greece, and make the Romans believe that you are going over, as, if occasion be, you really must. These things I advise you to, who though I am not the most skilful person in all sorts of War, yet have learnt at least by my good and bad fortune to cope with the Romans. In what I have given you my Counsel, I promise you not to be either unfaithful or storkful; so, may the Gods approve that opinion which shall seem best unto you.

VI.

VII.

VIII. This was the purport of Annibal's speech, which they who were present there commended more before his face, than in effect they followed his advice. For Antiochus did nothing of all that was proposed, save that he sent to Polyxenida for the Fleet and Forces to come out of Asia. There were also Embassadors sent to Larissa where the Council of Thessaly then sat, and a Day set for the Ætolians and Amynder to meet with their Armies at Pheræ, whither the King too presently came with his Forces. There, whilst he tarried for Amynder and the Ætolians, he sent Philip of Megalopolis with two Thousand Men to gather up the Bones of the Macedonians about Cynocephale, where the Romans had made an end of the War with Philip; either of his own inclination, as willing to ingratiate himself with the Macedonians, and make their King odious, for having left his Soldiers unburied; or out of the natural vanity incident to Kings, who give their minds to things that look very glorious and great, but are in themselves mere trifles. So there was a Bank made of an heap of those Bones, which were scatter'd all about the Fields; which as it gain'd him no good-will among the Macedonians, so it made Philip his utter Enemy. Wherefore he, who to that time was resolv'd to take his measures by the event of things, sent word immediately to M. Babius the Pro Prætor; That Antiochus had made an invade into Thessaly; and therefore, if he thought fit, he would have him march out of his Winter Quarters; that he would meet him, to consult what was best to be done.

IX. Whilst Antiochus was Encamped at Pheræ, where the Ætolians and Amynder join'd him, there came Embassadors from Larissa, to enquire, what the Thessalians had said or done to make him molest them; and desiring withal, that removing his Army, he would, if he had any thing to say to them, debate it by Embassadours. At the same time they sent five hundred men under the command of Hippolochus for a Garison to Pheræ; but they being excluded from access to that place, now that the Kings men had beset all the Roads, went to Scotussa. To the Larissan Embassadors the King gave this mild Answer; That he was come into Thessaly, not to make War, but to defend and establish the liberty thereof. He also sent an Envoy to say much the same thing to the Pheræans; but they, giving him no Answer, sent themselves an Embassadour to the King, by name Pausanias, who was one of the chief men in their City. Who when he had spoken to the same purpose (being in the same circumstances) as others had done for the Chacideses in the parley at the Streight of Epirus, and some things more boldly too; the King, having advised the Pheræans to deliberate again and again, for fear they should take that course, of which, whilst they were too cautious and provident for the time to come, they would repent at present, dismissed them. When this news came to Pheræ, they presently resolv'd, out of their love to the Romans, to undergo all that the Fortune of War should cast upon them. They therefore prepar'd themselves as fast as possible to defend their City, whilst the King at the same time began to attack their Walls on every side; as knowing well enough (for there was no doubt of it) that it depended upon the event of his attempt upon that City which he first set upon, whether he should be condemn'd or fear'd by the whole Nation of the Thessalians: wherefore he put the besieged into all the consternation he could. The first effort of the attack they endured with resolution enough; but soon after, when many fell, or were wounded, as they were making their defence, their hearts began to fail them. But being recall'd by the chastisement of the Nobility to persevere in their design, they left the outward circle of the Wall, (seeing their Forces were now wasted) and retired into the inner part of the City; about which there was a shorter Line of Circumvallation. At last, being quite tired out, they, fearing left, if they were taken by force, they should find no favour from the Conquerer, surrender'd themselves. Thereupon the King without any delay sent four thousand men, whilst the terror was fresh, to Scotussa; where the Inhabitants never stuck to surrender, having seen the Example of the Pheræans before their Eyes; who were forced at their cost to do that at last, which at first they so pertinaciously refused. Together with that City, Hippolochus also and the Larissan Garison rison were surrender'd. But they were all dismiss'd by the King without any hurt done to them; for that the King thought, that would be a thing of great moment to reconcile the affections of the Larissians unto him.

X. Within ten days after his coming to Pheræ, having perfected these matters, he went with his whole Army to Crano, which he took upon his first arrival. From thence he went and took possession of Cypara, Metropolis, and the Castles thereabouts; so that all places in that part of the Country, excepting Atrax and Gyro, were now in his hands. Then he resolv'd to attack Larissa: supposing, that either for fear, since the other Cities were so lately taken, or in gratitude for his dismissing of their Garison, or by the Example of so many Cities that had surrender'd themselves, they would no longer persist in their obstinacy. He therefore, having order'd his Elephants to be driven before the Ensigns for terror, march'd with a square Body up to the City: to the end that the minds of great part of the Larissians might float to and fro, between present fear of an Enemy, and respect for their absent Allies. At the same time Amynder with the Athaman Youth seiz'd Pellineum; and Menippus going into Perrhoëum with three thousand Ætolian Foot, and two hundred Horse, took Mallaa and Cyretie by storm, plundering all the Country of Tripolitis. Having done all this with great celerity they return'd to the King at Larissa, and came just as he was consulting what to do with that place. For there they were of different opinions: some saying, that they must use violence, and not defer attacking the Walls with Works and Engines on every side at once, it being a City seated on a Plain, and easy of access which way they pleas'd; whilst others said, one while it was a City of such strength as not to be compar'd to Pheræ; and anon, took notice that it was Winter, and such a time of year as was not fit for any Warlike Enterprize, much less for besieging or taking of Cities. Whilst the King hereupon stood doubtful between hope and fear, Embassadors from Pharsalus, who came by chance to surrender their City, raised his Courage. In the mean time M. Babius having met and confer'd with Philip in the Dassaretian Territories, sent Appian Claudius by common consent to guard Larissa: who marching through Macedonia by great Journeys came to that highest part of the Mountains that lies above Gonni. Gonni is a Town twenty thousand paces from Larissa, situate in the very entrance of the Lawn called Tempe. Where having Encamp'd on more ground than he needed to have done, in regard to the numbers he had, and kindled more Fires than were necessary, he made the Enemy believe what he design'd they should, to wit, that the whole Roman Army was there with Philip. Whereupon the King telling his men (for an excuse) that Winter was near at hand, after he had staid only one day retired from Larissa, and went back to Demetrias: the Ætolians and the Athamans too going into their own Territories likewise. Appias, though he saw that the Siege was raised (the only thing he was sent thither for) yet he went down to Larissa to confirm their Allies in their affections for the future; so that there was a double joy among them; not only for that the Enemy was departed out of their Confines, but that they saw a Roman Garison within their Walls.

XI. The King going from Demetrias to Chalcis fell in love with a Damsel of that place, who was Daughter to Cleopolemys; whom when he had tired out, first by Proxy, and then by his own importunities himself in person (the Gentleman being unwilling to match his Daughter into a Family so much above her) at last having gain'd his request, kept his Wedding as if it had been in the midst of Peace; and spent the remaining part of the Winter in feasting, drinking, sleeping, and such pleasures as attended that kind of Life, wherewith he was tired rather than cloy'd. All his great Officers too (who, in Boœtia especially, had the oversight of his Winter-Quarters) were guilty of the same debauchery, and so were the common Souldiers also; nor did any one of them put on his Armour, keep his watch or station, or do any thing else that belong'd to a Souldier. Wherefore in the beginning of the Spring, when he was come through Phocis into Acarnania, where he had order'd all his Army to meet, he easily perceiv'd, that his Souldiers kept their Winter with no greater severities than their General. Then he order'd Alexander the Acarnanian, and Menippus the Macedonian to carry the Forces to Status in Ætolia, whilst he himself, having sacrificed at Delphi to Apollo, went forward to Nappaetum. Having held a Council of the Nobility in Ætolia, he met his men that came through the Malian Bay, on the rode that goes by Chalcis and Lysimachia to Stratus. There Mnesilochus, a Nobleman of Acarnania, whom he bribed with many presents, did not only himself reconcile the Nation to the King, but had brought Clytus also their chief Magistrate, over to his opinion. Who seeing the Leucadians, (the chief City of Acarnania) could not be easily induced to a revolt, for fear of the Roman Fleet, which was either with Atilius, or about Cephalenia, set upon them by a stratagem: For he having said in Council, that they ought to defend the inland parts of Acarnania, and that all who were able to bear Arms should go forth to Medeon and Thyrium, lest those Towns should be seized by Antiochus and the Ætolians, there were certain persons set there on purpose to say; it was not necessary they should all rise in such a tumult, a guard of five hundred men would be enough. Which number when he had gotten, all raised out of the youth, he planted three hundred at Medeon, and two hundred at Thyrium, with a design that they should be in time as Hostages to the King.

XII. At the same time the Kings Embassadors came to Medeon: who having had their Audience, ence, upon debate in the Assembly what Answer they should make the King, some being of opinion that they ought to continue in their Alliance with the Romans, and others, that they ought not to slight the Kings Friendship, the opinion of Clytus seemed to be the mean and most expedient; for which reason it was so far embraced, that they sent Embassadors to the King, and desired of him, that he would suffer the Macedonians to consult upon so weighty a matter as that was, with the general Council of the Acarnanians. Mnesilochus and those of his Faction were put upon that Embassy on purpose: who, having sent certain persons privately to advise the King to come nearer with his Army, themselves protracted the time. So that before those Embassadors were got well out, Antiochus was in their Territories, and presently after at their Gates; through which, (whilst those that knew nothing of the treachery trembled, and tumultuously called the young men to their Arms) he was led by Clytus and Mnesilochus into the City. Now some of the Inhabitants coming over of their own free-will, even those that were of a quite different mind came for fear and waited upon the King. Whom when he had endeared (though they were formerly frightened at him) with an obliging Speech, several people of Acarnania revolted in hopes of his declared Clemency. From Medeon he went to Thyrium, having sent Mnesilochus and Embassadors thither before him. But the treachery detected at Medeon made the Thyrians more cautious, not more timorous: wherefore having given him a cross Answer, That they would accept of no Alliance save by consent of the Roman Generals, and shut their Gates, they planted their men upon the Walls. Then very seasonably, to strengthen the Acarnanians in their resolution, Cn. Octavius was sent by Quintius; who when he had receiv'd the Garison and a few Ships from A. Postumius, who had been made Governour of Cephalonia by Lieutenant Atilius; he came to Lencus, and fill'd the Allies with hopes; that M. Acilius the Consul was already come over the Sea with his Legions, and that the Roman Camp was in Thessaly. Now since the time of year, which was then fit for sailing made this rumour probable; the King having put a Guard into Medeon, and into some other Towns of Acarnania, departed from Thyrium, and through the Cities of Etolia and Phocis return'd to Chalcis.

XIII.

A little before that time M. Bibius and King Philip, who in the Winter time had met in the Dassaretian Confines, having sent Ap. Claudius into Thessaly to raise the Siege from before Larissa; because the time was scarce yet seasonable for action, went back into their Winter Quarters, but in the beginning of the Spring join their Forces together, and fell down into Thessaly; Antiochus being then in Acarnania. When they came thither, Philip attack'd Mallœa in Perræbia, and Bibius Phacium. Which when he had made himself Master of upon almost the first assault, he took Phæstus also with the same celerity. After that going to Atrax, he from thence march'd and seiz'd Chiretia and Phricium; and having put Garisons in the several Towns that he was possess'd of, went back again to join Philip at the Siege of Mallœa. Upon the arrival of the Roman Army, whether for fear of their strength, or in hopes of pardon they surrender'd themselves, and then [both Philip and Bibius] went in an united Body to receive those Towns, which the Athamans were possess'd of, and they were these; Aeginium, Ericinium, Gomphi, Silana, Tricca, Melibœa, and Phaloria. From thence they march, and besieged Pellinaum, where Philip of Megalopolis was ingarison'd with five hundred Foot, and forty Horse; but, before they attack'd it, sent a Messenger to Philip, to advise him, that he should not try his utmost force. To which Message he sent back this bold Answer; That he would trust the Romans, or the Thessalians; but would not submit to Philip. So when they saw they must use force; because they believ'd that Limnea might be at the same time attempted, the King thought fit to go thither; but Bibius staid at Pellinaum.

XIV.

It happen'd that at the same juncture, Manius Acilius the Consul, having pass'd the Sea with ten thousand Foot, two thousand Horse, and fifteen Elephants, order'd some particular Tribunes of the Souldiers to carry all the Foot Forces to Larissa; whilst he himself with the Horse came to Philip at Limnea. Upon the Consuls coming they made a Surrender without any more ado; so that the Kings Garison, and with them the Athamans were all deliver'd up. From Limnea the Consul went to Pellinaum; where first the Athamans surrender'd themselves, and after them, Philip of Megalopolis; whom (as he march'd out of the Garison) King Philip, happening to meet him, bad his Souldiers, in contempt, salute by the Title of King; as he himself, with a scoff not suitable to his majesty, when he came up to him, call'd him Brother. Thereupon he was carried to the Consul and committed to custody, being not long after sent Prisoner to Rome. The rest of the Athamans, or of King Antiochus's common Souldiers, that were ingarison'd in the Towns at that time surrender'd, were deliver'd up to King Philip; being three thousand men. The Consul went thence to Larissa, there to consult of the grand affairs of the War. On the rode thither Embassadors from Piera and Metropolis met him with the surrender of their Cities. Philip having used the Athaman Captives especially very kindly, that through them he might oblige that Nation, had hopes of gaining Athamania, and therefore drew his Army thither, having first sent the Captives into their several Cities. And indeed they had great authority with their Countrymen, telling them of the Kings Clemency and Munificence to them. Whereupon Amynder, whose majesty, being present, had kept some of them to their Allegiance, feared, fearing, lest he might be delivered up into the hands of Philip, his old Enemy, and to the Romans, who were then for his revolt very justly offended, with his Wife and Children departed the Kingdom, and went to Ambracia. Thus all Athamania became subject to Philip. The Consul, to refresh his Beasts (most of all) which were tired not only with coming by Sea, but afterward also with travelling, having stayed a few Days at Larissa, renewed, as it were, his Army with some small rest, and then went to Cranon. When he came thither, Pharsalus, Scotussa, Phera, and all the Garrisons in them, that were Antiochus's, were surrender'd to him. Out of which (having ask'd, Who of them were willing to stay with him) he delivered a Thousand Volunteers to Philip, and sent back the rest without their Arms to Demetrias. After that he took Possession of Proerna and the Castles that were about it, beginning then to draw forward into the Malian Bay. When he came near the narrow pass, above which Thaumaci stands, all the Youth, having forsaken the City, in Arms beset the Woods and the Roads, running down upon the Roman Army from the Places above. Thereupon the Consul at first sent certain Persons to parley with and deter them from that their mad attempt; but when he saw that they persisted in it, he sent a Tribune, with the Soldiers belonging to two Ensigns, round about, and intercepting their way back to the City, took it [as it lay] quite empty. Then, when they heard the huzza for the Cities being taken behind them, there was a great slaughter made of those that had been in ambush, as they fled back every way out of the Woods. From Thaumaci the Consul arrived in two Days at the River Sperchius, and march'd thence to plunder the Hepatean Territories.

Whilst these things were transacted, Antiochus was at Chalcis; who seeing even at that time that he had got nothing in Greece but pleasant Winter Quarters at Chalcis, and a dishonourable Wife, began to inveigh against the vain promises of the Ætolians, and to blame Thoas; but to admire Annibal, not only for a prudent Man, but almost a Prophet in all things, which at that time fell out. But yet lest he by his sloth also should destroy what he through his rashness had begun, he sent Messengers into Etolia, to make them assemble with all their Youth in one Body. And now himself also carry'd thither nigh ten Thousand Foot, made up out of those that afterward came out of Asia, and five Hundred Horse. Where seeing that fewer People met, than had ever done before, and that there came only the Nobility with a small number of their Dependants, saying, that they had done all they could to raise as many Men as possible, out of their several Cities, But could not prevail upon such as declin'd the War, either by Authority, good Will, or Command over them; he, being disappointed on all hands, not only by his own Men, that stay'd in Asia, but by his Allies also, who did not perform those things, that they had given him reason to hope for, retired into the Mountains of Thermopyla; which divide Greece into two parts, as the Apennine Hills with their ridge do Italy. From those Mountains of Thermopyla to the Northward lies Epirus, Perræbia, Magnesia, Thessaly, the Pthiote, Acheans, and the Malian Bay; and within the streights to the Southward goes the greater part of Etolia, Acarnania, Locris, Phocis, Bœotia, and the adjacent Island of Eubœa; the Country of Attica Peloponnesus lying behind them upon a promontory, as it were, that runs out into the Sea. Now this ledge of Hills, that reaches from Lencas and the Western Sea through Etolia to the other Eastern Ocean, has so many rough Places and Rocks upon it, that not only Armies, but even single active Men cannot easily find any passage through them. The farthest Mountains toward the East they call Oeta; and of them, the highest Callidromus, under which in the Vale going to the Malian Bay there is a Road not above sixty Paces broad, being the only military way that an Army, if it were not hindred, could be led. For that reason this place is called Pyle, and by others (because there are warm Waters in the very streights) Thermopyla [Pyle, being Gates or narrow Passes, and Thermos, warm in the Greek Language] renowned for the memorable Death of the Lacedæmonians, more than for their fight there against the Persians.

Antiochus, who was not then near so courageous as before, having encamp'd within the Gates of that place, block'd up the pass with fortifications also, and when with a double Bulwark, a Ditch and a Wall too, where the case required it, made of that great quantity of stones that lay thereabout, he had sufficiently secured himself; in confidence that the Roman Army would never make any attempt that way, he sent a party of Ætolians out of four Thousand (for so many were met there) partly to ingarison themselves at Heraclea, which lay before the streights, and partly to Hypata; as being not only assured that the Consul would attack Heraclea, but already inform'd by several People that all the Country about Hypata was laid waste. The Consul having plundered first the Hypatean and then the Heraclean Territories (for the Ætolians assistance signified nothing in either place) encamp'd over against the King in the very streights near the warm Fountains [or Baths]. Both Parties of the Ætolians shut themselves up in Heraclea. Then Antiochus, who, before he saw the Enemy, thought he had sufficiently secur'd and block'd up all Places, was fearful, lest the Roman should find any ways to pass over the Hills above. For there was, not only a report, that the Lacedæmonians formerly were so circumvented by the Persians, but that Philip also of late was so serv'd by the Romans. Wherefore he sent a Messenger to the Æto-

Z z z z.

tolians

XV.

XVI.

lians at Heraclea, [to desire] that they would do him this service at least in that War, to possess themselves of the tops of the Mountains thereabout, and so beset them, that the Romans might not have any way to pass. When this Message came, there arose a dissention among the Ætoli-ans: part of them thinking, that they ought to obey the Kings Command and go; and part, that they had better stay at Heraclea, to try both Fortunes; that whether the King were overcome by the Consul, they might have fresh Forces in a readiness to aid their Neighbour Cities, or, if he got the day, that they might be able to pursue the routed Romans. Both sides not only continu'd in the same mind, but also executed their design: for two thousand staid at Heraclea; and two more divided into three parts, posted themselves upon Callidromus, Rhoduntia, and Tichius, the names of several high Hills.

XVII. The Consul when he saw the upper places possess'd by the Ætoli-ans, sent M. Porcius Cato, and L. Valerius Flaccus, two Consular Lieutenants, with two thousand choice Foot, to the Ætolian Camps; Flaccus to Rhoduntia and Tichius, and Cato to Callidromus: whilst he himself, before he removed his Forces toward the Enemy, call'd an Assembly of his Souldiers, and spoke to them in this manner: *I see there are a great many men of all sorts among you, that serv'd under the Command and Conduct of T. Quintius in this same Province. Now in the Macedonian War there was a pass more insuperable by far at the River Aous, than this is. For these are Gates; and there is (all things being shut up between two Seas) one natural passage, as it were. At that time there were not only Fortifications made in the most convenient places, but stronger than ordinary. The Enemies Army too was then not only more numerous, but likewise somewhat better Souldiers: for in that there were Macedonians, Thracians and Illyrians, all very Warlike Nations: whereas in this there are Syrians and Asiatick Greeks, a pitiful sort of Creatures, born for slavery. That was a Warlike King, and exercised even from his youth in Wars with his Neighbours the Thracians, Illyrians, and all the Inhabitants round about: but this man (to omit all the rest of his life) is such an one, as that, when he was come over out of Asia into Europe to make War against the Romans, he did nothing more memorable in all the time of his Wintering, than that he married a Wife for love, out of a private Family, of obscure Parentage, even among her own Country Folks; and when he was newly married, went forth to War with his belly full of nuptial cheer. His greatest strength and hopes lay in the Ætoli-ans, a vain, ungrateful Nation, as you have formerly, and now Antiochus finds. For they neither met in any great number, nor could they be kept in their Camp; besides that they are now in an uproar: and though they had desired to defend Hypata and Heraclea, yet they secur'd neither, but fled, part of them into the tops of the Mountains, and part shut themselves up in Heraclea. The King himself confessing not only that he durst not come to a pitch'd Battle in plain ground, but not so much as Encamp in any open place, has now left all that Country before him, which he brag'd that he took from us and Philip, and hid himself among the Rocks; being posted, not before the Streights of the Mountains, as 'tis said the Lacedæmonians heretofore were, but quite within them; which is as great an argument of fear in him, as if he had shut himself up in the Walls of some City, to endure a Siege [rather than come out and fight for't. But neither will those streights secure Antiochus; nor those Hills, which they have taken, the Ætoli-ans. There hath care enough been taken of every side, and sufficient provision been made, that nothing should oppose you in the fight but the Foe. Now this you ought to propose to yourselves, that you fight not only for the liberty of Greece (though that were a glorious thing too to deliver Greece (which before we freed from Philip) now from the Ætoli-ans and Antiochus) nor that you are to have only that for your reward which is now in the Kings Camp: but that all those provisions also, that are every day expelled from Ephesus, will be your booty: and that afterward you will open a way for the Roman Empire over Asia, Syria, and all those wealthy Kingdoms that reach as far as the Sun's rising. What then shall we lack of circumscribing our bounds from Gades to the Indian Sea with the Ocean, which encompasses the whole World: and of having all mankind to adore, next to the Gods, the Roman name? For these so great rewards provide you equal minds, so as that to morrow we may, by the help of Heaven engage the Enemy.*

XVIII. The Souldiers being dismiss'd from this Assembly, before they refresh'd themselves, prepar'd their Arms and Darts; and at break of day, when the signal was given for a fight, the Consul marshal'd his men with a narrow Front, according to the nature and narrowness of the place. The King, when he saw the Enemies Ensigns, himself also brought forth his Forces. Part of the Light-Armour he planted foremost before the Bullwark, placing the strength of the Macedonians, whom they call Sarissophori, as a Fortification about the very works. On the left hand of these he set a party of Darters, Archers and Slingers, at the very Foot of the Mountain, to gall the Enemies naked flanks from that higher ground. On the right hand of those Macedonians even to the very end of the Fortifications, where fenny places, that are pathless even to the Sea (being full of clammy mud and quagmires) terminate them, he planted his Elephants with their usual guard, after them the Horse, and then, at a little distance, the other Forces in the second division of his Army. The Macedonians that were placed before the Bullwark, at first were well able to sustain the Roman Force, though they try'd on every side to make their way: being mightily assisted by those, who, from above, with Slings, threw a shower, as it were, of Bullets, Arrows and Darts together at them. But soon after, when the Enemies Force increas'd, and was no longer to be born, being beaten from their ground they retired into their Fortifications. There from from the Bullwark they made almost another Bullwark with their Spears which they held before them. For the height of the Bullwark was so moderate, that it not only afforded a rise for their own men to fight upon, but likewise by reason of their Spears length commanded the Enemy below: insomuch that many of them who came rashly under the Bullwark were run through; and they had either retreated from their vain attempt, or more of them been slain, had not M. Porcius Cato appear'd from the top of Callidromus, after he had forced the Ætoli-ans thence, and kill'd great part of them (for he had surprized many of them before they were aware of him, or when they were asleep) upon an Hill that lay above the Camp.

Flaccus had not the same Fortune at Tichius and Rhoduntia, having in vain attempted to gain those Forts. The Macedonians and the rest that were in the Kings Camp, at first, whilst there appear'd nothing else a far off but a great crowd like an Army; thought the Ætoli-ans had been coming, when they saw the fight at a distance, to their aid. But as soon as the Ensigns and Arms, which nearer at hand they knew, had convinced them of that error, they were all immediately in such a fright, that they threw down their Arms and ran away. Now not only the Fortifications but the narrowness of the Vale through which they must have been pursu'd, hinder'd those that follow'd, but most of all the Elephants being in the Rear; by whom the Foot could scarce pass, but the Horse by no manner of means; their Horses were so scar'd [at them] making a greater disturbance among themselves than in the very Battle. The rising of the Camp too took up some time; yet they pursued the Enemy that day as far as Scarphia. And having kill'd and taken many, on the road, not only Horses and Men, but Elephants also, and slain those they could not take, they return'd to their Camp; which had been attempted that day, in the very time of the fight, by the Ætoli-ans that were Ingarrison'd at Heraclea, though without any success proportionable to their bold attempt. The Consul at the third watch of the night following, having sent the Horse before, to pursue the Foe, at break of day went forward with the Legions. Antiochus was gone somewhat before; as having never stopt in his flight till he came to Elatia: where having gather'd up all the remainder of the fight and flight, went with a very small number of half-arm'd Souldiers to Chalcis. The Roman Horse did not overtake the King himself indeed at Elatia, but they destroy'd great part of his scatter'd men, who staid there, being either tired with marching or wandering up and down, as having fled through unknown ways without any guides to conduct them. Nor did ever a man escape except five hundred that were about the Kings Person, of the whole Army; and but a small number of the ten thousand men, that I told you, Polybius said the King brought over with him into Greece. What if we believe Valerius Antias, who says, that there were sixty thousand Souldiers in the Kings Army, of which forty thousand were slain, and above five thousand taken, with two hundred and thirty military Ensigns? Of the Romans there fell a hundred and fifty in the very Battle, but defending themselves from the Incurion of the Ætoli-ans, not above fifty.

XX. Whilst the Consul led his Army through Phocis and Boeotia, the Cities being conscious of their revolt, stood before their several Gates in the garb of Suppliants, for fear they might be hostilely rifled: but he went on every day as if he had been in an Allies Country without doing any hurt at all, till he came into the Coronean Dominions. The Statue which was set up in the Temple of Minerva Itonæ moved him to passion: and therefore he gave the Souldiers leave to ravage all the Fields about that Temple. But then he bethought himself, that since that Statue had been set up by the common consent of all Boeotia, it was unworthy to be severe upon the Coroneas only: so that having immediately recall'd his Souldiers, he put an end to their plunder; and only chastiz'd the Boeotians in words for their ingratitude toward the Romans from whom they had receiv'd so great and late benefits. Just in the time of the fight ten Ships of the Kings with their Admiral Isidorus stood at Thronium in the Malian Bay. Thither Alexander of Acarnania, who was sick of his Wounds, having fled, as the Messenger of their unfortunate Battle, and therefore those Ships affrighted at the fresh news of such a terrible accident, went thence to Ceneum in Eubœa. There Alexander died and was buried. Three Ships also, which, being come from Asia, were got into the same Port, when they heard of the Armies overthrow, return'd to Ephesus. Isidorus from Ceneum went over to Demetrias, thinking that the King might happily fly thither. At the same time A. Atilius, Admiral of the Roman Navy, met a great deal of provisions belonging to the King, which came over the freight, that lies near the Island of Andrus; drowning some and taking others of the Ships [that brought it.] But those that came last turn'd their course into Asia; whilst Atilius going to Piræus, from whence he came, with the Fleet of Prize-Ships that he had taken, divided a great quantity of Corn, not only among the Athenians, but the other Allies of that Country.

Antiochus a little before the Consuls coming, departed from Chalcis, and first put in at Tenus; going thence to Ephesus. When the Consul came to Chalcis, the Gates were thrown open, since Aristotle, the Kings Prefect, upon his approach, had left the City. The other Cities also in Eubœa were deliver'd up without any contest, and in a few days, when all things were totally settled, the Army was carry'd back, (without the least hurt done to any City) to Thermopylae; being much more commendable for their moderation after Victory;

Victory, than for the Victory it self. Then the Consul sent M. Cato, by whom the Senate and People of Rome should know undoubtedly what was done, to Rome. He from Crensa (which is a Port of the Thespiæ, lying in the inmost part of the Corinthian Bay) went to Patra in Achaia; from whence he Coasted along the shores of Ætolia and Acarnania as far as Coreyra; and so to Hydruntum in Italy. In five dayes from thence he went, at a great rate, by Land to Rome: where entering the City before day, he went from the Gate straight to the Prætor M. Junius: who call'd a Senate as soon as 'twas day. Now L. Cornelius Scipio, who had been sent thither by the Consul some dayes before, when he came and heard that Cato, who got before him, was in the Senate, took him there just as he was telling the news. Thence the two Embassadors, by order of the Senate, were brought into the Assembly [of the People] where they related the same things concerning the affairs in Ætolia, as they had done in the Senate. Thereupon a Supplication was decreed for three dayes; and that the Prætor should make forty of the greater sort of Sacrifices to what Gods he thought good. At the same time also M. Fulvius Nobilior, who two years before went Prætor into the farther Spain, came ovariant into the City: carrying before him of Bigate Silver [i. e. stamp'd with the form of a Chariot] a hundred and thirty thousand pieces; and more than that, twelve thousand pounds of silver Bullion, with a hundred and twenty seven pounds of Gold.

XXII. Acilius the Consul sent before-hand from Thermopyla to the Ætolians at Heraclea; that they should then at least, when they had tried the Kings vanity, repent, and having deliver'd up Heraclea, should think of desiring the Senates pardon, whether for their fury or their error. That there were other Cities of Greece, besides them, which had revolted from the Romans, though they had deseru'd very well of them: but because, after the Kings flight, in confidence of whom they had departed from their duty, they had not added obstinacy to their crime, they were receiv'd into their protection again. So the Ætolians also, though they did not follow, but sent for the King, and had been Leaders not Allies in the War, if they could be penitent, might be safe. To which they answering not a Word, it was manifest that the business was to be done with their Swords in their hands, and that when the King was overcome, the Ætolian War would still remain entire, wherefore he removed his Camp from Thermopyla to Heraclea; and that very day, that he might know the situation of the City, rode round the Walls. Now Heraclea is seated at the Foot of Mount Oeta; but, though it self be in a Plain, has a Castle belonging to it, that stands upon an high place, that is every way a mere Precipice. When he had view'd all that was worth his knowing, he resolv'd to attack the City in four places at once. Toward the River Asopus, where there is also a place for exercise, he set L. Valerius to make works and begin the assault; giving T. Sempronius charge to batter the Castle without the Walls, in which there were full as many, if not more Inhabitants, than in the City. On the side of the Mælian Bay, which affords no easy access, he planted M. Babius; and to the other small River, call'd Melana, over against Dianas Temple, set Ap. Claudius. By the great endeavours of these men, within a few dayes the Towers, Rams, and all other Warlike preparations for the attacking of Cities, were made and finish'd. For as the Country about Heraclea, being all Fenny, and full of tall Trees, supply'd very plentiful materials for all sorts of works, so, because the Ætolians were fled into their Walls, and the Houses in the Skirts of the City were deserted, they afforded not only Rafter and Planks, but Brick also and Mortar, with Stones of different bigness, for several uses.

XXIII. Now the Romans attack'd this City with their works more than their Arms; as the Ætolians, on the contrary, defended themselves with their Arms only. For when their Walls were shaken by the Rams, they did not with Ropes (as it is usual) receive and divert the blows; but fallied out all in Arms, many of them together, and some too with fire in their hands, to throw into the Enemies Works. There were also Arches in the Walls, fit to run out at; which they themselves, when they repaired those parts of the Wall that were knock'd down, made more numerous, that they might fall out upon the Enemy to better purpose. This they did the first dayes, whilst their strength continu'd entire, with all alacrity and in great numbers; but afterward every day fewer and more slowly. For, though though they were prest with many inconveniences, no thing did them so much hurt as watching; the Romans, who had Souldiers enough, succeeding one into the post of another, whilst the Ætolians, being but few, were teaz'd with continual labour, the same persons, several nights and dayes together. For twenty four dayes, in which they never rested from fighting, they work'd perpetually against the Enemy, who attack'd them in four places at once. When therefore the Consul understood that the Ætolians were now tired both by the time, and by the Fugitives that said so, he took this course; In the middle of the night, he order'd his men to retreat, and drawing them off from the Siege, kept them all quiet in his Camp till the third hour of the day: from which time the attack was afresh begun and continu'd till midnight again, being then intermitted till the third hour of the day, as before. Hereupon the Ætolians, supposing the same weariness to be the cause of their omitting the Assault, which had affected themselves also; when the signal was given for a retreat (as though they too had been recall'd by the same sound) went every man of them from their Posts; nor appear'd in Arms upon the Walls before the third hour of the day.

The

XXIV. The Consul having intermitted the attack at midnight, set upon it again at the fourth watch with all his force in three places at once; commanding T. Sempronius to keep the Souldiers on one side intent in expectation of the signal; because he supposed that the Enemy would certainly run all together in a nocturnal tumult to that place, whence they heard the noise come. The Ætolians who were part of them asleep, as tired with labour and watching, with much ado got up: whilst others, who were still awake ran toward the noise of people fighting in the dark; The Enemies endeavour'd partly to get over the ruins of the fallen Wall, and partly with Ladders attempted to get up. In opposition to whom the Ætolians flockt from all parts to assist [their Fellow-Citizens.] One side, in which there were Houses without the City, was neither defended nor opposed: but those that were to attack it, waited very intently for the signal, there being none to defend it. It was now day-light, when the Consul gave the signal: and then without any opposition, partly through the brachies, and partly with Ladders they got over the entire Walls. With that there was a shout heard as when a Town is taken; at which the Ætolians, deserting their Stations, fled from all parts into the Castle. The Conquerors by the Consuls permission, rifled the Town; not so much out of anger, or hatred, as that the Souldiers, who had been restrain'd in so many Cities, that they had taken from the Enemy, might in some one place at last perceive the benefit of gaining a Victory. But having recall'd the Souldiers about noon, he divided them into two Parties; whereof he order'd the one to be led round at the Foot of the Mountain to a Rock (which, being full as high, seems in the middle of the Valley as though it had been broken off from the Castle Hill: but the tops of those two Mountains are so nigh, that from the other Summit you may throw a Dart into the Castle) whilst with the other half the Consul, being to go up from the City into the Castle, waited for the signal from those that were gone about up to the top of the Rock.

XXV. The Ætolians, that were in the Castle, could not endure either the shout of those who had taken the Rock, or, after that, the shock of the Romans from the City, their spirits being now quite daunted; besides, that they had made no farther provisions for holding out the Siege any longer: for their Women and Children, with all the other weak crew were got into the Castle, which was scarce able to contain, much less to defend so great a multitude. Wherefore upon the first Assault they surrender'd themselves. Damocritus, among the rest of the Ætolian Nobility, was one that was deliver'd up: who in the beginning of the War, when T. Quintius desired the Ætolians Decree, whereby they order'd that Antiochus should be sent for, made Answer and said, He would give it him in Italy when the Ætolians had Encamped there. For the sake of his insolence therefore the Conquerors were the more rejoyced at their Victory. At the same time that the Romans attack'd Heraclea, Philip by consent attempted Lamia; having about Thermopyla met the Consul, as he was coming back out of Bæotia, to congratulate both him and the Roman People upon the score of their Victory, and to excuse himself, that being hinder'd by sickness he had not been concern'd in the War. From thence they went several wayes to attack two Cities at once, that lie some seven thousand paces asunder. And because Lamia not only stands upon a Bank, but also looks chiefly to that part of the Country, where the distance seems short, and all things are in view; the Romans and the Macedonians being Antagonists as it were both day and night as well in their works as their fighting, the Macedonians had thus much the greater difficulty, that the Romans attack'd it with Mounds, Galleries and all their works above ground, but the Macedonians under ground with Mines; and in rough places an impenetrable Flint Rock many times resisted their tools. Wherefore seeing that design went but slowly on, the King by the Nobility tempted the Townsmen to surrender the City: being well assured, that if Heraclea were first taken, they would surrender themselves to the Romans rather than to him: and that the Consul would have the opportunity of obliging them in his stead, by raising the Siege. Nor was he deceiv'd in his guess: for immediately their came a Message from Heraclea, as soon as it was taken, that he should abstain from making any farther attempt upon it: For that it was more fit, that the Roman Souldiers, who had fought a pitch'd Battle with the Ætolians, should have the rewards of Victory. So they retired from Lamia, which by the warning it had in the case of Heraclea, a Neighbouring City, avoided suffering of the same thing.

XXVI. A few dayes before Heraclea was taken, the Ætolians having summon'd a Council to Hy-pata, sent Embassadors to Antiochus; among whom Thoas was one, being the same person who was formerly sent. Their Orders were, first, to desire the King, that he would muster up all his Land and Sea Forces, and come again over into Greece: and next, that if he were kept by any business there, that he would send them men and money. That that did not only concern his dignity and honour not to betray his Allies, but conducted also to the safety of his Kingdom, not to let the Romans (who would be void of all care, when they had quite destroy'd the Ætolian Nation) come over with all their Forces into Asia. What they said was true, and therefore it mov'd the King so much the more. Wherefore at present he gave the Embassadors what money was necessary for the uses of the War, affirming that he would send them both Land and Naval Auxiliaries. But he kept one of them there with him, and that was Thoas; who was not unwilling to stay, because he had a mind to be still present to put the King continually in mind of his Promises.

But

XXVII. But the taking of Heraclea at last broke the Ætolians hearts: and therefore a few days after they had sent Embassadors into Asia to renew and excite the King, laying aside all thoughts of a War, they sent Agents to the Consul to desire a Peace. Whom, when they had begun to speak, the Consul interrupted and said, He had other business to mind before theirs; sending them back to Hypata (but granted them a Truce of ten dayes) and L. Valerius Flaccus along with them; and bidding them tell him what they had then a mind to say to him himself, or any thing else that they had to desire. When they came to Hypata, the Ætolian Nobility held a Council at Flaccus's House, consulting, in what manner they ought to apply themselves to the Consul. But when they were going to recount their ancient rights of Leagues, and their deserts toward the Romans, Flaccus bad them not pretend to those things, which they themselves had violated: that a confession of their fault would do them more good, and Speech turn'd all into Petition. For their hopes of safety lay not in their cause, but in the Clemency of the Roman People. That he would assist them, if they behaved themselves like suppliants, both with the Consul and the Senate at Rome: for thither also they must needs send Embassadors. This therefore they all thought the only means for their preservation; To put themselves upon the honour of the Romans. For by this method they should not only lay an obligation upon that people not to hurt them, as suppliants; but should themselves also continue free, if fortune gave them any better prospect.

XXVIII. When they came to the Consul, Pheneas, who was head of the Embassy, made a long Speech, which was so variously compos'd to mitigate the anger of the Conquerour, that at the end of it he said, that the Ætolians committed themselves and all they had to the mercy and goodness of the Romans. Which when the Consul heard, he reply'd, Be sure, Ætolians! that you do so. Then Pheneas shew'd the Decree, in which it was so, expressly, written; whereupon the Consul said, Since you are so resolv'd, I require that you immediately deliver up into my hands Dicaarchus your Fellow-Citizen, and Menetas the Epirote (He was got with a guard into Naupactum, and had tempted that Town to revolt) and Amynder, with the Athaman Nobility, by whose advice you revolted from us. With that Pheneas, standing by him, put in and told the Consul; We do not commit our selves to you as slaves, but for protection; though I am well assur'd, that you through want of knowledge are now mistaken in laying such injunctions upon us, as are not correspondent to the Customs of Greece. To which the Consul made Answer; For that I care not, what the Ætolians think consonant to the Grecian Customs; whilst I, after the Roman fashion, have that command over men that have surrender'd themselves; being conquer'd, now by your own Decree, as before by our arms. Wherefore unless what I order'd be presently done, I now command you to be bound: and with that, he bid his Servants bring thither some Chains, and the Lictors to stand ready about him. Upon which words of his, both Pheneas and the other Ætolians were discouraged, and at last perceiv'd what case they were in. Wherefore Pheneas said, that he and all the Ætolians, there present, knew, they must do as they were bidden; but that, to determine of those things, they must call a Council of the Ætolians. For which he desir'd, they might have a Truce of ten dayes. Upon a motion made by Flaccus on behalf of the Ætolians they had a Truce granted them; and so return'd to Hypata. Where, when, in a Council of their chosen men, whom they call Apocleti, Pheneas had declar'd both what was injoin'd them, and what had like to have befallen them, the Nobility indeed bewailed their condition, but yet thought fit to obey the Conquerour, and summon all the Ætolians out of the several Towns to a general Assembly.

XXIX. When all the Commonalty came together, and heard the same things, they were so exasperated at the severity and indignity of the Injunction, that, if they had been in Peace, they might by that sudden passion have been excited to a War. But their indignation was encreased too by the difficulty of what they were obliged to; For how could they deliver up Amynder, who was a King? As also by the hopes which they had then by chance given them, in that Nicander at that time coming from King Antiochus fill'd the multitude with vain expectations, that both by Sea and Land there were great preparations for a War. He on the twelfth day after he took Shipping, return'd into Ætolia, having perfected his Embassy, and arrived at Phalara in the Malian Bay. From whence when he had carried the money to Lamia, himself with certain of his most active men, toward the Evening, in the Fields that lay between the Roman and the Macedonian Camp, as he was going through wayes, that he knew, to Hypata, fell into the hands of the Macedonians: and was brought to the King before Supper was quite over. Which being told him, Philip, who was concern'd as though a Guest not an Enemy had been come in, bad him lie down and take part of what they had: but soon after having sent away all the rest, kept him there alone, forbidding him to fear any thing. Then he blamed the Ætolians for their ill Counsels, which all return'd upon their own heads: they having first brought the Romans and then Antiochus into Greece. But that he had forgotten things that were past, which might be easier reprehended than corrected, and would not insult over their adversity. That the Ætolians also ought to put an end to their animosities against him; and Nicander particularly be mindful of that day, on which he was by him preserv'd. So, having a Convoy order'd to carry him safe on his way, Nicander came to Hypata as they were consulting about a Peace with the Romans.

XXX. Manius Acilius, having fold or given to his Soldiers the booty about Heraclea, when he heard heard that they were all in disorder at Hypata, and also that the Ætolians flock'd to Naupactum, that thence they might receive the whole flock of the War, sent Ap. Claudius before hand with four Thousand Men to seize the tops of the Mountains, that were hard to pass, and himself got upon Oeta; where he made a Sacrifice to Hercules in that Place, which they call Pyra, because there the mortal Body of that God was burnt. Then marching away with his whole Army, he went the rest of his Journey with ease and speed enough. When he came to Corax (which is a very high Mountain between Callipolis and Naupactum) there many of his Beasts fell headlong, they and their Burdens, out of the Army, and the Men were fore put to it. But it was very obvious to observe, with what a slothful Enemy they had to do, who had not secur'd so rough a pass with any Guard, to hinder any Enemies going that way. He therefore seeing his Army was teaz'd there too, went down to Naupactum; and having set up one Bastion against the Castle, he besieged the other parts of the City, by dividing his Forces according to the situation of the Walls. Nor did that attack cost him less work and trouble than that of Heraclea.

At the same time also Messene in Peloponnesus, for refusing to be of their Council, was besieged by the Achaans. For two Cities, Messene and Elis, were out of the Achaean Council, and joyned with the Ætolians. Yet the Eleans, after Antiochus was driven out of Greece, gave the Achaean Embassadors a milder answer, That dismissing the Kings Guards there they would consider what they ought best to do. But the Messenians having sent the Embassadors away without any answer at all, had rais'd War; and being in a fright upon their own account (now that their Country was burnt all over with a destructive Army, and they saw a Camp pitch'd hard by their City) sent Embassadors to T. Quintius at Chalcis, who was the Author of their liberty, to tell him, That the Messenians were ready both to open their Gates and surrender themselves to the Romans, but not to the Achæans. Having heard the Embassadors, Quintius went immediately from Chalcis to Megalopolis; from whence he sent to Diophanes Prætor [or Stadt-holder] of Achaia, a Messenger, to bid him presently bring back his Army from Messene, and come to him. Diophanes did as he was order'd; and raising the Siege, went himself with all speed before the Army, so as that he met Quintius about Ardania, a little Town between Megalopolis and Messene. Where when he had told the reasons of his besieging Messene, Quintius having given him some gentle correction, That he would dare to do so great a thing without his leave, commanded him to disband his Army, and not disturb that peace which was design'd for a general good; bidding the Messenians, Carry back the banish'd persons, and joyn with the Achaean Council. If they had any thing either at present to except against, or for the future to provide against, that they should come to him at Corinth. Then he commanded Diophanes forthwith to summon him a Council of the Achaans; in which, complaining that the Island of Zazynthus was intercepted by fraudulent means, he required, That it should be restored to the Romans. Now Zazynthus had formerly belonged to Philip King of Macedon, who had given it as an acknowledgment to Amynder for letting him lead his Army through Athamania into the upper part of Ætolia; in which expedition, having broken their hearts, he forced the Ætolians to sue for Peace. Amynder made Philip of Megalopolis Governour of that Island; whither afterward (in the time of the War, wherein he joyned with Antiochus against the Romans) having recall'd Philip to assist him in the management of his affairs, he sent Hierocles of Agigentum as his successor. He, after Antiochus's flight from Thermopyla, and Amynder's being beaten out of Athamania by Philip, sent Messengers of his own accord to Diophanes the Prætor of the Achaans, and for a certain sum of Money delivered up the Island to the Achaans. That the Romans thought ought to be theirs by right of War: for Manius Acilius the Consul, and the Roman Legions, did not fight against Diophanes and the Achaans at Thermopyla. In answer to this, Diophanes one while endeavour'd to clear himself and his Nation, and anon discour'd of the lawfulness of the action. Some of the Achaans not only at first said they abhor'd such a thing, but then also blam'd the Prætors obstinacy; so that by their advice it was decreed, That the whole matter should be left to T. Quintius.

Now Quintius, as he was severe to those that oppos'd him, so, if they would yield, he was very kind. Wherefore omitting all signs of passion either in his voice or face, he told them, Gentlemen! If I thought your having of that Island would be advantageous to the Achæans, I would advise the Senate and People of Rome, to let you have it. But as I see a Tortoise, when he is gathered up into his shell, is secure against all blows; but when he puts forth any part, is obnoxious to injuries, and infirm wherever he is naked; so I do you Achæans, who being enclosed on every side by the Sea, can easily join to you all that is within the limits of Peloponnesus, and defend the same when so united; but as soon as you exceed those bounds out of a greedy desire to grasp at more, all your parts without are naked, and expos'd to every blow. With that all the Council assenting, Diophanes durst no longer oppose it, and therefore Zazynthus was deliver'd up to the Romans.

At the same time King Philip having ask'd the Consul, who was then going to Naupactum, whether he would have him in the mean time retake those Cities, which had revolted from the Roman Alliance; the Consul gave him leave. Whereupon he drew his Forces to Demetrias, being inform'd how great a disturbance there was in that City. For they being disappointed disappointed in all their hopes, when they saw themselves deserted by Antiochus, and that there was no relying upon the Aetolians, they day and night expected the coming either of their Enemy King Philip, or (which would be much more fatal to them (they being more justly incens'd) of the Romans. In that City there was a rude multitude of the Kings men; who having been first a few of them left in Garison, though more came afterward, most of them unarm'd, from an unfortunate Battle, had neither strength nor courage sufficient to endure a Siege. Wherefore Philip having sent certain persons before, to give them hopes of getting their pardon, they made Answer, that their Gates were open for the King. At his first entrance some of the Nobility went out of the City, but Eurylochus kill'd himself. Antiochus's Souldiers (for so they had agreed) were carried through Macedonia and Thrace by a Convoy of Macedonians (lest any one should injure them) to Lyfimachia. There were also some few Ships at Demetrias, commanded by Isidorus; which were with their Admiral in like manner dismissed. Then he took Dolopia, Aperantia, and several Cities of Perrabia.

XXXIV. Whilst Philip did thus, T. Quintius having taken possession of Zacynthus, by order from the Council of Achaia, went over to Naupactum: which had been now attack'd for two Months (but it was very near being taken) and therefore if it happen'd to be taken by force, all the Aetolians in it would questionless be utterly destroy'd. But though he were justly angry at the Aetolians, for that he remembered they were the only people that envy'd his glory, when he deliver'd Greece; besides that they were not at all mov'd by his authority, when, telling them before hand that those things which then had really come to pass, would fall out, he deterr'd them from their mad design; yet thinking it his duty, not utterly to ruine any Nation of Greece, which he himself had freed, he began to walk about the Walls, that he might be the better known to the Aetolians. With that immediately he was discover'd by the first guard, and it was presently noised through all the Town, that it was Quintius. Wherefore the Towns-folks running all to the Walls, held up their hands every one, and with an united cry, call'd out to Quintius, by name, to help and save them. Now at that time, though he was really moved with what they said, yet he made a sign with his hand, that he could not assist them. But when he came to the Consul, Do you not know, said he (Manius Acilius) what we are a doing? or, because you are a provident person, do you think it does not much concern the interest of the Common-wealth? By this he put the Consul into an expectation, which made him say, Well then, why don't you tell me what 'tis? To which Quintius reply'd; Do not you see that you, since you conquer'd Antiochus, have spent your time in attacking of two Cities, till your year is now almost expired: but that Philip, who never saw any Army, nor any Ensigns belonging to an Enemy, has united to himself not only Cities, but even so many Nations now, as Athamania, Perræbia, Aperantia and Dolopia? Now it does not so much concern us to have the Aetolian strength and wealth diminish'd, as it does that Philip should not grow too great; and that you and your Souldiers should not yet have two Cities for the reward of your Victories, whilst Philip has so many Nations.

XXXV. The Consul assented to what he said, but the shame of raising the Siege without any effect, made him hold his tongue; till at last the whole matter was left to Quintius. He therefore went back to that part of the Wall, where the Aetolians a little before had cry'd out; and there, seeing they so heartily desir'd, that he would take pity upon the Aetolians, he order'd some of them to come out to him. Whereupon Phaneas and the rest of the Nobility immediately went forth; and as they lay at his Feet, he told them; Your condition makes me restrain both my passion and my speech. Those things that I foretold are now come to pass: Nor have you so much as this left you, that you may seem not to deserve what you now suffer. Yet I, who am destin'd by a kind of fatality to cherish Greece, will not refuse to do good even to the ungrateful. Send your Agents to the Consul, to desire a Truce that may continue till you can send Embassadors to Rome, by whom you may put your selves into the Senates disposal; I will be your Advocate, and defend you before the Consul. As Quintius directed, so they did; nor did the Consul slight their Embassy; but having given them a Truce till a certain day, on which their Embassy might be dispatch'd from Rome, the Siege was raised and the Army sent into Phocis. The Consul with L. Quintius went over to the Achaian Council at Agium. There they treated about restoring the Eleans and the Lacedemonians that were banish'd: but neither of those businesses came to any Issue: because the Achaens would have it left to their good will, and the Eleans would rather join with the Achaian Council of their own free inclinations than by the direction of the Romans. Then there came to the Consul Embassadors out of Epirus, which was well known not to be true to their Alliance; though they had given Antiochus no assistance. They were also accused to have supply'd the King with money; nor could they themselves deny but they had sent Embassadors to him. To these people therefore, when they desired, that they might contract their former Friendship, the Consul reply'd, that he did not yet know, whether he ought to take them for Enemies or Friends; that the Senate should be the judges of that: for he would refer the whole matter to Rome, and upon that account would grant them a Truce of ninety dayes. The Epirotes sent to Rome, went to the Senate; from whom (having told what acts of hostility they had not done, rather than cleared themselves from what was objected against them) they had such an Answer as might might signifie, they had gain'd their pardon, but not vindicated their innocence. King Philip's Embassadors also were a little before brought into the Senate, to congratulate concerning the Victory: to whom, when they desired, that they might Sacrifice in the Capitol, and set up an offering of Gold in the Temple of Jupiter, the Senate gave permission. Whereupon they presented a Crown of gold of a hundred pound weight. Nor had the Embassadors a civil Answer only; but Demetrius also, Philip's Son, who was an Hostage at Rome, was deliver'd to the Embassadors to be carry'd back to his Father. Now the War which was waged in Greece with King Antiochus by Manius Acilius the Consul was thus ended.

The other Consul P. Cornelius Scipio, who happen'd to have the Province of Gaul, before XXXVI. he went to the War, which he was to wage against the Boii, desired of the Senate, That he might have Money granted him for those Games, which when he was Pro-Prator in Spain, he had vow'd in the very midst of a fight. But he seem'd to ask a thing which was new and unreasonable; wherefore they declared, That, what Games he had vow'd to set forth of his own head, without consulting the Senate, he should perform either out of the Spoils taken in that War, if he had reserv'd any thing for that end, or out of his own purse. P. Cornelius set forth those Plays [or Games] for ten Days together. About the same time the Temple of the Mater magna Idea [i. e. Cybele, Mother of the Gods] was dedicated: which Goddess that same P. Cornelius brought from the Sea side into the Palace when she came from Asia, in the Year that P. Cornelius Scipio, who was afterward surnamed Africanus, and P. Licinius were Consuls. M. Livius and C. Claudius when they were Censors, in the consulate of M. Cornelius and T. Sempronius, had agreed for the building of that Temple, and M. Junius Brutus dedicated it thirteen Years after it was agreed for; and there were Plays made at the dedication of it, which, Valerius Antias says, were the first Stage-Plays, call'd Megalesia. Then also, C. Licinius Lucullus, the Duumvir, dedicated the Temple of Youth in the Circus Maximus [a place for exercise] which M. Livius the Consul had vow'd to build sixteen Years before, the Day that he defeated Asdrubal and all his Army. The same Man, when Censor, set it out to be built, in the Consulship of M. Cornelius and P. Sempronius. At the dedication of this too there were Plays acted; and all things were performed with so much the more religious respect, for that there was then a new War drawing on with Antiochus.

In the beginning of that Year, in which these things were transacted (Manius Acilius XXXVII. being already gone to the War, and P. Cornelius the Consul staying yet at Rome) 'tis said, that two tame Oxen in the [street call'd] Curia, got up by Ladders upon the Tiles of an House. Then the Soothsayers ordered to be burnt alive, and their ashes to be thrown into the Tiber. At Tarracina and Amitemum it was reported, That it several times rained stones. That at Minturnæ the Temple of Jupiter and the Shops about the Forum were burnt by Lightning; and that at Vulturnum two Ships in the mouth of the River were struck with a Thunderbolt and burnt. Upon the account of those Prodigies the Decemviri having consulted the Sibyls Books, declared, That there ought to be a fast proclaimed to Ceres, and that to be observ'd every fifth Year; that a nine days sacrifice must be made; that a Supplication ought to be for one day; that they should supplicate with Crowns on their heads; and that the Consul P. Cornelius should sacrifice to what Gods and with what sacrifices the Decemviri appointed. Having appealed the Gods, not only by a right performance of all Vows, but also by an expiation for Prodigies, the Consul went into his Province, and ordered Cn. Domitius the Proconsul, when the Army was disbanded, to depart thence to Rome, whilst he himself led his Legions into the Country of the Boii.

Much about the same time, the Ligurians, having by their sacred Law mustered up an XXXVIII. Army, in the Night time surprized the Camp of Q. Minucius the Proconsul, who till Day light kept his Men in Battalia within the Bulwark; and carefully watching that the Enemy might not in any part get over his Fortifications, at break of Day, made a sally out at two Gates together. But the Ligurians were not (as he hoped they would have been) repelled by the first effort; for they endured the doubtful conflict above two Hours. At last, when several parties fallied forth one after another, so that fresh Men still succeeded those that were tired into the fight, the Ligurians, who were tired (among other things) with watching, turn'd their backs. There were slain above four Thousand of the Enemy, though, of the Romans and their Allies, not quite three Hundred. Nigh two Months after, P. Cornelius the Consul fought a remarkable pitch'd Battel with the Army of the Boii, in which there were twenty eight Thousand of the Enemies kill'd, as Valerius Antias says, three Thousand four Hundred taken, with one Hundred twenty four Military Ensigns, one Thousand two Hundred and thirty Horses, and two Hundred and forty seven Waggon; whereas there fell, of the Conquerours, only four Hundred eighty four. Now though as to the number we cannot well believe this Writer (because that in enhancing of an account there is no Man more lavish than he is) yet it appears to have been a great Victory; in that, not only their Camp was taken, but the Boii also immediately after that fright surrendered themselves; besides that there was a Supplication ordered by the Senate upon the score of that Victory, and the greater sort of Sacrifices offered.

At the same time M. Fulvius Nobilior, coming out of the farther Spain, made his entry XXXIX. into into

A a a a

into the City Ovant, and brought along with him ten Thousand Pounds of Silver Bullion, of bigate Silver [Itamp'd with a Chariot] one Hundred and thirty [Thousand Deniers] and of Gold one Hundred twenty five Pounds. P. Cornelius, having first taken Hostages from the Boii, mulcted them in almost half their Country, whither, if they pleas'd, the Romans might send Colonies. Then going to Rome, as to a certain Triumph, he dismiss'd his Army, and ordered them to be at Rome upon the Day of his intended Triumph; whilst he himself, the next Day after he arriv'd, having a Senate summon'd upon his account in the Temple of Bellona (when he had discours'd of the exploits that he had done) desired, that he might ride in Triumph into the City. To which P. Sempronius Blasus, Tribune of the People made Answer, That he was of opinion, they ought not to deny Scipio the honour of a Triumph, but only to defer it. That the Ligurian were always join'd with the Gallick Wars: for that those Nations, being near Neighbours, us'd mutually to assist one the other. If P. Scipio, when he had defeated the Boii, had either himself gone over with his Victorious Army into the Ligurian Territories, or had sent part of his Forces to Q. Minucius, who was detain'd there by a doubtful War, now onward of three years, they might have made an end of the War with the Ligurians. But now, that those Souldiers were brought away to attend his triumph, who might have done the Commonwealth great service: and might so still, if the Senate would restore that by deferring the triumph, which they by too much hastening of it had omitted. Wherefore, that they ought to command the Consul to return into his Province, and do what he could to subdue the Ligurians. For till they were totally subjected to the people of Rome, the Boii would not be at rest, nor should they have either perfect Peace or War. That some few months after the Ligurians were conquer'd, the Pro-Consul P. Cornelius, after the example of many, who had not triumph'd in the time of their Magistracy, should triumph.

XL.

To that the Consul said, That he neither had Liguria for his Province, nor had he waged any War with that Nation, nor consequently did he desire to triumph upon their account. That he hoped Q. Minucius in a short time, when he had subdu'd that people, would for that require and obtain a deserved triumph. That he desired to triumph over the Gauls, called the Boii, whom he had conquer'd, and forced from their Camps: and whose whole Country he two dayes after the fight, had taken by Surrender, having likewise brought Hostages from thence as a pledge of future Peace. But that it was a far greater thing [for him to brag on] that he had slain so many Gauls in the Battle; that no General ever before him engaged with so many thousands of the Boii: that above the half of fifty thousand men were slain, many thousands taken, and none left in that Country save old men and Children. So then, could any one admire, why a conquering Army, who had left no Enemy behind them in the Province, should come to Rome to celebrate the Consul's Triumph? Which Souldiers if the Senate had a mind to employ in any other Province, by what means did they think to make them go more readily upon fresh dangerous designs, or new toils; by presently giving them the reward of their past service, or by sending them away with hopes instead of realities; disappointed of their first expectations? For as to himself, he had gotten glory enough for all his life time, that day, whereon the Senate, judging him to be the best man in the City, had sent him to receive the Mater Idæa [i.e. Cybele.] That barely upon this account, though no Consulship, nor any triumph had been added to it, P. Scipio Nasica's Image would be creditable and honourable enough. Thereupon the whole Senate not only themselves consented to Decree him a triumph, but also by their authority forced the Tribune of the People to remit his Intercession. So P. Cornelius the Consul triumph'd over the Boii; carrying through the City, in Gallick Waggon, Arms, Ensigns and spoils of all sorts, with brazen Gallick Vessels, as likewise besides the noble Captives, an Herd of Horses that he took, and golden Chains to the number of fourteen hundred and seventy. Add to these, of gold two hundred forty five pounds, of silver try'd and untry'd, in gallick Vessels, artfully made after their fashion, two thousand three hundred and forty pounds; of Bigates two hundred thirty three thousand. Among the Souldiers, that follow'd his Chariot, he distributed three hundred and twenty five Asles a piece; giving double that to a Centurion, and treble to an Horseman. The next day calling an Assembly, when he had discours'd of his achievements, and of the injury done him by the Tribune, who must needs concern himself with another mans War, to defraud him of the benefit of his Victory, disbanded his men and dismiss'd them.

XLI.

Whilst these things were done in Italy, Antiochus at Ephesus was very secure touching the Roman War, as though the Romans were not like to come over into Asia. Which security great part of his Friends created in him either through error, or flattery. Only Annibal, who, at that time, was a great Favourite of the Kings, said, That he wonder'd more, the Romans were not already in Asia, than he doubted that they would come. That it was nearer to get over out of Greece into Asia, than out of Italy into Greece: and that Antiochus was a far greater cause [of such an Expedition] than the Etolians. Nor were the Romans less powerful by Sea than Land; having long since had an Army about Malea. That he heard, there was new Ships and a new Commander, to carry on the affair, already come out of Italy. Wherefore, that Antiochus should cease to form a Peace by vain hopes within himself: for he must e'r long, in Asia and for Asia, engage both by Land and Sea with the Romans: and either take away their Empire, who aim'd at the Government of the whole World, or lose his own Kingdom. He was the only man that seem'd to foresee and faithfully to foretel what would come to pass. Wherefore the the King himself with the Ships that were ready fitted out, went to Chersonesus; that he might fortifie those parts with Garisons, if the Romans perchance should come by Land. The other part of the Fleet he order'd Polyxenidas to muster up and bring along, sending Scout-Ships to search all places round about the Islands.

C. Livius, Admiral of the Roman Fleet, going out with fifty men of War, failed from Rome to Naples, where he had order'd the open-deckt Ships belonging to their Allies of that Country to meet him, and thence went over to Sicily: and being past through the streights by Messina, after he had received six punick Ships, sent to assist him; and exacted the Ships that were due from the Rhegines, Locrians, and those kind of Allies, he took a survey of the Navy at Lacinium, and went out to Sea. When he came to Corcyra, the first Greek City he arriv'd at, enquiring of the state of the War (for Greece was not yet at perfect Peace) and where the Roman Navy was, when he heard, that the King and Consul were posted near the streights of Thermopylae, but the Navy was at Piræus: thinking it his best way to make hast upon all accounts, he straight failed forward; and having forthwith plunder'd Peloponnesus, Samus and Zazynthus, because they chose formerly to side with the Etolians, he went to Malea, to which having a prosperous Voyage, he in a few days got to the old Navy at Piræus. At Scylla King Eumenes met him with three Ships, after he had been for a long time at Egina, unresolv'd, whether he should return to defend his Kingdom (for he heard that Antiochus was preparing both Naval and Land Forces at Ephesus) or never leave the Romans, upon whose Fortune his own depended. From the Piræus A. Atilius, having deliver'd the twenty five men of War to his Successor, went to Rome. Livius with eighty one beaked Ships, and many more lesser ones, which were either open with Beaks, or without Beaks, were Scoutships cross'd over to Delus.

About that time the Consul Acilius attack'd Naupactum. Contrary Winds kept Livy for some dayes at Delos, that being the most stormy place among the Cyclades, which are disjoint'd from each other sometimes with greater and sometimes with lesser streights. Polyxenidas being inform'd by the Scout-Ships, he had sent to cruise about, that the Roman Fleet stood at Delos, sent Messengers to the King; who, omitting what he was then doing in Hellepont, return'd, as fast as he possibly could, with his Beaked Ships to Ephesus; where he immediately consulted, Whether he should run the hazard of a naval fight. To which Polyxenidas answer'd; That he ought not to be idle; but that he should engage before Eumenes's Navy and the Rhodians join'd the Romans: for by that means they should not be much too disproportionate in number; who were in all other superiour to the Eoc, both as to the swiftness of their Navy, and the variety of their Auxiliaries. For the Roman Ships, as they were cloutery built and immovable, so also, as coming into an Enemies Country, were loaded with provisions; but theirs would have nothing (as leaving all things in peace round about them) excepting Souldiers and Arms: besides that the knowledge of the Sea, Lands and Winds would be of great advantage to them, though they would all be prejudicial to the Enemy, who had no skill in them. The Author of this Counsel moved them every one, and he put his advice in execution too. Having staid two dayes to make provision, the third day, with a hundred Ships (of which seventy were cover'd and the rest open, all of a smaller size) setting out went to Phocæa. There the King having heard that the Roman Navy was at hand, because he resolv'd not to be present at that Naval Engagement, he departed to Magnesia, by Sipylus, to raise Land Forces. The Fleet went to Cyssus, a Port of the Erythraeans, as being a more commodious place for them to stay and expect the Enemy. The Romans, as soon as the Northwinds were fallen (for they had blown for some dayes) made over from Dolus to Phane, a Port belonging to the Chians, lying toward the Aegean Sea: from whence they brought their Ships about to the chief City, and having taken in provisions, went over to Phocæa. Eumenes going to Elæa to his Navy some few days after, with 24. cover'd Ships, and more open ones, return'd a little way from Phocæa to the Romans who were making ready for a Sea fight. So going from thence with 150. cover'd Ships, and almost 50. open ones, they being at first blown toward the shore by contrary North winds, were forced to go in a slender Body almost one a Breast; till when the wind was a little allay'd they endeavour'd to put over into the Port of Corycus, which is above Cyssus.

Polyxenidas, when he heard that the Enemy was at hand, being glad of the opportunity of fighting, himself extended his left Wing into the Sea, bidding his Officers place the right Wing toward the Land, and went forth with an even Front to the fight. Which when the Roman saw, he furl'd his Sails, and lower'd his Masts, and setting his tackling at the same time in order staid for the Ships that came after. They were now almost thirty in Front; with whom that he might match the left Wing, he made all the Sail he could into the main Sea, commanding those that follow'd to plant themselves opposite to the right Wing near the Land. Eumenes brought up the Rear. But when they first began to bustle in removing the tackle, he himself also put the Ships forward with what speed he could. And now they were all in view; when two Punick Vessels went before the Roman Navy, that met with three of the Kings Ships, two of which, as being of an odd number, got about one of the other. First therefore they broke off the Oars from both sides, and then the Souldiers got on Board it; where knocking down and killing the Defendants they took the Ship. The one, that was engaged on even hand, when she saw the other taken, ran back to the Navy before she was circumvented by all three of them at once. Livius inflamed with indignation, bore up to the Enemy with his Admirals Ship. Against whom when those two that had beset the one Punick Ship, came up with the same hopes, he order'd the Rowers to let fall their Oars into the Water on both sides to keep the Ship steady, and to throw harping Irons into the Enemies Ships that were hard by; but when he had made the Fight like to a Land Battle, to remember their Roman Courage, and not think that he led Kings Slaves instead of men. By this means, far more easily than two before took one, than one defeated and seized two Ships. And now the Fleets were thoroughly engaged, so that they all fought pell mell on every side. Eumenes who came last when the fight was begun, when he observ'd that the left Wing of the Enemies was put into a confusion by Livius, himself set upon the right where the fight was equal. Nor was it long before the left Wing began first to fly. For Polyxenidas, as soon as he saw himself unquestionably overcome in point of Courage by the Enemy, immediately hoisted his Top-sails and ran for't as fast as he could, as they also did long after, who were engaged near the Land with Eumenes.

XLV. The Romans and Eumenes, as long as their Men could row, and that they were in hopes of gauling their Enemies Reer, pursued them with great resolution. But when they saw, through the swiftness of the Adversaries Ships, being light, that their own, who were laden with Provisions, could not make way fast enough after them, at last they stopt, having taken thirteen Ships with the Soldiers and Rowers in them, of which they sunk ten. Of the Roman Navy only the Punick Ship, that was encompassed by the two at the beginning of the fight, was lost. Polyxenidas ran all the way till he came to the Port of Ephesus. The Romans turned that Day at that place, whence the Kings Navy came forth; but the next Day made all hast imaginable to pursue the Enemy. About the middle of their Voyage they met twenty five Rhodian Men of War, with Pausistratus their Admiral. So having joyn'd them they followed the Foe to Ephesus, where they stood before the mouth of the Port in Battel array. After they had made the conquer'd confess what they pleas'd, the Rhodians and Eumenes were sent home; but the Romans sailing toward Chius (in the way to which they first passed by Phœnicus, a Port in the Erythrean Dominions) cast their Anchors in the Night, and the next Day went forward not only to the Island but the very City. Where having stay'd some few Days to refresh their Rowers more than any thing else, they went over to Phœcia; and having left there four five bank'd Gallies for defence of the place, the Fleet came to Cana; where, since the Winter was now at hand, the Ships were haled into a Dock, and a Trench with a Bulwark made about them. At the end of this Year there was an Assembly held at Rome, in which there were created for Consuls L. Cornelius Scipio and C. Lælius; all People being intent upon making an end of the War with Antiochus. The next Day the Prætors were created, M. Tuccius, L. Aurunculeius, Cn. Fulvius, L. A. milius, P. Junius, and C. Atinius Labeo.

DECADE IV. BOOK VII.

The E P I T O M E.

1. Lucius Cornelius Scipio the Consul, with his Lieutenant P. Scipio Africanus (who said he would be his Brothers Lieutenant, if he happen'd to have Greece and Asia for his Province, when that Province 'twas thought would be given to C. Lælius, a powerful Man in the Senate) going to wage war against Antiochus, was the first Roman General that ever cross'd the Seas into Asia. 29, 30. Æmilius Regillus fought with good success against the Royal Navy of Antiochus at Myonncsus, assisted by the Rhodians. 37. The Son of Africanus, being taken by Antiochus, was sent back to his Father. 46. Manius Acilius Glabrio triumph'd over Antiochus, whom he had beaten out of Greece, and over the Ætolians. 45. Afterward when Antiochus was conquered by L. Cornelius Scipio, assisted by King Eumenes, Son to Attalus of Pergamus, he had a Peace granted him upon condition, that he would quit all the Provinces on this side the Mountain Taurus. 56. Eumenes, by whose assistance Antiochus was defeated, had his Kingdom enlarged. 56. The Rhodians also, who had likewise lent their aid, had certain Cities given them. 57. There was a Colony carried to Bononia. 58. Æmilius Regillus, who had overcome the Kings Sea Commanders in a Naval Fight, led a Naval Triumph. 58. L. Cornelius Scipio, who made an end of the War with Antiochus, was equaliz'd to his Brother in a surname, being stiled, Asiaticus.

I. NOW that L. Cornelius Scipio, and C. Lælius were Consuls, there was no matter, save what concern'd Religion, debated in the Senate, before, not only the Ætolian Embassadors were themselves urgent touching their Nation, for that they had so short a Day of Truce; but were assisted also by T. Quintius, who was then returned out of Greece to Rome. The Ætolians relying more upon the Senates mercy, than on the merits of their own Cause, behaved themselves with all humility, setting their old good deeds against their new misdemeanours. Yet not only when present were they tired with the Interrogatories made by the Senators round the House (who endeavoured to get out out of them rather a confession of their guilt, than any other answers to their demands) but being likewise commanded to depart the Court, caus'd a great contention in the Senate. In their Cause anger was more prevalent than mercy; for the Senate was not angry with them as Enemies only, but as a savage and an unociable Nation. When therefore they had wrangled for several Days, at last they resolv'd neither to give them nor deny them a Peace; only there were two Conditions proposed to them, to wit, That either they should leave it wholly to the Senate to do what they pleas'd with them; or give them a thousand Talents, and take all the same Nations as the Romans did for their Friends and Enemies. Whereupon when they desired to know, What things they should leave to the Senates Arburement, they received no certain answer. So being dismiss'd without concluding of a Peace, they were commanded to depart the City that same Day, and to be gone out of Italy within fifteen Days after. Then they began to treat about the Provinces of the Consuls, who both desired Greece. Now Lælius was a Man of great Authority in the Senate; who, when the Senate had order'd the Consuls either to cast Lots for it, or to agree between themselves concerning their Provinces, said, It would be more gentile in them to leave the matter to the judgment of the Senate than to chance. To which Scipio made Answer, that he would consider what to do; but having talk'd about it with no Body but his Brother, was bid by him to leave it boldly to the Senate; so that he came back and told his Colleague, that he would do what he thought fit. Now this business either for the novelty of it, or the antiquity of Examples which in that kind were all now quite forgotten, had by the expectation of a fierce debate raised the Senates intention, P. Scipio Africanus said; that if they would decree Greece to be his Brother Lucius Scipio's Province, he'd go his Lieutenant thither. That word was heard with great assent, and decided the controversy; they having a mind to try, whether King Antiochus could find more assistance from Annibal, who was conquer'd, or the Consul and the Roman Legions from Africanus who was the Conquerour: wherefore almost all of them voted that Scipio should have Greece, and Lælius, Italy.

Then the Prætors chose their Provinces; L. Aurunculeius that of the City, Cn. Fulvius the Foreign Jurisdiction; L. Æmilius Regillus the Navy; P. Junius Brutus the Tuscans; M. Tuccius Appulia, and the Bruttii; and C. Atinius Sicily. Afterward to that Consul, who was to have Greece for his Province (besides that Army which he was to receive from Manius Acilius, consisting of two Legions) was given by way of supplement, three thousand Roman Foot, a hundred Horse, five thousand Latine Foot, and two hundred Horse; to which it was farther added, that, when he came into the Province (if he thought it for the interest of the common-wealth) he should carry his Army over into Asia. To the other Consul there was assign'd a perfect new Army, of two Roman Legions, with fifteen thousand Foot, and six hundred Horse of the Latine Allies. Quintius Minucius was order'd (since he had written, that that Province was now absolutely reduced, all the Ligurians having surrender'd themselves) to bring the Army out of Liguria into the Boian Territories, and deliver them to P. Cornelius the Pro-Consul. The City Legions which had been raised the year before, being brought out of that part of the Country, in which the year before he had mulcted the Boii, whom he conquer'd, were deliver'd to M. Tuccius the Prætor, with fifteen thousand Foot, and six hundred Horse out of their Latine Allies, for the defence of Apulia and the Bruttii. A. Cornelius, who the year before was Prætor, and had been with an Army in the Bruttian Territories, was order'd, if the Consul thought fit, to carry the Legions over into Ætolia, and deliver them to Manius Acilius: if he would stay there. But if Acilius would rather return to Rome, that A. Cornelius should remain in Ætolia with that Army. They farther order'd, that C. Atinius Labeo should receive the Province of Sicily, and his Army from M. Æmilius, and raise out of that very Province, if he pleas'd (as a Supplement) two thousand Foot, and a hundred Horse. P. Junius Brutus was to raise a new Army for Tuscany, consisting of one Roman Legion, ten thousand Latine Foot, and four hundred Horse: and L. Æmilius, who had the Sea Province was order'd to take twenty long Ships and his Seamen of M. Junius who was Prætor the year before, himself to raise a thousand Seamen, and two hundred Foot: and to go with those Ships and Souldiers into Asia, and receive the Navy from C. Livius. The two Spain and Sardinia were continu'd for another year in the hands of those that had them, to whom also the same Armies were allotted. There were two Tithes of Corn exacted that year from Sicily and Sardinia; whereof the Sicilian Corn was order'd to be carry'd to the Army in Ætolia; and the Sardinian, partly to Rome, and partly into Ætolia, as the Sicilian was.

Before the Consuls went into their Provinces, they thought fit to have certain Prodigies expiated by the High-Priests. At Rome the Temple of Juno Lucina was burnt with Lightning, so that the Roof and the Doors of it were defaced. At Puteoli the Wall and Gate were struck in many places with a Thunderbolt, and two men kill'd. At Nursia 'twas well known, that in a clear day there arose a storm; and that there also two Freemen were kill'd. The Tusculans said, that it rained Earth with them: and the Reatiners, that a Mule brought forth in their Territories. These therefore were expiated: and the Latine Ferie [a time of Sacrificing in memory of a League between the Latines and the Romans] celebrated; for that the flesh [a portion of the sacred Feast] which should have been given to the Lan-

II.

III.

ventes

ventes [a people concern'd in the same affair] had not been distributed to them. There was also a Supplication ordain'd upon those religious accounts; concerning which the Decemviri directed out of their Books, to what Gods it should be made. Ten ingenuous Youths, and as many Virgins, who had all of them their Fathers and Mothers still alive, were to be present at that Sacrifice: and the Decemviri made it in the night time with suckling Beasts [as Lambs, Calves, &c.] P. Cornelius Scipio Africanus, before he went, set up an Arch in the Capitol over-against the way that leads up thither, with seven gilded Ensigns, two Horses, and two marble Cisterns before it. At the same time forty three of the Ætolian Nobility (of whom Damocritus and his Brother were two) being brought to Rome by two Regiments sent by Manius Acilius, were put into the Lautumie [Stone-quarries; a Prison, where they were bound to dig and cut stone.] Then the Regiments return'd to the Army, by order of L. Cornelius the Consul: and Embassadors came from Ptolomy and Cleopatra, who reign'd over Egypt, to congratulate with Manius Acilius, for his having (when Consul) expelled Antiochus out of Greece; and to desire the Senate, that they would send an Army into Asia; for that all things were in a confusion, not only in Asia, but in Syria too. That the King of Egypt would be ready to do whatever the Senate should resolve upon. The Senate return'd the King thanks; and order'd the Embassadors to be presented, each one of them with four thousand Asses [a sort of Roman Coin.]

IV. L. Cornelius the Consul, having perfected what he had to do at Rome, gave order in a publick Assembly; that all the Souldiers, which he himself had raised as a supplement [to the other Forces] and those that were in the Bruttian Territories with A. Cornelius the Pro-Prator, should all meet upon the 13th of July at Brundisium. He likewise nominated three Lieutenants; Sex. Digintius, L. Apustius, and C. Fabricius Luscinus, to muster up the Ships from all the Sea Coast thereabout to Brundisium: and when all things were now ready, went from the City in his Warlike garb. There were five thousand Volunteers, of Romans and their Allies, who had been discharg'd from the Wars under their General P. Africanus, but now attended upon the Consul at his going forth, and gave in their names. At the same time that the Consul march'd to the Wars, upon the day that the Games were celebrated in honour of Apollo, which was the 9th of July, when the Sky was clear, and in the day time the Heavens were darken'd by the Moon going under the Orb of the Sun [and Eclipsing it.] L. Æmilius Regillus also, who happen'd to have the command of the Fleet, went away at the same time. L. Aurunculeius was employ'd by the Senate, to build thirty Gallies of five Banks, and twenty of three; because there was a report, that Antiochus, since the last Sea-fight, was setting out a Navy somewhat bigger [than before.] The Ætolians, before their Embassadors brought word back from Rome, that there was no hopes of peace (though all their Sea-Coast toward Peloponnesus was ravaged by the Acheans) being more mindful of their danger, than their loss, to intercept the Romans passage, possess'd themselves of the Mountain Corax. For they did not question, but, in the beginning of the Spring, they would return to attack Naupactum. But Acilius, who knew that was expected, thought it better to undertake an Enterprize unlookt for, and besiege Lamia; which was not only reduced almost into a desperate condition by Philip, but then also, for that very reason, because they fear'd no such matter, might be easily surpriz'd. He therefore marching from Elatia Encamped first in the Enemies Country about the River Sperchius: from whence he remov'd in the night, and at break of day invest'd the Walls with Souldiers quite round.

V. Their fear and consternation, as in case so unexpected, was very great: yet they that day defended their City with more resolution than any one could believe they would have done, the Men fighting upon the Walls, (against which there were Ladders set in many places) and the Women bringing Weapons of all sorts and Stones [for them to throw down upon the Foe.] Acilius, having given the signal for a retreat, led his men back about the middle of the day into his Camp; where, when they had refreshed their Bodies with Victuals and sleep, before he dismiss'd the Council of War [held in his own Tent] he gave them charge, to be ready arm'd before day; and said, that he would not bring them back into the Camp before they had taken the City. So making his attack at the same time as he did the day before in several places, seeing the Townsmen strength, Weapons, and, above all, their hearts, failed them, he in a few hours took the City. In which having partly sold and partly divided the Booty [among his men] he held a Consult to advise what he next should do. They were none of them for going to Naupactum, since the Woods at Corax were taken up by the Ætolians. Yet, that they might not be idle all the Summer, and lest the Ætolians should gain that Peace by his delays, which they could not obtain of the Senate, Acilius resolv'd to attack Amphissa. Accordingly the Army was led from Heraclea, through Oeta, thither. Where having Encamped near the Walls, he began to attack the City, not by investing it quite round, as he did Lamia, but with works. He planted his battering Rams against it in several places; whereby when the Walls were shaken, the Townsmen did not offer to provide or think of any thing against such a sort of Engines: but all their hopes were in their Arms and audacity; so that by frequent eruptions they put not only the several parties of the Enemy [that were posted here and there] but those also that were about the Works and Engines into disorder.

cessor,

VI. But for all that the Wall was beaten down in many places, when news came, That his Successor, who had landed an Army at Apollonia, was coming through Epirus and Thessaly. The Consul came with thirteen Thousand Foot, and five Hundred Horse, and being now arriv'd in the Malian Bay, sent certain Persons before him to Hypata, to demand a surrender of that City; but they making answer, That they would do nothing without the common consent of all the Ætolians, he, lest the siege of Hypata should detain him, before Amphissa was yet taken, dispatch'd away his Brother Africanus first, and himself marched after him to Amphissa. A little before their coming, the Townsmen, leaving the City (for it was now great part of it destitute of Walls) ran all of them, arm'd and unarm'd, into their Cattle which was impregnable. The Consul encamped about six Thousand Paces from it, whither the Athenians sent Embassadors, first to P. Scipio (who went before, as I told you, with a Body of men) and then to the Consul, to beg pardon for the Ætolians. They received a mild answer from Africanus, who designing an occasion honourably to quit the Ætolian War, had an eye upon Asia and Antiochus; and therefore had the Athenians perswade, not only the Romans, but the Ætolians too, to prefer Peace before War. Thereupon immediately, by advice of the Athenians, came an Embassy of the Ætolians from Hypata, whose hopes of Peace were increased by what Africanus, to whom they made their first application, said, to wit, That many Nations, first in Spain, and then in Africa, put themselves under his protection; and that in all cases he had left behind him greater testimonies of his Clemency and Bounty, than of his Warlike Achievements. But though by what he said to him their business seem'd already done, yet when they went to the Consul, he gave them the same answer, whereby they had been frighted from the Senate. Whereupon the Ætolians being surpriz'd at it as a new thing (for they saw they were ne'r the better either for the Athenian Embassy, or the mild answer of Africanus) said, They would tell their fellow Citizens [what the Consul said].

VII. So they return'd to Hypata, but the Inhabitants could not tell what to do in the case, being neither able to raise a Thousand Talents; and fearing [on the other hand] lest, if they should leave all to the free disposal [of the Romans] they would be very severe to them. Wherefore they order'd the same Embassadors to return to the Consul and Africanus, and desire, That, if they really design'd to grant them a Peace, and not only to make a shew of it (thereby to frustrate the hopes of a miserable People) they would either remit somewhat of the sum required, or order them to leave all to the Romans, except the power to dispose of their fellow Citizens Bodies. But they could not prevail with the Consul to make any alteration, and so that Embassy also was dismiss'd without any effect. Then the Athenians also follow'd, the chief of their Embassy being Echedemus, who restor'd the courage of the Ætolians (after they had been wearied with so many repulses, and so long bewailed, with vain lamentations, the fortune of their Nation) by advising them to desire a Truce of six Months, that they might send Embassadors to Rome. For delays [he said] would add nothing to their present misfortunes, as being already the most extream that could be; but present miseries might be eased in many cases by tract of time. According to Echedemus's Counsel the same Men were sent, who, applying themselves first to P. Scipio, gain'd of the Consul by his means a Truce for that time which they desired; and so raising the siege of Amphissa, M. Acilius, having delivered the Army to the Consul, departed out of the Province. The Consul, from Amphissa, return'd toward Thessaly, that through Macedonia and Thrace he might go into Asia; at what time Africanus told his Brother, L. Scipio, The way you take I also approve, but that depends wholly upon the pleasure of Philip; who, if he be true to our Empire, will not only give us leave to march through his Country, but will also supply us with Provisions and all things necessary for an Army in such a long journey; though if he fails us, you'll have no safe passage through Thrace. Wherefore I think it the best way first to try how the King stands affected, which may be most effectually done, if he that you send takes him before he is prepared what to say. T. Sempronius Gracchus, far the sharpest young Man they then had, being chosen out for that affair, went with incredible speed, upon Horses laid in the way on purpose, from Amphissa (for thence he was sent) in three Days to Pella. The King was at a Feast, where he had drank very hard; and that unbending of his mind removed all suspicion that he intended to make any innovation. So the stranger was then very courteously entertain'd, and the next Day saw all sorts of Provisions very kindly made ready for the Army, Bridges built over the several Rivers, and the Ways, where they were difficult to pass, mended. Which when he had observ'd, he return'd with the same celerity that he came, and met the Consul at Thannaci. Thereupon the Army being fill'd with more certain and greater hopes, came into Macedonia, where all things were prepar'd ready for them. At their arrival the King receiv'd and entertain'd them according to his Dignity. For he was a Man of good address and great humanity, which to Africanus seem'd very commendable qualities; that he, as he was excellent in other things also, so should not be averse to Hospitality as far as it was free from Luxury. By this means they travelled not only through Macedonia but Thrace too, where Philip attended and prepared all necessaries for them, till they came to the Hellefpont.

VIII. Antiochus, after his Sea Fight at Corycus, having had the whole Winter free for his Land and Naval Preparations, had been most intent upon repairing of his Fleet, lest he might have have been driven out of the whole possession of the Sea. He remembered, That he was overcome, even when the Rhodian Fleet was absent; wherefore if that too (and the Rhodians to be sure would never stay away a second time) should happen to be present at the fight, he should lack a great number of Ships to equal his Enemies Fleet in strength and bigness. He therefore sent Annibal into Syria to fetch the Phœnician Ships, and order'd Polyxenidas, by how much the more unsuccessful they had been, to be so much the more diligent, not only in repairing those that were left, but in preparing others also. He himself Winter'd in Phrygia; sending for Auxiliaries from all the Countreys round about; yea even into Gallagracia, whereof the Inhabitants at that time were very Warlike, as still retaining their Gallick Courage, before the native briskness of their Nation was worn out. He had left his Son Seleucus in Æolis with an Army to keep in awe the Cities on the Sea Coast, which Eumenes from Pergamus on the one hand, and the Romans from Phœcia and Erythra, on the other solicited [to revolt.] The Roman Navy, as I told you before, winter'd at Cane: whither King Eumenes came about the middle of Winter, with two thousand Foot, and a hundred Horse: and by saying, that a great booty might be driven out of the Enemies Country about Thyatira, perswaded Livius to send five thousand men along with him; who in a few dayes brought thence a vast quantity of plunder.

IX. At this juncture there arose a sedition at Phœcia, by means of some who strove to reconcile the minds of the multitude to Antiochus. The Wintering of the Ships was grievous to them, and so was the tribute they were to pay of five hundred Gowns, and as many Tunicks: besides, that the scarcity of Corn lay heavy upon them, by reason whereof the Ships and Garison of the Romans were gone thence. And then the Faction, which endeavour'd, in their Assembly, to draw the multitude over to Antiochus, was deliver'd from all fear. The Senate and the Nobility [of the place] thought it their duty to continue in their Alliance with the Romans; but the Authors of the revolt prevailed most upon the multitude. The Rhodians, the more idle they had been the Summer before, the sooner, that Spring, sent out the same Pausistratus Admiral of their Navy with thirty six Ships. At this time Livius having set forth from Cane with thirty Ships, and seven four bank'd Gallies, which King Eumenes had brought along with him, was going toward Hellepont, that he might prepare all things necessary for the passing over of the Army which he thought would come by Land. He touch'd first at the Port called the Acheans Port; from whence he went up to Ilium, and having sacrificed to Minerva very kindly, gave Audience to the several Embassies that came from Eleus, Dardanus and Rhæteum, to surrender their Cities into his hands. From thence he sail'd to the streights of Hellepont, and having left ten Ships in Harbour over against Abydus, he went over with the rest of his Fleet into Europe to attack Sestos. Where as the Souldiers were just under the Walls, the inspired, Fanatick Galli [Priests of Cybele] first of all, in a solemn habit, met them before the Gate, and said, that by order of the Mother of the Gods, they, her Servants, came to desire the Roman, that he would spare their Walls and City. Never an one of them had any violence offer'd to him: and soon after the whole Senate, with the several Magistrates, came forth to surrender their City. From thence the Navy was carried over to Abydus; where when, after several Conferences past to try their disposition, the Inhabitants gave no peaceable Answer, the Romans made themselves ready for the attack.

X. Whilst these things were transacted in Hellepont, Polyxenidas, the Kings Admiral (who was a banish'd Rhodian) having heard, that the Fleet of his Country was gone from home, and that Pausistratus, their Admiral, had said some things with pride and contempt concerning him in publick, conceiving a great indignation against him, thought of nothing else either day or night, than how he might by actions confute his huffing words. In order whereunto he sent a Man that he well knew, to tell him, not only that he would do Pausistratus, as well as his Country (if he might) great service: but also, that it was possible for him to be restored by Pausistratus to his Country. Whereupon though Pausistratus wondering ask'd, how that could be, yet he promised the person that propos'd it, either to do the thing for their common benefit, or to conceal it. With that the Messenger told him, that Polyxenidas would betray all the Kings Navy, or most part of it, to him. And that he desired no other reward for so great a service, than to return into his Country. The greatness of the thing caus'd him neither to credit nor despise what the man said: so that he presently went to Panormus in Samus, and there staid to inquire into the thing propos'd to him. Messengers came to and again; but did not Pausistratus believe it, before Polyxenidas wrote with his own hand, in presence of his Messenger, that he would do what he had promis'd; and sent the Letter sealed with his own Seal. Thereupon Pausistratus thought that the Traytor was sworn, as it were, to him by that pledge; for he could not imagine, that a man, who lived under the King, would be such a Fool, as to give a testimony under his own hand against himself. By this means the method of the pretended treachery was contrived. Polyxenidas gave out, that he would omit all preparations whatever; that he would not have Rowers, nor Seamen enough for the Navy: that he would, for a show, take up some of the Ships under a pretence to refit them, and send others into the Neighbouring Ports, but would keep some few before the Port of Ephesus, where-withall (if occasion were) to engage the Enemy. Now the same neglect that Pausistratus heard, Polyxenidas:

nidas would be guilty of in his Navy, he himself immediately shew'd: sending part of his Ships to Halicarnassus to fetch provisions, and part of them to the City of Samus, that he might be ready, whenever he received the signal of action from the Traytor. Polyxenidas to increase his error by a fair pretext, takes up some of the Ships, and mended the Docks, as though he resolv'd to do so by the rest: sending for Rowers out of his Winter-Quarters, not to Ephesus, but privately, to Magnesia.

It happened that a Soldier belonging to Antiochus, being come to Samus upon private business, was taken for a Spie and carried to the Admiral at Panormus. To whom, demanding of him, What they did at Ephesus, he (whether for fear or out of disaffection to his own Countrymen) told the whole truth of the matter; that there was a Fleet stood ready in the Port; that all the Rowers were sent to Magnesia near Sipylus; that some very few Ships were taken up and the Docks cover'd; and that the Naval Affairs were never better managed. But Pausistratus's mind, being prepossess'd with error and vain hopes, made him give no credit to this relation. So Polyxenidas, having got all things in sufficient readiness, sent in the Night time for his Rowers from Magnesia; and having brought down, with all speed, those Ships that he had taken up (when he had spent the Day not so much in necessary preparations as with a design not to have the Fleet to be seen at its setting out) he went out after Sun-set with seventy Men of War, and, though the Wind were against him, before Day got into the Port of Pygela. Where when he had rested all Day, for the same reason as before, he in the Night put over to the nearest part of Samus. From whence when he had order'd Nicander an Arch-pirate to go with five Men of War to Palinurus, and thence to carry the Soldiers, the nearest way he could, to Panormus rereward of the Enemy, he himself in the mean time, dividing the Fleet (that he might make sure of the entrance into the Port on both sides) made toward the same place. Pausistratus at first, being a little disturb'd at such a surprise, but soon after, like an old Soldier, recovering his Courage, thought the Enemy might be better kept off by Land than by Sea, and therefore led his Men in two Bodies to those Promontories, that, with two horns (as it were) running into the Sea, make the Port, supposing that from thence he should with his darting Weapons easily remove the Foe. But Nicander, who was sent by Land, having spoiled their project, he immediately altered his resolution, and bad them all get on board the Ships. With that both the Soldiers and Seamen too were in a great consternation, and fled, as it were, into their Ships, when they saw themselves circumvented both by Land and Sea too. Pausistratus thinking it the only means to save himself, if he could make way through the Ports mouth, and break out into the main Sea, after he saw that his Men were all on board, bad the rest follow, whilst he, in the head of them, rowing briskly on, bore up toward the entrance of the Port. When his Ship was now just going out at the Ports mouth, Polyxenidas set him with three five-bank'd Gallies, by whose beaks he was split and sunk, his Men being kill'd with Weapons that were thrown upon them, among whom Pausistratus also, whilst he fought with great briskness, was slain. For the rest of the Ships, some were taken before, some of them in the Port, and other some by Nicander, as they were putting off from the Shore. Only five Rhodian Ships, with two Coans, escaped, making their way for fear of the blazing flames through the midst of the Fleet. For the Ships carry'd before them, upon two long Poles that stuck out from their Prowes, in Iron Pans, a great deal of Fire. The Erythraean Gallies of three banks, having met the Rhodian Ships, whom they came to assist, not far from Samus, turn'd their course into Hellepont to the Romans. About the same time Seleucus took Phœcia by the treachery of the Sentinels, who open'd one of the Gates to him; so that Cyme, and other Cities upon the same Coast, revolted to him for fear.

Whilst these things past in Æolis, Abydus, having for several Days held out the Siege (the Kings Men defending the Walls thereof) now that they were all tired, and by the permission too of Philotas, who was Governour of the Garrison, their Magistrates treated with Livius concerning terms of surrendering their City. Now that matter was the longer in agitation, for that they could not agree, whether the Kings Men should march out with or without their Arms; so that, whilst they were discoursing of it, news came of the defeat of the Rhodians, and made them quit the debate. For Livius, fearing lest Polyxenidas, proud of his success in so great an action, should surprise the Navy that was at Cane, strait left the Siege of Abydus and gnarding of Hellepont, to lance those Ships that were taken up into the Docks at Cane. Eumenes also came to Elex, whilst Livius with all his Fleet, to which he had joyned two Mitylanean three-bank'd Gallies, sail'd toward Phœcia. Which when he heard was holden by a strong Garrison belonging to the King, and that Seleucus's Camp was not far off, having ravaged the Sea Coast, and put the booty, consisting chiefly of Men, as fast as he could on board the Ships, staid only so long, till Eumenes with his Fleet overtook him, and then sail'd for Samus. The Rhodians, as soon as they heard of the defeat [of their Countrymen] were at first both affrighted, and very much grieved. For, besides the loss of Ships and Soldiers, they had lost all the flower and strength of their Youth, many Noblemen having followed, among other things, the authority of Pausistratus, which with his own Country was deservedly very great. But soon after, for that they were circumvented by fraud, and that especially by a Citizen of their own, their grief turned into fury. Wherefore they immediately sent forth ten Ships, and, in a few days after, ten more, under the command of Eudamus, whom, though he were not equal to Paustistratus for his other Warlike Virtues, they believ'd would be as much more cautious as he had less Skill and Courage. The Romans and King Eumenes went with their Fleet first to Erythra, where having tarried one Night, the next Day they got to Corycum a Promontory near Teios; from whence, being willing to cross over to the nearest Port of Samus, they staid not for the Suns rising, by which the Mariners might have observed the state of the Heavens, but put themselves upon the hazard of a tempest. For in the midway, the Wind standing full North, they were tost in a storm.

B b b b b

vented

XIII. Polyxenidas supposing that the Enemy would go to Samus, to join the Rhodian Fleet, set out from Ephesus, and touch'd first at Myonessus: from whence he went over to an Island called Macris, that there he might have an opportunity to set upon any stragling Ships (if any such there were) as the Navy went by, or upon their Reer at least. When he saw their Navy was dispers'd by the storm, he at first thought that a good occasion to attack them, but a little after (the Wind rising, and rowling still much greater Waves upon them) seeing he could not come at them, he went over to the Island of Aethalia; that he might, next day, meet the Ships that were going to Samus. A small party of the Romans came, as soon as it was dark, into the Port of Samus, then empty; and the rest of their Fleet having been tost on the Ocean all night, put into the same Port. There, having intelligence from the Country People, that the Enemies Fleet lay at Aethalia, they held a Council to advise, whether they should engage them presently, or stay for the Rhodian Fleet. Thereupon deferring the business (for so it was resolv'd) they put over to Corycum, from whence they came. Polyxenidas also, having staid to no purpose; return'd to Ephesus. Then the Roman Ships, when the Sea was free from Enemies, went over to Samus; whither the Rhodian Fleet, after a few dayes, likewise came. For which that it might appear they waited, they sailed immediately for Ephesus, either to have an Engagement, or that, if the Enemy declined fighting (which was a thing of great importance in respect to the apprehensions of the several Cities) they might force from them a confession of their fear. So they stood, with their Ships set all a Breast in Battalia, fronting the Ports mouth. But seeing that no body came to oppose them, they divided the Navy, and, part of them, rode at Anchor in the entrance of the Port, whilst the rest put their men ashore: Upon them, as they were carrying a vast booty out of the Country (which they had plunder'd far and near) Andronicus a Macedonian, who was ingarison'd at Ephesus, made a sally out just when they came up to the Walls, and having taken great part of their booty away, forced them to fly back to their Ships. The next, having laid an Ambuscade about half way, the Romans, to draw the Macedonian out out of his Walls, march'd up in a body to the City. But that very suspicion having deter'd the [Ephesians] from coming out, they return'd from thence to their Ships: and since the Enemy declined fighting both by Sea and Land, the Fleet went back to Samus, from whence it came. Thence the Prætor sent two three-bank'd Gallies belonging to the Allies out of Italy, and two Rhodians of the same built, with Epicrates for their Admiral, to defend the strait of Cephalenia; which Hybristias of Lacedæmon, and the Cephalenian Youth then infested with Piracy, inasmuch that the Sea was now unpalsable to Ships that had any business to or from Italy.

XIV. At Piræus Epicrates met L. Æmilius Regillus, who succeeded to the Command of the Navy; and hearing of the Rhodians misadventure (since he himself had no more than two five-bank'd Gallies) took Epicrates and his four Ships along with him into Asia. But the open-deck'd Ships of the Athenians too follow'd after. He went over through the Ægean Sea. Timisicrates of Rhodes came thither too at midnight with two four-bank'd Gallies from Samus: and being brought to Æmilius, said, he was sent as a guard; for that the Kings Ships infested the Merchant-men upon that Coast by their frequent excursions from Hellefpont and Abydus. As Æmilius went over from Chius to Samus, two Rhodian four-bank'd Gallies, that were sent by Livius, and King Eumenes, with two five-bank'd Gallies, met him. When he came to Samus, having receiv'd the Fleet from Livius, and done Sacrifice (as is usual in such cases) according to order, he call'd a Council: in which C. Livius (for he was first ask'd his opinion) said, That no man could give more faithful advice than he, who perswaded another to that, which, if he were in the same station, he himself would do. That he had an intention to go with the whole Fleet to Ephesus, and take along with him certain Merchant-Ships laden with a great quantity of Balaft, which he would have sunk in the Ports mouth. And that to make such a Blockade there was so much the more easy, because the entrance into that Port was, like a River, long and narrow, and shallow. That by so doing he should have deprived the Foe of the use of the Sea, and have made their Fleet of no value to them.

XV. But his opinion pleas'd never a man of them. Whereupon King Eumenes demanded of him; What he would have done after he had drown'd his Ships, and so stop'd up the passage? Whether with his Fleet, then free, he would have gone away to assist his Allies, and terrified the Enemy? or would notwithstanding with his whole Navy have kept about the Port? for whether they went away, who doubted but the Enemy might have drawn up the sunk Balaft, and with less trouble have open'd, open'd, than he had stop'd up the Port? or if they must still stay there, what signified their shutting up the Port? But on the contrary, the Enemy would be at quiet all the Summer, in a safe Harbour, amidst all the enjoyments of a rich City, to which Asia supply'd all kind of necessaries; and the Romans in the wide Sea, exposed to Waves and Tempests, would be upon continual duty, and lack all sorts of provisions; themselves more tied and obstructed for doing what they had to do, than they could hinder the Enemy. Eudamus, Admiral of the Rhodian Fleet, shew'd, that that opinion displeas'd him more than he declared his own. Epicrates the Rhodian was of opinion, that, letting Ephesus for the present alone, they ought to send part of the Ships into Lycia; and to make Patara, the chief City of that Country, their Ally: for that would be of good consequence upon two accounts: Not only, that the Rhodians, when the Nations opposite to their Island were at quiet, might with all their Forces mind nothing else but the War against Antiochus; but that the Navy, which was then arising in Lycia, might be intercepted from joining Polyxenidas. This opinion took most, though they agreed that Regillus should advance with the whole Fleet to the Port of Ephesus, to put the Enemy in a fright.

XVI. C. Livius with two Roman Gallies of five banks, four Rhodian Gallies of four banks, and two open Smyranean Ships was sent into Lycia, being ordered first to go to Rhodes and to communicate all Counsels with them. The Cities, that he pass'd by, Miletus, Myndus, Halicarnassus, Cnidus, and Cous, did what he commanded with all diligence. When he came to Rhodes he told them what he was sent about, and at the same time advis'd with them. They all approv'd of what he said, and therefore he, taking along with him three four-bank'd Gallies besides the Fleet which he already had, sail'd to Patara. At first a prosperous Gale carry'd them to the very City, and they hoped by a sudden terror to make some disturbance; but afterward, when the Wind was turn'd, and the Sea began to boil into a storm, they with much ado indeed made the Land; but neither was there any station about the City secure, nor could they lye in the Sea before the Enemies Ports, it was so rough, and the Night so near at hand. When they were past the Walls, they went to the Port of Phœnicus which lyes from thence about two Thousand Paces, and secures Ships from the force of the Sea. But there were high Rocks also above it, which the Townsmen (taking the Kings Soldiers, whom they had in Garrison there along with them) got possession of. Against whom Livius (though the Places thereabout were steep and hard to get out of) sent the Istæan Auxiliaries, and the nimblest of the Smyranean Youth. They, whilst with Darts at first, and light Excursions (having but a few to deal with) rather provoked than engaged the Foe, endur'd the conflict. But when there came more flocking from the City, so that all the multitude was now in view, Livius began to fear, Lest the Auxiliaries might be circumvented, and that the Ships also might be in danger from the Land: Wherefore he drew forth to the Battel, not only his Soldiers, but Seamen too (a company of mere Tarpawlines) with what Arms each of them could get. Then likewise the Fight was doubtful; nor were several Soldiers only, but L. Apustius too slain in that tumultuary Battel. Yet at last the Lycians being totally routed, were forced back into their City, and the Romans with some loss of blood return'd to their Ships. From thence going into the Telmessian Bay, which with one side borders upon Caria, and with the other upon Lycia (and laying aside all hopes of any further attempt upon Patara) the Rhodians were sent home. Livius, passing by Asia, went over into Greece, that, when he had waited upon the Scipios who were then about Thessaly) he might go into Italy.

XVII. Æmilius (when he knew that all things were omitted in Lycia, and that Livius was gone into Italy) who, having himself been repuls'd from Ephesus by a Tempest, had return'd to Samus without effecting what he went about, thought it a dishonourable thing that Patara should be so vainly attempted, and therefore resolv'd to go thither with his whole Fleet, and attack the City with all the force he had. So passing by Miletus and the other Coasts belonging to their Allies, they went ashore in the Bay of Bargylla at Jassus. That City was in the hands of a Garrison belonging to the King; wherefore the Romans in an hostile manner ravaged the Country all about. Then, having sent certain Persons, by conferences with the Nobility and Magistrates to try their Inclinations (they having return'd him answer, That there was nothing within their power) he march'd up to attack the City. Now there were some banish'd Jasseses among the Romans, who were very urgent, many of them, with the Rhodians, Not to suffer a City, that were both their Neighbour and Relation, to perish, though it had done no harm. That there was no reason for their banishment but their fidelity to the Romans. That these who remained in the City were kept there by the same force of the Kings Soldiers, whereby they themselves were expelled. That the Jasseses were all of one mind, and would willingly be freed from being the Kings slaves. The Rhodians moved at their requests, and taking King Eumenes also along with them, by telling how nearly related they were to them, and pitying the case of the City, that was in possession of the Kings Garrison, prevail'd to have the Siege rais'd. Then going from thence (for all the other parts thereabout were at Peace with them) and passing along the Coast of Asia, they arriv'd at Loryma, a Port over against Rhodes. There in the Principia [a part of the Camp, where the second Division of their Army (call'd Principes) lay] arose at first a secret discourse among the Tribunes of the Soldiers, which came afterward to the Ears of Æmilius himself,

That the Navy was brought from Ephesus, the proper seat of that War, that the Enemy, being left free behind, might do what they pleas'd with so many Cities of their Allies that lay thereabout. At that Amilius was mightily concern'd, and having summon'd the Rhodians to him, ask'd them, Whether all the whole Fleet could harbour at Patara? To which they making answer, They could not, he had a good excuse to lay aside that design, and so return'd with his Ships to Samus.

XVIII. At the same time Seleucus Son to Antiochus, having kept his Army, all the Winter in Aolis (where he partly assist'd his Allies, and partly ravaged all those that he could not perfwade into an alliance) resolv'd to go over into the Confin'd of Eumenes's Kingdom, whilst he, far from home, was with the Romans and the Rhodians, harassing the Sea Coasts of Lycia. First therefore he came in hostile manner to Elea, but soon after, omitting to besiege that City, he plundered the Country, and march'd to attack Pergamus the Fortrefs and Metropolis of that Kingdom. Attalus, at first, having planted Guards before the City, by excursions of his Horse and Light-armour, rather provok'd than sustain'd the Enemy. At last, having tried by light Skirmishes that he was no wayes equal to the Foe, he retired into the Walls, and then the City began to be besieged. About the same time, Antiochus also going from Apamea, Encamped first at Sardeis, and then not far from Seleucus's Camp, at the Head of the River Caycus, with a great Army, mixt of several Nations. But there was most terrour in the four thousand Gauls, that fought for pay; whom, with a few others among them, he sent to ravage all the Pergamene Territories. Which being told at Samus, first Eumenes, call'd thence by a Domestick War, with his Fleet went to Elea; from whence, having with him a party of nimble Horse and Foot, under whose protection he was safe, he arriv'd at Pergamus, before the Enemy perc'v'd or were any way concern'd for his coming. There then began again light Skirmishes by way of Sally, Eumenes being loth to venture all upon the hazard of one Battle. Some few dayes after the Roman and the Rhodian Fleet, to assist the King, came from Samus to Elea. Of whom when Antiochus heard, that they had landed their Forces at Elea, and that so many Fleets were met together in one Port; and likewise had intelligence a little before, that the Consul with his Army was then in Macedonia, preparing all things necessary for his passing the Hellespont, thought the time was come for him to talk of Peace, before he were hard prest both by Sea and Land too, and therefore Encamp'd upon a certain Bank against Elea. Where having left all his Foot Forces, he march'd down with his Horse (which were in number six thousand) into the Fields under the very Walls of Elea; and sent an Herald to Amilius [to tell him] that he would treat of Peace.

XIX. Amilius, having sent for Eumenes from Pergamus, and summon'd in the Rhodians, held a Council. The Rhodians said, they did not scorn a Peace: but Eumenes said, it was neither honourable at that time to talk of Peace, nor could there be any issue of it. For, said he, how shall we, now that we are shut up in our Walls, and besieged (as it were) either honourably accept of conditions of Peace? or who will take that Peace to be valid, which we shall make without a Consul, without the authority of the Senate, or consent of the Roman People? For I desire to know of you; when you have made a Peace, will you return immediately into Italy or no? Will you take the Navy and the Army along with you? or stay till you know the Consuls pleasure in the case? What the Senators will is; and what the people say? It remains therefore, that you stay in Asia, and that their Forces, being led back again into their Winter Quarters (omitting the War) exhaust their Allies with supplies of provision for them: and after that (if they who are in Authority shall think fit) that we renew the War, which we may (if we remit nothing of the present manage of affairs) before Winter, with the help of the Gods, have finish'd. This opinion prevailed, and they sent Antiochus word back, that before the Consuls Arrival they could not treat of Peace. Antiochus having in vain attempted [to gain] a Peace, ravaged, first, the Elæan, and then the Pergamene Territories, and then leaving there his Son Seleucus, march'd (plundering all the way) toward Adramyttum, through a rich Country, which they call the Plain of Thebes, and was celebrated by Homer's Pen. Nor did the Kings Souldiers get more booty in any other place of Asia. Amilius also and Eumenes came to the same City of Adramyttum, to be a guard to it, though they went round about by Sea.

XX. It happen'd, that at the same time a thousand Foot and a hundred Horse, commanded by Diophanes, came to Elea out of Achaia. For whom when they were landed, Attalus sent certain persons to meet, and conduct them in the night to Pergamus. They were all old Souldiers, well skill'd in military affairs, and their Captain himself Scholar to Philopemen, the best General of all the Greeks at that time. They took two dayes to rest themselves and their Horses, and to view the Enemies Posts, where and when they might best make their approaches or retreat. The Kings men came up near to the Foot of the Hill, on which the City stands: so that they had liberty to plunder behind them, since no body sally'd out (not so much as to the places where their own men stood) who could throw a Dart to any considerable distance. But when they were once, for fear, forced into their Walls, the Kings men began first to contemn and then to neglect them. For great part of them had not their Horses either saddled or bridled: besides that, leaving some few standing to their Arms in Rank and File, the rest got away and stragled all over the Fields; some of them them playing at several sorts of youthful Games, some eating in the shade, and others lying down asleep. Which when Diophanes from the high City of Pergamus beheld, he commanded his men to take up their Arms and stand ready at the Gate, whilst he himself went to Attalus and told him, he had a design to attempt the Enemies Post. Attalus was very unwilling to let him, as seeing that he must fight with a hundred Horse against three hundred, and a thousand with four thousand: [but yet being over-perfwaded he consented; so Diophanes] going out at the Gate late down not far from the Enemies Camp, and waited for an occasion. Those that were at Pergamus thought it rather madness in him than courage; and the Enemies too who for some little time turn'd toward them, when they saw they were not at all concern'd, neither did they themselves alter any thing of their former negligence, but more than that slighted the fewness of them. Diophanes for some time kept his men quiet, as though he had brought them out to see a show only: but when he saw the Enemy gone out of their Ranks, commanded the Foot to make what hast they could after him, he himself in the head of the Horse, with his own Troop, as hard as he could drive (whilst all the Horse and Foot together set up a mighty shout) of a sudden invaded the Enemies station. Nor only the men, but the Horses too were frighted, and having broken their Bridles caused a distraction and a tumult among their own men. Some few Horses stood undaunted, whom they could not easily either Saddle, or Bridle, or Mount: so that the Achaans occasion'd a greater consternation than by the number of their Horsemen [one would have thought they should have done.] But the Foot coming regularly and prepared, set upon the Enemy, whilst they were scatter'd about through negligence, and almost half asleep; by which means they were kill'd and put to flight all over the Plains. Diophanes having follow'd them as far as it was safe for him, to the great honour of the Achaean Nation (for not only Men but Women also saw him from the Walls of Pergamus) return'd into the Garison of the City.

The next Day the Kings Men, being more compos'd and regular, encamped five Hundred Paces farther from the City; and the Achaans about the same time came forth into the same place. For many hours they watched on both sides very intently, as though they had every moment expected the attack; but when, not long before Sun-set, it was time to go back into their Camp, the Kings Men, putting all their Ensigns together, began to march in a Body more fit for a journey than a fight. Diophanes lay still whilst they were in sight, and then ran in upon their Reer with the same force as he had done the Day before; whereby he again put them into such a fright and a tumult, that, though their backs were cut, no one of them made the least resistance; but all in an hurry, and scarce able to keep their ranks, they were forced back into their Camp. This audacity of the Achaans made Seleucus remove his Camp out of the Territories of Pergamus. Antiochus, when he heard that the Romans and Eumenes were come to defend Adramyttum, meddled not with that City, though he plundered the Country about it. Then he took Peraa a Colony of the Mitylenians. Cotton and Corylenus, Aphrodisias and Crene were taken upon the first attempt. From thence he return'd through Thyatira to Sardeis, whilst Seleucus continuing upon the Sea-Coast, was a terrour to some and a guard to others. The Roman Fleet with Eumenes and the Rhodians returned first to Mitylene, and then back from whence it came, to Elea. From thence going to Phocæa, they arriv'd at an Island which they call Bachius, hard by Phocæa; where when they had hostily rifled all the Temples, which before they had not meddled with, and violated the Images in them (and indeed the Island was curiously adorn'd) they went to the very City it self. Which after they had divided among them, and, having so attack'd it, saw that without Works, Arms and Ladders it could not be taken, since a Garison sent by Antiochus of three Thousand Men was now in it; they presently laid aside the thoughts of a Siege, and the Navy went back to the Island, having done nothing else but plundered the Country about the City.

From thence it was resolv'd, That Eumenes should be sent home, and prepare for the Consul and his Army what was necessary for their passage over the Hellespont; that the Roman and Rhodian Fleet should return to Samus, and there tarry in a readiness lest Polyxenidas should move from Ephesus. The King accordingly return'd to Elea, the Romans and the Rhodians to Samus; where M. Amilius, the Prætors Brother, dyed. The Rhodians, having celebrated his Funeral, went to Rhodes, to be there in a readiness against a Fleet which there was a report was coming out of Syria, with thirteen Ships of their own, one Coan Gally of five banks, and another Gnidian. Two Days before Endamius came with the Navy from Samus, the thirteen Ships from Rhodes being sent along with Pamphilidas their Admiral against the Syrian Fleet, taking to their assistance four Ships that were as a guard to Caria, rais'd the Siege from before Dadala and some other small Castles, which the Kings Men were attempting to take. By this time it was resolv'd, that Endamius should set out with all speed, to whose Navy, that he then had, were likewise added six open Ships. Accordingly he setting forth as fast as he could, overtook those that went before him at the port of Megiste; from whence, when they came in one Body to Phaselis, they thought best there to wait for the Enemy.

Phaselis is in the Confin'd of Lycia and Pamphylia, standing a good way into the Sea, and is

XXI.

XXII.

XXIII.

is the first Land that they can see, who came from Cilicia to Rhodes, besides, that it gives you a sight of Ships a great way off; and was therefore chosen, as a fit place to meet the Enemy in. But (what they did not foresee) through the unhealthfulness of the place, the time of the year (for it was now the middle of Summer) and, more than that, a strange smell, distempers began to be very rife, especially among the Seamen. For fear of which contagion going away, they, when they were past the Pamphylian Bay, and had arrived at the River Eurymedon, heard from the Aspendians, that the Enemy was then at Sida. The Kings men had sailed so much the slower, by reason that the Etesie [Trade-winds, that blow at certain times of the Year] were against them, blowing at that time (as they constantly do) from West. Of the Rhodians there were thirty two four-bank'd Gallies, and four three-bank'd. The Kings Navy consisted of thirty seven great Ships, among which there were three seven bank'd, and four six-bank'd Gallies. Besides these there were ten three-bank'd Gallies, and the others knew from a certain Watch-Tower, that the Enemy were near at hand. Both the Fleets, the next day, as soon as it was light (as though they had been that day to fight) put out of their Port: and when the Rhodians were past the promontory [or Cape] which from Sida runs out into the Sea, they were presently within the Enemies Ken, whom they themselves also saw. The Kings left Wing, which lay to the Seaward, was commanded by Annibal, and the right by one of the Kings great Favourites, called Apollonius. And now they had drawn their Ships all up one by another in a straight line. The Rhodians came in a long Train: of which the first was Eudamus, the Admiral: Chariclitus brought up the Reer; and Pamphilidas commanded the main Body of the Fleet. Eudamus, when he saw the Enemy in Battalia and ready to engage, himself also put out to Sea; commanding those that follow'd to keep their Ranks, and put themselves in such a posture as directly to Front the Enemy. That order at first made some disorder among them. For neither was he so far out at Sea, as that all the Ships to the Landward had room to marshal themselves: besides that he himself made so much haste, that with only five Ships he met Annibal. The rest, because they were commanded to place themselves Frontwise, did not follow up. The Reer to the Landward had no room left; so that whilst they were in an hurry among themselves, the right Wing was now engaged with Annibal.

XXIV.

But in a moment of time, the strength of their Ships, and their experience in Sea affairs, remov'd all terror from the Rhodians. For their Ships not only put out with great speed into the main Sea, and each of them made room for those that came [behind them] to the Landward; but likewise if any of their Beaks happen'd to meet with an Enemies Ship, they either tore the prow of her, broke off her Oars, or running freely into their Ranks struck against the Poop. That which most daunted them, was, that a seven-bank'd Gally of the Kings was sunk by a far less Ship of the Rhodians at one thump. Wherefore now the Enemies right Wing was very much inclined to run away. Annibal with his multitude of Ships prest hardest upon Eudamus (who far excelled all the rest and was) out at Sea: nor had he failed to circumvent him, had not the signal (whereby it was their custom to call a dispersed Fleet into one Body) been given from the Admirals Ship, and all the Ships, that in the right Wing had been Victorious, come presently into their assistance. Thereupon both Annibal and all the Ships that were with him, ran away; nor could the Rhodians (their Rowers being great part of them sick, and therefore the sooner tired) pursue them. As they were refreshing themselves with Victuals in the Sea, where they halted, Eudamus seeing the Enemy tow several lame and disabled Ships along with open-deck'd Vessels [tied to them with Cables] and somewhat above twenty sailing away entire, commanded silence, and from the Turret [the Quarter Deck] of the Admirals Ships, Arise, said he, [to his men] and see a brave fight. With that they all arose, and viewing the distraction and flight of the Enemy, cry'd out all with one Voice, Let's follow them. Eudamus's own Ship was batter'd very much; but he order'd Pamphilidas and Chariclitus to pursue them, as far as they thought it safe. They accordingly for some time follow'd them; but when Annibal came near the Land, fearing, lest they might be Wind bound upon the Enemies Coast, they return'd to Eudamus, dragging the seven-bank'd Gally, which at the first onset was disabled, with much ado to Phaselis. Then they went back to Rhodes, not so glad of their Victory, as accusing one another, for that, when they might have done it, they had not sunk or taken all the Enemies Fleet. Annibal, being disabled in one unfortunate Battle, durst not even then go by Lycia, when he desired as soon as possible to join the Kings old Fleet. And indeed, to hinder him from so doing, the Rhodians sent Chariclitus with twenty beak'd Ships to Patara, and the Port of Megeste; commanding Eudamus, with seven of the biggest Ships, out of that Fleet, which he was Admiral of, to return to the Romans at Samus: to persuade the Romans, by all the reason and authority he had, to attack Patara.

XXV.

The news of that Victory first, and then the arrival of the Rhodians caused great joy among the Romans. Now it was manifest, that if the Rhodians were but once freed from the fear of Patara, they would be at leisure to make all the Seas of that Country secure. But Antiochus being gone from Sardeis, lest the maritime Cities should be surpriz'd, they order'd their men not to stir from their charge of Ionia and Aeolis. They sent Pamphilidas with four close-deck'd Ships [Men of War] to the Fleet that lay about Patara. Antiochus not not only muster'd up all the Forces of the Cities round about him, but also sent Embassadors and Letters to Prusias King of Bithynia, wherein he inveigh'd against the Romans coming over into Asia; saying, That they came to destroy all Kingdoms in general, that there might be no Empire in the whole World but that of the Romans only. That Philip and Nabis were conquer'd, and he was the third [King] they aimed at: and that, as every man stood next to him, who was last undone, they would run, like a continu'd conflagration through all [Nations.] That from him, they would make their next step into Bithynia, now that Eumenes was become their voluntary slave. Though Prusias was moved with this Message, yet a Letter which was sent from the Consul Scipio (or rather from his Brother Africanus) clear'd him of that suspicion. For he (besides the perpetual usage of the Roman People, of advancing the majesty of such Kings as were their Allies with all the honour they could) himself, by domestick instances persuaded Prusias to court their Alliance, telling him; That they left some petty Kings in Spain, (after they had receiv'd them into their protection) absolute Monarchs: That they placed Mantilla not only in his Fathers Throne, but also restored him to the Kingdom of Syphax from whence he had been expelled; and that he was not only by far the most opulent King in Africa, but equal, either in majesty or strength, to any Monarch of the whole World. That Philip and Nabis, though they were conquer'd by T. Quintius, were yet left in their Kingdoms: and that Philip also had, the year before, not only his Tribute remitted, but his Son also, who was an Hostage, restored to him; besides that, by permission of the Roman Generals, he regain'd some Cities out of Macedonia. And that Nabis too had been us'd with the same respect, had not his own fury first, and then the Aetolians fraud undone him. But the Kings mind was most confirm'd, after that C. Livius, who, when Prator, had formerly commanded the Fleet, came to him in the quality of an Embassador from Rome; and told him, not only how much more certain the hopes of Victory was to the Romans than to Antiochus, but also that their Friendship would be more sacred and inviolable.

Antiochus, despairing of Prusias's Alliance, went from Sardeis to see the Navy at Ephesus, which for some months had been all fitted up and ready: rather, because he saw, that the Roman Army and the two Scipio's, who commanded it, could not be opposed by his Land Forces, than that he had either ever before had any success at Sea, or had any great and certain assurance of it then. But yet he had some good hopes at present; for that he had heard, not only that great part of the Rhodian Navy was now about Patara, but also, that King Eumenes was gone with all his Ships into the Hellepont to meet the Consul. He likewise receiv'd some encouragement from the Rhodian Fleets being disabled, by a treacherous contrivance at Samus. In confidence of these things, he, having sent Polyxenidas with the Fleet to try by all means the fortune of a fight, himself led his Forces to Notium (which is a Town belonging to Colophon, and stands from old Colophon about two thousand paces) and would have had the City it self in his own hands; as being so near to Ephesus, that he could do nothing either by Sea, or Land, but the Colophonians would see, and immediately tell the Romans of: who, he did not doubt, but, when they heard of the Siege, would come with their Fleet from Samus to assist that City which was allied to them; and that that would be a good opportunity for Polyxenidas to do his business. Wherefore beginning with works to attack the City, and having made Retrenchments equally in two places down to the Sea, he on both sides planted Galleries, and a Mound close to the Wall, and under Tortoises [Engines of wood in that form] brought his battering Rams thither also. At which the Colophonians being frighted, sent Agents to L. Aemilius at Samus, to implore the assistance of the Prator, and the Roman People. Aemilius was not only offended at their long stay in Samus, as expecting nothing less, than that Polyxenidas, whom he had twice in vain provoked, should now be in a posture to give him Battle; but he also thought it a dishonourable thing, that Eumenes's Fleet should assist the Consul in putting his Legions over into Asia; and that he should be obliged to aid Colophon, which was now besieged, he could not tell how long. Eudamus the Rhodian, who had kept him at Samus, when he desired to go into Hellepont, and all the rest were urgent with him and said; how much better it was either to free his Allies from a Siege, or again to subdue that Fleet which he had once already conquer'd, and force the whole possession of the Sea out of the Enemies hands, then, forsaking his Allies, and delivering up all Asia both by Sea and Land to Antiochus, to go into Hellepont, where Eumenes's Fleet was sufficient from his own Post in the War.

Then going from Samus to get Provisions (for they had spent all the former) they resolv'd to cross over to Chius. That was to the Romans as a Barn [or Storehouse] and thither all the Ships of burden, that were sent out of Italy, directed their course. Wherefore going round from the City to the back part of the Island (which is northward, toward Chius and Erythrae) as they were ready to pass over, the Prator by a Letter had Intelligence, that there was a great quantity of Corn come out of Italy to Chius: but that the Ships, which brought the Wine, were detain'd by ill weather: being likewise at the same time inform'd, that the Teians had very largely supply'd the Kings Navy with provisions; and promised them five thousand Vessels full of Wine. Thereupon he presently, in the midst of his Voyage, turn'd his Fleet toward Teius; resolving either to have the provisions which they had prepared for the Enemy, with their consent, or to look upon them as Enemies. When they had turn'd their Ships stems directly directly toward the Land, there appear'd unto them about fifteen Ships near Myonnesus. Which Ships the Prætor supposed to be part of the Kings Navy, and therefore strait pursued them; but they were soon found to be Pyritical Barks and Fly-boats, who having ravaged all the Sea Coast of Chius, were coming back with all kinds of Booty, but when they saw the Fleet ran away. And indeed they outdid them in swiftness, their Vessels being light and made for the purpose, besides that they were nearer to the Shore. Wherefore before the Fleet came nigh them they got to Myonnesus. From whence the Prætor thinking to force the Ships out of the Port, though unacquainted with the place, pursued them. Myonnesus is a Promontory between Teius and Samus, whereof the Hill it self is made like a Meta [a Pillar set up in the Hippodrome or Circus where Chariots, &c. ran, for the Goal] going taper up from a large Basis to a sharp top; and from the Continent has a way to it that is very narrow, being bounded to the Sea-ward with the Rocks that are eaten away by the Waves; so that in some places the stones that hang over reach farther into the Sea than the Ships that are in the Harbour. About those Rocks therefore the Ships (not daring to venture in, lest they might chance to be under the stroke of the Pyrates standing above) spent that whole Day. At last, a little before Night, having quitted that vain enterprise, they came the next Day to Teius; and in the Port that is behind the City (which they themselves call Geraesticum) having moved their Ships, the Prætor sent out his Souldiers to plunder all the Fields about the City.

XXVIII. The Teians, seeing what havock was made, sent Agents to the Romans with all the tokens of humility; who clearing the City of all hostile words or actions against the Romans; [the Prætor] Told them not only that they supplied the Enemies Fleet with all sorts of Provisions, but also how much Wine they had promised Polyxenidas. Which if they would give to the Roman Fleet, he would recall the Souldiers from plundering their Country; but if not, would look upon them as Enemies. When the Embassadors had brought back this dismal answer, the Magistrates summon'd the People to an Assembly, to consult what to do. Now it so happening that Polyxenidas was coming that way with the Kings Fleet, when he heard, that the Romans were removed from Samus, and, having pursued the Pyrates to Myonnesus, had ravaged the Teian Territories (whilst their Ships stood in the Port of Geraesticum) himself cast an Anchor in a by-Port over against Myonnesus, at an Island which the Seamen call Macris. From thence enquiring thereabout what the Enemy did, was at first in great hopes, that, as he had defeated the Rhodian Fleet at Samus by besetting the Ports mouth where they were to go out, so he might now serve the Romans; nor is the nature of the place much unlike, but the Port, by Promontories, that almost meet each other, is so enclosed, that two Ships can scarce go out of it at once. Polyxenidas intended to secure the mouth of it in the Night time, and, having ordered ten Ships to stand at the two Promontories, who on both sides should flank the Enemies Ships as they came out, to put his Souldiers, out of the other part of the Fleet (as he had done at Panormus) ashore, and so, both by Sea and Land, surprisè the Foe. Nor had this been a vain design in him, had not the Romans (when the Teians had promised, That they would do as they were commanded) thought it more convenient, in order to take in their Provisions, that their Navy should go into the Port that is before the City. But Eudamus the Rhodian is also said to have found a fault in the other Port, when two Ships happened to strike against each other in the narrow mouth of it, and break their Oars. And, among other things, this also mov'd the Prætor to remove the Fleet, that there was danger from the Land, Antiochus being encamped not far from that place.

XXIX. The Fleet being come over to the City, the Soldiers and Seamen [belonging to Polyxenidas] went on Shore without any Bodies knowledge, to divide their Provisions and the Wine especially for their Ships; when (as it happened) in the middle of the Day a Country Fellow, who was brought to the Prætor, told him, That for the two Days last past there had a Fleet stood at the Isle of Macris, and that a little before that time there were some Ships seen to move as though they were going away. The Prætor being surprisèd with the relation ordered the Trumpeters to sound, that, if any of the Men were straggling about the Fields, they might return, sending the Tribunes into the City to bring the Soldiers and the Seamen into the Ships. Thereupon arose as great a tumult as though it had been upon the sudden breaking out of a Fire, or the taking of a City; some running into the City to call back their Men, and others running back from the City to their Ships; though, albeit for a while their orders were confounded by uncertain clamours (which were increased too by the Trumpets) at last they ran all together to the Ships. They could scarce each one of them distinguish or go to his own for the hurry they were in; and they had, through their consternation, been in great danger both by Sea and Land, had not Emilius divided them into several parties, and gone first out with his Admirals Ship into the main Sea, where he received them as they came after, and placed them each one in their order front-wife, whilst Eudamus and the Rhodian Fleet stood at the Land, that the Men might get on board without any fear, and every Ship come forth as soon as it was ready. By this means they not only ranged themselves in the Prætors sight, but the Rhodians brought up the Reer; and the Fleet went out to Sea all in Battalia as though they had seen the Kings Men. They were between the Promontory of Myonnesus and Corycum, when they saw the Enemy. The Kings Fleet Fleet too, coming in a long Train with two Ships a Breaht, put their Ships also into Battalia, running out so far with their left Wing, that they might be able to embrace and circumvent the right Wing of the Romans. Which when Eudamus, who brought up the Reer, saw, that the Romans could not even their Ranks, and that they were just ready to be surrounded in the right Wing, he put his Ships briskly forward (and the Rhodian Ships were by far the swiftest in the whole Fleet) and having even the Wing, ran with his own Ship against the Admirals, in which was Polyxenidas.

And now the fight began in all parts of both the Navies. On the Roman side there were eighty Ships engaged, of which twenty two were Rhodians. The Enemies Fleet consisted of ninety five one, among which there were Ships of the greatest Bulk, three six-bank'd, and two seven-bank'd Gallies. In the strength of their Ships, and courage of their men, the Romans far out did the Rhodians: but the Rhodian Ships them in the agility, and skill of their Pilots, as well as the dexterity of their Rowers. But those were the greatest terror to the Enemy, who carry'd fire before them; and that which, at Panormus, was the only cause of their escape, was now the greatest moment toward a Victory. For the Kings Ships, for fear of the fire, which came toward them, avoiding to meet them with their Prows, besides that they could not strike the Enemy with their beaks, themselves also made a fair Broadside for the Enemy to hit: for if any of them engaged they were certain to be burnt; so that they were terrified at the fire more than the fight. Yet the courage of their Souldiers (as it usually does) proved of very great importance in the War. For when the Romans had broken the main Body of the Enemy, tacking about they went and opposed those that fought in the Reer against the Rhodians: so that in a moment of time both the main body of Antiochus, and the Ships in the left Wing, being circumvented, were funk. The right Wing continu'd entire, and was terrified more at the misfortune of their Allies than at their own danger. But when they saw the rest circumvented, and Polyxenidas the Admirals Ship (leaving her Allies) set Sail, immediately they hoisted their Topails (and there was a favourable wind to go to Ephesus with) and ran away; having lost in that fight forty two Ships, whereof thirteen were taken by the Enemy, and the rest burnt or funk. Of the Roman side there were two Ships quite disabled, and some others batter'd; one Rhodian being taken, and that by a memorable chance. For when with her beak she had struck a Sidonian, the Anchor being by the very force of the blow beaten out of its own Ship, and with its hooked beard, like an Harping Iron, catching hold of the Prow of the other Ship, held it fast. Upon which they being in a fright, would have disengaged themselves, but the Rhodians would not let them; so that the Cable of the Anchor being drawn out and intangled in the Oars, brush'd off all on one side, and that very Ship which being struck, stuck to [the Rhodian] now it was disabled took it.

At which Antiochus being consternated, because, now that he was driven out of the possession of the Sea, he very much doubted, whether he could defend his Dominions that were more remote, he order'd his Garison to be brought from Lysimachia, lest he might there be surprisèd by the Romans, though much to his disadvantage, as the event it self afterward shew'd. For it was not only easy to defend Lysimachia from the first effort of the Romans: but to hold out a Siege also the whole Winter long; to reduce the Besiegers, by protracting the time, to the greatest extremity of want, and, in the mean time, to try, upon occasion, what hope there was of Peace. Nor did he only surrender Lysimachia to the Enemy after his defeat at Sea, but he also raised the Siege from Colophon, and went back to Sardeis: and thence sent into Cappadocia, to Ariarathes, to desire aid, and every whither else that he could, to raise forces, as being intent upon nothing now but a design of fighting a pitch'd Battle. Regillus Emilius, after his Victory at Sea, going to Ephesus, set his Ships directly against the Port, and after he had forced from the Enemy the greatest acknowledgment that could be of their surrendering the Sea to him, sail'd to Chius, whither, before the Sea-fight, from Samus he was bound. There, when he had repaired his Ships, that were disabled in the fight, he sent L. Emilius Scaurus with thirty Ships into the Hellestus, to put over the Army: commanding the Rhodians, whom he gratified with part of the plunder and other Naval spoils, to return home. But the Rhodians made hast another way to prevent [Scaurus] and went to put over the Consuls Forces: which when they had also done, they then at last returned to Rhodes. The Roman Navy went over from Chius to Phocæa, which lies in the innermost part of the Bay; being of an oblong form, and two thousand five hundred paces in Circuit; which comes together, as it were, on both sides into a narrower wedge, by them call'd Lampter [a Light House, to shew Sailers the way into the Port.] The breadth of it there is twelve hundred paces, from whence there runs a neck of a thousand paces exactly through the middle of the Bay; on either side of which narrow Partition it has two very secure Ports. That which lies to the South is called Naustatmus, from the use of it, because it contains a great number of Ships; and the other is near the very [place aforesaid call'd] Lampter.

When the Roman Fleet was got into these secure Ports, before he attacked the Walls either with Ladders, or Works, the Prætor thought fit to send certain persons to try the inclinations.

clinations of the Nobility and Magistrates. But when he saw that they were obstinate, he began to make the assault in two places at once. The one part had not many Houses in it; for the Temples of their Gods took up some part of the space. He therefore first began in that to plant his Ram and beat down their Walls and Turrets. But afterward, when the multitude ran thither to make defence, he applied his Ram on the other side too; so that the Walls were now thrown down on both sides. Upon the fall whereof, seeing the Roman Souldiers prest in through the very ruins, whilst others attempted with Ladders to get up upon the Walls, the Townsfolk made so obstinate a defence, that it easily appear'd, their strength lay more in their Arms and Courage, than in their Walls. Wherefore the Prætor being forced by the danger his Souldiers were in, order'd them to sound a Retreat, lest he might expose [his men] who were unwary, to persons that raved with madness and despair. But though the Battle were at that time ended, they did not, for all that, lie idle; but ran together from all places to fortifie, and repair what was beaten down. As they were intent upon this work Q. Antonius sent by the Prætor came upon them: who, having chid them for their pertinacioufness, shew'd the Romans had a greater care than they, not to fight so long as to destroy the City. If they would desist from their fury, that they would give them the liberty of surrendering themselves upon the same condition, as they had formerly submitted to C. Livius. When they heard this (having taken ten dayes to deliberate upon it, in which time they try'd what hopes of aid from Antiochus) seeing their Embassadors whom they sent to the King brought word back, That he could not at all assist them; they then open'd their Gates, upon condition that they should not suffer any act of hostility. When the Ensigns were brought into the City, and the Prætor had declar'd, that he would have them, since they had surrender'd themselves, to have free quarter; there was a shout set up quite round [with these words] That it was a shame, the Phœceans, who had never been faithful Allies, but always bitter Enemies, should escape unpunish'd. With that (as though the Prætor had given them a signal) they ran to and fro to rife the City. Amilius at first resisted and recall'd them; saying, that Cities taken, not those that surrender'd themselves, were used to be rifled: and yet even in them too all things ought to be done according to the discretion of the General, not of the Souldiers. But their fury and covetousness being too strong for his Command, he sent Cryers through all the City, to bid all the Freemen come together to him in the Market place, that they might not be injured; and indeed, in all things, that were within his power, the Prætor was as good as his word. For he restored to them their City, Lands, and Laws; and, because Winter was now at hand, chose the Port of Phœcia for his Navy to Winter in.

XXXIII. About the same time as the Consul went over the Confines of the Ænians and the Maronites, news was brought, that the Kings Fleet was defeated at Myonnesus, and that Lysimachia was deserted by the Garison. Which last was more joyful news than that of the Victory at Sea; for, when they came thither, the City being fill'd with all sorts of Provisions, prepar'd, as it were, against the arrival of the Army, entertain'd them; where they had proposed to themselves the extremity of want and toil in besieging of it. Having staid some few dayes there, for their baggage and sick men to overtake them, that were left behind through all the Castles of Thrace, as being either very ill, or tired with the length of their march (when they had them all together again) they went onward of their Journey through Chersonesus, and came to Hellepont. Where all things being prepared by order of King Eumenes for their passage, they went over into an Allied Country (as it were) without any resistance or tumult, though some Ships were driven to one, and some to another Port. Now this very much encouraged the Romans, when they saw they had a free ingress into Asia, which they thought would have cost them a great many blowes. Thereupon they lay for some time near the Hellepont; because it happen'd that those solemn dayes were now come, on which the Ancilia [sacred Shields] were carried about the City, so that it was a great offence then to travel. The same dayes also had kept P. Scipio from the Army upon a nearer obligation, because he himself was a Salus [a Priest of Mars, and one of those Salii, that carried the Shields, when at Rome, about the City] besides that he himself too was the occasion of their stay till he overtook them.

XXXIV. It happen'd that at that time there came an Embassadour into the Camp from Antiochus, named Byzantius Heraclides, with a Commission to treat of Peace; which he was in good hopes to obtain upon the score of the Romans halting and staying there, who, he believ'd, would have gone on, as soon as they came into Asia, with all expedition into the Kings Camp. Yet he resolv'd not to wait upon the Consul, before he had been with P. Scipio, and indeed his Orders from the King were so to do. For he had most confidence in him; besides that, not only the greatness of his Soul, and the fullness of glory [that he had gain'd] made him most placable. And then it was known to all the Nations thereabout, what a Conquerour he had been in Spain, and what after that in Africa: as also that his Son was a Captive then in the Kings Custody. But where, when, and by what accident that Son of his was taken, is among Authors (like many other things) very uncertain. Some say, that, in the beginning of the War, as he was going from Chalcis to Oreum, he was circumvented by the Kings Ships; though others affirm, that after he came over into Asia, being sent with a Troop of Fregellan Cavalry to view the Kings Camp, the Enemy sent a Party of of Horse presently out to meet him, and that, as he retreated, hapning in the hurry to fall from his Horse, he was with two of his Troopers taken, and so carried to the King. But this is certain, that, if there had been constant Peace with the Romans, or the King had held a perpetual private Correspondence with the Scipio's, their young Gentlemen could not have been treated or used more liberally and freely than he was. For which reason, when the Ambassador had staid for Scipio's coming, as soon as he came, he went to the Consul, and desired him to hear what commands he had [from the King].

Thereupon a full Assembly was call'd, and the Ambassador had his audience, at which XXXV. he told them (many Embassies having been sent to and fro before to no purpose) That he, for that very reason, hoped to succeed in his Embassy, because the former Embassadors had not prevailed. For Smyrna, Lampascus, Alexandria, Trous and Lysimachia in Europe were the matter of debate in those Treaties; whereof the King had now quitted Lysimachia, that they might not say he had any thing in Europe; and was ready, not only to surrender those Cities that were in Asia, but any others also, that the Romans had a mind to vindicate from his Government, as being their Allies; besides, that he would pay them half the charge of the War. These were the conditions of Peace; and the rest of his speech was, That, bearing in mind the state of humane affairs, they would not only be moderate in their own condition, but favourable too to that of others. That they would bound their Empire with Europe, for even that was of infinite extent. That particular Kingdoms could be more easily gain'd, than they could be all kept. But if they would have some part of Asia too, that, if they would pitch upon any certain Countries, the King would suffer his own moderation (for peace and quietness sake) to be overcome by the Romans desires. Now these things, that seemed to the Ambassador of great moment toward the obtaining of a Peace, were but small things in the esteem of the Romans. For they not only thought that the King ought to pay all the charge of the War (since upon his account it was first raised) or, that his Garisons ought to be drawn out of Ionis barely, and Æolis; but also, that, as all Greece was set at liberty, so all the Cities in Asia should be too. Which could not otherwise be brought to pass, than by Antiochus's quitting the possession of all Asia on this side the Mountain Taurus.

The Ambassador perceiving that he could gain nothing, that was fair, of the Council, XXXVI. attempted privately (for so he was ordered) to try the inclinations of P. Scipio. He said first of all, That the King would restore his Son to him without ransom; after which, (being ignorant both of Scipio's disposition, and the Roman Customes) he promised him a vast quantity of Gold, and, excepting the King only, the alliance of the whole Kingdom, if, by his means he obtained a Peace. To which Scipio reply'd, I do the less admire, that you know not all the Romans, and me, in particular, to whom you were sent; because I see, you are ignorant of his condition, from whom you come. Lysimachia was to have been kept, lest we should enter into Chersonesus: or to block up the Hellepont, lest we should go over into Asia; if you had been to have desired Peace of a People who were concern'd for the event of the War. But since you have granted us a passage over into Asia, and not only taken a Bridle [into your Mouths] but an Yoke [upon your Necks] what room have you left to dispute upon even terms, when you must of necessity endure our Government? I shall reckon my Son the greatest gift that I can receive from the Kings Munificence; and may my Fortune, I pray Heaven, never want any other; my mind, I am sure, never will. For so great a present to me he shall find me grateful to him, if he will be content with one private kindness for another. But I'll neither take nor give anything upon a publick account. What I have at present to present him with is only faithful advice [and that's this] Go you, and tell him in my name, I would have him desist from making War, and refuse no terms of Peace. These things did not at all move the King, who thought there was no danger in the War, since they impos'd conditions of Peace upon him, as though he had been already conquer'd. Wherefore omitting, at present, all thoughts of Peace, he imploy'd all his care in preparing for a War.

The Consul, having made all things ready for the execution of his designs, and being XXXVII. removed from his quarters, came first to Dardanium, and then to Rhætium, both of which Cities came thronging out to meet him. Thence he went forward to Ilium, and having encamped in the Plain that lies below the Walls thereof, went up into the City and the Castle, where he sacrificed to Minerva, the Guardian of the Place, whilst the Ilions with all manner of real and verbal respect declar'd that the Romans were descended from them, and the Romans were proud of their Original. Departing thence they arriv'd, in six Marches, at the head of the River Caycus; where King Eumenes also (having endeavour'd first to bring back the Fleet to their Winter Quarters at Elea, but afterward seeing that by reason the Wind was contrary, he could not for some Days get by the Promontory of Leffon) landed, lest he might be wanting to their first attempts, and, with a small party, marched, the nearest way, to the Roman Camp. Thereupon he was sent back out of the Camp to Pergamus, to get Provisions [for the Army] and, having delivered [a quantity of] Corn to whom the Consul had ordered it, returned to the same Camp again. Then, seeing they had provided Victuals for a great many Days, they resolv'd to go to the Enemy before the Winter came upon them. The Kings Camp was near Thyatira, where, when Antiochus had notice, that P. Scipio was carry'd sick to Elea, he sent Embassadors to carry his Son back to him : which was not only a grateful Present to his mind as a Father, but even a remedy to his distemper'd Body too. Wherefore when he had satisfied himself with embracing his Son, he bad the Embassadors; Tell the King (said he) I thank him; but that I cannot pay him any other acknowledgment at the present, than my advice, that he do not appear in the Field, before he hears that I am return'd into the Camp. Now though seventy thousand Foot, and above twelve thousand Horse, gave him sometimes the courage to hope for Victory, yet Antiochus, moved by the authority of so great a man, who, as to the uncertain events of War, he hoped could relieve him in all conditions, he retreated over the River of Phrygia [called Hermus] and about Magnesia, which is near Sipylum, Encamped. But lest, whilst he had a mind to protract the time, the Romans should make an attempt upon his Fortifications, he, having made a Trench six Cubits deep, and twelve broad, with a double Bullwark about it on the outside; built a Wall with a great many Turrets upon it on the inner brink; whereby it was easy to hinder the Enemy from getting over the Trench.

XXXVIII The Consul supposing the King to be about Thyatira, march'd down for five dayes together to the Hyrcane Plains. From whence, when he heard that he was gone, he follow'd him close to the Phrygian River, and pitch'd his Camp four thousand paces from the Foe. There about a thousand Horse (the greatest part of which were Gallo-Græcians, and some Daba, with Bow-Horsemen of other Nations mixt among them) having tumultuously pass'd the River, made an attack upon the several Stations [or Posts where the Enemy was planted.] At first they put them into a disturbance, as being discompos'd; but afterward, since the fight was long, and the number of the Romans encreas'd upon them by the easy supply which they had from their adjacent Camp, the Kings men, being now tired, and not able to resist so great a number, endeavour'd to retreat, were some of them kill'd about the Bank of the River, by those that pursu'd them, before they could get into it. After that there was a Cessation for two dayes, neither of them going over the River. But the third day the Romans went all over together, and Encamp'd about two thousand five hundred paces from the Foe. As they were pitching their Camp, and imploy'd in fortifying thereof, three thousand choice Foot and Horse of the Kings came with great terrour and tumult to them. There were somewhat fewer than used to be upon the Guard, and yet they alone, without any single persons being call'd from the Works, not only at first kept the Battle equal, but even, when the fight encreas'd, repell'd the Enemy; a hundred of them being kill'd and about the same number taken. During the four dayes following, the Armies stood before the Bullwark on both sides in Battalia: till, on the fourth day, the Romans march'd forth into the midst of the Plain. Antiochus did not stir forward at all, so that his Reer were less than a thousand Feet from the Bullwark.

XXXIX. The Consul, when he saw they declined the Fight, the next day call'd a Council, to advise, what to do if Antiochus would not give him an opportunity of fighting? For the Winter was at hand; and he must either keep his Souldiers in Tents, or, if they would needs go into Winter Quarters, he must defer the War till Summer. The Romans never condemn'd any Enemy so much before. Wherefore they all cry'd out, that he should lead them presently, and make use of the vehement ardour of his Souldiers, who (as though they were not to fight with so many thousand Enemies, but that an equal number of Sheep were to be slaughter'd by them) were ready to invade the Trenches, and through the Bullwark the Camp, if the Enemy would not come out to fight them. Cn. Domitius, being sent to find out the way, and on which side the Bullwark was most accessible, when he brought back certain intelligence, the next day they resolv'd to remove their Camp somewhat nearer. The third day they brought their Ensigns into the middle of the Plain, and began to marshal their Army. Nor did Antiochus think fit any longer to stand off, lest he might not only lessen the Courage of his men by declining the fight, but also augment the hopes of his Enemies, and therefore himself drew forth his Forces too: going forward so far from his Camp, as that it might appear, he was resolv'd to engage. The Roman was most of one Form, both as to the sort of men and their Arms; in which there were two Roman Legions, and two more of Allies and Latines; whereof each had in it five thousand four hundred men. The Romans were the main Body, and the Latines in the Wings. The Hastati [i. e. Spearmen or Pikes] stood in the Front, and next them the Principes, the Triarii bringing up the Reer. Beyond this compleat Army, as it were, on the right hand, the Consul marshal'd near three thousand Auxiliaries, belonging to King Eumenes (that were mingled among the short Shieldmen of the Acheans) into an even Front; planting near three thousand Horse without them, of whom eight hundred belong'd to Eumenes, and the rest were all Romans, with the Trallians and Cretans (who were in all five hundred) in the Reer. The left Wing did not seem to need such aids, because a River on that side, and craggy Rocks inclosed them. Yet there also were placed four Troops of Horse. These were all the Roman Forces, save two thousand Macedonians and Thracians together (that came as Volunteers) who were left for a Guard to the Camp. They planted sixteen Elephants behind the Triarii in the Reer. For, besides that they thought they could not sustain the multitude of the Kings Elephants (they being fifty four) the African [Elephants] cannot cope even with an equal number, that come from India; either either for that they are overcome in bulk (for the Indian Elephants are far beyond the African) or in fierceness.

The Kings Army was more various, consisting of many Nations, whose Arms, and Persons too, were very different. There were sixteen Thousand Foot arm'd after the manner of the Macedonians, who were call'd Phalangites, being the main Body, and, in the Front, divided into ten Parts. He distinguished those several Parts by putting two Elephants between every two of them, and the Army was from the Front inward two and thirty ranks deep. Now there was not only this strength in the Kings Army, but it created great terrour, as by its other appearance, so also by the Elephants making such a show among the arm'd Men. They themselves were very bulky, but their Frontals [Armour that they wore upon their foreheads] their Crests, and the Turrets upon their backs, with the four arm'd Men that stood thereon, besides the manager of him, added [a new dread] to their appearance. On the right side of the Phalangites he planted fifteen Hundred Gallogræcians, to whom he joyn'd three Thousand Horse in Armour, whom they call'd Cataphratti, with a Wing of about one Thousand other Horse which they call Agema. There were choice Men of Media, and Horsemen made up of several Nations in those Parts. Immediately behind them was an herd of Elephants placed in the Reer; and on the same side, in a Wing somewhat longer than ordinary, stood the Kings Regiment call'd Argyraphides, from their Silver Shields. Then there were of the Daba twelve Hundred Bow Horsemen; and of light armour three Thousand, part Trallians and part Cretans, about as many of one as of the other; besides that there were two Thousand five Hundred Mysians joined to the Bow-men. In the Reer of that Wing were four Thousand Cyrtæan Slingers and Elymæan Bow-men all mingled together. In the left Wing there were fifteen Hundred Gallogræcians added to the Phalangites, and to them likewise two Thousand Cappadocians, sent from King Ariarathes. Then there were two Thousand seven Hundred Auxiliaries mixt of all sorts, and three Thousand Cataphratti [Horse in Armour] and a Thousand other Horse, besides the Kings Wing with lighter coverings both for themselves and their Horses, in an habit not much unlike, and a great many Syrians mixt with Phrygians and Lydians. Before this Cavalry went Chariots, armed with Sithes, and Camels, which they call Dromadas. Upon these sate the Arabian Archers, having slender Swords, four Cubits long, that they might from such an height reach the Foe. Then there was another train like that, which was in the right Wing, consisting, first, of Tarentines, and then of two Thousand five Hundred Gallogræcians Horse; with one Hundred fresh Cretans, and fifteen Hundred Carians and Cilicians in the same Armour, besides as many Trallians and three Thousand short shield-men, who were Pisidians, Pamphilians, and Lycians. After all these there were Auxiliaries of the Cyrtæans and Elymæans equal to those in the right Wing, and sixteen Elephants stand at a small distance from them.

The King himself was in the right Wing, having placed his own Son Seleucus, and his Brothers Son, Antipater, to command in the left; and given the management of the main Body to three Persons, Minio, Zeuxis, and Philip, Master of the Elephants. A Morning Cloud, as the Day went on, lifted up to the Sky made a kind of darkness; and then a shower from the South [poured down and] wet them all quite through. Now that, which did no hurt at all to the Romans, was very incommodious to the Kings Men; for neither did the obscurity of the Day in their small Army, deprive the Romans of an ability to see quite round them, nor did the Rain their Swords or Javelins (for they were more of the heavy arm'd) any hurt. But the Kings Men, whose Army was so broad, could not see so much as the two Wings from the main Body, much less the two Wings one another; besides that the wet had spoiled their Bows, Slings, and the thongs of their Darts. The Sith-arm'd Chariots too, wherewith Antiochus thought he should have put the Enemy into such great disorder, proved a terror to his own Men. Now they were armed much after this fashion; they had Spears about the Pole standing out ten Cubits from the draughts like Horns, with which they ran every thing through that met them, and at the ends of the draughts two Sithes stuck out, the one even with the draughts, and the other lower, declining toward the Earth; the former to cut off all things that came by them, and the latter to reach Men that fell down and came under them. So also upon the Axles of the Wheels there were two Sithes fastned in the same manner on both sides several ways. Now the King, as I told you before, had placed these Chariots, thus arm'd, in the front of the Army, because, if they had been planted in the Reer, or the middle, they must have been driven through his own Men. Which when Eumenes saw, being no stranger to that manner of fighting, but knowing how doubtful such a sort of Aid was, if a Man fear'd the Horses, rather than set upon them in a regular way, he ordered the Cretan Archers, Slingers, and Darters, that were Horsemen, to ride up, not in a close Body, but as dispers'd as they possibly could, and on all sides at once to sling in their Weapons upon them. This storm, as it were (what with the Wounds given by the Weapons thrown from every side upon them, what with the dissonant shouts [that were set up]) so consternated the Horses, that they presently ran all about the Plain like mad, as though they had known no driver. But the light Armour, nimble Slingers, and swift Cretans in a moment declin'd their violence; and the Horse, pursuing them, them, augmented the tumult and fear of the Horses and Camels, as of those also that were before set a gadding; besides that there was a clamour added by the other numerous croud of those that stood about them. By this means the Chariots were driven out of the Plain that was between the two Armies; and then, laying aside all vain jesting, the two Armies having given the word on both sides, at last fell to it in a regular manner.

XLII.

But that vain thing was by and by the cause of a real damage to them. For the subsidiary aids, which were placed nearest, being frightened and consternated at the Chariots, so far as, that they even fled, exposed them all to the Cataphracti [Horsemen arm'd Cap-a-pee]. To whom when the Roman Horse, having routed the Body of reserves, was come, part of them endur'd not so much as their first effort, whilst others were routed, and others sunk down under the weight of their Arms and Coverings; till at last the whole left Wing declined, and, the Auxiliaries who were between the Horse and those they call Phalangites, being put into disorder, the terror came as far as the main Body. Thereupon not only their Ranks were disorder'd, and the use of their long Spears (which the Macedonians call Sarrisse) taken away by the intervention of their own Party; and then the Roman Legions made up, throwing their Javelins in upon them, whilst they were so confounded, even the Elephants that were in places between did not terrifie the Romans, who had been used in the African Wars, both to avoid the force of the Beast, and either to hit him with their Javelins a cross, or, if they could get nearer to him with their Swords to cut his Nerves. By this time the main Body was most of it, in the Front, destroy'd, and the reserves, being circumvented on their Reer were slain; when, in another part, they heard, their men were a flying, with a noise almost at the very Camp like that of men that are fear'd. For Antiochus, in the right Wing, seeing, through confidence in the River, there were no reserves at that Post, except four Troops of Horse, and those too, whilst they join'd their own Party, uncovering their Bank, made an attack upon that part with his Auxiliaries and Cataphract Horse. Nor did he charge them only in the Front, but getting between the Wing and the River, he flank'd them too; till such time as the Horse being first put to flight, and then the nearest of the Foot were forced back as fast as they could go to their Camp.

XLIII.

M. Aemilius, Tribune of the Souldiers, Son to M. Lepidus, was Master of the Camp, who a few years after was made High-Priest. He, where he saw his Party fly, met them with all his Forces; bidding, first, to stand, and then to return into the fight, reproving them for their fear and dishonourable flight. From thence he proceeded to threaten them, that they ran headlong upon their own ruine, unless they obey'd what he commanded. At last he gave his men the signal, to kill the foremost of those that ran away: and to force the crowd of such as fled with their Swords and Wounds back toward the Foe. This greater fear overcame the lesser: and therefore being compell'd by a doubtful dread they first stood still, though soon after, not only themselves return'd into the fight, but Aemilius also with his Party (which was two thousand stout men) made a brave resistance against the King who so hotly pursu'd him: besides that Attalus, Brother to Eumenes, in the right Wing, by which the left Wing of the Enemy had at the first effort been routed, when he saw, on the left, how his own Party fled, and a tumult all about the Camp, came up in season with two hundred Horse. Antiochus, as soon as he saw not only those, whose backs he had so lately seen, coming back into the fight, but another Company flowing thither both from the Camp and the main Body of the Army, turn'd his Horse and fled. By this means the Romans being Conquerours in both Wings, went over the heaps of Bodies (which they had raised in the main Body of the Army more than any where else; the men being there very stout, and not so well able to fly by reason that their Arms were so weighty) to rille the Camp. The Horse, first, that belong'd to Eumenes, and after them the other Horse too follow'd the Foe over all the Plain, killing the hindmost as fast as they overtook them. But that which was yet a greater Plague to them, as they fled away, and destroy'd the greatest number of them, was that their Chariots, Elephants and Camels, were mix'd with the crowd of themselves: so that their ranks being disorder'd, they falling blindly one over another, were by the Beasts running in trod all to pieces. In the Camp too there was a vast slaughter; full as great as that in the field. For not only the foremost inclined most to run toward the Camp, but in confidence of that multitude, who were in Garison there, fought with more resolution before the Bullwark. The Romans, being stop't by the Gates and the Bullwark, which they thought they should have taken at the first effort, when they at last had broken through, for madness made a more grievous slaughter among them.

XLIV.

They say there were fifty thousand Footmen kill'd that day, and four thousand Horse, fifteen hundred taken; with fifteen Elephants and their Governours. There were several Romans wounded: but there fell not [of them] above three hundred Foot, with twenty four Horse, and, of Eumenes's Army twenty five. And that day the Victors having rilled the Enemies Camp, return'd to their own with a great Booty. The next day they stripp'd the Bodies of those that were slain, and gather'd together the Captives. Then came Embassadors from Thyatira and Magnesia, near Sipylum, to surrender their Cities. Antiochus running away with some few others, to whom on the road there were more still added, with a small Band of men about Midnight went to Sardeis: where when he heard that his Son

Selenus

Selenus and some of his Friends were gone thence before to Apamea, he also himself at the fourth Watch, with his Wife and Daughter went that way, having committed the Custody of the City to Zeno, and made Timon Governour of Lydia. Which two persons being condemn'd, Embassadors were sent to the Consul by consent of the Townsmen, and the Souldiers that were in the Castle. About the same time also there came Embassadors from Tralles, from Magnesia, which lies above Meander, and from Ephesus to surrender their several Cities. Polyxenidas, having heard of the fight, had left Ephesus, and being got with his Fleet as far as Patara in Lycia, for fear of the Squadron of Rhodian Ships that were at Megiste, put to shore, and with some few to attend him went by Land into Syria. The Cities of Asia surrender'd themselves into the hands of the Consul, and the power of the Roman People. The Consul was now at Sardeis: whither P. Scipio also, as soon as he could endure the fatigue of the Journey, came from Elea.

Much about the same time an Herald from Antiochus, desired of the Consul, by the mediation of P. Scipio, and obtain'd his request; that the King might have leave to send Agents [to treat with him.] And accordingly some few dayes after, Zeuxis, who had been Præfect of Lydia, and Antipater his Brothers Son, came. Who, having first apply'd themselves to Eumenes (who, they thought, by reason of their old animosities, would be most averse to Peace) and found him more complaisant, than either they or the King believ'd he would prove, waited then upon P. Scipio, and by his means, upon the Consul: by whom having a full Council allow'd them to deliver their Message in, Zeuxis said, We, Romans! have not so much our selves any thing to say, as we have occasion to ask you, with what Sacrifice we may expiate the Kings error and obtain Peace and Pardon [of you] our Conquerours. You always shew'd the greatest clemency imaginable in pardoning Conquer'd Kings and States; with how much greater facility should you do it in this Victory, that has made you Lords of all the World? Now you should lay aside quarrels against all mortal men, and, like the Gods, consult the good of, and be favourable to humane race. But before the Embassadors came, it was resolv'd what their Answer should be: and it was to be deliver'd by Africanus; who, they say, spoke to this pleas'd to give us. But as to our minds, that are within our own Souls, we have born, and still do bear the same in all conditions; nor hath prosperity puff'd them up, or adversity cast them down. Of this, to omit others, I would give you your Friend Annibal for an instance, if I could not give you your selves. After we came over the Hellespont, before we saw the Kings Camp, or his Army, when Mars [the God of War] favour'd both sides alike; and the event of the War was uncertain, we tender'd you no better conditions of Peace upon even terms, than we do even now we have subdu'd you. Meddle not with Europe, and depart out of all Asia, that is on this side the Mountain Taurus. Then for the expences of the War you shall pay us fifteen thousand Eubœan Talents, five hundred at present, and two thousand five hundred when the Senate and People of Rome shall ratifie the Peace; and after that a thousand Talents Yearly for twelve Years together. We require also that Eumenes be paid five hundred Talents, the Corn that is behind of that which was due to his Father. Now when we have made this agreement, to be sure of your performance, it will indeed be some pledge, if you give us twenty Hostages such as we like; but we shall never be satisfied, that the Roman People are at perfect Peace with that Nation, where Annibal is. Him we demand above all things else. You shall also surrender to us Thoas the Ætolian, the raiser of the Ætolian War, who, in confidence of them armed you, and of you them; together with Mnasimachus the Acarnan; and Philo and Eubulidas of Chalcis. The King indeed will make Peace upon the worse terms, because he does it later than he might have done. But if he now delay the time, let him know, that it is an harder task to pull the majesty of Kings from their highest pitch to a middle station, than to precipitate them from thence to the lowest degree. Now the Embassadors were sent from the King with such a Commission, that they should receive all terms of Peace whatsoever; wherefore they agreed that Embassadors should be sent to Rome. The Consul divided his Army into their Winter-Quarters, part to Magnesia near Meander, part to Tralles, and part to Ephesus. To Ephesus some few dayes after there were Hostages brought to the Consul from the King; and the Embassadors came that were to go to Rome. Eumenes also went to Rome at the same time with the Kings Embassadors; after whom there follow'd Embassies from all the Cities of Asia.

Whilst these things were done in Asia, the two Pro-Consuls came, about the same time, back out of their Provinces to Rome, with hopes to triumph; Q. Minucius out of Liguria, and Manius Acilius out of Ætolia. Having heard what they had both done, the Senate deny'd Minucius a Triumph, but granted it to Acilius very unanimously; who was carry'd into the City as triumphing over Antiochus, and the Ætolians. There were carry'd before him at the Triumph two hundred and thirty Military Ensigns: of Silver Bullion three thousand pounds; of Coined Silver in Attick Tetradrachmes a hundred and thirteen thousand; of Cistophori [small pieces on which was stamped the Picture of a Man carrying a little Box with holy things in it] two hundred forty eight, a great many silver Vessels Embossed, and of great weight; besides silver Furniture belonging to the King, and a rich Garment with forty five Crowns of Gold, which were presents from the associated Cities: spoils of all sorts. He also led, of noble Captives, that were Ætolians, and Officers belonging to the King, thirty six.

XLV.

XLVI.

fix. Damocritus General of the *Ætoli*ans, having some dayes before, in the night, got out of Prison, being over-taken on the Bank of Tiber by the Keepers, before he was laid hold on, ran himself through with his Sword. Only there was no Souldiers to follow his Chariot: otherwise it was a magnificent Triumph, both for the show, and the glory of what he had perform'd. But the joy of this Triumph was taken off by a sad Message out of Spain, That in an unfortunate Battle in the Vastetan Territories, under the Conduct of L. Æmilius the Pro-Consul at a Town call'd Lyco, with the Lusitanians, there fell six thousand of the Roman Army: and that the rest being forced for fear within their Bullwark could scarce defend their Camp, but were brought like men that run away by great dayes Journeys into an Allies Country. This was the news out of Spain: at what time L. Arunculeius the Prætor brought into the Senate the Placentine and *Cremone*se Embassadours out of Gallia: who complain'd that they wanted Inhabitants; some being lost by the fortune of War, others taken off by distempers, as some left their Colonies to avoid the molestations of the Gauls: whereupon the Senate decreed: That C. Lælius the Consul, if he thought good, should muster up six thousand Families, to be divided among those Colonies, and that L. Arunculeius the Prætor, should create Triumvirates to carry them thither.

XLVII. The persons created were M. Atilius Serranus, L. Valerius Flaccus, Son of P. and L. Valerius Tappus, Son of C. Not long after, when the time for the Consular Assembly was now at hand, C. Lælius the Consul return'd out of Gaul to Rome. He not only rais'd Inhabitants for a supply to Cremona and Placentia, by virtue of an order of Senate, made in his absence, but he likewise propos'd, and the Senate upon his motion agreed, that two new Colonies should be carried into that Country that had belong'd to the Boii. At the same time a Letter came from L. Æmilius the Prætor, concerning the Sea-fight at Myonnesius; and that L. Scipio the Consul had put his Army over into Asia. Upon the score of their Victory at Sea there was a Supplication decreed for one day: and for another day, since that was the first time that the Roman Army had Encamped in Asia, that that affair might prove successful and of good consequence to them: the Consul being order'd to Sacrifice twenty of the greater sort of Victims at each supplication. Then the Consular Assembly was held with great contention. M. Æmilius Lepidus stood, who lay under the scandal of having left the Province of Sicily to stand for that Office, without consulting the Senate whether he should or no. M. Fulvius Nobilior, Cn. Manlius Vulso, and M. Valerius Messala, stood with him. Of whom Fulvius was created one of the Consuls, before the rest had yet made up the Votes of the Centuries [to the due number which was half, before a man could be declar'd Consul] and the next day declar'd Cn. Manlius, since Lepidus lost it (for Messala quitted his pretensions to it) his Colleague. Then they chose Prætors, the two Q. Fabius's, Labeo and Pictor (who had been inaugurated Flamen Quirinalis [i. e. High-Priest of Romulus] that year) M. Sempronius Tuditanus, Sp. Postumius Albinus, L. Plantius Hypsæus, and L. Babius Dives.

XLVIII. When M. Fulvius Nobilior, and Cn. Manlius Vulso were Consuls, Valerius Antias sayes, that there was a general report at Rome, which was taken almost for a certain truth, that in order to have young Scipio again, the Consul L. Scipio, and with him P. Africanus being invited out to a Parley with the King, were not only themselves laid hold of, but also, the Captains being likewise taken, the Army was immediately led to the Roman Camp, which was seiz'd, and all the Roman Forces destroy'd: that upon this account the *Ætoli*ans were Encouraged, and refused to obey what was injoin'd them, and that their Nobility went into Macedonia, Dardania, and Thracia to raise mercenary Souldiers: that they, who told this at Rome, were sent from A. Cornelius the Prætor to A. Terentius Varro, and M. Claudius Lepidus, out of Ætolia. And then to this story he added, that the Ætolian Embassadours, in the Senate, were ask'd, among other questions, this also; how they heard, that the Roman Generals were taken in Asia by King Antiochus, and the Army destroy'd? To which the *Ætoli*ans reply'd; That they were told by their own Embassadours, that were with the Consul. Now, since I have no other Author for this rumour, I would neither have any body affirm it from me [as true] nor totally neglect it as a falsity.

XLIX. The Ætolian Embassadours being introduced into the Senate (since both their cause and their fortune encouraged them humbly to beg pardon, either for their offence, or their error) began with their good services done to the Romans, and almost reproach'd [the Senate] with bragging of their Courage in the War against Philip; [whereby] they not only offended the ears [of the audience] with the insolence of what they said; but also, by ripping up old forgotten stories, brought the matter to such a pass, that the Senate call'd to mind many more ill offices, than good ones done by their Nation; and stirr'd up anger and hatred against those that stood in need of compassion. They were ask'd by one Senator, Whether they would leave the disposal of themselves to the Roman People? and then, by another; whether they would resolve to have the same Allies and Enemies with the Roman People? to which, seeing they made no Answer, they were ordered to be gone out of the Temple. Thereupon almost all the Senate cry'd out; That the *Ætoli*ans were yet wholly addicted to Antiochus, and that their Souls rely'd upon his hopes only. Wherefore they must wage War with them, who were their undoubted Enemies, and tame their savage hearts. But there was another business also, that incens'd incens'd [the Senate] [and that was] that at that very time when they sued for Peace to the Romans, they were making War against the Delops and the Athamans. Wherefore there was an order of Senate made, according to the opinion of M. Atilius, who had conquer'd Antiochus and the *Ætoli*ans, That the *Ætoli*ans should that Day be ordered to depart the City, and, within fifteen Days, out of Italy. A. Terentius Varro was sent to secure their passage, and it was declar'd, That if, after that time, any Embassy came from the *Ætoli*ans to Rome without the Generals permission, that had the Government of that Province, and a Roman Embassador along with them, they should be all look'd upon as Enemies. Thus were the *Ætoli*ans dismiss'd.

Then the Consuls propos'd the division of the Provinces; of which they two were to cast Lots for Ætolia and Asia. He that happened to have Asia, had allotted to him the Army that L. Scipio had; and for a supplement thereof four Thousand Roman Foot, two Hundred Horse, and of the Allies and Latines eight Thousand Foot and four Hundred Horse, that with those Forces he might wage War against Antiochus. To the other Consul was assign'd the Army that was in Ætolia, and leave given, that, for a supplement to it, he might raise, of Citizens and Allies, the same number as his Colleague. The same Consul was likewise order'd to fit out the same Ships, that were ready the Year before, and take them along with him; nor to make War against the *Ætoli*ans only, but to go over into the Island of Cephallenia also; being likewise charged, That, if with convenience to the Commonwealth he could, he should return to Rome at the Assembly-Day. For, besides that they were to choose new Magistrates every Year, they thought fit also to create Censors. But if any thing detain'd him, that he should let the Senate know, that he could not be there at the time of the Assembly. Ætolia fell to M. Fulvius, and Asia to Cn. Manlius's lot. Then the Prætors chose, of whom Sp. Postumius Albinus had the City, and foreign Jurisdiction; M. Sempronius Tuditanus, Sicily; Q. Fabius Pictor (who was Flamen Quirinalis, i. e. Romulus's High Priest) Sardinia; Q. Fabius Labeo, the Navy; L. Plantius Hypsæus, the hither Spain; and L. Babius Dives, the farther. For Sicily was design'd one Legion, and the Fleet that was in that Province; and that the new Prætor should impose two Tithes of Corn upon the Sicilians; whereof he should send the one into Asia, and the other into Ætolia. The same thing was also to be enacted from the Sardinians, and the Corn to be carry'd to the same Armies as that from Sicily was. To L. Babius there was a supply granted (to go into Spain) of one Thousand Roman Foot, fifty Horse, six Thousand Latine Foot, and two Hundred Horse; with which supplies the two Spains were to have (each of them) a Legion. The Magistrates of the Year before were some of them continued in Commission; C. Lælius with his Army for an Year; P. Junius, Proprietor in Etruria, with the Army that was in that Province; and M. Fuccius, who was Prætor of the Bruttii and Apulia.

But before the Prætors went into their several Provinces, there was a contest between P. Licinius the High Priest, and Q. Fabius Pictor, Flamen Quirinalis, such as had been, in the memory of their Fathers, between L. Metellus and Postumius Albinus. For Metellus, being High Priest, had detain'd Albinus when he was Consul, and going, with his Colleague C. Lutatius, into Sicily to the Fleet, to perform certain Holy Rites, as Licinius did this Prætor [Fabius] from going into Sardinia, which occasion'd a great bustle both in the Senate and before the People. For there were injunctions laid on both Parties, Pledges taken, Fines set, Tribunes appeal'd to, and a reference to the People. But Religion at last prevailed, and the Flamen was commanded to obey the High Priest; but his mulcts were remitted by order of the People. Thereupon, for madness that his Province was taken from him, the Prætor endeavour'd to turn himself out of his Office, but the Senate by their authority deter'd him, decreeing that he should perform the Office of a Judge among Foreigners. After that when the Levies were, in a few Days, over (for there were not many Soldiers to be rais'd) the Consuls and Prætors went into their several Provinces. Thereupon arose a flying report without any Author, concerning the state of affairs in Asia; but within some few Days there was certain news brought, and a Letter from the General, to Rome, which did not so much bring joy with it, into the place of their late fear (for they now no longer dreaded a Person whom they had conquer'd in Ætolia) as it took off the common report; he having appear'd, when they were entering upon that War, to be a grievous Enemy, not only upon the score of his own Force, but in that he had Annibal to manage the Campaign. Yet they thought not fit either to alter any thing touching the Consuls being sent into Asia, or of diminishing those Forces, for fear he should have an occasion to engage with the Gauls [there].

Not long after M. Aurelius Cotta, L. Scipio's Lieutenant, came with the Embassadors of King Antiochus, King Eumenes and the Rhodians, to Rome. Of whom Cotta, first, declar'd in the Senate, and then in the publick Assembly, by order of the Senate, what had pass'd in Asia. Whereupon there was a Supplication decreed for three Days, and forty of the greater sort of Sacrifices to be offer'd. Then Eumenes, first of all, had his audience; who when he had briefly, Given the Senate thanks, for delivering him and his Brother from a Siege, and vindicating his Kingdom from the injuries of Antiochus, and had congratulated with them, that they had managed their affairs with good success both by Sea and Land; as also, that they had driven King Antiochus tiachus (whom they had clearly routed and forced from his Camp) before out of Europe, and afterward out of all Asia too, that is on this side Mount Taurus; he told them, that he would rather they should enquire into his merits of their own Generals and Lieutenants, than hear them from his own mouth. Which Speech of his all the Senate approving, bad him say, without being so modest, what he thought the Senate and People of Rome ought to give him: for the Senate was resolv'd to do more, if possible, than would only equal his merits. To which the King reply'd; If he were to pitch upon a reward that were to come from any other hands, he would willingly (if he might have leave to consult the Roman Senate) make use of the advice of that most noble order; lest he might seem either excessively to have desired, or immodestly to have demanded any thing whatever; and therefore now, that they were to be the givers, their munificence toward him and his Brothers, ought to be much more guided by their own discretion. But the Senate were not at all deter'd by this Speech of his from bidding him to say [what he desired:] so that when for sometime they had contended, on the one side with indulgence, and the other with modesty (as leaving the thing to one another) with an inexplicable as well as a mutual facility, Enmenes went out of the Temple. The Senate continu'd of the same opinion; That it was an absurdity, that the King could not tell, what he hoped, or design'd to Petition for when he came thither. That he himself best knew, what was most commodious for his Kingdom, as being acquainted with Asia far better than the Senate was. Wherefore he ought to be recall'd, and forced to declare what he wish'd, and what he thought.

LIII.

Thereupon the King being brought back into the Temple, and bid to speak, said; "Grave Fathers! I should still have held my tongue, had I not known that you would by and by call in the Rhodian Embassadors; at whose Audience I must of necessity speak. Which to do will be for that reason so much the more difficult, because their demands will be such, as that they seem to desire not only nothing that is against me, but a thing that does not properly belong even to themselves. For they will plead the cause of the Greek Cities, and will say that they ought to be set at liberty. By which injunction, who doubts, but will not only alienate from us those Cities, that shall be so freed, but even the old Stipendiary Towns also? whilst they themselves, having oblig'd the people with so great a piece of service, will have them verbally for their Allies only, but really, to be subject and obnoxious to their command? And then (forsooth) though they affect these great matters, they'll pretend, that it does not at all concern them: only, that it becomes you, and is agreeable to their former actions. You therefore ought to have a care lest such an Harangue deceive you; and lest you do not only too unequal depress some of your Allies, whilst you raise others beyond measure; but also, lest they, who have born Arms against you, be in a better condition than your Friends and Allies. As for my own part, I had rather any body should believe, that in other things, I relinquish'd somewhat of my just right, than strove too pertinaciously to defend it: but in the contest concerning your Friendship, my good will toward you, and the honour that you will do me, I cannot endure to be outdone. This is the greatest inheritance that I receiv'd from my Father; who was the first of all the Inhabitants of Greece and Asia, that contracted a Friendship with you, and continu'd it with a perpetual and constant fidelity, even to his Life's end. Nor did he preserve his mind only true and faithful to you, but he was concern'd in all the Wars, that you have waged in Greece both by Land and Sea; assisting you with all sorts of provisions in such plenty, that none of all their Allies were in any manner equal to him. At last, as he was perswading the Bootians to become your Allies, he fainted in the very Assembly, and not long after died. In whose steps I tread; and, though I could make no addition to his good will and affection toward you (for they were insuperable) yet fortune, occasion, Antiochus and the War in Asia have given me an opportunity of excelling him in deeds and meritorious services that I have really perform'd. Antiochus, King of Asia, and part of Europe, offer'd me his Daughter in Marriage: restored immediately the Cities that had revolted from us; and gave me great hopes afterward of enlarging my Kingdom, if I would wage War on his side against you. But I shall not glory in not having ever offended you: I will rather relate those things that are worthy of the ancient Friendship between our Family and you. I assisted your Generals with Land and Sea Forces, so that never an one of your Allies could equal me: I supply'd them with Provisions both by Sea and Land; was present at all the Sea fights, that were fought in several places; nor did I ever spare for either labour or danger. That which is the greatest misery in War, I endured a Siege, being shut up at Pergamus to the utmost hazard both of my Life and Kingdom. After which being freed from that Siege, though at the same time Antiochus on the one side, and Seleucus on the other were Encamped about the [Metropolis and] chief Fortresses of my Kingdom, I left my own concerns, and with my whole Fleet met L. Scipio your Consul at Hellspont, to assist him in putting over the Army. And when your Army came over into Asia, I never stirr'd from the Consul: no Roman Souldier was more diligent in your Camp, than I and my Brothers. No Expedition, no Horse Battle was enter'd upon without me. There I stood in Battalia, and defended that Post where the Consul was pleas'd to place me: I will not say, Grave Fathers! Who can be compar'd with me for deserts toward you in this War? but I dare say,

"say, that I in that respect am equal to any of all the Nations or Kings, that you so highly esteem. Massinissa was your Enemy before he was your Ally: nor did he come to you with his Auxiliaries whilst he was safe in his Kingdom, but, after he was banish'd, expell'd, and had lost all his Forces, fled, with a Troop of Horse into your Camp for refuge. Yet you did not only restore him (for that in Africa he had behaved himself very faithfully and briskly on your side against Syphax and the Carthaginians) into his Fathers Kingdom, but, adding also the most opulent part of Syphax's Kingdom, made him the greatest King in all Africa. What reward then, pray, do we deserve, who never were Enemies, but always your Allies? My Father, I, and my Brothers have born Arms for you, not only in Asia, but far from home too, in Peloponnesus, Boetia, Ætolia; in the War with Philip, Antiochus and the Ætolians, both by Sea and Land. Well then (some one may say) what do you desire [for all this?] Why truly, Grave Fathers! since 'tis your pleasure that I must needs tell you; if you have removed Antiochus beyond the Mountain Taurus with a design your selves to inhabit that Country, I do not desire any better Neighbours to border upon me than you are; nor can I hope that any Kingdom may be made more secure and stable by any other means. But if you intend to remove from thence, and draw off your Armies too; I dare be bold to say, there's none of your Allies more worthy than myself to enjoy what you have gotten in the War. Oh! but 'tis a glorious thing to free Cities, that were in slavery! I grant it, if they have done no act of Hostility against you: but if they have been of Antiochus's side, how much more worthy is it of your prudence and equity, for you to consult the good of your Allies, that have deserved well of you, than that of your Enemies?

This Speech of the Kings was grateful to the Senate; so that it was very apparent they would do all things munificently, and with great freedom. Then the Smyranean Embassy, which was short, interposed, because some of the Rhodians were not there; who having been extraordinarily commended, for that they chose to undergo the greatest extremities, rather than surrender themselves to the King, the Rhodians were introduced; the chief of whom, having set forth the original of their Friendship with the Romans, and the merits of the Rhodians in the War, first, against Philip, and then against Antiochus, said; "There is nothing (Grave Fathers!) in our whole affair, more difficult, or more troublesome to us, than that we have a controversy with Enmenes, with whom alone, above all other Kings, not only every man of us, in his private capacity, but (that which more concerns us) our City in general has always maintain'd a publick correspondence. It is not (grave Fathers!) our affections, but the nature of the things themselves, which is most powerful, that disunites us; so that we, being our selves free, plead the cause of other mens liberty also; whilst Kings would have all People to be Slaves, and subject to their own Command. But however the thing be, our modesty toward the King obstructs us more than either our dispute is intangled, or seems likely to give you the trouble of a perplex'd deliberation [about it.] For if no honour could be otherwise paid to a King, that is your Ally and Friend; who also deserv'd very well of you in this very War (and of whose rewards you are now consulting) but by your delivering up free Cities in Vassalage to him; your deliberation [at this time] would be very doubtful; lest you should either send away the King, your Friend, without any honour confer'd upon him; or relinquish your first design, and fully that glory which you gain'd in the War against Philip, by enslaving so many Cities: but from the necessity, either of diminishing your love to your Friend, or your own glory, fortune does at this time in an extraordinary manner preserve you. For your Victory, through the bounty of the Gods, is not more glorious than rich: and able easily to discharge you from this debt. For not only Lycaonia, but both the Phrygia's, all Pisidia and Chersonesus, with all those Countries of Europe that lie round about, are in your disposal; of which any one, that you please to give him, may sufficiently augment the Kingdom of Enmenes: but all of them together would make him equal to the greatest Kings. You therefore may well enrich your Allies with the rewards of War, and yet not recede from your intentions: but remember, what reason for a War you pretended formerly against Philip, and now against Antiochus: what you did after you had conquer'd Philip, and what at present is desired and expected of you, not more, for that you once did it, than it becomes you so to do. For several Nations have several honourable and probable reasons to take up Arms. Some to get possession of such and such a Country, others such and such Villages, others Towns, others Ports, or some part of the Sea-Coast. But you neither desired these things before you had them, nor can you now covet them, since the whole World is in your hands. You fought for Renown and Glory among all Mankind, who have long admir'd your Name and Empire as much as the immortal Gods. Now what it was very hard to gain, I am afraid 'tis more difficult to preserve. You undertook to defend the liberty of an ancient noble Nation (whether you consider the Fame of what they have done, or your general commendation for humanity and learning) from the Tyranny of Kings. And therefore it behoves you perpetually to protect all that Nation which you have receiv'd into your care and tutelage. Those Cities that are in the ancient Country [of Greece in Europe] are not more Grecian Cities, than your Colonies,

LIV.

"which formerly went thence into Asia; nor has the changing of their Climate alter'd their nature or their manners. We dare, every City of us, vie with our Parents and Founders in a pious contest for good Arts and Virtue. You have many of you been in the Cities of Greece and Asia. Save that we are farther distant from you, we are outdone in nothing else. The Massilians, whom, if their nature could have been overcome by the genius (as it were) of the soil, so many unciviliz'd Nations, as I see round about them, had long e'er this corrupted, are as much esteemed (we hear) and justly valued by you, as though they lived in the very centre of all Greece. For they have kept not only the tone of the Language, the Garb and Habit, but, above all, the Manners, Laws and Humour [of their Country] free and entire from the Contagion of their Neighbours. The bound of their Empire now is Mount Taurus, and whatsoever is within that limit you ought not to think remote. But wheresoever your Arms have come, thither also 'tis fit your justice should reach even from this City. Let the Barbarians, who never knew any Laws but the commands of their Lords, have (what they delight in) Kings; whilst the Greeks are pleas'd with their own Fortune [that is] their Wills. They formerly with domestick force also embraced Empire; now they wish that where the Empire at present is, there it may for ever continue. It is enough for them to defend their Liberty with your Arms, since they cannot with their own. But some Cities were of Antiochus's side; and others before of Philips and Pyrrhus's, being Tarentines. Not to reckon up any other Nations, Carthage is free and enjoys its own Laws. See you, Grave Fathers! how much you owe to this example of yours. You will be persuaded to deny that to Eumenes's avarice which you deny'd to their own mult' just anger. We Rhodians leave it to your judgment, what brave and faithful service we have done you both in this and all other Wars that you have waged upon that Coast. And now in time of Peace we give you such advice, as, if you approve of it, will make all People believe that you use your Victory with more Gallantry than you got it.

L.V. This Oration seem'd futable to the Roman grandeur. After the Rhodians, Antiochus's Embassadors were call'd in; who, after the ordinary manner of those that beg Pardon, Having confessed the Kings error, beseech'd the Senate, that they would remember and consult their own clemency rather than the Kings faults, who had already suffer'd sufficiently for it; and, in fine, that they would by their Authority confirm, the Peace made by L. Scipio on the same terms that he had granted it. Thereupon not only the Senate agreed to the observation of that Peace, but the People also in a few Days after, gave their consent. The League was struck in the Capitol with Antipater, head of the Embassy, and Son to King Antiochus's Brother. After which the other Embassadors likewise out of Asia had their audience. To all which there was this answer given, That the Senate, after the manner of their Ancestors, would send ten Embassadors into Asia to controvert and compose all differences there; but that this should be the result of all, that all the Country on this side Mount Taurus, that was within the confines of King Antiochus's Kingdom, should be given to Eumenes, except Lycia and Caria as far as the River Meander; and that should be subject to the Rhodians. That the rest of the Cities in Asia, that had been stipendiary to Attalus, should all pay a tribute to Eumenes; but those that had been tributary to Antiochus, should be free and without any imposition. They pitch'd upon, for these ten Embassadors, Q. Minucius Rufus, L. Furius Purpureo, Q. Minucius Thermus, Ap. Claudius Nero, Cn. Cornelius Merula, M. Junius Brutus, L. Aurrunculeius, L. Aemilius Paulus, P. Cornelius Lentulus, and P. Aelius Tiberus.

L.VI. Now concerning those things, that required their presence upon the place to debate them, these Persons were free to do as they thought good; but concerning the business in general, the Senate determin'd thus, That all Lycaonia, both the Phrygias, Myfia, the Kings Woods, all Lydia and Ionis (except such Towns as had been free at the same time when they fought with King Antiochus) and particularly Magnesia near Sipylum, with Cana, which is called Hydreia, and the Country of the Hydrelites, lying toward Phrygia, the Castles and Villages by the River Meander, and all Towns but what were free before the War. Telmessus also by name, with the Forts belonging to it, and the Lands that had belonged to Ptolomy of Telmessus, that all these places and things above written should be given to King Eumenes. To the Rhodians was assigned all Lycia, beyond the aforesaid Telmessus, the Forts belonging thereunto, and the Lands that formerly appertain'd to Ptolomy of Telmessus; for these were excepted both by Eumenes and the Rhodians too. That part of Caria too was given to them, that lies nearer to the Island of Rhodes beyond the River Meander, consisting of Towns, Villages, Castles, and Lands that reach as far as Pisidia; saving such Towns among them, that had been at liberty the Day before they fought with King Antiochus in Asia. For this when the Rhodians had given [the Senate] thanks, they treated concerning the City of Soli in Cilicia, saying, That they as well as themselves were descended from the Argives; from which Cognation they came to love like Brothers. Wherefore they desired this extraordinary favour, that they would deliver that City from being slaves to the Kings. Thereupon King Antiochus's Embassadors were call'd and discours'd, but could not be in any wise prevail'd upon, Antipater appealing to the League, against which the Rhodians desired to have not only Soli, but to go over Mount Taurus and take all Cilicia. Upon that the Rhodiens being call'd back into the Senate, when the House had told them, how vehement ment the Kings Embassadour was, they added; That, if the Rhodians thought that matter concern'd the dignity of their City, the Senate would by all manner of means overcome the obstinacy of the Embassadors. With that the Rhodians thank'd them much more heartily than before; and said, they would rather yield to the arrogance of Antipater, than give any occasion of disturbing the Peace: So that there was no alteration made as to [the City of] Soli.

At the same time that these things were done, the Massilian Embassadors brought word, that L. Bæbius, as he was going into the Province of Spain, was circumvented by the Ligurians, and, having great part of his Attendants slain, was himself so wounded, that though with some few [Companions] (but no Lictors) he got away to Massilia; he died there within three days. The Senate, hearing that, decreed, that P. Junius Brutus, who was Pro-Prætor in Etruria, delivering the Province and the Army to one of his Lieutenants (whom he thought fit) should himself go into the farther Spain, which should be his Province. This order of Senate and a Letter, was sent by Sp. Postumius the Prætor into Etruria; and P. Junius the Pro-Prætor accordingly went into Spain. In which Province, a little before his Successor came, L. Aemilius Paulus, who afterward, to his great glory, conquer'd King Perseus, though the year before he had had but ill success; having raised a tumultuary Army, fought the Lusitanians in a pitch'd Battle. The Enemies were all totally routed, eighteen thousand Souldiers slain, three thousand three hundred taken, and their Camp seiz'd: The Fame of which Victory made things much quieter in Spain. The same year before the 30th of December, L. Valerius Flaccus, M. Atilius Serranus, and L. Valerius Tappus, were the Triumviri, that carried a Latine Colony to Bononia by order of the Senate, consisting of three thousand men; of whom the Horsemen had seventy Acres of Land apiece, and the others fifty. The Land had been taken from the Boian Gauls: [as] the Gauls had driven out the *Tuscan*s. That same Year many great men stood for the Censorship: which business, as though it had not been in it self enough to have bred any great contest, occasioned another contention much greater. There stood as Candidates, T. Quintius Flaminius, P. Cornelius Scipio (Son to Cneius) L. Valerius Flaccus, M. Porcius Cato, M. Claudius Marcellus, and M. Atilius Glabrio; who had conquer'd Antiochus and the Ætolians at Thermopylae. Now to this last of them (because he had made a great many Doles, whereby he had obliged great part of the People) did the favour of the multitude incline. Which so many of the Nobility being not able to endure; that an upstart Fellow should be so far prefer'd before them; P. Sempronius Gracchus, and C. Sempronius Rutilus, Tribunes of the People appointed him a day of Trial, for that he had neither carried in Triumph, nor brought into the Treasury, some part of the Kings money, and of the booty that was taken in Antiochus's Camp. The testimonies of the Lieutenants and Tribunes of the Souldiers were very different. But above the rest of the witnesses M. Cato was most taken notice of; whose authority, which he had gained by the constant [uniform] tenour of his Life, the white Gown [used by Candidates] diminish'd. He being a witness [in the case] said, that he did not see, at the Triumph, any of those gold and silver Vessels that were taken among other booty in the Kings Camp. At last, in Envy to him more than any body else, Glabrio said, He would stand no longer; seeing that what Noblemen were only in silence vex'd at, that a Competitor, who was as very an upstart as himself, had malign'd with such an horrid act of perjury, as no mult' [or fine] could equal.

There was a Fine laid upon him of a hundred thousand [Sesterces.] Now they contended twice about that matter; but the third time, when the person accus'd had desisted from his pretensions [to the office] the people would neither pass any Votes concerning the Fine, nor the Tribunes be any longer engaged in that business. The Censors created were T. Quintius Flaminius, and M. Claudius Marcellus. By whose means, there having been [an Audience of] the Senate granted to L. Aemilius Regillus (who had defeated Antiochus's Admiral by Sea) without the City, in the Temple of Apollo; when they had heard what he had done, and with what mighty Fleets of Enemies he had fought, as also how many Ships he had sunk or taken, he had a Naval Triumph granted him by the general consent of the House. He triumph'd upon the first of February: in which Triumph there were carried through the City forty nine Crowns of gold, but nothing near so much money as might have been expected in a Royal Triumph, there being [only] thirty four thousand seven hundred Attick Tetradrachmes [each of which was the weight of four Deniers] and of Cistophori [another Coin] a hundred thirty one thousand three hundred. Thereupon by order of Senate there were Supplications made; for that L. Paulus Aemilius had met with such success in Spain. Not long after L. Scipio came to the City: who lest he might seem inferior to his Brother for want of a Surname, would needs be called Asiaticus. He discours'd of his Achievements both in the Senate and before the People [at which time] there were some, who said, that War was greater for the Fame of it, than for any difficulty that he met with; it being ended in one memorable Battle; and that the glory of that Victory was anticipated at Thermopylae. But to one that truly consider'd it, It was a War with the Ætolians, at Thermopylae, more than with the King. For what Forces had Antiochus there? But in Asia there were all the powers of Asia up in Arms, and Auxiliaries muster'd together from the utmost limits of the East, out of all Nations. Wherefore they not only paid the immortal Gods all imaginable able honour, for that they had made the Victory as easy as it was great, but likewise decreed, that the General should Triumph. He accordingly triumphed in the Leap-Month [i.e. February] on the last day of it; and his Triumph was a more glorious show to the Eye, than that of his Brother Africanus; but, for the account of their achievements, and in respect of the danger and difficulty they met with, no more to be compar'd to it, than if you should set one General in competition with the other, or compare Antiochus to Annibal. He carried in Triumph two hundred thirty four military Ensigns; draughts of Towns a hundred thirty four, Elephants Teeth a thousand two hundred and twenty, and Crowns of gold two hundred twenty four. Of silver a hundred thirty seven thousand four hundred and twenty pounds; of Attick Tetradrachmes two hundred twenty four thousand, of Cistophores three hundred thirty one thousand and seventy, of pieces of Philippian gold a hundred and forty thousand, of silver Vessels (all of them Emboss'd) a thousand four hundred twenty four pound weight, and of golden ones a thousand pound weight. There were also some Captains of the Kings, with certain Prefects, and thirty two of his Courtiers led before the Chariot. To each Souldier was given the sum of twenty five Deniers; double so much to a Centurion, and treble to an Horseman: besides that there was a Souldiers pay, and a double quantity of Corn bestow'd upon them after the Triumph; as he had allow'd them formerly after the Battle in Asia. He triumpht almost an Year, after he went out of his Consulship.

LIX. About the same time Cn. Manlius also, the Consul, in Asia, and Q. Fabius Labeo the Prætor, came to the Fleet. Now the Consul did not want occasions to make War against the Gauls [in Asia.] But the Sea was at quiet, since Antiochus was defeated. As Fabius therefore was considering, what he had best do, that he might not seem to keep the Province idle, he thought it most convenient for him to go over into the Island of Crete. For there the Cydonians were waging a War against the Gortynians and the Gnosians, and it was reported, that there were a great number of Roman Captives, besides other people of the Italian Race, in slavery all over the Island. He therefore setting out with his Fleet from Ephesus, as soon as he arrived at Crete, sent Messengers about to all the Cities; to charge them to lay down their Arms, and each of them to muster up and bring back the Captives that were within their several jurisdictions; as also, to send Embassadors to him, with whom he might treat of things that equally concern'd both the Cretans and the Romans. But those words did not much move the Cretans: for none, except the Gortynians render'd back their Captives. Valerius Antias tells us, that there were four thousand Captives render'd, out of the whole Island, because they fear'd the threats of a War: and that that was the reason, (for he had done nothing else) why Fabius obtain'd a Naval Triumph. Fabius came back from Crete to Ephesus: from whence, having sent three Ships to the Coast of Thrace, he order'd Antiochus's Garisons to be drawn out of Enus and Maronia, that those Cities might be at liberty.

DECADE

DECADE IV. BOOK VIII.

The EPILOGUE.

4. &c. M. Fulvius the Consul, in Epirus, took the Ambracians, whom he Besieged, by surrender. 28. He subdu'd Cephallenia: and granted the conquer'd Ætolians a Peace. 12, 13, &c. Cn. Manlius, the Consul (his Colleague) vanquish'd the Gallogræcians, Tholistogians, Testolages, and Trocmans, who were come, under the Conduct of Brennus, over into Asia; being the only people that on this side Mount Taurus were not obedient. 16. Their original and when they first came into those Countries, they now possess, is related. 24. With an Example of Virtue and Chastity in a certain Roman: who being Queen to the King of Gallogræcia, whom she was taken, kill'd a Centurion that had offer'd violence to her. 36. A Survey [of the people] was set up by the Censors: at which the Pole came to two hundred fifty eight thousand three hundred twenty eight Roman Citizens. 39. They enter'd into an Alliance with Ariarathes King of Cappadocia. 45, 46, &c. Cn. Manlius (though the ten Embassadors contradicted it, by whose advice he had made a League with Antiochus) having pleaded his own cause in the Senate, triumph'd over the Gallogræcians. 50. Scipio Africanus, having a day appointed him [to appear in Court] as some say, by Q. Petillius, Tribune of the People, or, as others, by Nævius; for that he defrauded the treasury of the booty taken from Antiochus; when the day came, was call'd forth into the Rostra [a place where Orations were made] and said, This day, Fellow Citizens! I conquer'd Carthage: and so with the People attending upon him, he went up to the Capitol: 53. From whence (lest he might be any more tormented by the injustice of the Tribunes) he went into voluntary exile to Laternum; though 'tis uncertain whether he died there or at Rome: for there was a Monument set up for him at both places. 55, &c. Scipio Asiaticus, Brother to Africanus, was accus'd of the same crime (of cheating the publick) and condemn'd; but as he was going to Prison, Tib. Sempronius Gracchus, Tribune of the People, who formerly was an Enemy to the Scipio's, interceded for him; and for that kindness had Africanus's Daughter. 60. When the Pretor had sent the Quæstors to take possession of his goods upon the publick account, there was not only no appearance of any money that had been the Kings, but they could not even make up the sum in which he was condemn'd: for he would not accept of an innumerable parcel of money that his Friends and Relations gather'd for him: but what was necessary for him, in cloths, &c. was brought [to his hand].

W Hilst the War continu'd in Asia, things were not perfectly quiet, even in Ætolia, the Athamians giving the first occasion [of disturbance]. For Athamania at that time, Amynder being expell'd, was under Philips Prefects, and kept by a Party of his men; who through their Tyrannical and boundless behaviour had made the people wish for Amynder again. Thereupon Amynder, who at that time was in banishment in Ætolia, had some hopes given him, by Letters from his Friends (who told him the state of Athamania) that he should recover the Kingdom: and therefore he sent Messengers back to the Nobility at Argithea (which is the Metropolis of Athamania) to tell them; that, if they rightly understood the inclinations of his Countrymen, he would get rid of the Ætolians, and come into Athamania with certain select persons of Ætolia (who were the Council of the Nation) and Nicanor their State-holder. Whom, when he saw prepared for all manner of deligns, he soon after made acquainted, what day he would enter with his Army into Athamania. There were at first but four Conspirators against the Macedonian Garison: but these four took six more to their assistance in the business. After which, being afraid that their number, being so small, was more fit for the concealing than the doing of such an exploit, they added a number equal to the former. By this means, being now fifty two in all, they divided themselves into four parts; one whereof went to Heraclea, and another to Tetraphylia (where the Kings money used to be kept) the third to Thendonia, and the fourth to Argithea. Now they all agreed among themselves, that, at first, they should walk peaceably about the Forum, as though they had come about some private business; but, upon such a day, they should call all the mob together to drive the Macedonian Guards out of the several Castles. When that day came, and Amynder was with a thousand Ætolians in the Confines [of Athamania] the Garisons of the Macedonians were routed, by agreement, in four several places at once: and Letters sent all about into the rest of the Cities; [advising them] to vindicate themselves from the Tyrannical Dominion of Philip, and restore him to his Hereditary and lawful Kingdom. Thereupon the Macedonians were, on all sides, expell'd: though the Town of Teium (whereof the Castle was in the hands of a Garison belonging to the King, from the Prefect [or Governour] of which (named Zeno) they intercepted a Letter) for some few days made resistance. But then that too was surrender'd to Amynder and all Athamania was in his power, except the Castle of Atheneum, which lies upon the Borders of Macedonia.

Philip, when he heard that Athamania was revolted, set out with six thousand men, and with great celerity came to Gomphi: where having left the greater part of his Army (for they would not have endured such long marches) he went with two thousand to Atheneum, which was the only [Fort] yet held by his men. From whence making some Tryals of the adjacent parts, when he easily found that the rest were all Enemies, he went back to Gomphi, and then return'd with all his Forces together into Athamania. After that he order'd Zeno, whom whom he sent before with one Thousand Foot, to take possession of Ethopia, which lies very conveniently above Argithea; which Place, when he saw that his own Men were possessed of, he himself encamped near the Temple of Jupiter Acreus. Where having been detain'd one Day by foul Weather, he design'd next Day for Argithea. And as they were going, the Athamans immediately appear'd to them, running several ways to the tops of Banks that were by [the Road side]. At the sight of them the foremost Ensigns stood still, and there was a dread and a consternation in the whole Army; and each of them began to think with himself, what would become of them, if that Army should be led down into the Vales under those Rocks. This disturbance therefore [among his Men] forced the King (who desired, if they would follow him, in all haste to pass the straits) to recall the foremost [i. e. to face about] and carry his Ensigns back the same way that he came. The Athamans at first followed quietly at a distance; but, when the Ætolians joyn'd them, left them to fall upon the Enemies Reer, and planted themselves about the flanks. Some of them, going before a nearer way, beset the Passes; and the Macedonians were in such an hurry, that, as if they were in a confus'd posture of flying, than of a regular march, leaving many of their Arms and Men behind them, they cross the River; which put a stop to their pursuit. From thence the Macedonians went back safe to Gomphi; and from Gomphi into Macedonia. The Athamans and Ætolians ran together from all parts to Ethopia, to surprise Zeno, and the thousand Macedonians there. But the Macedonians, having no confidence in that place, went up into an higher Hill, that was more craggy every way: from which the Athamans, having found out Avenues to it in several places, presently drove them; and, as they were dispers'd (besides that they could not easily escape through such pathless and strange Rocks) took part of them, and kill'd the rest. Many of them, for fear, threw themselves headlong from the Precipices; few of them escaping, with Zeno, to the King. The next day, by virtue of a Truce, they had time given them to bury their slain.

I.

II.

III. Amynder, having recovered his Kingdom, sent Embassadors to the Senate at Rome, and to the Scipio's in Asia, who staid at Ephesus after a great Battel with Antiochus, desiring Peace and excusing himself, that by means of the Ætolians he had recovered his Fathers Kingdom, but accused Philip. The Ætolians went out of Athamania into Amphilochia, and, by consent of the major part, reduced the whole Nation. When they had gotten Amphilochia again (for it formerly belong'd to the Ætolians) they descended with the same hopes into Aperantia, which was, great part of it, surrendered in the same manner without fighting. Dolopia was never subject to the Ætolians; but they were to Philip. They therefore first took up Arms; but when they heard, that the Amphilochians were with the Ætolians, and of Philip's running away out of Athamania, with the slaughter of his Garrison there, they themselves also revolted from Philip to the Ætolians. But whilst the Ætolians thought themselves every way secure from the Macedonians upon the score of the Nations that lay round about, there was a report, That Antiochus in Asia was conquer'd by the Romans. Nor was it long after, before the Embassadors return'd from Rome without any hopes of Peace; and brought word, that Fulvius the Consul was already come over with an Army. Whereupon they were frighted, and having caused Embassies to be sent, before, from Rhodes and Athens (that, through the Authority of those Cities, their petitions, which were so lately rejected, might gain the easier access to the Senate) dispatch'd away the Chief Men of their Nation to Rome, to try their utmost hopes, having never thought of making Peace before the Enemy was in sight. At this time M. Fulvius, having put his Army over to Apollonia, was consulting with the Nobility of Epirus, where to begin the War. The Epirotes were for his attacking Ambracia, which then had united it self with the Ætolians. For, Whether the Ætolians came to defend it, the Fields thereabout were wide enough to fight in; or, whether they declined the conflict, the taking of it would be no difficulty. For there was not only plenty of stuff near at hand, to raise Mounds and other Works; but that Arethon also, a navigable River, convenient for bringing thither all sorts of necessaries, ran by the very Walls; besides that the Summer (a season fit for the purpose) was then before them. By this means they persuaded him to march through Epirus.

IV. When the Consul came to Ambracia, the taking of it seemed to be a great task. For Ambracia stands under a rough Hill, which the Inhabitants call Perrhanthos. The City toward the Plain and the River, looketh toward the West; but the Castle, that stands upon the Hill, to the East. The River Arethon, flowing out of Acarnania, falls into a Bay of the Sea, which, from the name of the adjacent City, is called the Ambracian [Bay]. But, besides that it is enclosed on this side with the River, and, on that, with Hills; it is also fortified with a strong Wall, that is something more than three Thousand Paces about. Fulvius therefore planted two Camps at a small distance one from another, on the Plains side, and built one Fort on a rising ground against the Castle. All which he so endeavoured to join with a Mound and Trench, that neither the besieged might have any outlet from the City, nor those without any avenue to send Auxiliaries in. Upon the report of Ambracia's being besieged, the Ætolians were already met, by order of Nicander, their State-holder, at Stratum. From whence they, at first, intended to come with all their Forces, to hinder the the Siege. But when they saw, the City was, great part of it, encompassed with Works, and that the Camp of the Epirotes was pitch'd in a Plain beyond the River; they thought fit to divide their Army. So, Eupolemus, going to Ambracia with a Thousand nimble Fellows, enter'd the City at such Places, where their Fortifications were not yet quite clos'd up. Nicander had a design, at first, with the other part of the Men, to attack the Camp of the Epirotes in the Night time; though it was not easy for the Romans to assist him, the River being between. But soon after, thinking that a dangerous enterprise (for fear the Romans should by any means perceive it, or that he should not get safe back again) he was deter'd from this design, and turn'd his course toward the ravaging of Acarnania.

The Consul, having finished the Fortifications, wherewith he was to enclose the City, and the Works, that he was to plant against the Walls, attack'd it in five places at once: placing three [Engines] at an equal distance (where the Plain made the Town more accessible) over against Pyrrheum (as they call it); one opposite to [the Temple] of Æsculapius, and one against the Castle. He hook the Walls with his Rams; and with Beams, that had hooked Irons fasten'd to them, brush'd off the Battlements. The Townsmen, at first, what with the sight, and the thumps given against the Walls with such a terrible noise, were in a great dread and consternation. But when they saw that the Walls (beyond their expectation) were standing, they recover'd themselves again, and with Swipes, loaded with weights of Lead or Stones, or huge Timbers, drove the Rams downward; drew the Hooks with Iron Anchors, which they threw upon them, to the inner part of the Wall, and broke the Beam; and, not only with mighty Sallies upon those that look to the Works, but daily eruptions also upon the several stations [of Souldiers] put the Enemy into a fright. Now things standing thus at Ambracia, the Ætolians return'd from pillaging of Acarnania to Stratum. And then Nicander, the State-holder, being in hopes by a stout attack to raise the Siege, sent one Nicodamus with five hundred Ætolians into Ambracia: appointing a certain night, and a particular time of night too, wherein not only they should set upon the Enemies Works, that lay toward Pyrrheum, from the City; but he himself also might put the Roman Camp into a confusion: for he supposed that by such a doubtful tumult (the Night augmenting their fear) some memorable action might be done. Nicodamus therefore, at Midnight, having escaped some of the Watches, and broke through the rest by resolute forcing of his way, got over the Brachium [a Work in Fortification, made like an Arm that's bent in with an Elbow] and so quite into the City. By which he gave the Besieged some encouragement and hopes to attempt all manner of things; and as soon as the appointed Night came, immediately attack'd the Works. That undertaking was more dreadful to attempt than effect. Because there was no violence offer'd from without; the Stateholder of the Ætolians being either deter'd by fear, or chusing rather to assist the Amphilochians (whom he had lately receiv'd into his obedience, and) whom Perseus, Son to Philip, who was sent to retake Dolopia and Amphilochia, did then with all his might attempt.

VI. The Roman Works, as I told you before, toward Pyrrheum, were planted in three places; which, all at once, though not with the same provision, or force, the Ætolians set upon. Some of them came with burning Torches, and others with tow, pitch, and Balls of Wildfire, that made a blaze all over the Field; with which they at the first effort surpriz'd a great many [of the Enemy.] But soon after, when the noise and tumult was propagated into the Camp, and the signal given by Consul, they took up their Arms, and ran out at every Gate to assist [their Party.] In one place the business was carried on with Fire and Sword: but at the other two, the Ætolians, having rather only made an attempt, than really engaged in the fight, march'd off from their vain Enterprise. The heat of the Battle therefore was now confin'd to one place: where the two Generals, Eupolemus and Nicodamus encouraged the men, and fill'd them with almost certain hopes; that Nicander would be presently there, according to agreement, and set upon the Enemies Reer. This for some time kept up the Souldiers hearts: but when they saw no signal, as was agreed, given them by their own Party, and that the number of their Enemies increas'd, they, being disappointed, slacken'd their force: till, at last, quite forsaking the design (when they could now scarce make a safe Retreat) they were forced to fly into the City; having burnt part of the works, but lost more men than they themselves kill'd. Now had the matter been carried according to agreement, no doubt but the Works might have been destroy'd on one side at least, with great slaughter of the Enemy. The Ambracians, and the Ætolians that were within, did not only retreat from the Enterprise of that Night, but for the future also (as though they had been by their own Friends betray'd, were much more backward in all dangerous attempts. For now none of them made sallies out, as before, upon the Enemy, but fought securely in their several Posts upon the Walls, and in the Towers [built upon them.]

VII. Perseus, when he heard, that the Ætolians were coming, quitted the Siege of the City, which he was then attacking, and, having only pillaged the Country, went out of Amphilochia back into Macedonia. The Ætolians also were call'd thence by the ravage committed upon the Sea-Coast. For Pleuratus, King of the Illyrians, being come into the Corinthian thian Bay with sixty Fly-Boats, and having join'd those Ships of the Acheans, that were his Fathers, laid waste the maritime parts of Ætolia. Against whom there were sent a thousand Ætolians, who, which way soever the Fleet went, met them a nearer way through the windings of the shore. Now the Romans at Ambracia, by shaking the Walls in many places with their Rams, had made a great breach; and yet they could not get into the City. For not only a new Wall was with equal celerity set up instead of that which was demolish'd, but the Souldiers also standing upon the Ruines served for a Bullwark. Wherefore, seeing the Consuls attempt succeeded but very indifferently by open force, he intended to make a secret Mine under a place that was cover'd with his Galleries. And for some time, that they had work'd Night and Day (not only digging under ground, but carrying out the Earth) they escaped the Enemies knowledge: till on a sudden the heap of Earth, that was higher than ordinary, discover'd their work to the Townsmen. Who being afraid, lest there should have been a passage made, by demolishing of their Walls, into the City, began to dig a Trench within, against that work which was cover'd with the Galleries. Which when they had made as deep, as the bottom of the Enemies mine could probably be, commanding silence, they laid their Ears [to the ground] in several places, to try if they could hear them digging. Which when they had done, they made a strait way into the mine: Nor was it any great difficulty. For in a moment they came to a void space, where the Wall was propt up by the Enemies: and there, (now the two works were join'd, so that there was a way out of the Trench into the mine,) they first with the Iron Instruments that they had made use of in the Work, and after that, with the assistance of Souldiers that soon came under to help them) had an unseen Battle under ground. But the heat of that was quickly over; the besieged putting either Hair-Cloths of Goats Hair to stop the mine, where they thought fit, or sometimes Doors on a sudden before them. There was also a new device of no great difficulty found out against those that were in the mine. They got an Hoghead with an hole bored in it at the bottom, wide enough to put a middle siz'd Pipe into, which they made of Iron; as they also did the lid of the Hoghead, which was it self likewise perforated in several places. This Hoghead they fill'd with light Feathers, and placed it with the mouth to the mine. Through the Holes of the [Iron] [Head or] cover there stuck out long Spears (which they call Sarisse) to keep off the Enemy. Then they put a small spark of fire into the Feathers, which with a pair of Smiths Bellows, put into the head of the Pipe, they blew and lighted. From whence there proceeded not only a great quantity of smoke, but that with such an intolerable stink (which when the Feathers burnt, fill'd all the Mine) that hardly any man could endure to stay in it.

E e e e

VIII. Now things being thus at Ambracia, there came two Embassadors [named] Phæneas and Damoteles, from the Ætolians with a free Commission, by Decree of their Nation, to the Consul. For their Stateholder, seeing that, on one hand, Ambracia was attack'd, and on the other, that all the Coast was infested by the Enemies Ships; besides that Amphilochia and Dolopia were ravaged by the Macedonians: and that the Ætolians were not able to manage three several Wars at one time; call'd a Council, and consulted with the Ætolian Nobility, what he had best to do. They were all of opinion, that it was best to sue for Peace (if possible) upon good terms; but it could not be had then, upon tolerable conditions: Saying, That the War was undertaken in confidence of Antiochus: but now that Antiochus was vanquish'd both by Sea and Land too, and driven almost out of the World, quite beyond the Mountain Taurus, what hopes had they of being able to carry on the War? That Phæneas and Damoteles ought to do (in such a case as that) what was for the good of the Ætolians, and consistent with their own integrity. For what room for deliberation, or what choice of things had fortune now left them? The Embassadors therefore were sent with this Commission; to beg of the Consul, that he would spare their City, and take pity on that Nation, which had once been his Ally, but was forced (they would not say by injuries) by calamities at least upon mad actions. That the Ætolians had not deserv'd more evil in the War with Antiochus than they had done good before, when they fought against Philip. That as they were not very largely rewarded then, so neither ought they now to be immoderately punished. To which the Consul answer'd; That the Ætolians sued for Peace more frequently than ever truly and heartily. That they should imitate Antiochus in Petitioning for Peace, whom they had drawn into the War. That he quitted, not only some few Cities, concerning whose liberty he had contended, but even all Asia (a rich Kingdom) on this side the Mountain Taurus. That he would not hearken to the Ætolians, when they came to treat of Peace, unless they were unarm'd. They must first deliver up their Arms, with all their Horses; and after that give the Roman People a thousand Talents of silver: whereof one half should be paid at present, if they would have a Peace. To which he would also add, as an Article of their League, that they should have the same Friends and Enemies with the Romans.

IX. To which the Embassadors (because those demands were great, and because they also knew the untamed and inflexible resolutions of their own people) gave no answer, but went home again; that there they might over and over consult the Stateholder and the Nobility, upon the whole matter, what to do. Where being receiv'd with clamour and reproof, for protracting the time, when they were bid to bring back any terms of Peace whatever; they return'd to Ambracia; but, being circumvented by an Ambuscade, by laid near the Road,

Road, by the Acarnanians, with whom they were then at Wars, were carried Prisoners to Tyrrheum. This put a stop to the Peace: [but in the mean time] when the Athenian and Rhodian Embassadors, who came to sollicite on their behalf, were now with the Consul; Amynder also King of the Athamans, upon promise of security, was come into the Roman Camp; more concern'd for Ambracia, where the greater part of the time he had been in banishment, than for the Ætolians. The Consul being inform'd by them concerning the case of the Embassadors, commanded them to be brought from Tyrrheum; upon whose arrival they began to talk of Peace. Amynder was very earnest (which was his chiefest business) to bring the Ambracians to a Surrender. But since he did but little good that way by going close up to the Walls, and talking with the Nobility, at last, by the Consuls leave, he went into the City, and partly by his advice, partly by intreaty prevailed with them, to commit themselves to the disposal of the Romans. C. Valerius also, Son to Levinus (who first enter'd into Alliance with that Nation) being the Consuls Brother, born of the same Mother, did the Ætolians a great deal of service. Thereupon the Ambracians, having first agreed, that they might send forth the Ætolians Auxiliaries, without any molestation open'd their Gates. And then, to give [the Romans] five hundred Eubæan Talents; two hundred in hand, and three hundred more within six years, at equal payments: besides that they should restore to the Romans all their Captives and Fugitives. That no City should be lookt upon as free, which either had been taken by the Romans after that time, when T. Quintius came over into Greece, or had voluntarily surrender'd it self: and that the Island of Cephalenia should be excluded out of the League: Now though these things were somewhat less than they hoped for; yet the Ætolians de-r'd to refer it to their Council; which was granted them. They were taken up for a while by a Debate about the Cities; which having sometime been free, they were very loth should be torn (as it were) from their Body. Nevertheless they all agreed to accept of the Peace. So the Ambracians gave the Consul a golden Crown of a hundred and fifty pound weight; besides, that all the Images of brass and marble, with the Paintings, which adorn'd Ambracia (where Pyrrhus had formerly kept his Court) more than any other Cities in that Country, were taken and carry'd away: but nothing else was hurt or touch'd.

Thereupon the Consul going from Ambracia into the Inland parts of Ætolia, Encamp'd at Argos in Amphilochia; which is twenty two thousand paces from Ambracia. Thither also came the Ætolian Embassadors after the Consul had a good while admired why they staid. From whom when he heard that the Ætolian Council approved of the Peace, he order'd them to go to the Senate at Rome; and giving them leave to take the Athenians and Rhodians along with them, as Mediators (together with his Brother C. Valerius) himself went over into Cephalenia. But at Rome they found all the Nobilities Ears and Minds prepossessed with the accusations brought [against them] by Philip: who by Embassadors, as well as Letters, complaining, that Dolopia, Amphilochia and Athamania, were forceably taken from him; and that his Garrisons, yea and his Son Perseus too, were driven out of Amphilochia, made the Senate refuse to give Audience to their Petitions. Yet the Athenians and the Rhodians were heard very quietly. Of whom the Athenian Embassador, Leon, Son of Icesias, is said also to have prevailed upon them by his Eloquence: who making use of a common similitude, said, The multitude or common people of the Ætolians were like a calm Sea, before it was disturb'd by Winds; for as long as they continu'd in Alliance with the Romans, they were at quiet through the native tranquillity of their Nation. But when Thoas and Dicæarchus from Asia, and Meneæras with Damocritus, from Europe, once began to blow, then that Tempest arose, that dash'd them against Antiochus, as upon a Rock.

The Ætolians having been long toss'd to and fro in the Debate, at last brought it so to pass, that they agreed upon the terms of Peace, which were these: That the Ætolian Nation preserve the Empire and Majesty of the Roman People without fraud or guile. That they suffer no Army, that shall be led against the Romans Friends and Allies, to pass through their Country: nor lend them any assistance. That they have the same Enemies with the Roman People; bearing Arms and waging War in like manner against them. That they restore all Renegadoes, Fugitives and Captives to the Romans and their Allies; save those, that, having been once taken, return'd home, but were taken again: or those, who having been then Enemies to the Romans were taken, when the Ætolians were among the Roman Guards. For the rest, that those that shall appear, be deliver'd in a hundred days to the Magistrates of Corcyra without deceit. And that those, who shall not appear, be so restored, whenever each of them shall first be found out. That they give forty Hostages at the discretion of the Roman Consul: none of them younger than twelve years of age, nor any older than forty. That neither the Stateholder, Master of the Horse, or publick Notary be made an Hostage, nor any other person, who before was an Hostage to the Romans: and that Cephalenia be excluded out of the Articles of the Peace. Concerning the sum of money that they were to pay, and the payments thereof, there was no alteration made from their agreement with the Consul. But it was order'd, that (if they would rather do so) they should give gold instead of silver, so it were at the rate of one piece of gold for ten of silver. That as those Cities, Lands or Men that had once belong'd to the Ætolians; or any of them that were either by Arms subdu'd, or voluntarily submitted themselves to the Roman Government, when L. Quintius, and Cn. Domitius were Consuls, or after their time; that of them the Aetolians should not willingly resume any one. And that the Oeniade should be with their City and Lands, all subject to the Aetolians. Upon these terms there was a League struck with the Aetolians. The same Summer, and upon the very same dayes almost, on which these things were transacted by M. Fulvius the Consul in Aetolia, the other Consul Cn. Manlius waged a War in Gallogreece: which I shall now give you an account of. At the beginning of the Spring the Consul came to Ephesus, where having receiv'd the Forces from L. Scipio, and survey'd the Army, he made a Speech to his men; in which he commended their courage; for that in the War against Antiochus they had made an end of it in one Battle; and exhorted them to undertake a new War with the Gauls, who had not only assist'd Antiochus, but were of such an unruly spirit, that Antiochus was driven beyond the Mountain Taurus to little purpose, unless the Gauls were disabled: to which he added some few things which were neither false nor immodest concerning himself. They were all rejoiced to hear the Consul, and agreed to what he said; believing that the Gauls were part of Antiochus's Forces: but that, now the King was overcome, they needed not to value them. The Consul was of opinion that Eumenes (who was then at Rome) was very unreasonably out of the way; because he knew the Country and the nature of the People; besides that it was his interest to have the Gauls subdued. He therefore sent for his Brother Attalus from Pergamus, and having persuaded him to undertake the War along with him, he sent him home again under a promise to do what he and his Friends could to raise an Army. Accordingly some few days after, when the Consul was gone from Ephesus to Magnesia, Attalus met him with a thousand Foot, and two hundred Horse: having order'd his Brother Athenaus to follow him with the rest of the Forces, and committed the keeping of Pergamus to such as he thought would be faithful to his Brother and the Kingdom. The Consul, commending the youth, went forward with all his Forces and Encamped at Meander; because that River was not fordable on Foot; but he must of necessity get Boats to put over the Army.

XXIII. Having pass'd the Meander they came to Hiera Come; where there is a noble Temple of Apollo, with an Oracle; and the Priests are said to give their Answers (according as the case happens to be) in Elegant Verses. From hence they arrived in two dayes march at the River Harpasus; whither there came Embassadors from Alibanda, to desire him, either by his Authority or Arms, to reduce a Castle that had lately revolted from them, and make it submit to their ancient Laws. Athenaus also, Brother to Eumenes and Attalus came thither with Leusus of Crete, and Corragus of Macedonia: bringing a thousand Foot and three hundred Horse of mixt Nations along with them. The Consul sending a Tribune of the Souldiers with a small Party, retook the Castle by force and restored it to the Alabandians: whilst he himself went directly and Encamped at Antioch near the River Meander. The head of this River rises at Celene; which was formerly the chief City of Phrygia. But afterward they removed not far from old Celene, to a new City call'd Apamea, from Apamea, Sister to King Seleucus. The River Marsyas also, which rises not far from the head of Meander, falls into it. And there is a Tradition, that at Celene, Marsyas play'd upon the Pipe against Apollo. Now Meander, rising out of the highest part of the Castle in Celene, and running down through the middle of the City, is discharg'd first through Caria, and then through Ionia, into a Bay of the Sea, that lies between Priene and Miletum. At Antioch Seleucus, Son to Antiochus, came into the Consuls Camp, according to the League made with Scipio, to provide Corn for the Army: where there arose a small debate about Attalus's Auxiliaries; for that Seleucus said, Antiochus had agreed to give Corn to none but Roman Souldiers. But that also was decided by the Consuls resolution, who sending a Tribune gave order; that the Roman Souldiers should not take [any Corn] before Attalus's Auxiliaries had receiv'd it. From thence he went on to Gordintichus (as they call it) and so in three marches to Tabe; a City standing upon the Confines of Pisidia on that part that lies toward the Pamphylian Sea; where, since the Forces of that side of the Country were entire, there were men very eager to fight. And even the Horse, falling out upon the Roman Army, put them at the first attack into great disorder. But soon after, when it appear'd that they were not equal either in number or courage, being forced into the City, they ask'd pardon for their error, and were ready to yield themselves. They were injoin'd to pay twenty five Talents of Silver, and sixty thousand Bushels of Wheat; and so were admitted to make their surrender.

XIV. Three days after they came to the River Chaus: from whence they went and took the City of Eriza upon the first attempt. Then they proceeded to the Castle of Thabusion which stands upon the River Indus; so called from one Indus who was there thrown off an Elephant. And now they were not far from Cibyra: but no Embassy came from Moagetes, King of that City, who was a man very faithless and wayward in all his dealings. Wherefore, to try his inclinations, the Consul sent before him C. Helvius with four thousand Foot, and five hundred Horse. This Party was met, just as they enter'd into his Confines, by Embassadors, who told them, that the King was ready to do what they commanded; and desir'd, that he would come peaceably into their Country, keeping the Souldiers from making havoc of it. They brought fifteen Talents from a Crown of Gold; and Helvius promising to keep the Country entire from Plunder, order'd the Embassadors to go and wait upon the Consul. To whom (since (since they said the same thing before him too) the Consul made Answer: We Romans have not any testimony of the Tyrants good will toward us; besides that all the World know him to be such a person, as that we ought to think of punishing, rather than making an Alliance with him. The Embassadors being disturb'd at this, desir'd nothing else, than that he would accept of the Crown: and that he would permit the King to come and discourse him in order to atchieve himself. Accordingly the next day, by permission of the Consul the King came into the Camp, cloth'd and attended like an ordinary Man. Where he made a submissive, humble Speech, extenuating his own power, and complaining of the poverty of the Cities in his Dominions; which were (besides Cibyra) Syleum and Alimne. Out of these, he with some diffidence promised (though he beggar'd himself, and all his people) to raise twenty five Talents. Whereunto the Consul reply'd: This mockery of yours can no longer be born with. Was there not reason enough for your being ashamed of cheating us by your Embassadors when you were absent, but you must persist in the same impudence when present too? Five and twenty Talents would exhaust your Kingdom? Let me tell you, Sirs! unless you pay five hundred Talents to us in three dayes, you must expect a ravage in your Country, and a Siege before your City Walls. The King though frighted at this denunciation, yet continu'd in his obdurate pretence of poverty; but by degrees making an illiberal addition, sometimes with cavilling, and other whiles with begging and feigned tears, was brought to a hundred Talents: to which were added sixty thousand Bushels of Corn. All this was done within six days.

From Cibyra he led the Army through the Sindian Territories, and Encamped on the farther side of the River Calcaures. The next day they march'd by the Fenn Caraliis, and halted at Mandropolis. From whence when they went on to the next City named Lagos, the Inhabitants ran all away for fear. They therefore rifled the Town, that was forsaken of its people, but abounded in all sorts of provisions. Then from the Spring-head of the River Lyfis they went forward next day to the River Cobulatus. The Termessians at that time having taken the City, attack'd the Castle of Isionda: so that the besieged, having no other hopes of aid left, sent Embassadors to the Consul to desire his assistance [saying] that they, with their Wives and Children, being shut up in the Castle, every day expected death either by Sword or Famine. Whereupon the Consul, who before had a mind to go into Pamphylia, had then a good occasion offer'd him: and, at his arrival, raised the Siege from before Isionda. He granted Termessus a Peace (though he took fifty Talents of Silver from them) as he likewise did to the Aspendians, and the other people of Pamphylia. Out of Pamphylia he return'd the first day to the River Taurus, and, the next, Encamp'd at Xyline Come, as they call it. From thence he went straight to the City of Cormasa, the next City to which is Darsa. That he found deserted by the Inhabitants for fear, but full of all necessities. Whence as he went on by the Fenns, Embassadors met him from Lyfimoë, to surrender their City. Then he came into the Sagalassene Territories, a fruitful and a rich soil: inhabited by the Pisidians, who are much the best Warriors in all that Country. Whom as that animates, so does the fertility of the soil, the multitude of their people, and the situation of their City, which, among those few that are there is fortified. The Consul, because there was no Embassy ready at the Confines, sent his men to plunder the Country. By that means at last their obstinacy was tamed, when they saw all they had taken away. They therefore sent Embassadors, who, bargaining to give [the Consul] fifty Talents, a hundred and twenty thousand Bushels of Wheat, and sixty thousand of Barly, obtain'd a Peace. From thence going onward to the head of the River Obrima, he Encamp'd at a Village called Aporidos Come: whither Seleucus also came the next day from Apamea: and from that place, having first sent his sick men and other cumbersome Baggage to Apamea, took Guides of Seleucus's providing along with him, and march'd that day into the Plains of Metropolis, and the next day, on to Dimie in Phrygia. Then he came to Synnada; the Towns thereabout being deserted for fear. When therefore he had laden his Army with the plunder of them, so that they could scarce march five thousand paces in a day, he came to a place called old Reudos. From thence he went to Anabura; the next day to the head of [the River] Alander, and the third day Encamp'd at Abassus: There he continu'd for several dayes; because he was come to the Borders of the Tolistoboians.

These Gauls being a vast number of men, either for want of Land [to cultivate] or in hopes of plunder, thinking no Nation, through which they were to pass, equal to them in Arms, came under the conduct of one Brennus into Dardania. But there arose a Sedition, and twenty thousand men, revolting and dividing themselves from Brennus, went with Leonorius and Lutarius, two petit Kings, another way into Thrace. Where, by fighting with those that resisted them, and imposing a Tribute upon such as desired a Peace, when they came to Byzantium; they for sometime had all the Coast of Propontis Tributary to them, and the Cities of that Region under their Dominion. From thence they had a mind to go over into Asia; hearing from the neighbourhood, what a fruitful Country that was. Then, having taking Lyfimachia by Treachery, and forceably possessed themselves of all Cherfoneus, they went down to Hellepont: where seeing that they were divided from Asia by such a narrow strait, they were much more inclin'd to get over; and sent Messengers to Antipater, the Governour of that Coast concerning their passage. Which affair being protracted beyond beyond their expectations, there arose another new Sedition between the petit Kings. Leonorius went back with the greater part of the men to Byzantium from whence he came: whilst Lutarius took from the Macedonians (that were sent, under pretence of an Embassy, by Antipater, as Spies) two men of War and three lesser Ships. With these carrying over his men by parcels night and day, he, in a few dayes, put over all his Forces. Not long after Leonorius, by the assistance of Nicomedes, King of Bithynia, went over from Byzantium. Then the Gauls united again into one Body, and aided Nicomedes against Lybæa, who at that time held part of Bithynia; but was by their assistance chiefly subdu'd; so that all Bithynia became subject to Nicomedes only. Going out of Bithynia they march'd forward into Asia. Now of twenty thousand men there were not above ten thousand arm'd; yet they put all the Nations on this side Taurus into such a fright, that those they did, and those they did not come into, all alike, submitted to them. At last, seeing there were three Nations; the Tolistoboians, the Trocmans and the Tectosages: they divided Asia into three parts according as it was tributary to each of their people. To the Trocmans was given the Coast of Hellepont; as the Tolistoboians had Eolis and Ionia, and the Tectosages, the Inland parts of Asia: who exacted a Tribute (for maintaining of Souldiers) of all Asia on this side Taurus. Now they chose for their Seat the Country that lies about the River Halys: and so great was the terrour of their name, (whose multitude was also encreas'd by daily propagation,) that the Kings of Syria too at last refused not to pay them such a certain Revenue. The first that ever refused in Asia was Attalus, Father to King Eumenes: and his bold attempt was seconded by good Fortune; for he overcame them in a set Battle. But yet he did not so subdue them, that they would renounce their pretensions to govern: for they continu'd in the same condition till the War of Antiochus against the Romans. And then too, when Antiochus was beaten, they had great hopes; that, since they lived so far from the Sea, the Roman Army would not come to them.

XVII. Now seeing he must of necessity engage with this Enemy, who was so terrible to all Nations round about, the Consul made a speech to his Soldiers to this purpose, I know very well (fellow Soldiers) that of all the Nations, which inhabit Asia, the Gauls have the greatest reputation for Warriors. This fierce Nation, that hath wandered in War through almost the whole World, has taken a seat among a most civilized People. Their Bodies are tall, their Hair long and red, their Shields large, and their Swords very long; besides the noise they make when they begin to fight, with their howling, dancing, and the horrid clattering of their Arms when they shake their Shields after their Country manner: which are all industriously design'd to create terrour. But let the Greeks and the Phrygians fear these things, to whom they are unusual and rare: the Romans who are accusom'd to Gallick tumults, know these kinds of vanities. They once indeed at Allia, routed our Ancestors at the first onset: but since that time [our men] have, for these two hundred years, consternated, slain and routed them, like so many Sheep; so that there have been as many Triumphs made for the Gauls, as for all the World beside. Now this we know by experience, that if you weather their first effort, which they make upon you with an eager appetite, and blind fury, their limbs drop with sweat, and they are tired; their Arms fall out of their hands; and the Sun, dust, or thirst, enervate their tender Bodies, as well as their effeminate minds too, when their anger's allay'd, though you use no Sword against them. We have not only tryed their Legions by our Legions, but by one single man engaging with another. T. Manlius and M. Valerius have taught us, how far Roman valour exceeds Gallick Fury. We know that M. Manlius alone forced the Gauls down again, who were in a Body scaling the Capitol. Now those Ancestors of ours had to do with real Gauls, born in their own Country. But these are a degenerated sort of mixt people, as their name of Gallogreeks very rightly imports. For as in Fruits and Beasts, their Seeds are not so conducive to the preservation of their nature, as the propriety of the soil and air, where they are bred alters them. The Macedonians, who have Colonies at Alexandria in Egypt, at Selenicia and Babylon, and other parts of the World, are degenerated into Syrians, Parthians and Egyptians. Massilia in Gaul, has contracted somewhat of their disposition from their Neighbouring Nations: and what do the Tarentines retain of that severe and horrid discipline of the Spartans? No, every thing is born most generous in its own native soil: and that which is planted in a Foreign Land, quite alters its nature into that wherewith 'tis nourished. You therefore shall victoriously destroy the conquer'd Phrygians, who are loaded with Gallick Arms, as you did in the War against Antiochus. I am more afraid, that we shall gain little honour by it, than that the War will be too difficult for us. King Attalus oftentimes defeated and routed them. Do not you think, that Brutes only, which are newly caught, do at first retain their wild fierceness, and afterwards (when they have been fed out of mens hands) grow tame; but that in mollifying the savageness of men, nature observes not the same course. Do you believe these men to be the same, that their Fathers and Grandfathers were? No, they came, banish'd from home, for want of Land to cultivate, through the rough Coast of Illyrium, Pæonia and Thrace, and by fighting their way through the fiercest of Nations, got into these Countries. So that when they were harden'd and exasperated with so many misfortunes, they were entertain'd in a Land, that could glut them with all manner of plenty; and by the help of a fat soil, a good air, and kind Neighbours, all that fierceness, wherewith they came, was perfectly tamed. You therefore, who are the Sons of Mars, must have a care of and avoid, as soon as possible, the pleasures of Asia: so far do these Foreign delights, with the contagion of the discipline discipline and manners of their Neighbours prevail toward the extinguishing of the vigour of mens minds. But this falls out very well for you; that as they have not strength by any means equal to yours, so they have still a name equal to that ancient reputation, wherewith they came [hither:] and you will gain the same glory in the War, as though you had overcome the old Gauls with all their former courage.

Then having dismiss'd the Assembly, and sent Embassadors to Eposognatus, who, being one of the Petit Kings, had not only continu'd in Alliance with Eumenes, but likewise deny'd aid to Antiochus against the Romans, he removed his Camp. The first day he march'd as far as the River Alander, and the next day came to a Village called Tiscos; whither there came Embassadors from the Oroandians, to desire an Alliance; on whom he impos'd [a Tribute of] two hundred Talents; concerning which, upon their Petition, he gave them leave to make report to their Principals. From thence the Consul march'd with his Army to Pluendum, and so Encamp'd at Alyatti: to which place the persons sent to Eposognatus return'd, and Embassadors from the petit King along with them, desiring, that they [the Romans] would not make War upon the Tectosages: for Eposognatus himself would go into that Nation, and perswade them to do what was injoin'd them. The petit Kings request was granted; and then the Army was led through the Country which they call Axylos; having its name from the nature of it and signifying [without Wood.] For there it neither produces any Wood, nor so much as Thorns, or any other combustible matter; but the Inhabitants use Cow-dung instead of Wood. After that, whilst the Romans were Encamped at Cuballum a Castle of Gallogreece, the Enemies Horse appear'd with a great tumult: nor did they only disturb the Roman Quarters, as coming upon them so suddenly, but likewise kill'd some of them. Which tumult being propagated into the Camp, the Roman Horse fallied out immediately every way, and routed the Gauls, killing several of them in their flight. From thence the Consul, who saw, that he was come up to the Enemy, having first secur'd his passage, and then with care got all his men into one Body, march'd forward, and being arrived, without halting, at the River Sangarius, resolv'd to build a Bridge over it, because it was not fordable on Foot. This River Sangarius, flowing out of the Mountain Adoreus through Phrygia, runs, in Bithynia, into the River Thymbris; from whence being now much bigger, by reason that its Waters are doubled, it passes through Bithynia; and disembogues it self into Propontis: being yet not so memorable upon the score of its bigness; as that it affords the Neighbourhood a vast quantity of Fish. Having pass'd the River, when he had finish'd the Bridge, as they went by the Bankside, the Galli [Cybeles Priests, who was called the Great Mother] met him from Pessinus with the solemn Ornaments belonging to their Function, and prophesied in an inspired sort of Verse; That their Goddess gave the Romans free passage to the War, and Victory; with Dominion over that Country. To which the Consul reply'd, That he accepted of the omen, and pitch'd his Camp in that very place. The next day he came to Gordium: which is no great Town, but a noted Mart, beyond what Inland places use to be. It has three Seas at almost an equal distance from it; the Hellepont by Sinope, and the shores of the other Coast, which the maritime Cilicians inhabit. It likewise Borders upon many other great Nations; whose Commerce mutual convenience has chiefly brought into that place: This Town at that time they found deserted by the Inhabitants, who were all fled away, but full of all sorts of provisions. Whilst they staid there, Embassadors came from Eposognatus, who brought word, that though he had gone himself in person to the petit Kings of the Gauls, he had no reason done him. That they were going out of their Campaign Villages and Countries in great numbers, and taking along with them (besides their Wives and Children) all that they were able to carry off, made toward the Mountain Olympus, that from thence, by their Arms and the situation of the place together, they might defend themselves.

After that the Oroandian Embassadors brought certain news, That the Tolistoboians had possess'd themselves of the Mountain Olympus: and that the Tectosages were gone to another Mountain called Magaba: but that the Trocmans, having left their Wives and Children with the Tectosages, resolv'd to go in Arms and assist the Tolistoboians. Now the petit Kings of these three people at that time, were Ortiagon, Combolomarus and Gaulotus: whose chiefest reason to undertake a War was this; that since they were possess'd of the highest Hills in all that Region, having gotten together all such things as were necessary, though for a long time, they thought by mere Fatigue to tire out the Foe. For they would neither dare to come up such steep and uneven places: or, if they did attempt it, might even with a small force be hinder'd and thrown down again: nor would they, though they lay quiet at the foot of such cold Mountains, be able to endure cold and want. But though the very height of the place sufficiently defended them, they made a Trench also and other Fortifications about the Hills on which they lay. They took but very little care to provide darting Weapons; for that they believ'd the very roughness of the place would afford them plenty of stones.

The Consul therefore, because he foresaw that the fight would be, not hand to hand, but at a good distance from the places attach'd, had prepar'd a vast quantity of Piles [Javelins] light Spears, Arrows, Bullets and little stones, such as might be fit to be thrown in a Sling; and, being furnish'd with all these darting or hurling instruments, march'd toward the Mountain

XVIII.

XIX.

XX.

Mountain Olympus; from which he Encamp'd about five thousand paces. The next day, as he went on with four hundred Horse and Attalus, to view the nature of the Mountain, and the situation of the Gallick Camp, the Enemies Horse, who doubl'd his number, coming suddenly out of their Camp, put him to flight; some few of his men being kill'd as they ran away, but more wounded. The third day he went out with all his Forces to view the several places; and, because none of the Enemies came out of their Fortifications, rode securely round the Mountain; where he observ'd, on the Southside, certain green Banks, that ascended very pleasantly to such a place, but on the Northside, steep and almost perpendicular Rocks: and though most of the rest were unpassable, found out three Avenues: one in the middle of the Mountain, where 'twas grassy; but the two others very difficult on the North-East and South West sides. Having consider'd of these things that day he Encamp'd at the very Foot of the Mountain. The next day, having sacrificed, and appeas'd the Gods by the first offering that he made, he divided his Army into three parts, and led them toward the Foe; himself going up with the greatest part of his Forces, where the Mountain was most accessible. He order'd L. Manlius, his Brother, to march up on the North-East side, as far as the places would permit him, and he with safety might. That if he met with any dangerous, craggy part, that he should not contend with the unevenness of such a place, or think to conquer things insuperable: but should come down the side of the Hill and join him. He bad C. Helvius with the third part to go leisurely about at the bottom of the Mountain, and afterward on the South-West side to march his men upward. He also divided the Auxiliaries of Attalus into three parts of equal numbers: but order'd the youth himself to go along with him; leaving the Horse, with the Elephants in the Plain adjacent to the Hills, and giving charge to the chief Officers [of them] diligently to mind what was done on all sides, and make hast to assist them, where there was occasion for it.

XXI.

The Gauls being secure enough of their two sides, that they were unaccessible on that part which lay to the South, in order to block up the way, sent near four thousand arm'd men to possess themselves of a Bank that lies by the pass about a thousand paces from the Camp: supposing that thereby, as with a Fort, they should stop up the Avenue. Which when the Romans saw, they straight prepar'd themselves for a fight. Before the Ensigns at a small distance went the Light-Armour, with Attalus's Cretan Archers, Slingers, and the Thrallians of Thrace: whilst the Ensigns of Foot as they were led very gently up so steep a place, so had their Shields before them, only to avoid the Darts, and not as though they resolv'd to engage Foot to Foot. So the Battle was begun at a distance with casting Weapons, being at first pretty equal; for that the situation of the place was an help to the Gauls, though the Romans had the better on't in point of variety and plenty of Arms. But when they had fought for some time, there was no comparison between them. For their Shields, which were long, but not broad enough for their large Bodies (besides that they were also plain) were no good covering to the Gauls. Nor had they by this time any Weapons save Swords: of which, since the Enemy did not engage hand to hand, there was no use. They made use of Stones, which neither were small enough (they having prepar'd none before hand) but such as came by mere chance in the hurry to their hands, nor (being unaccustom'd to that way of fighting) did they either by art or strength inforce their blow. They therefore were pelted with Arrows, Bullets, and Darts (as being unprovided) on all sides; nor could they see, being blinded with anger and fear together, what to do: because they were surpriz'd with a sort of fight, for which they were not any ways fitted. For, as, when they engaged hand to hand, where they could mutually give and take wounds, their spirits were enflamed with passion; so being wounded they could not tell from whence, and at a distance with light Weapons, nor having any place which with blind fury they could run upon, they set, like Wild-Beasts, that are shot through, upon their own party. That which the more discover'd their wounds was that they fought naked; their Bodies also tender and white, as being never stripp'd but in a Battle. By that means they not only lost the more blood out of their fleshy Limbs, but their wounds were also more dreadful, and the whiteness of their Skin was more stained with the black blood. Yet they are not concern'd for such apparent wounds; but cut their own flesh, where the hurt is broader than deeper, and fancy they fight with more honour for that reason. Nevertheless the same persons, when the head of an Arrow, or a Bullet that's got into the flesh at a small Orifice slings them (and those that look for it cannot get it out) are presently mad and ashamed that such a slight thing should be their bane, and throw themselves down all along upon the ground. Others of them rushing fiercely upon the Foe, were wounded on every side: and when they came hand to hand were kill'd by the Light-armour'd Souldiers called Vehites. This sort of Souldiers have a Shield of three foot long, and in their right hands Spears, which they use at a distance; being begirt with a Spanish Sword. But if they have occasion to engage Foot to Foot, they remove their Spears into their left hands, and draw their Swords. By this time there were but few Gauls left alive: who seeing themselves overcome by the Light-armour, and that the Legions were at hand, ran back as hard as they could drive to their Camp, which was now full of fear and tumult; being that there both Women and Children,

Children, and all other people that were unfit to make Souldiers of, were mixt together: so the Romans got possession of the Hills, which the Enemy had deserted.

About the same time L. Manlius, and C. Helvius, having gone upward, as far as the declining Hills would suffer them, when they came to places that were unpassable, turn'd toward that side of the Mountain, which was only accessible, and began both to follow the Consul at a small distance, as though they had agreed upon't before hand; being forced to that by mere necessity, which had at first been their best course. For reserves in such rough places have often been of very great use; that when the foremost chance to be beaten down again, the next may not only shelter the routed party, but come themselves in fresh to the fight. The Consul, when the first Ensigns of the Legions came to the Hills that the Light-arm'd men had taken, order'd his men to take breath and rest themselves a little while; shewing them the Gauls at the same time, who lay all along upon the Hills; and said, if the Light-armour did such an exploit, what might be expected from the Legions, from men in perfect armour, and from persons of the greatest resolution? That they must needs take the Camp into which the Enemy being forced by the Light armour betook themselves and trembled. But he order'd the Light-arm'd men to march before; who, whilst the Army halted, had spent that very time to good purpose in gathering up the Weapons that lay all over the Hills, that they might be sure of hurling Arms enough to serve their turns. And now they were near the Camp, when the Gauls, lest their Fortifications should not well defend them, flood arm'd before the Bullwark. By which means being born down with all sorts of Weapons (for that by how many the more and thicker they were, so much the harder it was for any Weapon to miss them) they were in a moment of time forced into their Bullwark, having only left strong Guards at the very entrance of their Gates. Upon the multitude that was forced into the Camp there was a great quantity of hurling Weapons thrown, and that many of them were wounded you might know by the noise which was mingled with the cries of Women and Children. At those, that stood as Guards at the several Gates, the Antesignani [such as stood before the Ensigns] of the Legions threw Javelins. But they were not wounded; only, having their Shields stuck through, they were many of them fasten'd one to another: nor could they any longer sustain the Romans vigour.

XXIII.

Thereupon flinging open their Gates, before the Conquerours got in, the Gauls run out of their Camp on every side, with all the speed imaginable, through paths and no paths; nor could any Precipices or craggy Rocks hinder them; for they fear'd nothing else except the Enemy. Wherefore a great many of them, falling headlong down a vast height, were kill'd. The Consul having taken the Camp abstain'd from the plunder and booty of it; bidding his Souldiers, Follow him every man of them in pursuit of the Foe, and augment their fear, now that they already were under such a consternation. The other Army also with L. Manlius came thither; but he did not suffer them neither to enter the Camp; sending them straight away to pursue the Enemy. He himself too a while after follow'd them, having committed the keeping of the Captives to the Tribunes of the Souldiers; supposing that the War would be at an end, if in fright a considerable number of them were slain or taken: When the Consul was gone forth, C. Helvius arrived with the third party: nor could he keep his men from plundering the Camp; so that the booty became very unjustly theirs, who had not been present at the Battle. The Horse stood a good while, not only ignorant that there had been a Victory obtain'd on their side, but even that there had been a Fight. But at last they too, as far as their Horses could get up the Hills, pursuing the scatter'd Gauls, and over-taking them about the Foot of the Mountain, kill'd or took them. The number of the slain could not easily be told, because they ran and were slaughter'd through all the winding ways upon the Mountains: great part of them falling down from craggy Rocks into deep Vales, and part of them being kill'd in the Woods and among the Brakes. Claudius, who says there were two Battles fought upon the Mountain Olympus, says also, that there were forty thousand men slain: though Valerius Antias, who uses to be more immoderate in augment of numbers, tells us they were not above ten thousand. The number of the Prisoners was doubtless full forty thousand; for that they had carry'd along with them a crowd of all sorts and all Ages: more like a people that were going to leave their Country, than to War. The Consul having burnt all the Enemies Arms in one heap, order'd them all to bring the rest of the booty together, and either sold what part of it was to be given to the publick use; or with care, that it should be equal, divided it among the Souldiers. They were also all of them commended publicly, and each man rewarded according to his desert. But above all, Attalus, with general assent of the rest: for that youth was not only a person of singular Courage and industry in all enterprizes, and dangers but of extraordinary modesty also.

But now there yet remained an entire War with the Tectosages; against whom the Consul went, he arrived in three marches at Ancyra, a noble City in that Country: from whence the Enemy was distant a little more than ten thousand paces. Where whilst they were Encamped, there was a memorable action done by a Captive Woman. Ortiagon the petit Kings Wife, a Woman of great Beauty, was kept among several other Captives; who were committed to the Custody of a Centurion, that had all the lust and avarice of a Souldier about him.

XXIV.

F f f f f

him. He therefore first try'd her inclination. Which when he found averse to voluntary Adultery, he offer'd violence to her Body, which Fortune had made a Slave. After which, to alleviate the indignity of the injury, he put the poor Woman in hopes of returning to her own Country: but did not freely, like a Lover, having contracted with her for such a quantity of gold. Now lest any of his own People should know of it, he permitted her to send one of the other Captives (whom she pleas'd) as a Messenger to her own Country: appointing a place near the River; where two, and no more, Friends of the Captive Lady should come next Night with the gold and receive her. It happen'd that a Servant of the same Woman was one of the Captives under the mens Custody. Him therefore the Centurion carry'd, as the Messenger, at the edge of Night, without the Guards: and the next Night the Woman's two Friends and the Centurion with his Captive came to the place appointed. Where when they shew'd the gold, that made up the sum of an Attick Talent (for so much he had bargain'd for) the Woman commanded them with her own mouth to draw their Swords, and kill the Centurion as he was taking hold of the gold. Which when they had done, and cut off his Head, she took it, wrapt it up in her Gown, and carry'd it to her Husband Ortiagon, who was fled back home from Olympus. Whom before he embraced, she threw the Centurion's Head down before his Feet. At which seeing, he admir'd whose Head it was, or what more than Female Exploit it was that she had done; she confess'd to him what injury she had receiv'd, and how she revenged her forced Chastity, and (they say) by the Sanctity and Gravity of the remaining part of her Life, preserv'd to the last the honour of this Matron-like Achievement.

XXV. At Ancyra there came Envoys into the Consul's Camp from the Tectosages, desiring, That he would not Decamp from Ancyra, before he had discours'd with their Kings. For any conditions of Peace would be more eligible to them than War. The time therefore was to be on the Morrow, and the place, as nigh the middle as could be between the Gallick Camp and Ancyra. Whither when the Consul was come at the due time with a guard of five hundred Horse, and seeing ne'r an one of the Gauls there, was come back; the same Envoys return'd to excuse their Masters, and said, That their Kings could not come upon the score of Religion: but the Nobility of the Nations, by whom the matter might be as well transacted, would come. The Consul also said, that he would send Attalus. Accordingly they came on both sides to this Conference: and Attalus having brought along with him three hundred Horse for a Guard, they laid down the terms of Peace. But because no end could be put to the business whilst the Generals were absent, they agreed, that the Consul and the Kings should meet there the next day. The disappointment on the Gauls part was design'd; first to gain time, till they could put their goods (with which they were unwilling to perish) with their Wives and Children over the River Halys; and secondly, because they were contriving a Plot against the Consul himself, who was an heedless man, and suspected not the treacherous intent of the Conference. For which purpose they chose out a thousand Horse of all their numbers, who were men of known Courage. And their treachery had taken effect, had not Fortune stood up for the Law of Nations which they had a design to violate. For the Roman Foragers, and those that went to fetch in Wood, were led into that part of the Country where the Conference was to be; the Tribunes supposing that to be the safest place, because they were like to have the Consul's Guard and himself too before them, to oppose the Enemy. Nevertheless they planted their other Guard also of six hundred Horse, nearer to the Camp. The Consul, upon Attalus's Affirmation, that the Kings would come, and the matter might be transacted, went out of the Camp, and when he was got forward about five thousand paces with the same guard, as before of Horse, so that he was not far from the place appointed; he saw, on a sudden, the Gauls coming in a full Carier, and a Hostile manner toward him. Wherefore he set his Army in order, and having commanded the Horse to make ready their Weapons and prepare their minds, he at first very resolutely receiv'd the first charge of the Battle, without giving way; but soon after, the multitude pressing on too fast upon him, he by degrees retir'd, though the ranks of his Troops were thereby not at all disorder'd. At last, seeing there was more danger in his staying there, than safety in the preservation of his Ranks, they all ran away as fast as they could. Thereupon the Gauls pursu'd them as they ran scatter'd up and down and kill'd them: nor had there been a few of them destroy'd, had not the Guard of Foragers, consisting of six hundred Horse, met them. For they, hearing the fearful cries of their own men afar off, when they had made ready their Weapons, and their Horses came in fresh to obviate the flight of their defeated Party. By that means Fortune was quickly alter'd, and the terror remov'd from the Conquer'd to the Conquerours. For the Gauls were routed upon the first attack, the Foragers running together out of all the Fields thereabout, so that the Enemy came upon the Gauls on every side: nor could it be safe or easy for them so much as to run away; because the Romans pursu'd them, who were already tired, with fresh Horses. Some few therefore escaped; but never an one was taken: though a far greater number of them suffer'd Death for violating the sacred obligations of the Conference: and the Romans next day, their minds being inflamed with fury, came with all their Forces up to the Enemy.

XXVI. The Consul spent two dayes in searching into the nature of the Mountain, lest there should should be any part of it unknown to him: but on the third day, having consulted the Soothsayers, and then sacrificed, he divided his Forces into four parts, and so led them forth: intending to carry two of them up the middle of the Mountain, and to take two upon the sides against the Wings of the Gauls. The greatest strength that the Enemy had, were the Tectosages and the Trocmians, who were in the main Body of their Army, to the number of fifty thousand men. Their Horse, whom they dismounted (because there was use to be made of Horses among craggy Rocks) they placed in the right Wing, being ten thousand persons: whilst Ariarathes's Cappadocians, the Auxiliaries of Morzus in the left, made up about the number of four thousand. The Consul, as he did upon the Mount Olympus, having placed the Light armour in the Front, took care that the same quantity of all kind of Weapons should be ready at hand. When the two Armies approach'd, all things were the same on both sides as they had been in the former Battle, except their Courage, which as it was augmented in the Conquerours by success, so was quite damp'd in the Enemy; for that, though they themselves were not Conquer'd, they lookt upon the miscarriage of their Countrymen as though it had been their own. Wherefore that action being begun in the same manner had the like issue. For there was a Cloud, as it were, of light Weapons thrown all together upon them, which bore down the Army of Gauls: nor durst any one of them either run out of their Ranks, lest he should expose his Body every way to their Artillery; nor yet stand still, seeing that the thicker they were together, the more wounds they receiv'd, being as it were a fairer mark for the Romans to aim at. But now the Consul supposing that all the Enemies, who of themselves were mightily disturbed, if he should shew them the Ensigns of the Legions, would all immediately run away, took his Light-arm'd men into his Ranks, with the other Party of Auxiliaries, and put forward the main Body.

The Gauls being terrified with the memory of the Tolistoboian miscarriage, and carrying XXVII. Weapons stuck into their Bodies, as also not only tired with standing, but faint with their Wounds too, could not endure even the first effort and shout of the Romans. Wherefore they ran toward their Camp; though few got within the Fortifications. For the greatest part of them flying to the right and left beyond the Camp, went that way which their violent hast at that time carried them: whilst the Victors pursuing them even to their Camp were very levere upon their Reer. But then they halted in the Camp for love of the Booty, nor did any of them pursue the Foe. The Gauls stood longer in the Wings, because the Romans came later to them: yet they did not bear even the first Volley of Weapons. Mean time the Consul, who could not draw them off that were gone into the Camp for plunder, sent those that had been in the Wings immediately to pursue the Foe. Who having follow'd them for some space, yet slew not above eight thousand men in the flight; for there was no set Battle. The rest got over the River Halys; whilst a great Party of the Romans staid that night in the Enemies Camp. The others the Consul brought back into their own Camp. The next day he took a view of the Captives, and the booty; which was as much, as the most rapacious Nation in the whole World, who had been by force possess'd for many years of all on this side the Mountain Taurus, could heap together. After this the Gauls, who had been scatter'd all over the Country in their flight, being met together again in one place, great part of them wounded, or unarm'd, and destitute of all necessaries, sent Envoys to the Consul concerning a Peace. Then Manlius to come to Ephesus; whilst he himself making halt to get out of those parts that were so cold by reason of Taurus being so nigh (for now it was the middle of Autumn) brought back his Victorious Army into Winter Quarters upon the Sea-Coast.

Whilst these things were transacted in Asia, all things in the other Provinces were quiet. XXVIII. At Rome, the Censors, T. Quintius Flaminius, and M. Claudius Marcellus, review'd the Senate, of which P. Scipio Africanus now the third time chosen President; there being only four names pass'd over [in order to their being put out of the Senate] none of whom had ever rode in a Curule Chair. They were also very mild in their review of the Knighthood. They likewise bargain'd for the building of an House upon the place where that of Sp. Maelius (called now Aequimelium) stood in the Capitol, and to have the street paved with Flint from the Capene Gate to the Temple of Mars. The Companions consulted the Senate, to know, where they should be poled: and it was decreed, that it should be done at Rome. There were great Waters that Year. The Tiber over whelm'd the Campus Martius, and all the lower parts of the City twelve times. Now when Cn. Manlius, the Consul, had made an end of the War against the Gauls in Asia, the other Consul M. Fulvius, having subdu'd the Aetolians, went over into Cephalenia, and sent all about to the Cities of that Island, to inquire; Whether they would rather yield themselves to the Romans, or try the Fortune of a War? Whereupon their fear so far prevailed with them, that they all submitted to a Surrender. So, Hostages being required of them, the Nesiotes, Cranians, Palleans, and Samians (according to the ability of such a poor people) gave twenty. By this means an unexpected Peace smiled upon Cephalenia; when on a sudden, one of their Cities, namely the Samians (for what reason is not known) revolted. For they said, that since their City was situate in a convenient place, they were afraid, lest they might be forced by the Romans to remove from it.

FFFFF z

But

But whether they form'd these apprehensions in themselves, and by vain fears depriv'd themselves of rest; or whether such a thing might be talk'd of by the Romans, and so brought to their Ears, is not certain: save that, as soon as they had given their Hostages, they presently shut their Gates: nor would they, even at the request of their own Natives (for the Consul had sent to the Walls [of the City] to move the compassion of those that were Parents or Countrymen at least [to the Hostages]) desist from their undertaking. Thereupon the City began (since they return'd no peaceable answer) to be attack'd. The Consul had all sorts of Provisions of Warlike Instruments and Engines brought over from the Siege of Ambracia; besides that the Souldiers quickly perfected all such Works, as were to be rais'd. Wherefore their Rams being apply'd in two places at once began to shake the Walls.

XXIX. Nor did the Samians omit any thing, whereby either the Works or the Enemy might be removed; but made resistance by two things more especially: the one, in that they still repaired the inward Wall when it was beaten down, with a strong new one; and the other, in that they sallied out of a sudden, one while upon the Enemies Works, and another while upon their Guards: in which attempts they for the most part got the better of it. There was one slight way at last found out, scarce worth the mentioning, to restrain them; [and that was this.] There were a hundred Slingers sent for from Agium, Patra, and Dyme; who had been us'd even from their Childhood (according to the custom of their Country) to throw round stones, that lie upon the Sea-shores among the Sand, into the open Sea. Wherefore they us'd that instrument to greater advantage, and with more certainty, and a stronger blow, than the Balearian Slingers did. Neither has their Sling one Leather only [in the bottom of it] as the Balearian and that of other Nations hath; but three, which are fasten'd close and hard together with many seams: least the Leather being loose, the [Stone, or] Bullet should rouse to and fro when they are going to sling it; so that lying dead upon the bottom, it is hurl'd forth as from a Cross-Bow. They therefore being us'd to throw Coronets of a small compass from a great distance, did not only wound the heads of the Enemies, but any part of their Faces that they design'd [to hit]. These things kept the Samians from sallying forth either so frequently, or so boldly: inasmuch that they desired the Achaens from the Walls, for a little time, to draw off; and quietly look on, whilst they engaged with the Romans. The Samians held out the Siege for four Months. But at last, since of those few, that they were, some daily fell, or were wounded; and they that remained were tired both in their Bodies and Minds too: the Romans, getting in the Night over the Wall through the Fort, which they call Cyatis (for the City runs Westward toward the Sea side) came into the Market-place. Whereupon the Samians, seeing part of their City was taken, fled with their Wives and Children into the bigger Fort, and from thence the next day making their Surrender (their City being rifled) they were all sold for Slaves.

XXX. The Consul having set all things in order at Cephalonia, and put a Garrison into Samus, went over into Peloponnesus, at the request of the Aegians chiefly and the Lacedemonians, who had for a great while together desired his Company there. The meeting of the general Assembly, or Council of Achaia, was originally always appointed to be at Agium, either out of respect to the dignity of that City, or for the convenience of the place. But this usage Philopæmen that Year, first of all endeavour'd to abolish, and therefore prepared a Bill to be pass'd into a Law, that the meeting should be in all the Cities that sent Members to the Achaian Parliament, by turns. And accordingly when the Consul was a coming (the chief Magistrates in each City summoning them to Agium) Philopæmen (who then was Stateholder) order'd the Assembly to be at Argos. Whither when it appear'd that they were all resolv'd to come; the Consul also, though he favour'd the Aegians most, came to Argos: where when, upon debate, he saw the matter incline [the other way] he desist'd from his first design [of being for Agium.] After that the Lacedemonians engaged him in their quarrel; their City being most infested by a company of people that were banish'd thence: Of whom great part dwelt in the Maritime Castles of the Laconian Coast, which was all taken away [from the Lacedemonians.] Which indignity the Lacedemonians being scarce able to endure (in order to their having some Avenue to the Sea (if they at any time had occasion to send Embassadors either to Rome, or any other place) and that at the same time they might have a convenient Port, or receptacle for Foreign Commodities that were of necessary use to them) in the Night time surpriz'd and got possession of a Maritime Village called Las. Thereupon the Villagers and the banish'd persons who lived in that Town, were terrified, at first, at the unexpected accident; but afterward, being got together a little before day, with ease expell'd the Lacedemonians. Nevertheless all the Sea-Coast was in a fright: so that the Castle, Villages, and the banish'd persons also, that harbour'd there, all in general sent Embassadors to the Achaens.

XXXI. Philopæmen the Stateholder, who from the very beginning had been a Friend to the cause of the banish'd persons, and always advis'd the Achaens to diminish the power of the Lacedemonians, upon complaint granted them a Council: in which (he proposing it) there was a Decree made; That since T. Quintius and the Romans had deliver'd the Castles and Villages upon upon the Laconian Coast into the protection and custody of the Achaens, and that the Lacedemonians ought not, according to the League, to have any thing to do with them, whereas the Village of Las was Besieg'd, and a great slaughter made there; if the Authors and Abettors of that action were not surrender'd to the Achaens, they would look upon the League to be violated. Thereupon Embassadors were presently sent to Lacedemon to demand those persons. But that Injunction seem'd to the Lacedemonians so tyrannical and unworthy, that if their City had been in its old circumstances, they would undoubtedly have taken up Arms. But that which put them under the greatest consternation was, least, if they should once comply with such Injunctions, and take the Yoke upon them, Philopæmen should (as he had been about to do a good while) deliver Lacedemon up to the banish'd persons. They therefore, being mad with anger, kill'd thirty men of that Faction, which had held some correspondence with Philopæmen and the banish'd men; and made a Decree, to renounce all Alliance with the Achaens: and to send Embassadors immediately to Cephalonia, who should surrender Lacedemon to the Consul M. Fulvius and the Romans: and to desire him, that he would come into Peloponnesus to receive the City of Lacedemon into the protection and government of the Roman People.

Of which when their Embassadors brought word to the Achaens, they, by a general XXXII. consent of all the Cities, belonging to that Council, declared War against the Lacedemonians. But the Winter hinder'd the immediate waging of it: though their Confines were pillaged by small Inrodes (more like robbing than fair fighting) not only by Land, but in Ships also on the Sea-Coast. This tumult brought the Consul into Peloponnesus: by whose Order a Council being appointed at Elis, the Lacedemonians were sent for to debate the matter. And there indeed was not only a great dispute, but even wrangling also. To which the Consul, who was ambitious enough to favour both Parties, having made several doubtful replies, put an end to all by this one Injunction; that they should desist from the War, till they had sent Embassadors to the Senate at Rome. They therefore accordingly dispatch'd an Embassy on both sides to Rome. The banish'd men also of Lacedemon injoin'd the Achaens to take care of their cause and Embassy. Diophanes and Lycortas, both Megalopolitans, were chief of the Achaean Embassy: who disagreeing as to publick affairs, at that time also made very different Speeches. For Diophanes left the debating of all things wholly to the Senate; [Saying] that they could best put an end to all Controversies between the Achaens and the Lacedemonians: but Lycortas desired (according to the Orders that Philopæmen had given him) that the Achaens might have the liberty to do what, according to the League and their own Laws, they had decreed: and preserve their own freedom entire, of which they themselves were the Authors. The Achaens at that time had great authority with the Romans: who yet did not think fit to make any innovations touching the Lacedemonians. Wherefore their Answer was so perplex'd, that the Achaens might believe Lacedemon left wholly to their disposal; and yet the Lacedemonians not imagine that all things were submitted to their pleasure. This power the Achaens made a very immoderate and tyrannical use of.

Philopæmen was continu'd in his Office; who in the beginning of the Spring having mu- XXXIII. ster'd up an Army, Encamped in the Confines of Lacedemon. From whence he sent Embassadors to demand the Authors of the Revolt; with a Promise, not only that their City should be at quiet, if they did what he required; but that the persons also should suffer nothing without being first heard. Now all others for fear were silent; but those whom demanded by name, themselves profess'd they would go; having first the Embassadors word for it. That they should have no violence offer'd to them, till they had answer'd for themselves. There went likewise some other persons of great quality, not only as Advocates to the private persons, but also because they thought their cause concern'd the State. The Achaens had never before brought the banish'd persons of Lacedemon along with them into their Confines; because they thought nothing would so much alienate the affections of that City [as such an action.] But then the Antesignani of almost all their Army were banish'd persons: who, when the Lacedemonians came to the Gates of the Camp, made a Body and met them. Whereupon they first rebuked them; but soon after a quarrel arose, and, when their blood was up, the stoutest of the banish'd persons made an attack upon the Lacedemonians. With that they appealed to the Gods and the honour of the Embassadors; that they and the Prætor might remove the croud, protect the Lacedemonians, and hinder some, who were going to put Chains upon them: by which means, the multitude being set into an uproar, the tumult increased. The Achaens at first ran together only to look on: but soon after, when the banish'd men roared out, what they had suffer'd, desiring aid, and saying at the same time, That they should never have the like occasion, if they slipt that: that the League, which was made in the Capitol, at Olympia, and in the Castle at Athens, was evacuated by those persons: wherefore before they were oblig'd by another new League, they ought to punish those offenders: the multitude being incens'd at these words, upon one mans crying out, that they should fall upon them, threw stones at them: so that seventeen who in the hurly-burly had Chains put upon them, were slain. The next day sixty three more (that were laid hold on) whom the Prætor had kept from violence; (not because he had a mind to save them, but because he was unwilling they should die without making their defence) being expos'd to the enraged multitude, after they they had spoken some few words to the prejudiced Audience, were all condemn'd and deliver'd over to Execution.

XXXIV. Now the Lacedemonians being thus afrighted, it was enjoin'd them first to demolish their Walls: and then, that all Foreign Auxiliaries, that had fought for pay under the Tyrants, should depart out of the Laconian Dominions. Next, that all slaves belonging to the Tyrant whom they had freed (of which sort there were a great number) should go away before such a certain time: and that those, who staid there, it should be lawful for the Achæans to take, sell and carry away. That they should abrogate all Lycurgus's Laws and Customs. That they should use the Achæan Laws and Institutions. For by that means they would be all of one Body, and the more easily agree concerning all matters. Now as they did nothing more obediently, than pull down their Walls; so they took nothing more to heart than that the banish'd men should be brought back again. But for all that there was a Decree made at Tegea, in the publick Assembly of the Achæans, touching their being restored. Then mention being made, that the Foreign Auxiliaries were dismiss'd, and that the others who were ascripti Lacedemoniis [i. e. newly taken into the number of the Lacedemonians] (for so they call'd them, that were freed from the Tyrants) were gone out of the City, and got into the Fields before the Army was disbanded; they thought fit that the Statcholder should go with a Party of nimble Fellows, and laying hold of that sort of men, sell them as Captives of War. Accordingly many of them were taken and sold: and out of that money [receiv'd for them] the Portico at Megalopolis; which the Lacedemonians had thrown down, was, by the Permission of the Achæans rebuilt. The Land also belonging to Belbina, which the Tyrants of Lacedemon had been wrongfully possess'd of, was restored to that City, according to an ancient Decree of the Achæans, that had been made in the Reign of Philip, Son of Amyntas. Now the City of Lacedemon being by this means enervated, as it were, was therefore for a long time obnoxious to the Achæans. But no thing was so great a damage to them, as the Discipline of Lycurgus (to which they had been accustomed for seven hundred years) being then abolished.

XXXV. From the Council, where in presence of the Consul there had been a debate between the Achæans and Lacedemonians, M. Fulvius (since the year was now just at an end) went to Rome to hold the [Consular] Assembly, and created, for Consuls, M. Valerius Messala, with C. Livius Salinator: having put by M. Aemilius Lepidus, his Enemy, who that year also stood for the Office. Then they chose Prætors [whose names were] Q. Marcus Philippus, M. Claudius Marcellus, C. Stertinius, C. Atinius, P. Claudius Pulcher, and L. Manlius Acidinus. When the Assembly was over; they thought fit that M. Fulvius the Consul, should return to the Army in his Province; and to him, as also to his Colleague Cn. Manlius, was their Commission continu'd for another Year. That Year there was set up in the Temple of Hercules, the Image of the God himself; and a Chariot, drawn by six Horses, all gilded, in the Capitol: whereupon was this Inscription, Consulem dedisse [i. e. that the Consul gave it. There were likewise twelve brazen Shields set up by the Curule Ædiles, P. Claudius and Ser. Sulpicius Galba, out of that money, in which they had condemn'd the Fore-stallers of Corn. Q. Fulvius Flaccus also, Ædile of the People, set up two gilded Images, upon the Condemnation of one of them; they being severally accused. His Colleague A. Cæcilius condemn'd never an one. The Roman Games were thrice perform'd all over, and the Plebeian five times. Then M. Valerius Messala, and C. Livius Salinator, entering upon their Consulate on the Ides of March, consulted the Senate touching the Common-wealth, the Provinces and the Armies. As to Ætolia and Asia there was no alteration made: but the Consuls, one of them had Pisa with Liguria assign'd to him, and the other the Province of Gaul: though they were order'd either to agree between themselves, or to cast Lots [which they pleas'd:] besides which they were to raise new Armies; two Legions, with fifteen thousand Latine Foot, and twelve hundred Horse. Now Messala happen'd to have Liguria, and Salinator Gaul. Then the Prætors chose: of whom, M. Claudius had the City jurisdiction, and P. Claudius the Foreign: Q. Marcus Sicily; C. Stertinius Sardinia; L. Manlius the hither Spain; and C. Atinius the farther.

XXXVI. As to the Armies, their resolution was this; That the Legions that had been in Gaul under C. Lælius, should be brought over to M. Tuccius the Pro-Prætor into the Bruttian Territories: that the Army in Sicily should be disbanded; and that M. Sempronius the Pro-Prætor should bring back to Rome the Fleet, that was there. For the Spains were allotted those two Legions that were already in those Provinces: and that both the Pro-Prætors should raise three thousand Foot and two hundred Horse, as a supply out of their Allies, and carry them over along with them. But before the new Magistrates went into their Provinces, the College of Decemviri order'd a Supplication of three dayes continuance to be made in all cross ways, for that, in the day time, between nine and ten a Clock it grew on a sudden very dark. There was also a nine days Sacrifice appointed, because in the Aventine it had rained Stones. The Campanians (when the Censors had forced them to be poled at Rome, pursuant to an Order of Senate, that was made the year before, for before it was uncertain, where they should be poled) petition'd, that they might marry Women, who were Roman Citizens; and that if any of them had formerly married such Wives, they might still keep them; as also, that their Children and and Heirs, who were born before that time, might be lookt upon as Legitimate: both which desires of theirs they obtain'd. Concerning the Formians, Fundanes, and Arpinates, C. Valerius Tappus, Tribune of the People propos'd; that they should have the privilege of voting; which before they had not. Which propos'd of his four Tribunes of the People oppos'd, because it was not made by authority of the Senate; though when they understood that it was the Peoples and not the Senates right to give any Body (whom they thought fit) the freedom of Voting, they desisted. So the Bill was pass'd: that the Formians and Fundanes should vote in the Æmilian Tribe, and the Arpinates in the Cornelian: and accordingly in those Tribes they were then by order of the Commons (which Valerius propos'd) first poled. M. Claudius Marcellus the Censor, having by Lot gain'd the precedence of T. Quintius, made a Survey [of the people:] at which there were poled, of Citizens, two hundred fifty eight thousand three hundred and eight; and when the Pole [or Survey] was over, the Consuls went into their Provinces.

That Winter, in which these things were transacted at Rome, there came Embassies to Cn. Manlius, who was first Consul, and then Pro Consul, whilst he Winter'd in Asia, from all the Cities and Nations, that are on this side Mount Taurus: and as the Romans gain'd a more renowned and noble Victory over Antiochus than over the Gauls; so that over the Gauls was more joyful to their Allies, than the other over Antiochus. For it was more tolerable to them to be Slaves to the King, than to endure the savage severities of a barbarous people, who put them every day into an uncertain terrour, how far the tempest (as it were) of their ravage would carry them. Wherefore (as men, who had liberty given them by the routing of Antiochus, but Peace by subduing of the Gauls) they came, not only to congratulate, but brought Crowns of gold also along with them, each one according to their abilities. There came likewise Embassadors from Antiochus, and from the Gauls themselves, for conditions of Peace; as also from Ariarathes, King of Cappadocia, to desire pardon, and pay a Fine for their offence, in that they had assisted Antiochus. He therefore was injoin'd to pay two hundred Talents of silver. The Answer made to the Gauls, was; that, when King Eumenes came, they should have conditions of Peace given them. The Embassies of the Cities were dismiss'd with favourable Answers, more joyful than they came. The Embassadors of Antiochus were order'd to carry their money and the Corn into Pamphylia, according to the League made with L. Scipio; for that he would come thither with his Army. Then in the beginning of the Spring, having survey'd his Army, he march'd away, and in eight dayes came to Apamea. Where having staid three dayes, he went in three marches again from Apamea into Pamphylia, whither he had order'd the Kings men to convey the Money and the Corn. There were a thousand and fifty Talents of silver receiv'd and carry'd to Apamea; and the Corn was divided among the Army. Thence he march'd to Perga; which was the only City thereabout that was kept by a Garison of the Kings. But when he came near to it, the Governour of the Garison came to meet him, desiring thirty dayes time, to consult King Antiochus touching the surrender of the City. Whereupon he gave them the time [they desired] and till then left the Garison. From Perga, having sent his Brother L. Manlius with four thousand men to Oroanda, to collect the remaining part of the money that he had bargain'd for, he himself, having heard that King Eumenes and ten Embassadors were come from Rome to Ephesus, order'd Antiochus's Embassadors to follow him, and led his Army back to Apamea.

There, according to the opinion of the ten Embassadors, there was a League drawn up XXXVIII in words much to this purpose: Let there be an Alliance between King Antiochus and the Roman People upon these terms: That the King suffer no Army, that is about to make War against the Roman People or their Allies, to pass either through his Kingdom, or any other Territories in his Dominions: nor assist them with any provisions, or otherwise. That the Romans and their Allies do the same to Antiochus and all his Subjects. That Antiochus shall not wage War with any Islanders, nor go over into Europe. That he depart out of all Cities, Countries, Villages, and Castles on this side Mount Taurus as far as the River Halys, and from the Vale of Taurus even to those Hills, where it inclines toward Lycaonia. That he carry no Arms out of those Cities, Countries, or Castles, out of which he marches; or if he do, that he restore them to the right Owners. That he take back no Souldier or other person whatever out of the Kingdom of Eumenes. If any Citizens of those Cities, that are taken from King Antiochus, are with King Antiochus, or within the bounds of his Kingdom, that they all return to Apamea by such a day. But that those who are out of Antiochus's Kingdom, with the Romans, or their Allies, either go away or stay there [as they please.] That he restore to the Romans and their Allies, all Slaves, Fugitives, Prisoners of War, or any Freeman, that is a Captive or Renegado. That he deliver up all his Elephants, and provide no more. That he deliver up all his long Ships and their tackle: and that he have not above ten swift Gallies, none of which to be row'd with more than thirty Oars; unless he be provoked to make War with those against whom the Romans have left him to his liberty, and then he may make use of more. That he sail not about the Promontories of Calycadnus and Sarpedon; unless any Ship of his be to bring money, Tribute, Embassadors, or Hostages. That King Antiochus shall not have the privilege to hire Souldiers out of those Nations that are under the Roman Government: no not so much as to entertain Volunteers. That all Houses, or other Buildings Buildings within the Confines of Antiochus's Kingdom, that belong to the Rhodians or their Allies, be in the same condition, as they were before the War, and in the possession of the Rhodians or their Allies. That if any money be due, it should be demanded [of them.] If any thing were taken away, that they should have the privilege to search for, inquire about and retake it. That if they were possess'd of any Cities (that ought to be deliver'd up) to whom Antiochus gave them, he should draw the Garrisons out of them: and see that they were carefully surrender'd. That he should pay twelve thousand Attick Talents of good silver in twelve years at equal payments (every Talent to weigh full eighty pounds of Roman weight) with five hundred and forty thousand Bushels of Wheat. That he give King Eumenes three hundred and fifty Talents within five years: and instead of Corn, as the value of it, a hundred twenty seven Talents. That he give twenty Hostages to the Romans; who after three years should not be less than eighteen, nor more than fifty five years of Age. That if any of the Roman Allies should voluntarily wage War against Antiochus, he might repel force by force: so that he did not either keep any City by right of War, or take it into his Alliance. That they should decide Controversies among themselves by law and judgment, or, if they both agreed, by War. There was likewise in this League an Agreement made concerning the surrender of Annibal of Carthage, Thoas of Atolia, Mnasimachus of Acarnania, and those Chalcidenses, Embulidas and Philo. And that if they should think fit hereafter to add or alter any thing therein, it might be done without any damage to the League.

XXXIX. The Consul swore to observe this League; and there went certain persons to exact the same Oath from the King; namely, Q. Minucius Thermus, and L. Manlius, who was then by chance come back from Oroanda, and wrote to Q. Fabius Labeo, who was Admiral of the Navy, to go immediately to Patara, to destroy and burn all the Kings Ships that were there. He accordingly went from Ephesus, and cut to pieces or burnt fifty Men of War; taking Telmessus (the Inhabitants whereof were terrified at the sudden arrival of the Navy) in the same Expedition. Out of Lycia, he forthwith cross'd over into Greece by the Islands, having order'd those that were left at Ephesus to follow him. Then having staid some few dayes at Athens, till the Ships came from Ephesus to Piræus, he brought his whole Fleet thence back into Italy. Cn. Manlius, when he had receiv'd, (among other things that he was to have) the Elephants also, from Antiochus, and had given them all as a present to Eumenes, after that try'd the causes of the several Cities; many of which were much disorder'd amidst their innovations. King Ariarathes also, having by the intercession of Eumenes, (to whom he at that time had betroth'd his Daughter) got half the money remitted which he was injoin'd to pay, was receiv'd into Friendship. When the causes of the Cities were all heard, the ten Embassadors made a great deal of difference in their conditions. To those that had been stipendiary to King Antiochus, and of the Roman side, they gave their freedom: but all such as had been on Antiochus's side, or stipendiaries to King Attalus, they order'd all to pay a Tribute to Eumenes. They likewise granted a particular immunity to the Colophonians, that dwell in Notium, to the Cymeans and Milesians by name. But to the Glazomenians besides their immunity they gave the Island of Drynusia too for a present, restoring to the Milesians also that Land which they call Sacred; as they likewise added Rheteum and Gergithum to the Ilian Territories; not so much for any late deserts, as upon the score and in remembrance of their Extraction, [they being derived from the Ilians or Trojans.] There was the same reason for their freeing Dardanium also in like manner. They likewise not only presented the Chians, Smyrneans, and Erythraeans (upon the account of their singular fidelity shewn in the late War) with Lands, but paid them all extraordinary honours. To the Phocaans they not only restored the Lands, which they had before the War, but likewise permitted them to use their ancient Laws. The Rhodians had those things confirm'd, that were given them by the former Decree. For Lycia and Caria were given [to them] as far as the River Meander; excepting Telmessus. To King Eumenes they assign'd Chersonesus in Europe, and Lyfimbachia, with the Castles, Villages and Lands [thereabouts] [in the same manner, and] with the same Boundaries wherewith Antiochus had enjoy'd them; restoring to him both the Phrygians; the one lying to the Hellespont, and the other, which they call the greater [Phrygia:] with Mysia (which King Prusias had taken away from him) Lycaonia, Myliar, Lydia, and several Cities particularly named, as, Tralleis, Ephesus and Telmessus. Concerning Pamphylia, seeing there was a dispute between Eumenes and Antiochus's Embassadors (for that part of it was on this side, and part of it beyond Taurus) the whole matter was refer'd to the Senate.

XL. Having made these Leagues and Decrees, Manlius, with the ten Embassadors, and his whole Army went to Hellespont; whither he summon'd all the petit Kings of the Gauls, and prescribed and denounced unto them conditions, on which they should keep Peace with Eumenes; that they might no longer wander up and down in Arms; but keep within the bounds of their own Dominions. Then having muster'd together all the Ships on that Coast (Eumenes's Fleet being also brought by his Brother Athenaus from Elea) he went over with all his Forces into Europe. After which, marching slowly through Chersonesus (for that his men were heavy laden with Booty of all sorts) he halted at Lyfimbachia: that he enter Thrace with his Beasts as fresh and entire as possible; because they generally dreaded to march through that Country. That day that he went from Lyfimbachia he came to the River Melus (as

(as they call it) and thence the next day to Cypsela. From whence, for about ten thousand paces, the way was woody, narrow, and rough: Upon account of which difficulty he divided his Army into two parts; ordering the one to go before, and the other to follow at a great distance, with the carriages between them; which were Waggon with the publick money and other pretious Booty. Wherefore as he travelled through the Woods, ten thousand Thracians, made up of four Nations, the Asians, Cenians, Maduatenes, and Coletes, beset the way at the very streights [of the pass.] Now 'twas believ'd, that this was not done without King Philip of Macedons knowledge and contrivance: for that he knew, the Romans would not return any other way home than through Thrace, and how much money they carry'd with them. In the first Body was the General, who was much concern'd for the roughness of the wayes. The Thracians stir'd not, till the Souldiers were all gone by. But when they saw that the foremost were got beyond the streights, to which the hindmost were not yet come near, they set upon the Baggage and Carriages. And having slain the Guard thereof, they partly rifled what was in the Waggon, and partly took away the Beasts from under their burdens. Whereupon when the noise [of it] came, first to them that were now just enter'd into the Wood behind, and then also to the foremost Body, they ran on both sides up to each other, and engaged in a disorderly fight in several places at the same time. Now the Thracians, being cumber'd with their burdens, and many of them (that they might have their hands empty to catch what they could) unarm'd, the very Booty [which they got] expos'd them to slaughter: whilst roughness of the places betray'd the Romans to the Barbarians, who ran upon them through paths that they well knew, or lay sometimes in wait along the hollow Vales. The very Carriages also and the Waggon (as it happen'd) falling inconveniently in their several wayes were a great hinderance to the one or the other side in the time of their fight; in which there fell, here a Robber, and there one that endeavour'd to get the booty again. So that, according as the place was even or uneven for this or that Party, according as the Souldiers minds were, and according to their numbers (for sometimes they met with more than they themselves were, and sometimes with fewer) the Fortune of the fight was various: though many fell on both sides. And now Night drew nigh, when the Thracians quitted the Battle; not to avoid Wounds or being kill'd, but because they had booty enough.

The foremost Body of the Romans Encamp'd in an open place without the Woods, near the Temple of Bendis [i. e. Diana] whilst the other part staid in the middle of the Wood; Encamp'd round with a double bullwark to guard the Carriages. The next day (having search'd the Wood, before they removed) they join'd the foremost. In that Battle, though they lost part of their Carriages, and Servants, with some Souldiers (for they fought almost all over the Wood) they receiv'd most damage by the death of Q. Minucius Thermus, who was a strong and a valiant man. That day they arrived at the River Hebrus; from whence they pass'd the Enion Territories, by the Temple of Apollo, which the Natives call Zerynthus. Then they came to another freight about Tempyra (for that's the name of the place) which was as rough as the former; but, because there are no Woods about it, is not a convenient place for an Ambuscade. Hither, with the same hopes of prey, came the Thracians (who are a Nation in Thrace too) but, because the naked Vales gave way for them to be seen at a distance besetting the pass, there was less terror and tumult among the Romans. For though the place were uneven, yet they must of necessity fight hand to hand, in a regular manner, and in the open Field. Wherefore coming close up, and with a shout falling briskly on, they first removed the Enemy from their Post, and afterward forced them back again. Thereupon began the flight and slaughter of them, their own streights being their greatest hinderance. After this, the Romans, being Victorious, Encamped at a Village of the Maronites, called Sare: from whence they went next day into the Plain called Campus Priaticus; where they staid three dayes to take in Corn, partly out of the Maronites Country, and partly out of their own Ships, that follow'd them with all sorts of Provisions. From their Camp there it was a dayes Journey to Apollonia; from whence they march'd through the Abderites Dominions to Neapolis: which was all along a quiet rode, by reason of the Greek Colonies in those parts. But the remaining part of the way, as they went through the middle of Thrace Day and Night, if it were not troublesome to them, was yet suspected so to be, till they came into Macedonia. But that same Army found the Thracians more civil to them, when they were led the same way by Scipio, for no other reason but because they had less booty to lose. Though at that time also Claudius says; that 15000. Thracians met Mutines the Numidian, who went before to view the Country. That there were 400 Numidian Horse, and some few Elephants. That Mutines's Son broke through the midst of the Enemies with a hundred and fifty chosen Horsemen: and that the same person soon after, whilst Mutines (having placed the Elephants in the middle, and the Horse in the Wings) was engaged with the Enemy, gave them a diversion in the rear, by which means the Enemy, who were put into great disorder by that storm (as it were) of Horse, never came up to the body of foot. Cn. Manlius led his Army through Macedonia into Thessaly: from whence coming through Epirus to Apollonia (not fighting the Sea at that time of Year so much, as that he durst cross it) he Winter'd there.

When the Year was almost out, the Consul M. Valerius came out of Liguria to Rome in order order to choose new Magistrates; having done nothing, that was memorable in his Province, so as that that might have been a reasonable Plea for his coming later than ordinary to [hold] the Assembly. The Assembly for proposing of Consuls was on the 16th of February: and there were chosen, M. Aemilius Lepidus, and C. Flaminius. The day after, the Prætors were elected; namely, Ap. Claudius Pulcher, Ser. Sulpicius Galba, Q. Terentius Culleo, L. Terentius Massaliota, Q. Fulvius Flaccus, and M. Furius Crassipes. When the Assembly was over, the Consul refer'd it to the Senate, what Provinces they would please to assign the Prætors. Whereupon they order'd two to be at Rome, for the doing of justice [between man and man] two out of Italy, [which were] Sicily and Sardinia; and two in Italy [which were] Tarentum and Gaul; and immediately, before they enter'd upon their Offices, they were commanded to cast Lots. Ser. Sulpicius happen'd to have the City, Q. Terentius the Foreign Jurisdiction; L. Terentius Sicily; Q. Fulvius Sardinia; Ap. Claudius Tarentum; and M. Furius Gaul. That year L. Minucius Myrtilus, and L. Manlius, for that they were said to have beaten the Carthaginian Embassadors, were deliver'd (by order of M. Claudius the City Prætor) by the Heralds to the Embassadors, and carry'd to Carthage. There was then also a report of a great War in Liguria, that increas'd every day more and more. Wherefore to both the new Consuls (that day when they propos'd the settling of the Provinces and other publick affairs) the Senate assign'd Liguria for their Province. This order of Senate the Consul Lepidus oppos'd; saying, it was an unworthy thing, that both the Consuls should be shut up in the Vales of Liguria. That M. Fulvius and Cn. Manlius had been now two years, the one in Europe and the other in Asia, as though they had been substituted to reign there instead of Philip and Antiochus; wherefore, if the Senate resolv'd, that the Armies should continue in those parts, that Consuls were more fit than private men to command them. That they wander'd with the terror of War through Nations, against whom there was no War declar'd, selling Peace for money. That, if it were necessary to keep those Provinces with standing Armies, then as M. Fulvius and Cn. Manlius had succeeded M. Acilius and L. Scipio in the Consulate; so C. Livius and M. Valerius ought to succeed Fulvius and Manlius. That now surely, since the Ætolian War was ended, Asia retaken from Antiochus, and the Gauls conquer'd, the Consuls ought to be sent to the Consular Armies, or the Legions to be brought back from thence, and render'd to the Commonwealth. The Senate, though they heard what was said, yet still persever'd in their former resolution; that Liguria should be both the joint Province of both the Consuls together; and gave order that Manlius and Fulvius, quitting their Provinces, should bring the Armies thence, and come back to Rome.

XLI.

XLII.

XLIII.

Now there was a Pique between M. Fulvius and M. Aemilius, the Consuls; Aemilius affirming, among other things, that he was made Consul two years the later by means of M. Fulvius. Where to create Envy against him he suborn'd the Ambracian Embassadors to come into the Senate and accuse him. Who thereupon complain'd, that they had a War waged against them, even in time of Peace, though they had done all that the former Consuls injoin'd them, and were ready to perform the same obedience to M. Fulvius: that their Country was first ravaged, whereby their City was put into fear of being rifled and butcher'd, insomuch that by their dread they were forced to shut their Gates. After that, that they were beseged, attack'd, and had all the severities of War exercised upon them by slaughter, fire, ruine and rifling of their City. That their Wives and Children were carried away into slavery; their goods taken from them: and (which troubled them most of all) their Temples through the whole City rob'd of all their Ornaments. That the Images of their Gods, yea and the Gods themselves were forced from their seats and carry'd away: the Walls and Pillars stript [of their Furniture] so that the Ambracians had now no Gods left to adore or pray to. Now whilst they complain'd of these things, the Consul criminously asking them, by compact, more questions, seem'd to get out of them what they would not of themselves have declar'd. At which the Senate being moved, C. Flaminius the other Consul undertook M. Fulvius's cause, saying, That the Ambracians went in an old beaten road. For so M. Marcellus was accused by the *Syracusan*es and Q. Fulvius by the Campanians. And at the same rate they might suffer T. Quintius to be accused by King Philip, M. Acilius and L. Scipio by Antiochus, C. Manlius by the Gauls, and Fulvius himself by the Inhabitants of Ætolia and Cephalenia. Do you suppose, Grave Fathers! that either M. Fulvius himself, or I for him, will deny, that Ambracia was attack'd and taken; or that their Images and Ornaments were carry'd thence, and other things done, which are usual at the Sacking of Cities; when he resolves to demand a Triumph for these very actions? When he resolves to have carry'd before his Chariot, and to fix upon the Posts of his House, [the draught of] Ambracia taken, with the Images which they accuse him for carrying away, and the other spoils of that City? There is no reason why they should separate themselves from the Ætolians; the Ætolians and the Ambracians case being both the same. Wherefore either let my Colleague exercise his enmity in another cause; or, if he hath more mind to do it in this, let him keep his Ambracians till M. Fulvius comes hither. I shall not suffer any thing to be determin'd either concerning the Ambracians, or the Ætolians, whilst M. Fulvius is absent.

XLIV.

Now Aemilius declaring that his Enemies malice had a great deal of cunning with it (as all the World knew) for that he by delays would so protract the time that he might not return to Rome as long as his adversary was Consul, there were two dayes spent in a contest between between the two Consuls. But nothing could possibly be determin'd of whilst Flaminius was present. Wherefore they took the opportunity when Flaminius was absent, and, upon the report of Aemilius, an Order of Senate was made; That the Ambracians should have all their goods again; that they should be at liberty and use their own Law. That they should take what customs they pleas'd both by Sea and Land, so that the Romans and their Allies the Latines, were free from them. That as to the Images and other Ornaments which they complain'd were taken out of their Temples, they would leave them to the College of Priests (when M. Fulvius was come back to Rome) who should do what they thought good in it. Nor was the Consul content with this, but afterward, when there was but a few in the House, added th' is also to the order of Senate; That Ambracia did not seem to be taken by force. Then there was a Supplication of three days continuance appointed by the Decemviri for the peoples health; because a grievous pestilence depopulated both City and Country. Alter which the Latine Ferie [i. e. Holy dayes] were celebrated. Which religious offices when the Consuls had perform'd and made an end of their Levy (for both of them were for having new Souldiers) they went into their Provinces; and disbanded all the old Army. After the Consuls were gone, the Pro-Consul Cn. Manlius came to Rome; who having a Senate granted him at the Temple of Bellona by Ser. Sulpicius Galba, the City Prætor; told what exploits he had done, and desired, that for those things the Gods might have all honour ascribed to them, and he himself ride in Triumph through the City. But the greater part of the ten Embassadors that had been with him (and above all others, L. Furius Purpureo with L. Aemilius Paulus) withstood it: saying:

XLV.

"That they themselves were assign'd to Cn. Manlius as Embassadors for the making of a Peace with Antiochus, and perfecting that League and those terms which were begun with L. Scipio. That Cn. Manlius did all he could to disturb that Peace, and to take Antiochus, if he had given him an opportunity, by an Ambuscade: but that he perceiving the Consuls design (though he had been often aimed at in Conferences [which Manlius had] desired [to have with him]) had not only avoided any meeting, but even the sight of him. That having a desire to go beyond Taurus, he could hardly be kept, even by the intreaties of all the Embassadors, from running the risque of that misfortune which the Sibylls Verses had foretold touching those that went beyond the fatal bounds. Yea that nevertheless he drew his Army nearer, and Encamped almost upon the very tops of the Mountains where the Waters flow down on both sides [i. e. near the Wells.] When he found no occasion to make War there, the Kings men being quiet, that he led the Army round into Gallagrecia; against which Nation he made War without any Authority from the Senate, or consent of the People: which who ever dar'd to do on his own head? That the Wars against Antiochus, Philip, Annibal, and the Carthaginians were but of very late dayes. But that concerning all those, the Senate was consulted, and the People gave their consents. That Embassadors were often sent before hand, and demands made [of what belong'd to them] till at last [the Heralds] were sent to declare a War. Now, Cn. Manlius! what did you do, that may make us able to say, this was a publick War of the Roman People, and not thy private Robbery? But wert thou content with that very thing it self: didst thou lead thy Army straight on toward those, that you had pitch'd upon as their Enemy; or did you not rather wander through all the by-ways, recesses and Corners of Pisidia, Lycæonia, and Phrygia (since you stood in a cross way, that whither soever Attalus, Brother to Eumenes, turned his Forces, thither thou (a mercenary Consul) might'st with the Roman Army follow him) to pick up money among the petit Kings and Garisons? For what hadst thou to do with Anomada? or what with other People, that were equally innocent? But how did you carry on the War, for which you desire to triumph? Didst thou fight upon an even place, and at your own time? Indeed you desire very well, that all honour may be paid to the immortal Gods; first, in that they would not let the Army suffer for the rashness of their General, who made War against all the Laws of Nations: and secondly, for that they gave us Beasts not men to cope with.

XLVI.

"Do not you imagine that the name only of the Gallagrecs is mixt; their Bodies and their minds too were mixt and adulterated long before. If they were the same Gauls, with whom we have fought a thousand times with various success in Italy, would any one have return'd (do you think) to have given an account of the Battle, for all that our General [Manlius] did? He fought twice with them, but both times in a very disadvantageous Post, where his Army was in a low Vale, almost under the very Feet of the Enemies; so that if they had not thrown their Weapons down upon him, but only come down with their own naked Bodies, they might have easily crush'd our men. What then prevented it? Why truly the great Fortune and terrible name of the Roman People. For they, though they were such huge giantlike Fellows, were restrained and almost astonish'd at the ruine of Annibal, Philip, and Antiochus. They were confternated into a flight with Slings and Arrows: nor was there any Sword through all the Army embriued with blood in that gallick War: but like swarms of Bees they all flew away at the first Volley of those light Weapons. But alas! we, even we (the same persons) (by which Fortune shews us, what might have happen'd, had we been to deal with people fit to be called "Enemies) when on our way back we fell into the hands of the Thracian Robbers, we were slain, routed, and dispossest of all our Carriages. Q. Minucius Thermus, in whom we suffer'd much more, than if Cn. Manlius had perished, by whose rashness that misfortune was occasion'd, with many other stout men, was slain: and the Army, which was bringing back the spoils of King Antiochus, dissipated into three parts, the foremost in one place, the hindmost in another, and the Baggage in a third. He skulk'd one Night among the Brambles in Dens of Wild Beasts. And do you demand a triumph for this? If there had been no defeat or ignominy receiv'd in Thrace, over what Foes would you desire to triumph? Over them (I suppose) whom the Senate or People of Rome had decreed to be their Enemies. For upon that ground was a triumph granted to this [Person] L. Scipio, and to that [Gentleman] Manius Acilius over King Antiochus: and so also a little before to T. Quintius over King Philip, and to P. Africanus over Annibal, the Carthaginians and Syphax. Yea even those little things (after the Senate had already determin'd of a War) were inquir'd after; How they should declare it; whether to the Kings themselves, or whether it were sufficient that the denunciation of it should be made to any one Garrison? Will you then have all these things corrupted and confounded? Will you have the Laws of Arms abolish'd? Shall there be no Heralds? Yes (Heaven forgive my saying so) let Religion go to wreck; and do you forget that there are any Gods at all. But will you not have the Senate neither consulted touching a War? Nor the people ask'd whether they are willing that there should be Arms rais'd against the Gauls? It was but just now that the Consuls desired to go into Greece and Asia: yet since you steadfastly resolved that Liguria should be their Province, they obey'd you. They therefore, if they come off with Victory in the War, will justly desire a triumph of you, by whose Authority they waged it.

"Enemies)

XLVII. Such was the Discourse of Furius and Emilius: to which we are inform'd, that, Manlius answer'd in words to this effect: "The Tribunes of the People, Grave Fathers! were formerly us'd to oppose those that demanded a Triumph: But I have reason at present to thank them, for that (whether they shew'd such respect to my Person, or to the greatness of what I have done) they seem'd ready not only to approve of my honour, but also, if occasion were, to propose it. I have, indeed, some Enemies among the ten Embassadors, whom our Ancestors gave to Generals, as their Council, to assist them in the honourable management of a Victory. L. Furius, and L. Emilius will not suffer me to get up into the triumphal Chariot, but take the glorious Crown off my Head: whom I (if the Tribunes should have deny'd me a triumph) should have summon'd as witnesses of what I had done. I truly envy no mans honour: [but this I must say, that] you, Grave Fathers! when the Tribunes of the People of late (who were stout, brave men) would have hinder'd Q. Fabius Labeo from triumphing, by your authority deterr'd them. And he triumph'd, though his Enemies said (not that he waged an unjust War, but) that he never saw an Enemy. Yet I, who have fought so many pitched Battles with an hundred thousand of the fiercest Enemies; who have taken or kill'd above forty thousand men; who have destroy'd two of their Camps: who have left all the Country on this side Mount Taurus more at quiet than Italy now is; am not only wrongfully kept from triumphing, but forced my self to plead my own cause before you, Grave Fathers! being accused by my own [Council the] Embassadors. Now their accusation, Grave Fathers! is, if you observe, twofold: for they said, first, that I ought not to have waged War against the Gauls, and then, that I did it rashly and imprudently. The Gauls [said they] were not thy Enemies; but thou laidst violent hands upon them whilst they were at quiet, and did as they were commanded. I do not desire, Grave Fathers! that what you know in general of the barbarity of the Gallick Nation, and their inveterate hatred to the Roman name, you would believe of these Gauls, that inhabit Asia. But do you judge of these Gauls, as they are in themselves, without any regard to the infamy and envy of the whole Nation. I wish King Eumenes, and all the Cities of Asia were here; that you might hear their accusations rather than mine. Do but send Embassadors into all the great Towns of Asia, and enquire, whether they are freed from greater servitude by Antiochus's being removed beyond Mount Taurus, or by my Conquest over the Gauls? Let them tell you, how often their Country was laid wast, and their Cattle driven away: when they had scarce the liberty even to redeem their Captives, but heard, that their men were sacrificed, and their Children offer'd to Idols. Know, that their Allies paid a Tribute to the Gauls; and that so they must have done (though they are now by you deliver'd from the Kings Yoke) even to this day, if I had not taken pains to prevent it. That the farther Antiochus had been removed from, so much the more tyrannically would the Gauls have domin'd in Asia; and that you would have added all the Region on this side Taurus to the Dominions of the Gauls and not to your own. But besides that these things are all true, the Gauls also robbed Delphi, where was once the universal Oracle of all Mankind, in the very navel [or Centre] of the World: and yet the Roman People did not declare or make War against them for it. But I truly was of opinion that there was some difference between that time, when Greece and Asia were not as yet in your hands (as to the order-

"ing

"ing and observing what was to be done in those parts) and this, wherein you have made Taurus the boundary of the Roman Empire; wherein you give immunity and liberty to the several Cities: wherein to some Nations you add; some you mulct in [part of their] Lands; on other you impose a Tax: you augment or diminish; give or take away Kingdoms; and think it your business to see that they have Peace both by Sea and Land. Would you have thought that Asia had been freed, if Antiochus had not drawn out his Garisons; though they were quiet in their several Forts? If the Gallick Armies should wander up and down in such numbers [as they us'd] would your presents that you made to King Eumenes, or the liberty of the Cities stand good.

"But why do I talk at this rate? as though I had not found, but made the Gauls our XLVIII. Enemies? I appeal to thee, L. Scipio; whose courage and good fortune both, I, thy Successor, desired and obtain'd of the Gods; and thee, P. Scipio, who borest the Character of a Lieutenant, and the majesty of a Colleague, not only with thy Brother but with all the Army; whether you know that there were Legions of Gauls in Antiochus's Army? Whether you ever saw them in the Field, placed in both Wings? (for that seem'd to be the strength of their Forces) or fought with them, as just Enemies? Whether you kill'd them? or carried off their spoils? Yet the Senate decreed, and the people consented, that these men should make War, not with the Gauls, but with Antiochus. Though I suppose they intended it at the same time against all that were in his Garisons. Of whom, excepting Antiochus, with whom Scipio had made a Peace, and with whom you had particularly order'd him to strike a League, there was none but what were Enemies, for that they had born Arms for him against us. In which circumstances though the Gauls had been more than any others, together with certain petit Kings and Tyrants; yet I not only made a Peace with the rest, whom I forced, according to the dignity of their Empire, to atone for their offences; but also try'd whether the Gauls minds could be alter'd from their native savageness: and when I found they were untamable and implacable, I then at last thought fit by force and Arms to restrain them. And now, having acquitted my self from any fault in undertaking the War; I must give you an account how I mannaged it. In which affair I truly should be confident of my cause, though I were to plead, not before a Roman but a Carthaginian Senate: where they say, Generals are hang'd up though they have even a Victory, if they did it by improper or ill means. But since I am in such a City, as therefore calls the Gods to their assistance when they begin or do any action, because it leaves no room for calumny in those things that the Gods have approved of, and hath, among its solemn words (when it decrees a supplication or a triumph) For that he hath well and prosperously mannaged the publick business; if I would not; if I thought it an odious and a proud act to boast of a mans own valour: but should desire, upon the score of my own and my Armies success (in that we had subdu'd so great a Nation without any loss of men) that all honour might be paid to the immortal Gods, and I ride up in triumph into the Capital (from whence, when I had rightly performed my Vows, I set forth) would you deny the immortal Gods and me that [honour?]

"But I fought in an uneven [disadvantageous] place [they say:] pray tell me; how XLIX. could I fight in a place more convenient? when the Enemy had possession of the Mountain? and were in a fortified place? for I must have access to the Foe, if I would overcome him. What if they had had a City in that place, and should have kept within the Walls? Why they must have been besieged. What? Did Manius Acilius fight with King Antiochus in a Plain, at Thermopylae? What? Did not T. Quintius force down Philip in the same manner, when he was upon the Mountains above the River Aius? For my part truly I do not see, either what a sort of Enemy they themselves fancy it to have been, or what they would have it seem to you. If [they think the Gauls] degenerated and softened by the pleasures of Asia, what danger was there in going against them even in so unequal and disadvantageous place? but if dreadful upon the score not only of their savage minds, but the strength of their Bodies also; how can you deny a triumph to so great a Victory? Envy, Grave Fathers! is blind; nor knows she any thing, save how to detract from virtuous actions, by taking off from the honour and reward of them. I beg your pardon, Grave Fathers! if my Speech be longer than ordinary; since 'tis not out of any vanity, to brag of my own actions, so much as of necessity to acquit my self from those crimes, that are charg'd upon me. Could I make my passage all along through Thrace (which was narrow) even instead of steep, or cultivated instead of Woody? and prevent the Thracian Robbers from lurking in Ambuscades which they were acquainted with? Could I hinder our Baggage from being stolen? or every single Beasts from being carry'd off? Could I preserve every particular person from Wounds? or keep that stout and strenuous Hero, Q. Minucius from dying of his hurt? Upon this accident, where by it unhappily fell out, that we lost so good a Citizen, they hang. But that the two Bodies of the Vanguard and the Reer (in a rough pass, a strange place, and when the Enemy had set upon us) circumvented the Army of the Barbarians, that were employ'd in [pilfering from] our Carriages; killing and taking many thousands that very day, and

"and many more in a few days after; this, if they were silent, they believ'd you would not be acquainted with, though the whole Army be witness of what I say. Now if I had never drawn my Sword in Asia, or so much as seen an Enemy there; yet, as Pro-Consul, I should have deserv'd a Triumph for the two Battles in Thrace. But I have now said enough: save that I ought, Grave Fathers! to crave your pardon, for tiring your Patience with so many words.

L. His accusation, that Day, had prevail'd beyond his Defence, had they not protracted the debate till the Evening. Then the Senate was dismiss'd, with such an opinion, that 'twas thought they would deny him a Triumph. But the next Day the Relations and Friends of Cn. Manlius endeavour'd all they could for him, and the Authority of the Seniors prevail'd, who denyed, That there was any precedent; that a General who, having conquer'd their inveterate Enemies, settled his Province, and brought his Army back, should enter the City like a private Person, and dishonourably, without a Chariot and a Laurel Crown. This made them ashamed to be any longer his Enemies, and so they generally decreed him a Triumph. But that which stifled the mention and memory of this contention, was a greater contest that arose with a Person far greater and more renowned. For the two Q. Petilius summon'd P. Scipio Africanus (as Valerius Antias says) to tryal. Which action of theirs Men interpreted according to their several inclinations; some accused, not the Tribunes, but the whole City, for enduring of it, and said, That two of the greatest Cities in the whole World were found to be at the same time ungrateful to two great Men, but that Rome would be the more ungrateful [of the two] if, as conquer'd Carthage had driven conquer'd Annibal, into banishment, so victorious Rome should expel their conquering Scipio. Others, That no one Citizen ought to be so eminent as that he should not answer according to Law; for that nothing was so much like an equality in liberty, as for every particular person, how powerful soever, to make his defence [if any thing were laid to his charge]. What other thing could with safety (much less the grand affairs of state) be committed to any Mans management, if he must not give an account for it? and that violence was no injustice upon him, who could not submit to the rules of common equity. These kind of discourses past till such time as the Day of hearing came. Now there was never any Man before, nor was even that Scipio himself (either when he was Consul or Censor) carry'd into the Forum with a greater flux of People, than went along with him that Day to his Tryal. Where being order'd to plead for himself, he (without mentioning his Crimes) began and made so magnificent a speech concerning his own achievement, that it was evident, no Man was ever either better, or more truly commended. For he spoke of his Actions with the same Courage and Spirit, wherewith he performed them. Nor was it irksome to hear him, because he related them to save himself, and not out of vain Glory.

LII. The Tribunes of the People having recounted the old crimes of Luxury committed in the Winter Camp at Syracuse, and the Plemian Tumult at Locri, to give the greater credit to the present accusation, charg'd him, by suspicions more than by arguments, with taking of Money, saying, That his captive Son was restored to him without ransom, and that Scipio was every other way courted by Antiochus, as though the Peace and War of Rome had depended upon his pleasure only. That he was a Dictator to the Consul, and not a Lieutenant, in the Province: nor went he thither for any other reason, but that (what Spain, Gaul, Sicily, and Africa, so long ago were perswaded of) it might appear to Greece, Asia, and all the Eastern Kings and Nations, that one single Man was the head and chief support of the Roman Empire; that their City (which was Empress of the whole World) lay under the umbrage of Scipio, whose Nods were as good as the Decrees of the Senate, or the Authority of the People. Thus, though they could not touch him with any infamous charge, they loaded him with all the Envy they could. By which means their speeches lasted till Night, and so the tryal was put off till another Day. When that Day came, the Tribunes sate in the Rostra by break of Day; and the party accus'd came with a great number of Friends and Clients through the midst of the Assembly into the Rostra [i. e. the place for Orations] where after all People were commanded to be silent, he told them, This Day (O Tribunes of the People, and you, my fellow Citizens) I fought with Annibal and the Carthaginians a pitch'd Battel in Africk, with good success. Wherefore, because on this Day we ought to lay aside all strife and quarrelling, I will go hence into the Capitol, to salute the great and good Jove, Juno, Minerva, and the rest of those Gods who preside over the Capitol and the Castle; and will give them thanks, for that this very Day, and at many other times, they gave me courage and ability to manage the publick business so much to advantage; and do you, Romans, as many of you as have leisure, go along with me, to beseech the Gods, that you may have more Noblemen like me; for if from seventeen Tears of Age to this time, in which I am now an old Man, you have always been before-hand with me in your honours, yet I have outdone yours honour by my actions. With that he went up from the Rostra into the Capitol, whither the whole multitude immediately turn'd and follow'd him; inasmuch that the very Clerks and Serjeants [or such like Officers] at last left the Tribunes; nor was there any one with them, except a company of Servants, and the Cryer that cited the party accused, out of the Rostra. Scipio went, not only into the Capitol, but through all the City too, with the People, round about, to every Temple of the Gods; so that that Day was full as solemnly kept, and with as much joy (through the favour of the People, and their estimation of his true greatness) as as that on which he rode into the City in Triumph over King Syphax and the Carthaginians.

This was the last happy Day that Scipio saw. For after that, having a prospect of Envy and Controversies, with the Tribunes (his Tryal being put off to a longer Day) he went to Luternum [where he had an Estate] with a resolution not to come back to make his defence. For his Courage and Spirit was greater (besides that he was us'd to better fortune) than that he should acknowledge himself guilty of any crime, or submit himself to the low condition of those that are fain to plead their own Causes. So, when the Day came, and he, though absent, began to be cited, L. Scipio told the Court by way of Essoigne, That he was sick and could not come. Which excuse [or Essoigne] the Tribunes that had summon'd him, not admitting of, they said, "His not coming to make his defence proceeded from the same Pride, whereby he had left the Court, the Tribunes of the People, and the Assembly [before] and that he, accompanied with those very Men, from whom he had taken the right of passing sentence upon him, and their Liberty, had triumphed over the Roman People, whom he drew like Captives after him; having that Day made a secession on [i. e. departure or separation of the People] into the Capitol from the Tribunes of the People. And now [said they, fellow Citizens] you have the reward of that rashness. For he, by whose leading and perswasion you left us, has now himself left you. But does our courage every Day so much decrease, that we who, seventeen Years ago, when he had an Army and a Fleet, durst send the Tribunes of the People, and the Ædile, into Sicily to take and bring him back to Rome, dare not now, though he be a private Person, send any body to fetch him from his Country House to make a Legal Defence for himself? Thereupon the Tribunes of the People being appeal'd to by L. Scipio, decreed, That if he were excus'd upon the account of sickness, that should be admitted as a good essoigne, and the Day be put off by their Colleagues. Now Tib. Sempronius Gracchus was at that time Tribune of the People, who had a quarrel with P. Scipio. But he therefore, though he forbade his name to be set to the Decree of his Colleagues, so that all People expected that he should deliver a more severe opinion than the rest, made this determination, That seeing L. Scipio excus'd his Brother upon the score of his being sick, he thought that a sufficient essoigne; and that he would not suffer P. Scipio to be accus'd before he came back to Rome. Nay, and then too, if he appeal'd to him, he would assist him toward the preventing of his tryal. That P. Scipio, by his great Achievements and the Honours, which the Roman People had conferr'd upon him, was come, by the consent both of Gods and Men, to that height, that for him to stand upon his tryal in the Rostra, and hear the railing taunts of a company of Boys, was a greater dishonour to the Roman People than to himself.

But he added to his determination [upon the point] this sign of his indignation also, Shall that great Conquerour of Africa (Tribunes) the mighty Scipio, stand at your feet? did he therefore rout and defeat four most renowned Generals of the Carthaginians in Spain, and four Armies? did he therefore take Syphax, subdue Annibal, make Carthage tributary to us, and remove Antiochus (for L. Scipio made his Brother a sharer in this Glory) beyond the Mountain Taurus, to submit to the two Petilius? or that you should triumph over him? Shall famous Men never get, either by their own merits, or the honours you confer on them, into a secure, and, as it were, a sacred refuge; where their age may be sure to be, if not so venerable, yet inviolable [as an Altar?]. His determination, and this speech together, moved not only all the rest, but even the accusers also themselves, and they said, They would deliberate concerning their privileges and what was their duty [in the case]. Then, when the Assembly of the People was dismiss'd, they call'd a Senate, wherein the whole order, but more especially the consular and the senior part, gave Tib. Gracchus a great many thanks, for that he had prefer'd the Commonwealths [Interest] before his own private piques; and the Petilius were mightily inveigh'd against, for that they desired to grow famous upon the ruines of another Mans reputation, and sought for spoils out of Africanus's Triumph. After that there was nothing said touching Africanus, who dwelt at Luternum without any desire to come again into the City. And they say, that dying in the Country, he ordered himself to be buried in that very place, and that his Monument should be there built, lest his Funeral should be celebrated in his own ungrateful Country. He was a very remarkable Person, but more upon the score of his skill in War, than his management in Peace; though the first part of his life was more memorable than the last. For in his Youth he was continually waging War, but in his Age, Affairs also declin'd [with him] nor was there matter enough for his genius [to be employ'd in]. What was his second Consulship to his first; yea, though you add his Censorship too? What was his Lieutenantship in Asia, which was of no advantage by reason of his illness, besides that it was blasted by the misfortune which happened to his Son, and, after his return home, by the necessity of either undergoing a [dishonourable] sentence, or flying from that and his Country at the same time? But yet he alone had the Glory of putting an end to the Punick War, which was the greatest and most perilous that ever the Romans waged.

Upon the Death of Africanus, his Enemies grew more spiteful: of whom M. Porcius Cato was the chief; who, even when he was alive also, was wont to snarl at his greatness. And by his LII.

LIII.

LIV.

his advice some think the Petillii; not only enter'd upon their project, whilst Africanus was alive; but, after he was dead also, prefer'd a Bill; which was this: That you [the Senate] be pleas'd to order that inquiry to be made, what money was taken, carried away, or levied from King Antiochus, and his Subjects: and that concerning so much of it, as hath not been accounted for in the publick Treasury, Ser. Sulpicius the Cuy Prætor make report to the Senate: but that the Senate name any one [else] of the present Prætors to make such inquiry. This Bill Q. and L. Mummius at first oppos'd: but they thought it reasonable, that the Senate should inquire concerning any money that had not been brought into the treasury according to the constant usage in former times. The Petillii also condemn'd the grandeur and tyranny of the Scipio's in the Senate: whilst L. Furius Purpureo, who was one of the ten Embassadors in Asia, thought they ought to enlarge the Bill; and inquire, not only what moneys were taken from Antiochus, but likewise from other Kings and Nations too: out of malice to his Enemy Cn. Manlius. Then L. Scipio, who, it appear'd, was like to say more for himself than against the Law, stood forth to dissuade them. He complain'd, that such a Bill should be prefer'd after the Death of his Brother, who was a person so extraordinarily valiant and renowned: [and said] Was it too little for P. Africanus not to be praised in the Rollra after his Death, unless he were accus'd also. That the Carthaginians were content with the banishment of Annibal; but that the Roman People were not satisfied even with the death of P. Scipio: unless his good name too were taken from him after he was buried, and his Brother also (which was another accession to their Envy) made a sacrifice [to their malice.] M. Cato was for passing the Bill (who hath an Oration extant concerning the money taken from King Antiochus) and deterr'd the Mummius's (the Tribunes) from being against it. Wherefore these two laying aside their intercession [or, no longer opposing of it] all the Tribes voted, as he had propos'd.

LV. After that when Ser. Sulpicius propos'd the question to them, who should make the inquiry according to the Petillian Bill; the Senate order'd Q. Terentius Cæcilius the Prætor to be the man. Before whom, being either so great a Friend to the Cornelian Family, that they who tell us that Scipio dy'd and was buried at Rome (for such a report also there is) say likewise that he attended at the Funeral, as formerly at his triumph, with a Cap on his Head, and at the Capene Gate gave Wine sweeten'd with Honey to those that follow'd the Corps; for that he, among other Captives, was by Scipio retaken in Asia: or so great an Enemy, that for his extraordinary animosity, he was particularly chosen by that Faction that was against the Scipio's, to make this inquiry; before this Prætor (I say) whether too favourable or too severe [I cannot tell] L. Scipio was presently call'd in question: and at the same time an information brought, and the names taken of his Lieutenants, A. and L. Hostilius Cato, and C. Furius Aculeo the Questor. Yea, that all of them might seem concern'd in the same Conspiracy to rob the publick, two Clerks [or Notaries] also and a Messenger [were taken up.] L. Hostilius, the Clerks, and the Messenger were acquitted before any Sentence pass'd upon Scipio: but Scipio, L. Hostilius the Lieutenant, and C. Furius were condemn'd: [upon this account] for that Scipio, (to make a better accommodation of peace between him and Antiochus) had receiv'd six thousand pounds of gold, and four hundred and eighty of silver, more than he had return'd into the Treasury: A. Hostilius eighty pound of gold with four hundred and three of silver; and Furius the Questor a hundred and thirty of gold, and two hundred of silver. These sums of gold and silver I find set down in (P. Africanus) Antias. Now in L. Scipio's Case, I would rather have it to be the Bookellers fault, than a lie of the Authors, as to the sum of gold and silver. For it is more likely, that the weight of silver was greater than that of the gold: and that the mulct laid upon him was rather four Millions of Sesterces than eight hundred Millions: and that so much the more still, for that they say, P. Scipio himself was required to give an account of such a sum in the Senate: as also, that having order'd his Brother Lucius to bring the Book of that account, as the Senate was looking upon it, he with his own hands, tore it all to pieces: as being very angry, that, after he had brought into the Treasury twenty Millions of Sesterces, an account of four Millions should be required of him. And that with the same assurance of mind, when the Questors were afraid to take any money out of the Treasury contrary to Law, he ask'd for the Keys and said, he'd open the Treasury, who had been the cause of its being shut.

LVI. They are also of very different opinions in many other things concerning Scipio's later days, especially his Tryal, his Death, Funeral, and place of Burial: so that I cannot tell which story to believe. They do not agree concerning his Accuser: some saying that M. Navius, and others, that the Petillii summon'd to his Tryal: Nor concerning the time, when he was to be try'd; nor of the year in which he dy'd: nor where he dy'd, or was buried. Some say, that he dy'd and was buried at Rome, and others at Liternum. But there is a Monument and Statues erected for him in both places. For at Liternum there was a Monument, and upon it a Statue; which I my self saw not long ago thrown down by a Tempest, and at Rome (without the Capene Gate) there are three Statues, two whereof are said to be [the Statues] of P. and L. Scipio, and the third of Q. Ennius the Poet. Nor is this difference among Historians only, but the Speeches also [which were made upon that occasion] (if at least those that go under that Title (of P. Scipio, and Tib. Gracchus) were really theirs) are contradictory to each other. The Title of P. Scipio's Oration bears in it the name name of M. Navius, Tribune of the people, though the Oration it self is without any name at all of an accuser, but only calls him sometimes Rascal, and elsewhere Fop. Nor has Gracchus's Oration it self made any mention either of the Petilliuses being Africanus's accusers, or of the Day appointed for his Tryal. But he that would accommodate this matter to Gracchus's Oration, must tell you quite another story, and follow those Authors, who say, that when L. Scipio was accus'd and condemn'd for taking of Money from the King, Africanus was a Lieutenant in Etruria; From whence, as soon as he heard of his Brothers misfortune, he made haste and (quitting his Lieutenantship) went to Rome; where going from the Gate Strait into the Forum (seeing it was said that his Brother was going to Prison) he refus'd him from the Officer, and (more out of natural affection than civility) offer'd violence to the Tribunes, who strove to detain him. For this Gracchus himself complains of, That the power of the Tribunes was destroyed by a private Person. And at last, though he promised assistance to L. Scipio, he adds, That it was a thing of more tolerable example, that the Tribunes power and the Commonwealth should seem to be overcome by a Tribune of the People, rather than by a private Person; but yet he blames him for this one insistent action at such a rate, that, in chiding him for degenerating so far from himself, he makes him amends for the reproof he gave him with heaping many commendations upon him for his former moderation and temperance. For he says, That the People were once rebuked by him, for that they would needs have made him perpetual Consul and Dictator; that he forbade the setting up of any Statues for him in the Assembly Court, in the Rostra, in the Senate House, in the Capitol, or in Jove's Chapel; as also, that he was against the making of a Decree, that his Image should be carry'd out of the Temple of Jupiter (the good and great) in a triumphal habit.

These things being said in commendation of him, even by an Enemy, shew'd the greatness of his mind in his being able to set bounds to his Honours as he was a Citizen of Rome. 'Tis very probable that his younger Daughter (for the elder undoubtedly was placed out by her Father to P. Cornelius Nasica) was married to this Gracchus. But 'tis not well known, whether she were betrothed and married after the Death of her Father; or whether those opinions are in the right [which say] that Gracchus (when L. Scipio was going to Prison, and none of his Collegues would assist him) swore, That all the enmity he bore to the Scipios, still continued; nor did he do anything to ingratiate himself [with them]; but yet he would not suffer P. Africanus to be carry'd into that Prison, to which he had seen the same Africanus lead the Kings and Generals of their Enemies. That the Senate, that Day happening to sup in the Capitol, rose all up together, and desired, That, whilst the Feast lasted, Africanus would betroth his Daughter to Gracchus. Which Espousals being rightly perform'd amidst that publick solemnity, that Scipio, when he came home, told his Wife Emilia, That he had betrothed his younger Daughter. At which she being in a Woman-like passion, and saying, That, if he design'd to marry her to Gracchus, her Mother ought to have known of it. That Scipio, being overjoy'd that she should hit so right upon the same Person, made answer, That she was betrothed to that very Man. Now these things ought to be laid before you concerning so great a Person, though Opinions and Authors vary about them.

When the Tryals were, by Q. Terentius the Prætor, made an end of, Hostilius and Furius being condemn'd, gave sureties the same Day to the City Questors. Scipio, arguing that all the Money which he had receiv'd was in the Treasury, and that he had nothing which belong'd to the publick, was going to Prison. But P. Scipio Nasica appeal'd to the Tribunes, and made a speech full of real Glories, not only of the Cornelian Race in general, but particularly of his own Family. "That his Parents, and those of P. Africanus, as also of L. Scipio, who was now going to Prison, were Cn. and P. Scipio, two great and famous Men. "That they (when for some Years they had advanced the Roman Fame in Spain, against many Generals and Armies too of the Carthaginians and Spaniards, not only in War, but in that they had given those Nations an instance of the moderation and honour that Romans were endowed with) at last both dy'd for the good of the Roman People. Now though it would have been enough for their Posterity to have maintain'd that Glory which they got, yet that P. Africanus so far outdid his Fathers praises, that he made People believe, he was not born of Humane Blood, but of Divine Extraction. That L. Scipio of whom they then discour'd (to pass by all that he had done in Spain and Africa, when he was his Brothers Lieutenant) who had been Consul, was not only look'd upon by the Senate as a fit Person to have Asia for his Province (though out of course) and the management of the War against Antiochus; but by his Brother also, who after two Consulships, one Consulship and a Triumph, went into Asia as his Lieutenant. Where, lest the greatness and splendour of the Lieutenant should obscure the Consuls Glory, it so happened, that, the Day whereon L. Scipio conquer'd Antiochus at Magnesia, P. Scipio was sick at Elea some few Days journey from thence. That that Army was not less than that of Annibal, with which they had fought in Africa; and that there was among many other Generals of the Kings, that very same Annibal too, who had been General in the Punick War. And that the War also was so managed, that no body could blame so much as fortune for it. But yet now, in time of Peace, they are seeking out for an accusation [against him] and say, that he sold Peace for Money. That by this means the ten Embassadors also were

H h h h h

"at

"at the same time arraign'd, by whose advice the Peace was made. Yea, that there were some of the ten Embassadors, who accused Cn. Manlius: but their accusation did not prevail, not only so far as to gain credit to what they charg'd upon him, but not so much as to retard his triumph.

LIX.

"But that indeed, in Scipio's Case, the conditions of Peace were suspected as being too favourable to Antiochus. For his Kingdom was left entire; he posses'd all, after he was conquer'd, that he had before the War: but though he had a great quantity of gold and silver, there was no part of it brought into the publick Treasury, but all turn'd to private use. Was not there more gold and silver brought in before all Peoples Eyes at L. Scipio's Triumph, than at ten other Triumphs and put them all together? For what should I speak of the Confines of his Kingdom? [or say] That Antiochus had all Asia and the adjacent parts of Europe: how great a tract of Land that is from the Mountain Taurus to the Aegean Sea; since all people know how many, not only Cities, but Nations too it contains. That this Country, which is above thirty dayes Journey long, and ten broad between the two Seas, was taken away from Antiochus as far as the Mountain Taurus, he being driven into the most remote Corner of the World. What, if the Peace were granted him for nothing, could be taken from him more? That when Philip was conquer'd, he had Macedonia left him; and Nabis Lacedemon. Nor was there any crime invented against Quintius; for he had not Africanus for his Brother, who, when he should by his glory have done L. Scipio good, quite contrary through the Envy that lay upon him, did him an injury. That there was more gold and silver thought to have been brought into Scipio's House, than could have been made of all the Goods he had if they had been sold. Where then is that gold of the Kings? Where are so many Estates that he receiv'd? There must have been an heap of this new gains in his House, which costs him not much in keeping. But what could not be made of his goods, his Enemies would fetch out of his Body and back by vexation and contumelies against him: so far, as to put a person of such Renown in Prison, among a parcel of Thieves and Robbers, where he should die in the dark and the Stocks; and afterward be thrown forth naked before the Prison: which would be a disgrace to the City of Rome as well as to the Cornelian Family.

LX.

In opposition to this Terentius the Prætor repeated the Petilian Bill, the order of Senate, and the Sentence [pass'd] concerning L. Scipio: [and said] that he, unless the money that he was adjudg'd to pay, were brought into the publick Treasury, had nothing else to do but to order the party condemn'd to be taken and carry'd to Prison. The Tribunes having withdrawn, to consult, a little after C. Fannius, according to his own, and all the rest of his Collegues opinions, saving Gracchus, declared, that the Tribunes would not hinder the Prætor from exercising his authority. But Tib. Gracchus said this was his resolution; That he would not hinder the Prætor from making the money that was adjudg'd of L. Scipio's goods: but yet that he would not suffer L. Scipio (who had conquer'd the most opulent King in all the World; had propagated the Roman Empire to the utmost Borders of the Earth; oblig'd Eumenes, the Rhodians, and so many other Cities of Asia by his kindness, and imprison'd a great number of their Enemies chief Officers, whom he led in Triumph) to be in Jail among the Enemies of the Roman People; and therefore charg'd them to let him go. This resolution of his was heard with so much assent, and people were so glad to see L. Scipio dismiss'd, that the sentence scarce seem'd to have been pass'd in the same City. Then the Prætor sent the Questors to take possession, on behalf of the publick, of L. Scipio's goods: in which there neither appear'd any token of the Kings money, nor was there even so much made of them, as the sum in which he was condemn'd amounted to. His Relations, Friends and Clients rais'd money among themselves for L. Scipio; in so much, that if he would have accepted of it, he might have been somewhat richer than he was before his misfortunes. But he would not take any of it. What was necessary for him in Cloths [and the like] was bought for him by his Relations: and the Envy of the Scipio's fell upon the Prætor, his Council, and the Accusers.

DECADE

DECADE IV. BOOK IX.

The E P I T O M E.

2. Æmilius the Consul, having subdu'd Liguria, joined that road, which comes from Placentia to Ariminum, to the Via Flaminia, or Flaminian way. 6. The principles of Luxury are said to be brought in by the Asian Army. The Ligurians, all about the Appennine were subdu'd. 8, 9, &c. The Bacchanalia, a Grecian Solemnity [in honour of Bacchus] celebrated in the night time, which was the seminary of all wickedness, having become the occasion of a vast multitudes entering into a conspiracy, was inquir'd into and discover'd by the Consul, who punish'd a great many [of the conspirators] and abolish'd it. T. Q. Flaminius, Brother to Titus, was put out of the Senate by the Censors (L. Valerius Flaccus and M. Porcius Cato, who was a very great man for managing affairs either in Peace or War) for that he, when he had Gaul for his Province as Consul, (upon the request of one Philip a Carthaginian whom he lov'd) had kill'd a certain Gaul with his own hands; or, as some say, had with an Axe beheaded a Condemn'd Prisoner, at the request of a certain Placentian youth, whom he was in love with. There is an Oration of M. Cato extant against him. 52. Scipio died at Uternum. 51. And, as though Fortune had resolv'd to join two Funerals of the two greatest men together; Annibal, being deliver'd up to the Romans (by Prusias King of Bithynia, to whom, when Antiochus was now conquer'd, he had fled) who had sent T. Quintius Flaminius to demand him, poison'd himself. 50. Philopamen also, General of the Achaans, and a very great man, was likewise poison'd by the Mc-senians, who had taken him in the War. 55. The Colonies of Potentia, Pisaurum, Parma and Mucina were planted. 56. Good success against the Celtiberians; with the beginning and causes of the Macedonian War. The original whereof proceeded from Philip's resentment, that his Kingdom should be impair'd by the Romans, and that he was forced to draw his Garrisons out of Thrace and other places.

W Hilst these things were transacted at Rome (if so be they were done that year) both the Consuls made War in Liguria. That Enemy was design'd, as it were, by Fate to keep up the military Discipline of the Romans in the intervals of such great Wars: nor did any other Province more sharpen their Souldiers to Courage. For Asia, by the pleasantness of its Cities, the plenty of all things both by Sea and Land, the effeminacy of the Enemy, and [the help of] the Kings wealth made their Armies more rich than valiant. Especially under the Command of Cn. Manlius they were dissolute and negligent. Wherefore their march through Thrace being somewhat rougher, and their Enemy more exercised [in Arms] by great misadventures chastiz'd them. In Liguria there were all things, that could excite a Souldier: Mountainous and craggy places, which for them to take, and to dispossess the Enemy of, was very difficult: steep wayes, that were also narrow, and beset with Ambuscades: a light, swift, and surprizing Foe, that would not suffer them in any place, or at any time, to be quiet or secure: a necessity of attacking fortified Castles, which was both laborious and dangerous: a poor Country, that oblig'd Souldiers to be sparing, as not affording much booty. Wherefore no Sutlers [or Scullions for the Camp, &c.] follow'd them, nor did a long train of Beasts extend their Army: which consisted of nothing but arms and men, who placed all their hopes in their Arms. Nor was their ever wanting either opportunity or cause for a War with those People; for, by reason of their domestick poverty they made inroads into the Neighbouring Countries; though they did not fight so as to run the hazard of all they had.

C. Flaminius the Consul, having fought several successful Battles with the Frintates of Liguria in their own Country, accepted of their surrender, and disarm'd them: but when he chastized them for not delivering up their Arms so sincerely as they should have done, they fled into the Angine Mountains: Whither the Consul presently follow'd them. But they again made halt from thence, and the greatest part of them ran unarm'd through pathless places, and over craggy Rocks (as hard as they could drive) where the Enemy could not follow them, till they got beyond the Apennine. But those that staid in the Camp were circumvented and taken. Then the Legions were led beyond the Apennine. There [the Enemy] having for some time defended themselves by the height of the Mountain which they were posses'd of, soon after surrender'd themselves. Then their Arms were look'd after with greater care, and all taken away. From thence the War was transfer'd to the Apuan Ligurians, who had made such incursions into the Territories of Pisa and Bononia, that they could not be well inhabited, or cultivated. And having quite subdu'd these people also, the Consul gave Peace to the adjacent Nations. Now, since he had so brought it to pass, that the Province was quiet from War: lest his Souldiers should be idle, he march'd from Bononia to Arretum. M. Æmilius, the other Consul, burnt and laid wast the Countries of Liguria, with all the Villages that lay in Plains or Vales, whilst they themselves kept upon two Mountains called Ballyta and Sniffimontium: and then setting upon those also that were upon the Hills he first teased them with light Skirmishes; and at last, having forced them down into the Field, overcame them in a set Battle, at which he vow'd [to build] a Temple to Diana. Having subdu'd all on this side the Apennine, Æmilius set upon the Tras-

K h h h h

mountains

montanes [or those that lived beyond the Mountains] (among whom were the Brinates of Liguria, whom C. Flaminius had not visited) subdued them all, took away their Arms, and brought the multitude [of them] down from the Hills into the Plain. Then, when he had settled Liguria, he led his Army into the Gallick Dominions; and made a way from Placentia to Arminum, to meet the Flaminius [way]. In the last Battel, that he had with the Ligurians hand to hand, he vow'd [to build] a Temple to Queen Juno. Now these things were done in Liguria that Year.

III. In Gaul M. Furius the Prætor, who in time of Peace desired a plausible pretence for a War, had taken their Arms from the innocent Cenomans. Of which the Cenomans complained to the Senate at Rome, but were referred to the Consul Emilius, whom the Senate had impowred to make inquiry, and determine [of the matter]. They therefore having had a great contest with the Prætor carryed the cause, and had their Arms restored to them, the Prætor being order'd to quit the Province. Then there was a Senate [or audience of the Senate] granted to the Embassadors from the Latine Allies, who were come thither in great numbers from all parts of Latium. Upon whose complaint, That a great many of their Citizens were come to Rome, and there were poled; Q. Terentius Culleo was imploy'd, To inquire after all such persons, and whomsoever the Allies could prove to be poled, or rated (he or his Father) in their Cities, when C. Claudius and M. Livius were Censors, or after their time, to force them to return to the place, at which they were so poled. Upon this search being made, twelve Thousand Latines returned home; for the City was even at that time oppress'd with a vast multitude of Foreigners.

IV. Before the Consuls returned to Rome, M. Fulvius the Proconsul, came back out of Ætolia. Wherefore in the Senate [held] at the Temple of Apollo, after he had discours'd concerning his Atchievements in Ætolia and Cephalonia, he desired of them, That for his good and prosperous management of the publick affairs, they would order, that all honour should be paid to the immortal Gods, and decree him a Triumph. M. Aebutius Tribune of the People shew'd, that he was resolv'd to interpose, if any thing were determin'd in that affair before the arrival of the Consul M. Emilius, For he would contradict it, and gave him charge, when he went into his Province, that that debate should be kept entire till he came. That Fulvius lost nothing but time; for the Senate would, even when the Consul was present, determine as they pleas'd. To which M. Fulvius [reply'd], That if either the pique between him and M. Emilius were unknown to the World, or with how ungovernable and almost Kingly fury he exercised those animosities; yet it was not to be endured, that the Consuls being absent should hinder their [performing] all honour to the immortal Gods, or retard a deserved and a due Triumph; or that a General, who had done great things, and a victorious Army, should stand at the Gates with their Booty and Captives, till the Consul, who staid away for this very reason, should be pleas'd to come back to Rome. But since there is a known grudge between him and the Consul, what justice can any Man expect from him, who carry'd an order of Senate to the Treasury, which was made surreptitiously, when there were but few in the House? That he thought Ambracia was not taken by force, which was attack'd with a Mound and Galleries, where there first works were fired and new ones made, where they fought about the Walls, both above and under ground, for fifteen Days together, where, when the Soldiers had now got over the Walls, they had a doubtful consist [in the Town] from break of Day till Night, and where there were above three Thousand of the Enemy slain. And then, what a calumny has he brought to the High Priests, concerning the Temples of the Immortal Gods being rifled in the City, when it was taken? unless it be lawful for the City to be adorn'd with the spoils of Syracuse, and other Cities, that had been taken, but against Ambracia only, when that was taken, the right of War must not take place. That he desired the Senate and the Tribunes, that they would not make him the scorn of his haughty adversary.

V. Hereupon they all [were of his side] some perswading, and others rebuking the Tribune. But Tib. Gracchus's Oration prevailed most, [who said], That it was a thing of ill example to make use of even his own animosities as he was a Magistrate; but that a Tribune of the People should concern himself to inquire into the piques between other Men, was dishonourable, and becoming the Authority and the sacred Laws of that Colledge. That every Man ought by his own judgment to hate or love, and to approve or disapprove of things [as he himself saw cause] not to depend upon the look or nod of another, or be carry'd about by the force of another Mans inclination, and (being a Tribune of the People) stand up for an angry Consul, or remember what Emilius had privately charg'd him with; to forget that the Tribuneship was committed to him by the Roman People; and that, for the assistance and to defend the liberty of private Persons, and not to assert the Majesty forsooth of Consuls. That he was not well aware of this neither; that it would be deliver'd down as a memorandum to posterity; that, in the same Colledge one of the Tribunes of the People laid aside his private animosity for the sake of the Commonwealth, whilst another of them maintained even that of another Person, which was impos'd upon him. The Tribune, overcome by these rebukes, went out of the Court, and then, upon the proposal of Ser. Sulpicius the Prætor, M. Fulvius had a Triumph decreed him. Who when he had given the Senate thanks, added, That he had vow'd [to celebrate] the grand Games to Jupiter (the good and great) that Day on which he took Ambracia. That for that purpose the Cities had contributed a hundred and ten Pounds of Gold. Wherefore he desired, that that Gold might be deduct'd out of the the money which he was to bring into the Treasury at his Triumph. The Senate thereupon order'd the Colledge of Priests to be consult'd; whether it were necessary, that all that gold should be laid out upon the Games? To which the Priests answering negatively, that it was not material, in point of Religion, how much money was spent upon the Games; the Senate left Fulvius at his liberty to lay out what he would, so he exceeded not the sum of eighty thousand [Sesterces.] He had resolv'd to triumph in the Month of January; but when he heard that the Consul Emilius, (upon the receipt of a Letter from the Tribune Aebutius concerning the laying down of his intercession) as he was coming to Rome to obstruct the Triumph, was fallen sick by the way, he, lest he might have more to do in the case of his triumph, than he had in the War, anticipated the day of his triumphing. So he triumph'd over the Ætolians and Cephalonia, on the 21st of December. There were golden Crowns of a hundred and twelve pound weight carried before his Chariot, and a thousand eighty three pound of silver; with two hundred forty three pound of gold; of Attick Tetradrachms [a Coin] a hundred and eighteen thousand; of Philips money twelve thousand four hundred twenty two [pieces] two hundred eighty five brazen Statues; two hundred and thirty marble Statues; besides Arms, Weapons, and other spoils of the Enemy in abundance; with battering Engines [to sling great Weapons or Stones] and other Warlike Instruments of all sorts; and Officers, who were either Ætolians, and of Cephalonia, or Kings men left there by Antiochus, to the number of twenty seven. He presented a great many Tribunes, Prefects, Horsemen, and Centurions, both Romans and Allies, with military gifts, that day, in the Circus Flaminius, before he rode into the City: giving to each Souldier, out of the booty, twenty five Deniers; double to a Centurion, and treble to an Horseman.

VI. And now the time for the Consular Assembly was at hand; at which, because M. Emilius, whose business it happen'd to be, could not be present, C. Flaminius came to Rome. By him were created for Consuls Sp. Postumius Albinus, and Q. Marcius Philippus. Then the Prætors were made; [whose names were] T. Manius, P. Cornelius Sulla, C. Calpurnius Piso, M. Licinius Lucullus, C. Aurelius Scaurus, and L. Quintus Crispinus. At the latter end of the Year, when the new Magistrates were now chosen, upon the 4th of March Cn. Manlius Vulso triumph'd over the Gauls, that dwelt in Asia. Now the reason why he triumph'd later than ordinary, was, lest he should have been put to make his defence in the time of Q. Terentius Culleo's Prætorship, by the Perillian Law; and he set on fire by the flame of that Sentence, whereby L. Scipio was condemn'd: the Judges being more incens'd at him than the other, for that, whereas the other had kept the Military Discipline strictly up, he, being his Successor, had corrupted it by any manner of extravagancy. Nor did those things only reflect upon him, which were said to have been done a great way off and out of sight, in his Province; but those also much more, that were seen in his Souldiers every day. For the original of Foreign Luxury was introduced into the City by the Asiatick Army; who were the first that brought bras Beds, rich Coverlets, Counterpanes, and other woven Furniture, and (which were then lookt upon as magnificent Household-stuff) Tables with one Foot, and Cupboards [or Side-Tables] to Rome. Then too were singing Women that play'd upon the Lute and the Harp, with other methods of diversion first added to their Feasts; which began themselves likewise to be prepared with greater care and cost; and a Cook, who among the ancients was the meanest Slave they had, to be in esteem, in use, and valued: so that what was before mere drudgery, became an Art. But yet those, which then were seen, were scarce the Seeds of future Luxury.

VII. Cn. Manlius carry'd in his Triumph golden Crowns of two hundred and twelve pound weight; of silver a hundred and twenty thousand pound; of Gold two thousand two hundred and three pound; of Attick Tetradrachms a hundred twenty seven thousand; of Cistophores two hundred and fifty; of Philippicks in gold sixteen thousand three hundred and twenty; with a great quantity of Gallick Arms and spoils, which were carried in Waggon, besides fifty two great Officers of the Enemies that were led before his Chariot. He divided among his Souldiers, to each man forty two Deniers; double that to a Centurion; giving a double stipend to each foot man, and treble to an Horseman. Many people of all qualities were presented with military gifts, and follow'd his Chariot. And then, there were such Verses spoken by the Souldiers upon their General, that it was easily discern'd, they were said of an indulgent and ambitious Leader; and that the triumph was more glorious through the favour of the Souldiers, than of the People. But Manlius's Friends prevailed so far as to gain the good will of the people too; for by their solicitations there was an order of Senate made, that out of the money which was carry'd in Triumph, that Contribution which the People had made to the publick of money to pay the Army, which was not paid before that time, should be return'd to them. And accordingly the City Questors paid twenty five [Deniers] and a half for a thousand bras pieces, with care and fidelity. At the same time two Tribunes of the Souldiers came out of the two Spains with Letters from C. Atinius, and L. Manlius, who then govern'd those Provinces: by which Letters they were inform'd, that the Celtiberians and Lusitanians were in Arms, and pillaged the Territories of their Allies. About that affair the Senate refer'd the whole Consultation to the new Magistrates. At the Roman Games (that year) which P. Cornelius Cethegus, and A. Postumius Albinus set forth, a Mast of a Ship [that was set up there to have Sails ty'd from it to keep off the Sun, &c. from the Spectators] which in the Circus was not fasten'd so well as it should have been, fell upon the Statue of Pollentia, and beat it down. At that religious accident the Senate were concern'd, and thought that one day ought to be added to the Celebration of the Games; that two Statues ought to be set up instead of that one; and that a new one ought to be made, that should be gilt. The Plebeian Games also were perform'd all over one day by Order of the Aediles C. Sempronius Blaesus, and M. Furius Luscus.

VIII. The next Year, Sp. Postumius Albinus, and Q. Marcius Philippus, the Consuls, were diverted from taking care of the Army, Wars and Provinces to take revenge for an intestine Conspiracy. The Prætors chose their Provinces: T. Manius the City; M. Licinius Lucullus had [the Jurisdiction] between Citizens and Foreigners; C. Aurélius Scawus Sardinia; P. Cornelius Sulla Sicily; L. Quintius Crispinus the hither Spain; and C. Calpurnius Piso the farther. Both the Consuls were order'd to make inquiry into the intestine Conspiracies. There came an ordinary man out of Greece first into Etruria (without any of those many Arts which that learned Nation hath taught us for the furnishing of our minds as well as Bodies; but only) as a small Priest and Prophet: nor did he openly and in the face of the World profess to make any gain of what he taught, or publickly to infuse a religious dread into mens minds, but he was the chief manager of certain secret Rites, called Initia; which were at first deliver'd to some few People; but soon after began to be divulged to all Men and Women too. Now to this religious performance there were added the pleasures of Feasting and Wine, to draw the more folks in. And when Wine and the Night (the Men and Women being mix'd together, young and old all in a Crowd) had extinguish'd all sense of shame; first there were debaucheries of all sorts committed; every one having that pleasure ready prepared for them, to which their nature was most inclin'd. Nor had they one sort of crimes only: but ingenious Men and Women lay promiscuously with one another: and false Witness, false tokens, Testimonies and Judgments came out of that same Office [of Roguery.] So also many times people were poison'd or kill'd in their own Houses, so as that their Bodies sometimes could not be found that they might be buried. Many things were carry'd on by Treachery, and many more by Force. But that which concealed their outrages, was, that by reason of their howlings, and the noise of their Drums and Cymbals, no body could hear the cries of those that complain'd, when they had violence offer'd to them or were kill'd.

IX. The stain of this mischief came out of Etruria to Rome, like an infection as it were. Where at first the bigness of the City, which was more capacious, and wide to hold such ill People, concealed their Villanies. But at last Postumius the Consul discover'd them by this means. P. Aebutius, whose Father had been a Trooper at the publick charge, being left an Orphan, when his Guardians were dead, was educated under the Tutelage of his Mother Duronia, and his Father-in-Law T. Sempronius Rutilus; of whom his Mother was mighty fond. Now this Father-in-Law, having managed his Guardianship at that rate, that he could not give a good account of it, had a mind either to have the young Boy either taken off, or obliged by some Bond to be at his disposal. The Bacchanalia [Rites in honour of Bacchus] therefore were the only way [to do his business.] So the Mother call'd the Lad [and told him] that she had vow'd, when he was sick, that as soon as he grew well again, she would initiate him in the Bacchanalia. That now being obliged by her Vow through the blessing of the Gods, she would perform it. That he must live chaste for ten dayes, and that the tenth day she would carry him to Supper, and afterward, when he was clean wash'd, into the Sacrary [or holy place.] Now there was one Hispala Fecenia, a noted Curtizan, and a Libertine [i.e. one born of Parents that were Slaves] worthy of more gain than when a Girl she had been used to, who even after she was manumitted [i.e. had her freedom given her] maintain'd her self in the same manner. With this Woman Aebutius, being a Neighbour, kept Company: which was no damage either to his Estate or Credit. For she loved him dearly, and, since his Friends gave him but a small allowance, by her munificence kept him. Yea she went so far out of affection to him, that after her Patrons Death, because she was under no Bodies protection, having desired a Guardian of the Tribunes and the Prætor, when she made her Will, she left Aebutius her sole Heir.

X. Now these pledges of love being between them, so that they kept nothing secret the one from the other, the youth, in jest, bid her not think much, if for some few nights he lay from her. That he, upon the score of Religion, had a mind to be initiated at the Bacchanalia, to discharge a Vow that he made for his recovery out of sickness. Which when the Woman heard, being much troubled, she said, God forbid! It was better for her and him both to die, than that he should do so, and pray'd that a thousand Curses might light on their heads who had perswaded him to it. Whereupon the youth admiring at her words, and the great disorder she was in, bad her spare her Curses; for his Mother, by the consent of his Father-in-Law, had commanded him so to do: Why then (said she) your Father-in-Law (for peradventure we may not so justly accuse your mother of it) makes haste to destroy your chastity, credit, hopes and life. At which when he so much the more admired, and ask'd, what the matter was, She, (begging pardon of the Gods and Goddesses, if forced by the love she bore him, she revealed things that ought to have been concealed) told him that when she was a waiting Maid she went along with her Mistress into that Sacrary; but since she was free, never came within it. That she knew that to be the Shop of all sorts of Corruptions; and that it was known that for two years there had been no body initiated above twenty years of Age. That, as soon as any person was introduced, he was deliver'd, like a Sacrifice, to the Priests; who carry'd him into a place, that ring round about with howlings, and a noise of singing, Cymbals, and Drums, that the Voice of any one that complain'd, when lustful violence was offer'd to them, might not be heard. Wherefore she desir'd and beseech'd him, that he would disengage himself from that design by any means whatsoever; and not throw himself headlong into that place, where he must both do and suffer all the most abominable things imaginable: nor would she let him stir from her, before the young man had promised, that he would keep away from those mysteries.

to

When he came home, and his Mother began to tell him, what he must do that day, and what again on the other dayes that he was to keep in order to his initiation; he said, he would do nothing at all [of what she said] nor did he intend to be initiated: at which Discourse his Father-in-Law was present. Immediately the Woman cry'd out; That he could not lye from Hispala ten Nights. That being intoxicated with the poison and enchantments of that Serpent, he had no respect or reverence for his Father-in-Law, his Mother, nor the Gods themselves: and so his Father-in-Law on the one side, and his Mother on the other rebuking him, turn'd him and four Servants out of Doors. Thereupon the young man went to his Aunt Aebutia, and told her the reason why he was turn'd out by his Mother. And after, by her advice, the next day complain'd to the Consul Postumius in private where there was no body by. The Consul, bidding him come to him again three dayes after dismiss'd: whilst he himself ask'd Sulpicia, a grave Woman, and his Mother-in-Law, Whether she knew an old Woman called Aebutia in the Aventine? to which she replying, that she did know her to be a good old fashion'd Woman: he said, He must needs speak with her: and therefore she must send a Messenger to her to come [thither.] Aebutia, being sent for by Sulpicia, came; and some small time after, the Consul, as though it had come in by chance, began a Discourse concerning her Brothers being robb'd of his Estate, by those that should not have done it, he was then at her House, as being turn'd out of Doors by his Mother; for that the modest Youth (God be praised) would not be initiated in the Bacchanalia, which were rites, as Fame went, very obscene.

Then the Consul supposing he had found sufficiently concerning Aebutius, that he had not told him a lie, sending Aebutia away, he desired his Mother-in-Law, that she would send for Hispala also to him, out of the Aventine, where, being a Libertine, she was not unknown to the Neighbourhood. For he had some questions to ask her too. At which Message Hispala being troubled, that she should be sent for to so noble and grave a Lady, without knowing for what reason; when she saw the Lictors in the Porch, the crowd of Consular persons and the Consul himself, she was almost ready to dy. But the Consul taking her and his Mother-in-Law into the inner part of the House, he told her, that if she could find in her heart to tell the truth, she needed not to be troubled; for she should have either that good and noble Lady Sulpicia's word, or his [for her security:] upon condition, that she would declare to him all that was usually done in the Grove of Simela, at the Bacchanals in the Night time, when those rites were perform'd. Which when she heard, the Woman was so taken with a dread and trembling over all her Limbs, that for a good while she could not speak: till at last coming to her self, she said, that being but a very little Girl, and a Servant, she was initiated with her Mistress. But for some years, since she was manumitted, she knew nothing of what they did there. Now the Consul commended her for that, that she did not deny but she was initiated, and declared the rest too with the same fidelity. But when she said, She knew nothing more of the matter, he reply'd, That he should not give her the same Pardon, nor shew her the same favour, if she were convicted by another person, as if she confess'd the truth of her self: and that he was inform'd by that other person of all that she had told him.

The Woman supposing (as it really was) that Aebutius was the discoverer of the secret, fell down at Sulpicia's Feet, and first began to entreat her, that she would not suffer the discourse of a Libertine Woman with her Lover to be turn'd into not only a serious but even a capital matter also: [and said] that she spake those things to deter him, and not because she knew anything. With that Postumius being incens'd with anger, told her, That then too she thought, sure, that she was putting her shams upon her Lover Aebutius, and was not talking in a grave Ladies House, and with a Consul. But Sulpicia took her up, and not only encouraged her, but endeavour'd to mitigate her Son-in-Laws Anger. At last, when she came to her self, having very much to blame Aebutius for his perfidiousness, who had made her such a return for her great deserts in that very case, she said, she fear'd the Gods very much, whose secrets she had discover'd, but men much more, who would tear her to pieces with their own hands for being such an Informer. Wherefore she desired this one thing of Sulpicia, and of the Consul too; that they would send her to some place out of Italy, where she might lead the rest of her life in safety. The Consul bad her be of good cheer, and said, He would take care, that she should live secure at Rome. Then Hispala declared the original of the sacred rites [before mention'd:] [saying] "That at first

" that

"that Temple was for Women only, nor was there any Man admitted into it. That they had three set Days in a Year, in which in the Day time they were admitted among the Bacche [Women that celebrated the Rites of Bacchus]. That the Matrons were wont to be created Priestesses by turns. But that Paculla Minia, a Priestess of Campania, quite alter'd all [their Ceremonies] as though she had done it by direction from the Gods. For it was she that first initiated two Men (who were her Sons) Minius, and Herennius Cerrinius, changing the diurnal Sacrifices into nocturnal ones; and, instead of three Days in a Year for initiation, making five every Month. By which means the Rites were grown promiscuous, and Men mingled with Women, besides that the licentiousness of the night was added also, in which there was no manner of villany or lewdness omitted. That there were more lustful enormities committed by the Men among themselves, than by the Women. That if any one were unwilling to endure such shameless actions, and flow to wickedness, they were sacrificed for Victims: for they thought nothing unlawful, which was the greatest tenet in their Religion. That the Men, as though they were mad, prophesied with a fanatical motion or tossing of their Bodies; and that the Matrons ran down to the Tiber, in the habit of Bacche, with their Hair about their Ears, and burning Torches in their Hands; and putting their Torches into the Water (which were made of solid Sulphur and Lime) took them away again still lighted. That they used to say, those Men were snatch'd away by the Gods, whom they tyed to an Engine, and carryed away into secret Dens and Caves. And that they were such, as would not either conspire, associate in villany, or endure their lustful uncleanness. That they were so vast a number, as that they were now almost another People, among whom there were some noble Men and Women. That two Years last past it was ordered, that no Body should be initiated, who was above twenty Years of Age; and that they made it their business to get People of such an Age, as would endure their folly and lewdness.

XIV. Having made the full discovery, she threw her self again at his Feet, and desired in the same Words, That he would send her away. Whereupon the Consul desired his Mother-in-law, that she would make some part of the House void, for Hispala to go into. She allotted her the upper part of the House [call'd Cenaculum] to which (the Ladders that were on the outside being lock'd up) there was a passage through the House. With that Fecenia's Goods were all presently brought thither, and her Family sent for; besides that Abutius also was ordered to come to the Consul's Client. So when both the Informers were in his power, Postumius related the thing to the Senate. To whom when he had declar'd in order, first what he was informed of, and then what he had found out by inquiry, the Fathers were in a great fright, not only upon the publick account, lest those Conspiracies and nightly Meetings should occasion any secret treachery or danger, but privately also, each Man for himself, lest any of them might be any way concern'd in that extravagance. The Senate therefore thought they ought to thank the Consul, for that he had search'd into that affair with great care and without any noise. After that they commit the enquiry concerning the Bacchanals and those Holy Nocturnal Rites, out of course, to the Consuls, who were to take care that that affair did not turn to any disadvantage to Abutius and Fecenia the discoverers, and to invite other Informers also by rewards to come in. That the Priests of those Rites, whether Men or Women, should be sought for through all Towns and Burroughs (and not only in Rome) that they might be in the hands of the Consuls. That there should also be an Edict made in Rome, and sent over all Italy, That no Man, that was initiated into the Ceremonies of Bacchus should meet or assemble to celebrate those Rites, nor do any such sacred Office. But before all things else, that enquiry should be made concerning those, who met, or assembled, to offer any act of lust, or other wickedness. This the Senate decreed; and the Consuls commanded the Curule Aediles to get together all the Priests of that order, and, when they had them in hold, to keep them in a private Chamber [not a Prison] whilst the Aediles of the People took care that no Rites were performed in private. The Triumviri Capiteles were also ordered to set watches all about the City, and see that there were no nightly meetings, as also to take care of Fire. There were five Men allowed as assistants to these Triumviri, that each of them in his own Region, or Ward, might look to the Houses on this side Tiber.

XV. The Magistrates being set upon these Duties, the Consuls went up into the Rostra, and having summon'd an Assembly, when the Consul had made an end of that solemn Form of Prayer, that Magistrates are wont to repeat before they speak to the People, he thus began, "This solemn address to the Gods, fellow Citizens! was never (not only so futable, but) so necessary to any Assembly, to admonish you, that these are the Gods whom your Ancestors design'd to worship, venerate, and pray to; and not those who by corrupt and foreign Ceremonies, incite Mens minds, who are mad, as it were, with fury, to all sorts of wickedness and lust. Truly I cannot tell either how to hold my tongue, or what to say. If you are ignorant of any thing, I'm afraid I shall leave room for negligence; and if I discover all, I fear, I shall terrifie you too much. But whatever I shall say, know that 'tis less than the heinousness and greatness of the thing requires. But I'll take care it shall be enough to be a caution to you. I do not doubt, but that you have heard that the Bacchanals have not only been long ago celebrated all over Italy, but that they are now also

"also in many places of the City (and that not only by report, but by their nocturnal howlings and bawlings, which ring over all the Town) but do not know what the meaning of it is. Some People believe it to be a kind of Worship paid to the Gods, others a sort of loud sport and merriment; and, whatever 'tis, that no great number are concerned in it. Now as to their multitude, if I should say that there are many Thousands of Men, you must of necessity be frighted, unless I also add, who and what sort of Cattle they are. First then, great part of them are Women, and that was the original of this evil; after whom there come come Men very like those Women, who are both buggers and buggerers, fanatical fellows that sit up all Night, amazed with Wine and nocturnal Clamours. Their Conspiracy has yet no life in't, but it has a vast increase every Day, in that they are daily more and more. Your Ancestors, nor even you, would not assemble so rashly and accidentally, unless, when the standard being set up in the Castle, upon the score of an Assembly [of the several Centuries] the Army was drawn forth; or when the Tribunes of the People had appointed a Council, or some Magistrate had summon'd the People to an ordinary Assembly; and wheresoever the multitude was, there they thought there ought to be a lawful Governour of the Rabble. Now what do you think, first, of these nocturnal meetings, and next, of the promiscuous Assemblies of Men and Women together? If you should know at what age Men are initiated, it would not only move your pity but your shame too for them. Do you think, Romans! that Young Men, who are initiated into this Order, are fit to be made Soldiers of? Shall we put them in Arms that come out of such an obscene [not Temple, but] Brothel-House? Will such fellows as these, that are covered all over with Buggeries of their own and other Mens, fight for the Chastity of their Wives and Children?

"It would be somewhat less, if they were grown effeminate only by their Vices (for that was once most of their disgrace) keeping their hands from evil actions, and their minds from treacherous thoughts. There never was so great a mischief in the Commonwealth, that concern'd more Men, or things. For whatsoever has been done for these several Years, through Lust, Treachery, or any other sort of Wickedness, has sprung, you must know, out of this same holy place. But they have not yet put in practice all the villany which they have conspired to commit. Their impious Conspiracy keeps yet within the bounds of private Crimes, because they have not strength enough to ruine the Commonwealth in general. But the mischief grows and creeps forward every day, and is already greater than to be obstructed by a private fortune, but looks and aims at the whole Commonwealth. [And let me tell you] Romans! unless you take a special care, their nocturnal Assembly may be equal to this of yours now in the day time, which is by the Consul lawfully called. They, each one of them at present in their several private Capacities, are afraid of you met all together at an Assembly. But when you are gone home, or at your Country House, they'll meet again to consult at once about their own safety and your destruction. Then will they, when all together, be dreadful to you who are separated from each other. Wherefore you ought, every Man of you to wish, that all your Relations and Friends be well affected; and if any Mans lust, or fury, has carryed him violently away into that gulph, to think that such a person is devoted to them, with whom he has conspired to the perpetration of all villany and lewdness, and not his Friend. But I am not sure, that some even of you will not fall into the same error; for nothing is more specious and apt to deceive Men than a false Religion. Where the will of the Gods is made the pretext for wicked actions, we are commonly afraid, lest, whilst we punish the iniquities of Men, we should violate any thing of Divine Right that's mingled with [such pretences]. But for this Religious Fear, innumerable Decrees of the High-Priests, Orders of Senate, and the Responses of the Augurs [Soothsayers] free you. How often were the Magistrates charg'd in the time of our Fathers and Grandfathers, to forbid the performance of any foreign Rites? to keep such little pretending Priests and Prophets out of the Forum, the Circus and the City? to get together their canting Books of Prognostications, and burn them? and to abolish all sorts of Sacrifices, but such as were made after the Roman way? For they, who were Persons very skilful in all Laws both Divine and Humane, thought, that nothing contributed so much to the dissolution of Religion, as when Men sacrificed, not according to the usage of their Country, but after a foreign manner. These things I thought good to advertise you of before hand, lest any superstition should disturb your minds, when you saw us pulling down the Bacchanalia, and dissipating those wicked meetings. All these things we will do with the favour and by the consent of the Gods, who, because they were angry that their Majesty should be contaminated by such wickedness and lust, brought these things out of darkness into the light; nor would have them laid open, that they might go unpunished, but that they might be revenged and suppressed. The Senate has committed the inquiry concerning that matter to me and my Colleague, out of course, and we will do with all diligence what in us lies. We have already committed the care of the nocturnal watches throughout the City to their inferiour Magistrates. It is also reasonable that you, in your several stations, perform with speed your duties, according to what shall be commanded, and endeavour to prevent any danger or tumult that may arise through the Treachery of those that are concern'd in this criminal case.

XVII. Then they commanded the Orders of Senate to be read (and propos'd a reward for Informers:) That if any one had brought any person to them, or the name of any absent person, who upon his being accus'd was fled, they would set him a certain day: at which unless he appeared upon Summons, he should be condemn'd in his absence. That if any man, who was then out of Italy, were named, they would give him a longer day, if he would come and make his defence. Wherewithal they made an Edict; That no man should sell or buy any thing in order to an escape; nor that any man should receive, conceal, or any ways assist those that fled [from Justice.] The Assembly being dismiss'd, there was a great terrour all over the City. Nor did it contain it self within the Walls only of the City, or the bounds of Rome, but they began to tremble all over Italy upon the receipt of Letters from their Friends concerning the Order of Senate, the Assembly, and the Edict of the Consuls. Many persons, that might after the day, on which the thing (in the Assembly) was discover'd (they having set Watches at all the Gates about the Town) were laid hold on, as they were running away, and brought back again by the Triumviri; whilst the names of many others were notified. Some of them, both Men and Women, kill'd themselves; there being above seven thousand of both Sexes said to be in the Conspiracy. But the heads of the Conspiracy as was well known, were M. and L. Catinius, two ordinary Roman Citizens, L. Opitermius, a Faliscan, and Minus Cerrinius, a Campanian. That from these men sprang all those Villanies and Enormities: and that they were the chief Priests and Promoters of such [impious] holy rites. Wherefore there was care taken, that they should be laid hold on as soon as possible. Nor did they, when they were brought to the Consul, and had made their confession, put any stop to the Sentence concerning them.

XVIII. But there were so many persons who fled the City, that, seeing many men lost both the benefit of the Law and their goods too [against them;] the Prætors T. Menius and Marcus Licinius were forced by the Senate to differ the business to the 30th day [after that time] till the Consuls should have made an end of their Inquiries. The same solitude (for that they, whose names were brought in, did not Answer, or were not to be found in Rome) forced the Consuls to go about into the several Towns, there to make inquiry and perform the part of Judges. Those that were only initiated (and had said Prayers, according to the sacred form (which the Priests repeated before them) in which was contained a cursed Conspiracy to do all acts of Villany and Lechery; but had not committed any of those things, to which by Oath they were obliged) they left in Bonds behind them; but those that had been defiled by Lust or Murder, or those that had been contaminated by false Testimonies, false Tokens, forging of Wills, or other Frauds, they put to Death. There were more kill'd, than put into Prison; though there were great numbers, in both cases, both of Men and Women. The Women that were condemn'd they deliver'd to their Relations, in whose hands [or Tutelage] they were; that they might punish them in private: But if there were no person fit to punish them, they did it in publick. After that the Consuls were injoin'd; first to pull down all the Bacchanalia at Rome, and then all over Italy; except there were any ancient Altar, or consecrated Image in them. And for the future it was provided by order of Senate; That there should be no Bacchanalia at Rome, or in any part of Italy. That, if any man thought such a Sacrifice so solemn, and necessary, that he could not omit it without being guilty of a great sin, he should come and tell the City Prætor: that the Prætor should consult the Senate; by whose permission (when there were an hundred at least of the Senators present) that Sacrifice might be performed; but so, that there should not be above five present at it; nor any common [publick] money, any Master of the Ceremonies, or any Priest [allow'd.]

XIX. After that there was another Order of Senate annex'd to this (upon the proposal of Q. Marcius the Consul) that concerning them, whom the Consuls had made use of as Informers, the whole matter should be refer'd to the Senate, when Sp. Postumius, having made an end of his Inquiries, came back to Rome. They thought fit to send Minus Cerrinius of Campania to Prison at Ardea: and to give order before hand to the Magistrates of that place, to look to him more narrowly, than ordinary; not only lest he should make his escape, but likewise, that he might have no opportunity to destroy himself. Sp. Postumius came some time after to Rome; upon whose Proposal of a reward for P. Aebutius and Hispala Fecenia (because by their means the Bacchanals were discover'd) there was an Order of Senate made; That to each of them the City Questors should give out of the Treasury a hundred thousand pound of brass [money] and that the Consul with the Tribunes of the People, should take care as soon as possible to propose to the Commons, that P. Aebutius should be discharg'd from serving in the Wars; so that he should not be a Soldier against his will; nor should the Censor assign him a publick Horse [i. e. force him to be a Trooper:] and that Fecenia Hispala should have the liberty to bestow, or diminish [her Patrimony] to marry out of her Patrons Family [i. e. with any other man besides his freed men,] and take whom she pleased for her Guardian, as if her Husband had so order'd it by his Will: and that she should have the liberty to marry a man that was ingenuously born, who should not be look'd upon to be by that any way degraded, or disparaged. And that the Consuls, for the time being, or those that should hereafter be, should take care, that that Woman had no hurt done to her, but that she she might live in safety: all which the Senate order'd and thought fit to be done. All these things therefore were propos'd to the Commons; and done according to the order of Senate; and as to the impunity and rewards of the other Informers, the whole matter was left to the Consuls.

And now Q. Marcius, having made an end of all Inquiries within his district, was preparing to go into the Province of Liguria, after he had receiv'd three thousand Roman Foot, a hundred and fifty Horse, and five thousand Latin Foot, with two hundred Horse as a Supplement [to his Forces.] The same Province was also assign'd to his Colleague with the same number of Horse and Foot. They likewise receiv'd the Armies, which C. Flaminius and M. Aemilius the Consuls the year before had. But they were farther order'd by the Senate to raise two new Legions: besides that they exacted twenty thousand Foot from the Allies and Latines: with thirteen hundred Horse, three thousand Roman Foot, and two hundred Horse. All this Army, except the Legions, they thought fit to send as a Supplement to the Army in Spain. Wherefore the Consuls, whilst they themselves were employ'd about their Inquiries [into the Bacchanalia] committed to T. Menius the chief care of making the Levy. When they had made an end of their Inquisitions, Q. Marcius went first into that part of Liguria where the Apuans live. Whom whilst he pursu'd a great way into their secret Woods (which were their constant lurking places and refuges) he was circumvented in a disadvantageous place amidst the strait pass which was beset before-hand [by the Enemy.] There he lost four thousand Souldiers, and three Ensigns belonging to the second Legion; besides that eleven Banners belonging to the Latine Allies, were taken by the Foe; and a great many Arms, which, because they were an incumbrance to them in their flight through those Woody places, they threw away all along [as they went.] But the Ligurians ceased to pursue, before the Romans stopp'd their flight. The Consul, as soon as he was got out of the Enemies Territories, lest it should be known, how much his Forces were diminish'd, disbanded his Army in an Allies Country: though he could not, for all that, stifle the report of his ill success: for the Wood from whence the Ligurians had chased him was called Saltus Marcius.

About the time that this news came out of Liguria, there were Letters brought out of Spain, full of joy and sadness mixt together. For C. Atinius, who two years before had gone Prætor into that Province, fought a pitch'd Battle in the Asian Dominions with the Insitanians: in which there were six thousand men slain; the rest being totally routed and forced to quit their Camp. After which he led his Legions to attack the Town of Asia; which he also took with almost as much ease as he had done the Camp; but, as he unwarily went under the Walls, being wounded, he in a few dayes dy'd. Having read the Letter concerning the Death of the Pro-Prætor, the Senate thought fit to send a man to overtake C. Calpurnius the Prætor at the Port of Luna, and tell him, that the Senate thought it requisite (lest the Province should be without a Governour) for him to make hast and go into it. He, that was sent, came within four dayes to Luna; from whence Calpurnius was departed some few dayes before. In the hither Spain too L. Manlius Acidinus, who went thither at the same time, when C. Atinius went into his Province, had a conflict with the Celtiberians: from which they drew off without knowing who had the better of it, save that the Celtiberians decamp'd the next Night: and the Romans had an opportunity not only to bury their [dead] men, but to gather up the spoils of the Enemy. Some few dayes after, the Celtiberians, having raised a greater Army, on their own accord provoked the Romans to Battle at a Town called Calagurris. Now there is no reason given, why, when their numbers were increased, they were yet weaker [than before:] for they were conquer'd that bout, twelve thousand of them slain, above two thousand taken, and the Romans took their Camp: yea, had not the coming of his Successor rebated the Conquerours vigour, the Celtiberians had been totally subdu'd. The new Prætors led both the Armies into their Winter Quarters.

At the same time, when this news came out of Spain, the Games called Taurilia were celebrated for two dayes upon a religious account. After which M. Fulvius, who prepared for them ten dayes together, set forth those Games, which he had vow'd in the Aetolian War. There came many Artists out of Greece for honours sake; and then also the Romans first saw Wrestling [which was at that time shewn] with hunting of Lions and Panthers; so that the sport was perform'd with the variety and plenty of almost this Age [of ours.] Then they kept a nine dayes solemnity, for that in Picenum it had rained stones for three dayes, and fiery meteors were said lightly to have sing'd the Cloaths of many people. There was also one day of supplication added, for that the Temple of Ops in the Capitol was burnt by lightning. Upon which score the Consuls sacrificed with the greater sort of Victims, and purg'd the City. About the same time there was a report came from Umbria too, that there was a Male and Female Bullock born of almost twelve years old. They therefore abominating that Prodigy, commanded it to be driven out of the Roman Territories, and kill'd as soon as possible. The same year the Transalpine Gauls coming over into Venetia, without Ravage or War, not far from that place, where Aquileia now stands, made choice of a place to build a Town. Whereupon Embassadors being sent from Rome, beyond the Alps, about that business, they receiv'd this Answer; That they neither went from home by the anthority of their own Nation; nor did they know what to do in Italy. At that time L. Scipio set forth the Games, which he said he had vow'd in the time of the War against Antiochus, for ten days together, out of that money which was raised for that purpose by the Kings and the several Cities. Valerius Antias says, that, after his being condemn'd, and that his goods were sold, he was sent Embassadour into Asia, to decide the Controversies between the two Kings, Antiochus and Eumenes. That then the money was raised for him, and Artists gather'd together out of all Asia: and that after his Embassy he moved the Senate concerning the Games, of which before he had made no mention since the War, in which he said they were vow'd.

XXIII. When the year was now expiring, Q. Marcius was to go out of his Office whilst he was absent: and Sp. Postumius, having made an end of the Inquisitions with all care and integrity, held the Assembly. There were created for Consuls, Ap. Claudius Pulcher, and M. Sempronius Tuditanus. The next day their Prætors were chosen, viz. P. Cornelius Cethegus, A. Postumius Albinus, C. Afranius Stellio, C. Atilius Serranus, L. Postumius Tappianus, and M. Claudius Marcellus. At the end of the Year, since Sp. Postumius had brought word, That, as he travelled over both the Coasts of Italy, he found two Colonies deserted, the one in the upper Sea, which was Sipontum, and the other in the lower Sea, called Buxentum; there were three persons chosen by T. Menius the City Prætor, (pursuant to an order of Senate) to carry Planters thither; [whose names were] L. Scribonius Libo, M. Tuccius, and Cn. Babius Tampilus. The War that was at hand with King Perseus and the Macedonians did not proceed from those causes, that many people imagine, nor from Perseus himself; but was set on foot by Philip. For he himself, if he had lived, would have carry'd on that War. One thing troubled him most of all, when he had conditions imposed upon after he was conquer'd; that the Senate had taken away from him the power of punishing those Macedonians who had revolted from him in the War; though, seeing Quintius had left out that whole matter in the terms of the Peace, he had not despaired of obtaining that [freedom]. Then when Antiochus was conquer'd at Thermopyle, and they had shar'd the manage of the War between them, so that at the same time Acilius attack'd Heraclea, and Philip Lamia, (when Heraclea was taken) for that he was order'd to march off from the Walls of Lamia, and the Town was surrender'd to the Romans, he took that ill. But the Consul asswaged his Anger, in that he himself hastening to Naupactum, whither the Ætolians were fled, permitted Philip, to make War upon Athamania and Amynder; and to add those Cities, which the Ætolians had taken from the Thessalians, to his own Kingdom. Nor had he much ado to drive Amynder out of Athamania, and take several Cities. He likewise reduced Demetrias (which is a strong City, and very opportunely situated for all designs) with the Magnetians, to himself. After that he took some Cities in Thrace too, that were disturb'd by the Vice of taking a new and unusual liberty (through the seditious of their Nobility) by joining with the party, which was overcome in that domestick broil.

XXIV. By this means for the present was the Kings Anger against the Romans appeas'd. But yet he never ceased even in times of Peace from raising of Forces, to make use of in War, whenever he had an occasion. He encreased the Revenues of his Kingdom, not only out of the Fruits of the Country, and Customs in the Sea Port Towns [for Wars exported and imported] but he likewise not only set men to dig the old Mines, that had been long intermitted, but made new ones too in many places. But, to restore the multitude of men, whom he had lost in the War, he not only provided for a new Generation of men, by forcing all people to get and breed up Children; but he brought over a great number of Thracians also into Macedonia: where, being for some time quiet from Wars, he bent all his thoughts and care upon a method how to augment the wealth of his Kingdom. But then there came the same reasons again, to move his passion against the Romans. For the complaints of these Thessalians and Perræbians (concerning their Cities being possess'd by him) and of the Embassadours of King Eumenes (concerning some Thracian Towns that were taken by force) were so heard, that it was evident enough they were not neglected. But that which moved the Senate most was, that they had heard, he affected the possession of Ænus and Maronea; for they did not care so much for the Thessalians. The Athaman Embassadours also came, complaining (not that they had lost some part, or the Borders of their Country, but) that all Athamania in general was now in the Kings hands. Banish'd persons too of Maronea were beaten out by the Kings Guards, because they had defended the cause of their liberty. They brought word not only that Maronea, but Ænus also was in Philip's possession. There likewise came Embassadours from Philip to clear him of those accusations: who said, That there was nothing done, but by permission of the Roman Generals. That the Cities of Thessaly, Perræbia, Magnesia, and Athamania, with Amynder, were in the same case, as the Ætolians. That when Antiochus was beaten, the Consul, being himself employ'd in attacking the Cities of Ætolia, sent Philip to retake those Cities: and that they being now subdu'd by force did pay obedience [to him]. The Senate, that they might not determine of any thing in the Kings absence, sent Embassadours to discuss those points, [whose names were] Q. Cassius Metellus, M. Babius Tampilus, and T. Sempronius: just before whose coming coming there was a Council appointed of all those Cities, who had any controversy with the King, to meet at Tempe in Thessaly.

XXV. There when the Roman Embassadours, in the place of Arbitrators, the Thessalians, Perræbians and Athamans, as the Accusers, and Philip, to hear the crimes [charg'd against him] like a Prisoner, were [all] set together; every one of those, who were the heads of the Embassies, according to their natural inclination, their good or ill will to Philip, discours'd more mildly or severely. Now there came into the debate, Philippopolis, Tricca, Phalonia, Eurymene, and the other Towns thereabouts; whether they belong'd to the Thessalians, though they were by force taken away and kept by the Ætolians (for it was well known that Philip took them from the Ætolians) or whether they had been anciently Ætolian Towns. For Acilius granted them to the King upon that condition only, if they had anciently belong'd to the Ætolians; and if they were under the Ætolians out of their own free will, and not compell'd by force of Arms. The debates touching the Towns of Perræbia and Magnesia were much of the same nature: for the Ætolians had confounded the rights of them all by their possessing of them upon several occasions. But to these things that were in debate, there were added the complaints of the Thessalians; that he was resolv'd, if he must restore those Towns, they should have them all rifled and deserted. For besides those that were lost by the Fortune of War, he had taken away five hundred of the best of their youth into Macedonia, and there unworthily employ'd them in servile business; besides that he took care, that those which he was forced to render to the Thessalians should be of no use to them. That Thebes in Pthiotis was a Sea Port, that had once been very advantageous to the Thessalians. But the King having got a Fleet of Merchant-men, that were to sail by Thebes to Demetrias, had taken all the trade thither. That now he did not abstain from violating Embassadours neither who are lookt upon as sacred by all Nations; for he laid an Ambuscade for those that were a going to Quintius. Whereby all the Thessalians were put into such a fright, that never an one of them durst so much as open their mouths, either in their Cities, or in the publick Assemblies of their Nation. For the Romans, who were the Authors of their liberty, were a great way off: that a tyrannical Master stuck close to their sides, who hinder'd them from making use of the Romans goodness: but what was freedom, if their tongues were not free? That even now, in confidence of the Embassadours, they groan'd rather than spake: and that, unless the Romans found out some way, whereby the Greeks, that lived in Macedonia, might be eased of their fears, and Philip's audacity taken off; it was not only to no purpose that he was conquer'd, but that they were set at liberty. That he ought to be held in with a straight rein, like a Wrestly Horse, that will not easily be ruled. Thus spake the last of them somewhat sharply; though the former had mildly allayed his wrath, desiring, that he would pardon them, since they pleaded for liberty; and that, laying aside the austerity of a Master, he would use to shew himself an Ally and a Friend; and thereby imitate the Roman People, who chose to make themselves Allies by love rather than by fear. When the Thessalians had been heard; the Perræbians said, that Gommocondylum, (which Philip had named Olympias) belong'd to Perræbia, and desired, that it might be restored to them. They made the same request also concerning Malleæ and Ericinium. The Athamans too demanded back their liberty, together with the Castles of Athenæum and Petneum.

XXVI. Philip, that he might seem rather an accuser, than guilty, himself also beginning with complaints, said, that the Thessalians had taken by force and Arms, Menclais in Dolopia, which formerly belong'd to his Kingdom. As also, that Petra in Pieria was taken by the same Thessalians and the Perræbians [together.] That they took Xynie, which was undoubtedly an Ætolian Town, into their own Dominions; and that Perachelois, which belong'd to Athamania, was wrongfully made part of the Thessalian Territories. For, as to the crimes that were objected against him, concerning his laying wait for the Embassadours, and frequenting or forsaking such and such Sea-Ports, the one was very ridiculous (that he should give an account, what Ports his Merchants or Mariners went to) and other was quite contrary to his constant usage. For it was now so many years, that their Embassadours had never ceased to carry Stories of him, one while to the Roman Generals, and another while to the Senate at Rome; yet which of them did he ever abuse so much as in words only? That they pretended, there was an Ambuscade once laid for those that were a going to Quintius; but they did not say what, what befel them. That such crimes were invented by them, who sought for something, which they might falsely object, when they had nothing of truth [to tell.] That the Thessalians did insolently and immoderately abuse the indulgence of the Romans, whilst they too greedily guzzled down pure liberty, as those that had been long thirsty [did Wine.] That, upon the same score, they, like Slaves, who are, contrary to their expectations, on a sudden set at liberty, they try'd the freedom of their speech and tongue: and vaunted themselves by inveighing and railing against their Governours. Then raised by his passion he added; That Sun was not yet set for all dayes [that were to come:] which threatening saying of his, not only the Thessalians, but the Romans also took [as spoken] against them. And, when the murmur that arose upon those words was at last again allay'd, he then made Answer to the Embassadours of the Perræbians and Athamans [in this manner.] That the use of those Cities, for which they pleaded, was altogether the same: That the Consul Acilius, and the Romans gave him then, when they belong'd to the Enemy. That if they that gave him that present would take it from him again, he knew he must yield; but they would thereby do an injury to a better a better and a more faithful Friend, to oblige a light and an useless [parcel of] Allies. For there was no obligation more fading than that of liberty; especially among such people, as by making a bad use of it were like to destroy it. Having heard the case, the Embassadors declared, That they thought fit the Macedonian Garisons should be drawn out of those Cities; and that the Kingdom should be bounded by its ancient limits. As to the injuries which they complain'd were done to them on both sides, that they would appoint a legal method how a decision should be made between those Nations and the Macedonians.

XXVII. The King being mightily offended with what they said, they went thence to Thessalonica, to inquire concerning the Cities of Thrace. Where the Embassadors of King Eumenes [told them;] That, if the Romans had a mind, that Aenus and Maronea should be free, it did not suite with their modesty to say anything else, save to admonish them; that they would leave them really and not verbally free; nor suffer their gift to be intercepted by another person. But if they less regarded the Cities in Thrace; yet it was more consonant to reason, that Eumenes should have those Towns, that were subject to Antiochus, as the rewards of War, than that Philip should: whether upon the score of his Father Attalus's merits in the War, which the Roman People waged against Philip; or of his own, who was concern'd in all the toil and danger of the War with Antiochus, both by Sea and Land. Besides that he had the judgment of the ten Embassadors in the case before hand; who when they gave him Chersonesus and Lyfimachia, gave him Maronea and Aenus too; which by their very Neighbourhood were as it were dependencies upon that greater present. For upon the account of what merit toward the Roman People, or right of Government (since they were so far from the Confines of Macedonia) had Philip put Garisons into those Cities? That they would order the Maronites to be called in; and from them they should receive a more satisfactory account of the state of those Cities. Then the Maronean Embassadors being call'd in, said, That the Kings Garison was not only in one part of the City; but in several places at the same time, and that Maronea was full of Macedonians. By which means the Kings flatterers domineered there. That they alone had the liberty to speak both in the Senate and in other publick Assemblies; and that they not only took to themselves but confer'd upon others also all kinds of honour. That every good man, who had any regard to his liberty and the Laws, was either banish'd his Country, or forced to live there in disgrace and silence, subject to a parcel of Rascals. They also added some few words concerning the right of their Borders; saying, That Q. Fabius Labco, when he was in those parts, set Philip a boundary; which was to be the Kings old road, that goes into the Paroreia [i. e. the Country, near the Mountain:] of Thrace, and comes no where nigh the Sea: but that Philip afterward went a new way, whereby to take in the Cities and Country belonging to the Maronites.

XXVIII. To this Philip, taking a quite different method of Discourse, from that which he lately used against the Thessalians and Perrabians, said; "I have no controversy with the Maronites, or with King Eumenes, but even with you, Romans! from whom I have long observ'd that I can have no justice [done me.] I thought it reasonable, that the Macedonian Cities, which in the time of the Truce, had revolted from, should be again restored to me; not because that would be any great addition to my Kingdom (for they are not only small Towns, but situate also upon the very Frontiers [of my Dominions]) but because the example would conduce very much to the keeping of the other Macedonians within [the bounds of their Allegiance.] But this was deny'd me. Then, being order'd, in the Atolian War, by the Consul Manius Acilius, to attack Lamia, when I had been long fatigued there with Battles and Works; as I was just ready to scale the Walls, and had almost taken the City, the Consul recall'd me, and forced me to draw my Forces off from it. To make me amends for the injury it was permitted, that I should retake some certain Castles (rather than Cities) of Thessaly, Perrabia, and Athamania. And those too, you, Q. Cecilius! some few dayes after, took from me. A little before that, the Embassadors of Eumenes, forsooth, took it for an unquestionable truth, that, what belongs to Antiochus, it was more reasonable, Eumenes should be Master of than I. But that I take to be quite contrary. For Eumenes could not have kept his Kingdom, not only, if the Romans had not been Victorious, but also, if they had not waged a War [against Antiochus.] Where he is oblig'd to you, not you to him. But as to my Kingdom, every part of it was so far from being in danger, that I slighted Antiochus's offer, though he promised me three thousand Talents, fifty men of War, and all the Cities of Greece, which I was formerly possess'd of, as a reward, if I would be his Ally. For I pretended to be his Enemy, even before that Manius Acilius came with his Army into Greece; and with him, as Consul, I bore any share in the War, that he appointed me [to take.] To the succeeding Consul, L. Scipio, also, when he resolv'd to lead his Army by Land to the Hellespont, I not only granted a free passage through my Kingdom, but I secur'd the wayes too, made Bridges, and provided him all sorts of necessaries: and that not only through Macedonia, but Thrace too; where, among other things, the Barbarians were to behave themselves peaceably also. For this my kindness (not to say, desert) toward you; whether, Romans! became you most; to add somewhat, in order to enlarge and encrease my Dominions by their munificence, or to take from me, what I had, either in my own right, or of their bounty? as you now do. The Macedonian Cities, which you your "selves confels were once part of my Kingdom, are not restored. Eumenes comes to rob me, just as he did Antiochus, and pretends, forsooth, a Decree of the ten Embassadors to [cover] a most impudent Calumny; though by that he may be most of all baffled and put out of countenance. For therein it is plainly and literally set down; That Chersonesus and Lyfimachia should be given to Eumenes. Where, I pray, are Aenus, Maronea, and the Cities of Thrace named? What he durst not so much as desire of them, shall he obtain of you, as if they had granted it to him? It imports me [to know] in what number you would have me to be with you. If you resolve to persecute me as an open Enemy, go on, and do as you have begun. But if you have any respect for me, as a King, that is your Ally and Friend; I beseech you, do not think I deserve such hard usage.

"selves

The Kings Speech made the Embassadors somewhat concern'd; wherefore by a moderate kind of Answer they left the matter in suspense; [saying;] That if those Cities were given to Eumenes by Decree of the ten Embassadors, they would make no alteration. But if Philip had taken them in the War, he should enjoy them, as the reward of Victory, by right of War. If neither of those suppositions were true, they thought fit to refer the decision of the case to the Senate; and, to the end, that all things should continue entire, that the Garisons, which were in those Cities, should be drawn out. These were the chief reasons, that alienated Philips affections from the Romans; so that we may suppose this War was not raised by his Son Perseus upon any new grounds, but was entail'd upon him, for these causes, by his Father. At Rome there was no suspicion of a Macedonian War. L. Manlius the Pro-Consul was return'd from Spain; who desiring of the Senate a triumph in the Temple of Bellona, might have obtain'd it by the greatness of his achievements; but the example hinder'd it; for that there was such provision made, according to the usage of their Forefathers, that no Man, who had not brought home his Army, should triumph, unless he had left his Province totally subdu'd, and in perfect Peace to his Successor. Yet they allow'd Manlius a middle sort [or a less degree] of honour; to wit, that he come Ouant into the City. He brought along with him fifty two golden Crowns, a hundred twenty two pounds of gold, and sixteen thousand and three hundred of silver; besides that he declared in the Senate, that Q. Fabius the Questor was coming after him with ten thousand pound of silver, and eighty of gold; which he would likewise bring into the Treasury. There was a great insurrection of the Slaves in Apulia that Year. L. Postumius the Prator had Tarentum for his Province: who made a strict inquiry concerning the Conspiracy of the Shepherds, who infested all the publick roads and pasture grounds with Robberies; condemning seven thousand of them (though many fled for it) many whereof he punish'd. The Consuls having been long detain'd in the City, about the business of their Levies, went at length into their several Provinces.

The same Year, in Spain, the Prators, C. Calpurnius and L. Quintius, having, at the beginning of the Spring, brought their Forces out of their Winter Quarters, and join'd each other in Beturia, march'd forward into Carpetania, where the Enemies Camp was, being unanimously resolv'd and ready to engage. Not far from Hippo and Toletum, two Cities, there happen'd a Skirmish between their Foragers. Whom whilst they on both sides assisted from their Camp, all their Forces were by degrees drawn forth into the Field. In that tumultuary Battle, both the place, and manner of the fight were for the Enemy. The two Armies of the Romans, were beaten and forced back into their Camp. But the Enemies did not pursue them. So the Roman Prators, lest their Camp should have been the next day attack'd, about the dead time of the next night gave the signal privately, and led away their Army. At break of day the Spaniards came in Battalia up to their Bullwark, and marching into the Camp, which, contrary to their expectations, were deserted, they took what was left there in the hurry [which the Romans, at their departure were in,] and, going back into their own Camp, continu'd there at quiet for some few dayes. Of the Romans and their Allies, (in the Battle, and their flight) there were slain five thousand, with whose spoils the Enemy arm'd themselves: and thence they march'd to the River Tagus. In the mean while the Roman Prators spent all that time in mustering up of Spanish Auxiliaries out of the several Cities, that were their Allies, and in recovering their Souldiers Courage from the terror of the late unfortunate Battle. When they thought they had strength enough, and that the Souldiers also, to obliterate their former disgrace, desired [to see] the Enemy, they went and encamped twelve thousand paces from the River Tagus. From whence, at the third Watch, taking up their Ensigns, they came in a square Body at break of day to the Bank of Tagus. The Enemies Camp was beyond the River upon an Hill. Immediately therefore in two places, where they could wade through, Calpurnius on the right hand, and Quintius on the left, led the Army over: whilst the Enemy lay still, and wondering at their sudden arrival, stood to deliberate; though they might have put them into a consternation even as they were passing the River. In the mean while the Romans, having carry'd and gather'd all their Baggage into one place, because they saw the Enemy now coming on, so that they had not time enough to Encamp, set themselves in Array. In the middle were placed Calpurnius's fifth Legion, and Quintius's eighth (which was the strength of the whole Army) and they had the plain open before them as far as the Enemies Camp, free from all fear of Ambuscades.

The

XXXI. The Spaniards, seeing the two Roman Armies on the hither bank (that they might take them, before they could join each other, or marshal their Men) ran out of their Camp as fast as they could to engage them. Whereupon there was, at the beginning, a very fierce Battle, the Spaniards on the one side being proud of their late Victory, and the Roman Soldiers fired by their unusual disgrace. The main Body, consisting of two stout Legions, fought very bravely; whom when the Enemy saw they could not force to quit their post, they began to attack them wedge-wise, pressing upon the middlemost in greater numbers still and thicker. With that, when Calpurnius the Prætor saw the main Body so hard put to't, he sent two Lieutenants (T. Quintilius Varius, and L. Juventius Thalna) in all haste to encourage each Legion: bidding them inform and tell them, That in them alone lay all their hopes of conquering and preserving Spain. If they gave ground, that never a man in that Army would ever see (not only Italy, but not so much as) the farther Bank of Tagus any more. In the mean while he himself, riding a little way about with the Horse of two Legions, fell in upon the Flank of the Enemies wedge, that prest so hard upon the main Body. Quintius with his Horse attack'd the other Flank of the Enemy: though Calpurnius's Horse fought far more resolutely; and the Prætor himself above all the rest. For he first assaulted the Foe, and so engaged himself in the midst of them, that it could scarce be discern'd, what side he was of. So the Horse were animated by the Courage of their Prætor, and the Foot by the bravery of the Horse. The foremost Centurions were ashamed, to see their Prætor amidst the Weapons of the Enemy: and therefore they, every one of them, urg'd on the Ensign-Bearers, bidding them carry up the Banners, whilst all the rest immediately renew'd the noise, and cry'd out, Follow, to the Souldiers. They therefore made their effort as it were from an higher ground: and thereby, like a torrent, came rowling down, and totally routed the consternated Spaniards, who could not bear the shock, the Romans came fast upon them one after another. As they fled into their Camp the Horse pursu'd them, and, being mixt among the crowd of the Enemy, got into the Camp [along with them.] Where, by the help of those that were left to guard the Camp, the Fight was renew'd; and the Roman Horse were forced to alight. As they were at it, the fifth Legion came up; and after them, the rest of the Forces, as fast as they could. The Spaniards were kill'd all round over the whole Camp; nor did there above four thousand men escape. Of whom about three thousand, who had still kept their Arms, possess'd themselves of an adjacent Hill; whilst the other thousand half-arm'd stragled about the Country. There were of the Enemy at first above thirty five thousand, of whom there was only so small a share [as these] left after the Fight. There were taken, of Military Ensigns a hundred thirty three. Of the Romans and their Allies there fell not many more than six hundred, and of the Provincial Auxiliaries about a hundred and fifty. There were five Tribunes of the Souldiers lost, and some few Roman Horse, which made the greatest show among them of a bloody Victory. They staid in the Enemies Camp, because they had not time to fortify their own. The next day the Horsemen were publicly commended by C. Calpurnius, and presented with new Trappings [for their Horses;] besides, that he declar'd, that they were the chief cause of the Enemies being routed, and their Camp taken. Quintius the other Prætor presented his Horsemen with Chains [for Ornament, to wear about their Necks or Arms] and Buttons [for their Cloaks.] Many of the Centurions also in both Armies had Presents made to them, especially those, that were in the main Body.

XXXII. The Consuls, having made an end of their Levies and other affairs which they had at Rome, led their Army into the Province of Liguria. Sempronius marching from Pise into the Territories of the Apuan Ligurians, (by laying wast their Country, and burning their Villages, with their Castles) open'd a passage all along even to the River Macra, and the Port of Luna. The Enemy got upon an Hill which was the ancient seat of their Forefathers: from whence (when [the Romans had] conquer'd the unevenness of the place) they were, in the Battle, tumbled down. Ap. Claudius also equal'd the valour and success of his Colleague by several prosperous Battles against the Ingaunians of Liguria: besides that he took six of their Towns; and in them many thousand people [Prisoners.] Of whom he beheaded forty three who were the Authors of the War. But by this time the time of the Assembly was at hand. Yet Claudius came to Rome, before Sempronius (whose duty it happen'd to be to hold the [Consular] Assembly) because his Brother P. Claudius stood for the Consul: and had for his Competitors three Patricians [of the Degree of Senators] namely, L. Amilius, Q. Fabius Labeo, and Servius Sulpicius Galba, who were old Candidates, and stood again for that honour, which their former repulses had made them think to be the more due to them. And farther, since there could not be above one Patrician chosen, it would be the more difficult to carry it, when four stood [for the Office.] There were also several worthy Plebeians that stood, viz. L. Porcius, Q. Terentius Culleo, Cn. Babius Tamphilus, who, though they had been formerly repulsed were still in hopes one time or other to obtain that defer'd honour. Claudius was the only new Candidate amongst them all. In the opinion of the people there was no question but Q. Fabius Labeo, and L. Porcius Licinus were design'd [for the place.] But the Consul Claudius, running all about the Forum without any Lictors along with his Brother, (though his Adversaries, and the greater part part of the Senate cry'd out, That he ought to remember that he was Consul of Rome, rather than that he was Brother to P. Claudius: and that he should sit in the Court, either as a Judge, or a silent Spectator of the Assembly, yet) could not be taken off of his immoderate zeal. The Assembly was likewise several times disturbed by the great content of the Tribunes of the People, who were either for or against the Consul; till Appius at last so far prevailed, that Fabius was put by, and he got his Brother in. So P. Claudius Pulcher was chosen contrary to his own, and all other peoples expectations. L. Porcius Licinus kept his station, because the Plebeians strove not with that heat as Claudius did, but were much more moderate. Then the Assembly was held for chusing of Prætors; and into that office were put, C. Decimius Flavius, P. Sempronius Longus, P. Cornelius Cethegus, Q. Nevius Matho, C. Sempronius Blasius, and A. Terentius Varro. These things were done that year, wherein Ap. Claudius and M. Sempronius were Consuls.

In the beginning of the next year, wherein P. Claudius and L. Porcius were Consuls; after that Q. Cecilius, M. Babius and T. Sempronius, who were sent to decide the Controversies between Philip, Eumenes, and the Cities of Thessaly, had given an account of their Embassy, they introduced the Embassadors also of those Kings and Cities into the Senate. Thereupon the same things were again repeated that had been said before the Embassadors in Greece. And then the Senate order'd another new Embassy into Macedonia and Greece (of which Ap. Claudius was the head) to see, whether the Cities were restored to the Rhodians, Thessalians, and Perræbians. They were likewise order'd, to see the Garisons drawn out of Aenus and Maronea, and that all the Sea Coast of Thrace were deliver'd from Philip and the Macedonians. They were also commanded to go into Peloponnesus, from whence the former Embassy had departed and left things more unsettled than if they had never come thither. For among other things they were also dismiss'd without an Answer, nor were they, upon their request, admitted to have an Audience of the Achean Council. Of which Q. Cecilius making great complaint; and the Lacedæmonians lamenting at the same time, that their Walls were pull'd down; that their common people were carry'd away into Achaia and sold, and that Lycurgus's Laws, by which their City had been till that day upheld, were taken from them; the Acheans said most in excuse for having deny'd the Embassadors admission to their Council; reciting a Law, which forbade any Council to be summon'd, unless it were upon the score of Peace or War, or when Embassadors came from the Senate with Letters, or other written Commissions or Messages. But that that might be no excuse for the future, the Senate shew'd them, that they ought to take care, that the Roman Embassadors might always have the freedom of coming to the Council of their Nation; as they themselves, whenever they would, had admission into the Senate [at Rome.]

These Embassies being dismiss'd, Philip, when he heard, that he must quit the Cities, and draw forth his Garisons; was incens'd against them all, but vented his Anger chiefly upon the Maronites. Wherefore he commanded Onomastus, who was Governour of the Sea-Coast, to kill all the heads of the contrary Faction. And accordingly he, having got a Company of Thracians into the Town in the night time, by means of one Cassander, a Subject of the Kings that had lived a great while at Maronea, made such a slaughter, as though he had taken the City in War. Now therefore when the Roman Embassadors complain'd, that he shou'd shew himself so cruel to the innocent Maronites, and so insolent to the Roman People, as to kill them, to whom the Senate had thought fit to restore their liberty; he said, that business did not at all concern either himself or any of his [Subjects]. But that they fell out among themselves; whilst some of them were for delivering the City up to him; and others, to Eumenes. Which they might easily know, if they would but ask the Maronites; as being well assur'd, that, since they were all so much consternated at the late slaughter [which was made in their Town] never a man of them would dare to open his mouth. Appius said, They ought not to make any question of a thing that was so plain. But if he would acquit himself from the charge, he ought to send Onomastus and Cassander, by whom the thing was said to be committed, to Rome, that the Senate might examine them. That saying of his at first so disturbed the King, that his colour went and came, nor could he keep his Countenance. But soon after, having recover'd himself, he said, that, if they pleas'd, he would send Cassander, who had been at Maronea. But what had Onomastus to do with the matter? who had not been (not only at Maronea, but) so much as in the adjacent Country? For he not only was tender of Onomastus, who was a great Favourite of his own, but likewise was much more afraid, lest he should turn Informer: because as he had himself contrived the thing with him, so he had formerly employ'd him in many such designs. Cassander too is thought to have been poison'd by men that were sent after him through Epirus, lest he should make any discovery.

So the Embassadors went away from the Conference with Philip, in such a manner, that they shew'd, They were not pleas'd with any thing [that he had said]; and Philip, not doubting, but that he must of necessity renew the War, yet because his strength was not yet ripe for such an affair (to cause a delay) resolv'd to send Demetrius, his younger Son, to Rome, not only to clear him of the crimes laid to his charge, but also to mitigate the Senates displeasure; being pretty confident, that the youth himself too, who, when he was an Hostage at Rome, had given some proof of his Princely Genius, would do something or other to purpose. In the mean time, under pretence of assisting the Byzantians, but in deed, deed,

K k k k k

deed, to terrifie the petit Kings of Thrace, he went [into those parts] and having defeated them in one Battel, in which he took their General Amodocus, he returned into Macedonia, having sent before-hand to sollicite the Barbarians, that inhabit near the River Ister, to make an irruption into Italy. By this time the Roman Embassadors, that were ordered to go out of Macedonia into Achaia, were expected; against whom, that they might have their Ensigns all ready laid, Lycortas their State-holder appointed a Council. In which they discours'd concerning the Lacedemonians, saying, That they, of Enemies, were become their Accusers; and that there was danger, that they might be more dreadful now they were conquer'd, than when they were yet engaged in the War. For in the War the Achæans had made use of the Romans as their Allies; but that now the same Romans were more favourable to the Lacedemonians than to the Achæans, since even Areus and Alcibiades, both banish'd Persons, that had been restored by their means, had undertaken an Embassy to Rome against the Nation of the Achæans which had so well deserv'd of them; and had inveigh'd so much against them, that they seem'd still to be in exile and not restored. Thereupon they all cry'd out, There should be a report made concerning those persons in particular; and so, since all things were carry'd with heat and not with judgment, they were condemn'd to dye. Some few Days after the Roman Embassadors came, and had a Council summon'd [to give them audience] at Clitor in Arcadia.

XXXVI. But before they did any thing, the Achæans were afraid, and thought, how unequal the debate was like to be, for that they saw Areus and Alcibiades, whom they, in their last Council, had condemn'd to dye, with the Embassadors; nor [for that reason] durst any one of them so much as speak. Appius said, That those things, of which the Lacedemonians complain'd, displeas'd the Senate, viz. First, the slaughter of those Persons, who, being called forth by Philopæmen to take their tryal, were kill'd; and next, when they had been so barbarous to those Men, neither did their cruelty abate in any kind. For the Walls of that most famous City were demolish'd, their ancient Laws abrogated, and the Discipline of Licurgus, so celebrated through all Nations, quite destroyed. When Appius had said this, Lycortas (not only as he was Prætor [State-holder] but also because he was of Philopæmen's faction, who had been the Author of all things that were done at Lacedæmon) made this answer, 'Tis much more difficult, Appius Claudius! for us to speak before you, than it was lately to the Senate. For then we were to answer the Lacedæmonians, who accus'd us; but now we are accus'd by you your selves, before whom we are to make our defence. Which unequal circumstances of ours we undergo with that hope, that you'll hear us with the [impartial] mind of a Judge, laying aside that heat, wherewith you just now spake, I truly (since you, a little while ago, mentioned those things, of which the Lacedemonians complain'd, not only formerly here, to Q. Cæcilius, but afterward also to the Senate of Rome) shall believe that I answer, not to you but to them, in your presence. Now you charge us with the slaughter of those Persons, who, being summon'd by Philopæmen to make their defence, were kill'd; but this crime, Romans! I suppose ought not only not to have been objected to us by you, but not so much as even before you. Why so? why because it was in their League, that the Lacedæmonians should not meddle with the maritime Cities. Now when they took up Arms, and by force in the Night time seiz'd those Cities, from which they were ordered to abstain, if T. Quintius, or the Roman Army had been then in Peloponnesus, as before, the surpriz'd and oppress'd [Inhabitants of those places] would have all fled to them. But since you were a great way off, whither should they run but to us, their Allies, whom they had seen assisting Gytheum, and attacking Lacedæmon with you upon the like occasion? 'Twas upon your account therefore that we undertook a just and a pious War. Which since some People commend, (nor can the Lacedæmonians themselves blame us for it) and the Gods too approved of, who gave us the Victory; how do these things, that were done by the Law of Arms, come now into dispute, though the greatest part of them does not at all concern us. Indeed we were the Persons that summon'd them to a tryal, who had excited the multitude to take up Arms, that by force had taken and rifled the maritime Towns, and made such a slaughter of the chief Men in them; but that they were killed as they were coming to make their defence, is their charge, Areus and Alcibiades (who now, forsooth, are our accusers) and not ours. For the banish'd Lacedæmonians (of which number they were two, and then with you, as having chosen the maritime Towns for their habitation) thinking themselves to be aimed at; made an attack upon them, by whose means they were driven into Exile (but even there (which the more enraged them) could not live in quiet for them); and so Lacedæmonians kill'd Lacedæmonians, and not Achæans. Nor does it concern us to argue whether they were justly or injuriously slain.

XXXVII. But sure, Achæans! it was you, that abolish'd the ancient Laws and Discipline of Lycurgus, and pull'd down their Walls. Both which objections how can the same persons make; since the Walls of Lacedæmon were not built by Lycurgus, but some few years ago, in order to dissolve Lycurgus's Discipline? For the Kings made them of late dayes as a guard and defence to themselves, not to the City. And if Lycurgus were alive again, he would be glad to see them down; and would say, that now he saw the face of his Country, even ancient Sparta. You, Lacedemonians, ought not to have expected Philopæmen, or the Achæans, but should with your own hands have removed and thrown down all the Monuments their of Tyranny. For those were your ugly scars (as it were) of servitude; for though you had lived free without Walls for almost eight hundred years, and and sometimes also had been chief of all Greece, yet you were afterward Slaves for a hundred years, bound up in Walls (made round about your Town) like Fetters. As to the abrogation of the Laws, I suppose, the Tyrants abolish'd the ancient Lacedæmonian Laws; and that we did not take away their own (which they then were not possess'd of) but gave them ours: nor did we do the City any small kindness, when we made it part of our Council, and mingled them among us: that so there might be but one Body of men, and one general Council in all Peloponnesus. Then, I conceive, if we our selves had lived under one sort of Laws, and had injoin'd them another, they might have well complain'd, and have been angry, that they were so hardly dealt with. I know, Appius Claudius, that what I have hitherto said, hath not been proper for Allies to say before their Allies, nor like a free Nation; but rather like Slaves that are making their defence before their Masters. For if those words of the Cryer were to any purpose, whereby you order'd the Achæans to be first of all [declared] free, if the League continue in force; if our Alliance and Friendship be equally preserv'd [on both sides] why do you (since I do not desire to know what you Romans did after you had taken Capua) require to be inform'd, what we Achæans did, when we had conquer'd the Lacedæmonians in War? Why some of them were kill'd, suppose, by us. What? Did not you behead the Capuan Senators? We demolish'd their Walls. Did not you (not only pull down their Walls, but also) take away their City and Country from them? The League, you'll say, is equally obliging [on both sides] [to the Romans as well as] the Achæans, to see to; but in reality the Achæans have but a precarious sort of liberty: besides, that the Government is in the hands of the Romans. I know it, Appius; and, if I ought not to be, I am not vex'd at it. But I desire you, that, what difference soever there be between the Romans and the Achæans, yet ours and your Enemies may not be in the same, or rather better circumstances with you, than we, who are your Allies. For we were the cause of their being equal with us; when we gave them our Laws, and made them part of the Achæan Council. But that's too little for them that are conquer'd, which satisfies the Conquerours. They desire more as Enemies, than they have as Allies. Those things which we are obliged by Oath to preserve in Monuments of Letters cut in stone for an eternal memorial of them, as sacred and inviolable, they would have us (for-swear our selves and) abolish. Romans, we honour, and (if you'll have us say so) fear you: but we honour and fear the immortal Gods much more. He was heard with the assent of the greatest part, and they all thought, he had spoken according to the majesty of a Magistrate: so that it easily appear'd, that by dealing gently he could not maintain his dignity with the Romans. Then Appius said, he would advise the Achæans by all means, whilst they might voluntarily do it, to be Friends [with the Lacedæmonians] lest they should soon afterward be forced to it against their wills. This saying of his was heard with a general sorrow, but made them afraid to refuse his commands. They only desired, that the Romans would alter what they pleas'd as to the Lacedæmonians; but would not oblige the Achæans to make those things void which they had establish'd with an Oath: and then the Sentence of Death against Areus and Alcibiades, which lately made, was revers'd.

At Rome, in the beginning of that Year, when they had discours'd concerning the Pro- XXXVIII vinces of the Consuls and Prætors, the Consuls had Liguria (because there was no War any where else) allotted them. The Prætors, C. Decimus Flavius had the City, and P. Cornelius Cethegus the Jurisdiction between Citizens and Foreigners; C. Sempronius Blasus Sicily; Q. Nevius Matbo Sardinia (and was also to inquire concerning their poisoning there) A. Terentius Varro the hither Spain; and P. Sempronius Longus the farther. From those two Provinces there came about that time, two Embassadors named, L. Juventius Thalna, and T. Quintilius Varus. Who having inform'd the Senate, what a mighty War was made an end of in Spain, desired at the same time, that all honour might be ascribed to the immortal Gods for their great success, and that the Prætors might be permitted to bring away their Armies. Thereupon a Supplication was order'd of two dayes continuance: and when they talk'd of the Armies that were under the Consuls and the Prætors, they gave order that the whole matter concerning the Legions being brought home, should be reported [to the House.] Some few days after the two Legions, which Appius Claudius, and M. Sempronius had had, were allotted to serve under the Consul in Liguria. Concerning the Spanish Armies, there was a great contest between the new Prætors and the Friends of them that were absent, viz. Calpurnius and Quintius. Both sides had the Tribunes of the People, and the Consuls [to back them.] The former of whom declar'd, that they would interpose against the Order of Senate, if they voted that the Armies should be brought home; and the latter, that, if such an intercession were made, they would suffer nothing else to be decreed. At last the favour born to the persons absent was over-power'd, and an Order of Senate made; That the Prætors should raise four thousand Roman Foot, and four hundred Horse; with five thousand Latine Foot, and five hundred Horse, which they should take along with them into Spain. And that when they had distributed these men into four Legions, they should disband all above five thousand Foot, and three hundred Horse in each Legion; but those first of all, who were old Souldiers, and then such as Calpurnius and Quintius had found to be most stout and serviceable in the War.

When this sedition was allay'd, there strait arose another upon the Death of C. Decimi- XXXIX us the Prætor. Cn. Sicinius, and L. Puppins (who had been Ædiles the Year before) and C. Valerius, Flamen Dialis [i. e. Jupiter's High Priest] and Q. Fulvius Flaccus (who, because he had been design'd to be Curule Ædile, was without a white Gown, but stickled most of all) stood for the same place; and Flaccus contended against the Flamen. But, though at first he seem'd to be equal with him, and soon after to have the better of it, part of the Tribunes of the People said, They ought not to regard him, because he was not capable of, nor could he, as a single person, bear two Offices, especially Curule ones [i. e. eminent in the state] at the same time; whilst some of them said, they thought it reasonable he should be discharg'd from the obligation of the Laws, that the People might have the liberty of making who they would Prætor. L. Porcius the Consul was first of opinion, Not to take his name; and next, that he might do so by authority from the Senate, having summon'd the Senators together, he said, he refer'd it to them [to consider] that against all Law, and by an example which was not tolerable to a free City, one, who was set down for Curule Ædile, stood for the Prætorship; but that he, unless they thought any way else more convenient, design'd to hold the Assembly according to Law. Whereupon the Senate voted, That L. Porcius the Consul should treat with Q. Fulvius, that he might not be an hinderance to the holding of a Legal Assembly for choosing of a Prætor in the room of C. Decimius. So when the Consul came to discourse with him according to the order of Senate, Flaccus told him, That he would do nothing unworthy of himself. By which ambiguous and imperfect answer he gave them some reason to hope, that he would do as they would have him, and yield to the authority of the Senate. But at the Assembly he nevertheless made a greater bustle than before, complaining, That the Consul and the Senate extorted from him the kindness of the Roman People, and laid upon him the envy of a double honour, as though it were not manifest, that, as soon as he were design'd for Prætor, he would immediately renounce his Ædileship. The Consul seeing his resolution, as a Candidate, still encrease, and that the favour of the People inclin'd more and more toward him, dismissing the Assembly, call'd a Senate, where they were generally of opinion, That, since the Authority of the Senate did not at all move Flaccus, they ought to treat with him before the People. Thereupon an Assembly being call'd, when the Consul had done speaking, Flaccus, who continued even then of the same mind, gave the Roman People thanks, That they had been pleas'd, with so much zeal (whenever they had had the liberty of declaring their inclinations) to make him Prætor, and [said] that he would not slight the favour of his fellow Citizens to him. That resolute saying of his gain'd him so much the more favour, that without all doubt he had been Prætor, if the Consul would have taken his name. Thence arose a great Contest, not only among the Tribunes themselves, but with the Consul too, till he call'd a Senate, and it was decreed, That since Flaccus's obstinacy, and the evil zeal of some People hinder'd their holding an Assembly for choosing of a new Prætor according to Law, the Senate were of opinion that there were Prætors enough; that P. Cornelius should have both jurisdictions in the City, and should set forth Games to Apollo.

XL.

This Assembly therefore being dissolv'd by the prudence and courage of the Senate, there was another held with greater heat, as being not only concerning a far more weighty affair, but among a greater number of much more powerful Men. For L. Valerius Flaccus, P. and L. Scipio, Cn. Manlius Vulso, and L. Furius Purpureo (who were Patricians) with M. Porcius Cato, M. Fulvius Nobilior, T. and M. Scipronius (Longus and Tuditanus who were Plebeians) were fierce contenders for the Censorship. But M. Porcius far excell'd all the Patricians and Plebeians too of the most signal Families. For in this Person there was so great a force of wit and understanding, that, where-ever he had been born, he seem'd to have been able to make his own fortune, as wanting no skill to manage either private or publick business. He understood both City and Country Affairs. Their knowledge in the Law promoted some Men to the greatest honours, others their Eloquence, and others their Military Renown. But, this Man had such a versatile head to all sorts of things, that you would have sworn, he had been born for that only, which he was about, whatever 'twas. In War he was exceeding stout, and famous for a great many signal Battels, who also, when he came to great Honours, was an incomparable General. He likewise, in Peace, if you consulted the Law, was very skilful; if a Cause were to be pleaded, very eloquent; nor such an one, whose tongue was only active whilst he lived (but who had left no Monument of his Eloquence behind him) no, his Eloquence does, and still shall live, prefer'd in his sacred Writings of all sorts. There are many of his Orations both for himself, and also for and against others. For he tired out his Enemies, not only by accusing them, but also by pleading of his own Cause. He had too many quarrels that continually kept him in action, but he weathered them all. Nor can you easily determine, Whether the Nobility teaz'd him more, or he them. This is certain, he was a Man of an obstinate Spirit, a sharp Tongue, and took too much freedom in his Speeches; but then his mind was invincible to all [unlawful] desires, and he was a Person of rigid innocence, a contemner of [popular] favour, and of Riches. In parsimony, and undergoing of toil and danger, he seem'd to have a Body and Soul too of Iron, which was not broken even by old Age it self, that dissolves all things. For in the eighty sixth Year of his Age he both pleaded and wrote his own Cause, and in the ninetieth brought Sergius Galba to his trial before the People.

XLI.

This man (as in the whole course of his Life, so then also) the Nobility malign'd, whilst he stood for that office: and all the Candidates came together (save L. Flaccus, who had been his Collegue in the Consulate) to put him by the honour: not only that they themselves themselves might rather have it; nor because they were vex'd to see a new man a Censor, but also, because they expected a severe Censorship, and such as would endanger many mens Reputations, from a person, who as he had been injur'd by many people, so was desirous of revenge. For even at that time he stood for the place, with menaces in his mouth; complaining, that they were against him, who fear'd a free and a courageous Censorship; and Voted at the same time for L. Valerius; [saying] That, having him alone for his Collegue, he could chastize the new enormities [of the present times] and recal the ancient customs and manners. The Audience being enflam'd with these words, they (though the Nobility were against it) not only made M. Porcius Censor, but added L. Valerius Flaccus too as his Collegue. After the Assembly for Censors, the Consuls and Prætors went into their several Provinces; except Q. Nevius, who was detain'd four months at least, before he went into Sardinia, by Inquisitions that he was to make concerning Poysoning; great part whereof he perform'd without the City in several Corporations and Boroughs, because it seem'd more convenient for him so to do. If you'll believe Valerius Antias, he condemn'd two thousand men. L. Postumius also the Prætor, who happen'd to have Tarentum for his Province, punish'd great numbers of the plotting Shepherds, and prosecuted the remainder of the Inquest concerning the Bacchanals with all diligence. For he pass'd Sentence upon many men (who either when summon'd, had not appeared, or having bilk'd their Sureties, were then lurking in that part of Italy) as guilty; though some he caught and sent to the Senate at Rome; where they were all put into Prison by P. Cornelius.

XLII.

In the further Spain things were all quiet, since the Lusitanians had been vanquish'd in the last War. In the hither, A. Terentius took the Town of Corbio (which is in the Suesetan Territories) with Galleries and Works. After which the hither Province also was at rest all the Winter. The old Prætors C. Calpurnius, and L. Quintius return'd to Rome; where they had each of them a triumph decreed by general consent of the Senate. But Calpurnius triumph'd first over the Lusitanians and Celtiberians. He brought in eighty three Crowns of gold, and twelve thousand pounds of silver. Some few days after L. Quintius Crispinus Triumph'd upon account of the same Lusitanians and Celtiberians; bringing in his triumph the like quantity of gold and silver. The Censors, M. Porcius and L. Valerius, survey'd the Senate, whose expectation was mixt with fear. They turn'd seven out of the Senate: one of which was a person very remarkable, both for his Birth and Honours, called L. Quintius Flaminius, a Consular man. 'Tis said, that in the memory of our Forefathers it was order'd, that the Censors should make a remark upon every one, whom they put out of the Senate. There are extant indeed other sharp Speeches of Cato's against those men, that he either removed from the order of Senators, or from whom he took their Houses: but the most severe one of all is against L. Quintius; which if he had made, as an Accuser, before his removal, and not as Censor afterward, even T. Quintius, his Brother (though he had then been Censor) could not have kept Quintius in the Senate. Among other things he laid to his charge: *That one Philip, a Carthaginian (who was his beloved, and a remarkable * Catamite) was [by him] carry'd from Rome into the Province of Gaul, in hopes of great Presents. That that Boy, when he wantonly rally'd with him, was often wont to upbraid the Consul, that, just before the Sword-Prize, he was taken from Rome, to oblige his Lover. And that as they were once making merry together, when they were now heated with Wine, that news was brought whilst they were in the midst of their jollity, that a Boian Gentleman was come thither as a Fugitive, he and his Children. That he had a mind to wait upon the Consul, and have his promise of protection face to face. That being brought into the Tent he began to speak to the Consul by an Interpreter. But that, as he was at talking to him, Quintius said to his Catamite; Hast thou a mind (since thou camest away from Rome before the Gladiators fought) to see this Gaul here die? and that he had scarce seriously consented to it, before the Consul, upon the Catamites yielding to it, with a drawn Sword, that hung over his head, whilst the Gaul was a speaking, first wounded him in the head, and then, as he was running away, and implor'd the assistance of the Roman People, and all those that were present, ran him through the side.*

XLIII.

Valerius Antias, as one who never had read Cato's Oration, but believ'd an idle story only, which was set abroad without any certain Author; tells us another Tale, though very like this, as to the Lust and Cruelty of it. That at Placentia he sent for a noted Woman, that he was in Love with, to a Feast. And that there as he was boasting of himself to the Whore, among other things, he told her, how severe he had been in his Inquisitions, and how many men he had in hold, already condemn'd to die, whom he resolv'd to behead. Whereupon, that she, lying at Table next below him, said, she never saw any body behead a man, and therefore would fain see such a sight. And that upon this occasion, he, being an indulgent Lover, commanded one of those miserable Creatures to be brought in, and beheaded him [before her.] Now this was a cruel and a barbarous action, he it as the Censor, or as Valerius faves; that, amidst their Cups and good cheer, where people used to sacrifice to the Gods in good Victuals, and to utter good wishes (to satisfy the curiosity of a Whore who lay in the Consul's bosom) an humane Victim should be slain, and the table besprinkled with blood. At the end of Cato's Speech Quintius is offer'd his choice, that if he deny'd that action, and those other things which were objected against him, to give security to make his own defence; but if he confessed it, no.

not to think any man would be sorry for his disgrace, who, when he was mad with Wine and Lust, had made sport with the blood of a man at a Feast.

XLIV. In the Survey of the Knighthood, L. Scipio Asiaticus had his Horse taken from him. In rating of people also he was a grievous and a sharp Censor to all sorts of men. He order'd the under Officers to take an account in the Books of Rates of the Ornaments and attire of Women, together with their Sedans [or Litters] that were worth above fifteen thousand Asles of Bras. And farther, that all Slaves, under twenty Years of Age, that had been bought since the last Survey, for ten thousand Asles or more, should be valued at ten times as much as they were worth, and that for all such things the Masters should pay three Asles in the thousand. They cut off all the publick Water that flowed into any private House or ground; and demolish'd all Buildings or Balconies belonging to private persons, that jetted out into publick places, within thirty dayes. After that, they bargain'd for the making of Works, out of the money which was design'd for that purpose; for the paving of [several] Ponds with stone, and scouring the common Sewers, where it was necessary; as also for the making of such Sewers in the Aventine and in other places, where there as yet were none. Flaccus also by himself made a Mound at the Neptunian Waters, that the people might have a way; and a passage over the Hill at Formia. Cato bought two Courts [called] Menim and Titium in the Stone-quarries, with four Shops for the publick; and built a stately Fabrick there which was called Porcia. They also farm'd out the publick Revenues at very high rates, but got the publick work done at the lowest that they possibly could. Which bargains since the Senate (tired out by the intricacies and tears of those that farm'd or undertook such Revenues or Works) thought fit to rescin'd, and had order'd all things to be fetled anew; the Censors, having by an Edict removed all those persons (from the place where such Contracts were made) that had eluded the former Bargains, let out and contracted for the very same things at a very little less price. This was a remarkable Censorship, and full of broils; which kept M. Porcius (who was lookt upon to be so severe) in an hurry all his life time. The same year two Colonies were carry'd, Potentia into Picenum, and Pisaurum into the Gallick Territories: where each man had six Acres of Land allotted him. The same Triumviri, Q. Fabius Labco, and M. and Q. Fulvius (Flaccus and Nobilior) divided the Land and carry'd the Planters thither. The Consuls of that year did nothing that is worth the remembring either at home or abroad.

XLV. For the next year they chose as Consuls, M. Claudius Marcellus, and Q. Fabius Labco; who, upon the Ides of March [i. e. the 14th day] on which they enter'd upon their Consulship, made a Proposal concerning theirs and the Prætors Provinces. For Prætors were created, C. Valerius, Jupiters High-Priest, (who had stood for it the year before) L. Postumius Albinus, P. Cornelius Sisenna, L. Puppius, L. Julius and L. Sicinius. To the Consuls was assign'd the Province of Liguria, with the same Armies that P. Claudius and M. Porcius had had. The Spains were reserv'd to the Prætors of the former year, with their Armies, without casting Lots for them. The Prætors were order'd so to chuse, that one of the jurisdictions in the City might be the Province of the Flamen Dialis [i. e. Jupiters Priest]. He happen'd to have the Foreign jurisdiction, and Cornelius Sisenna had the City; Sp. Postumius Sicily; L. Puppius Apulia; L. Julius Gallia; and Cn. Sicinius Sardinia. Of whom L. Julius was order'd to go away by times. Now the Transalpine Gauls having (as I told you before) got over into Italy through a strange pass that was never before known, a Town in that part of the Country that is now called Ager Aquileiensis. The Prætor therefore was enjoin'd, to hinder (as much as in him lay, without making a War) the carrying on of that [work.] If he must of necessity make use of his Arms to obstruct it, he was to send the Consuls word; for the Senate resolv'd that one of them should lead the Legions against the Gauls. In the end of the last year there was an Assembly held for chusing of an Augur: and Sp. Postumius Albinus was created in the room of Cn. Cornelius Lentulus, who was then deceas'd.

XLVI. At the beginning of this year P. Licinius Crassus the High-Priest dy'd; in whose place M. Sempronius Tuditanus was chosen. C. Servilius Geminus was also created High-Priest. Upon the score of P. Licinius's Funeral there was a Dole of flesh given, and a hundred and twenty Gladiators fought; besides that there were Funeral Games set forth for three dayes; after which there was a Feast. And at that, there being Tables spread over all the Forum, a Tempest that arose, with violent showers, forced a great many people to set up Tents there: which, when it was all clear again, were removed. Whereupon they commonly said, they had done as the Soothsayers had prophesied; that it was necessary for Tents to be set up in the Market-place. When they were discharg'd from this religious obligation, another was laid upon them; for that it had rained blood two dayes together in the Court of Vulcan: for the expiation of which prodigy, the Decemviri appointed a Supplication. Before the Consuls went into their Provinces, they introduced the Foreign Embassadors from beyond Sea into the Senate. Nor were there ever before so many men from those parts at Rome. For since the report went about all the Nations, that inhabit near Macedonia, That accusations and complaints against Philip were not neglectfully heard by the Romans, but that it was worth a great many mens while to complain; each City and Nation, yea and many particular persons privately too (for he was a grievous Neighbour to all people) came to Rome either in hopes to ease their misery, or to gain the comfort at least of being condoled. There likewise came an Embassy from King Eumenes, with his Brother Athenens, to complain; not only that the Garisons were not drawn out of Thrace; but also, that Auxiliaries were sent to Prusias in Bithynia, who then waged War against Eumenes.

17. 11

Demetrius, who was then but a very young Man, was to answer to all these things, XLVII. though it was an hard matter for him to remember either what was objected, or what was to be said against it. For they were not only many objections, but most of them mere trifles too; about the controversie concerning their Borders, their Men who were taken away, their Beasts that were driven away, about determinations in Law that were made according to his pleasure, who was Judge, or not at all, and of things that were adjudged either by force or favour. Now the Senate, seeing that Demetrius could not inform them of these things so clearly, nor they conceive them plainly enough from him, and were withal concern'd at the rawness and the disturbance of the young Man, they order'd him to be ask'd, Whether he had any thing to shew them under his fathers hand? To which he answering, that he had; they thought it most proper to take the Kings own answers to each particular. Wherefore they immediately desired the Book, and then gave him leave to read it. Now the cases upon each head were drawn up in short, so as that he said, He had done some things according to the decrees of the Embassadors, and that it was not his fault that he did not do the rest so, but theirs rather themselves who accus'd him. He likewise had therewith mixt complaints, touching the injustice of the decrees, and [shew'd] how unequally the debate was managed before Cæcilius; as also, that they all insulted dishonourably, and not according to any desert of his, over him. The Senate took these remarks of his provoked mind; but whilst the young Prince was excusing some things, and saying that he would undertake for others, That they should be as the Senate would be pleas'd to have them, they thought fit to make him this answer, That his father had done nothing more prudently nor more to the Senates mind, than that, however those things were done, he was willing to give the Romans satisfaction by his son Demetrius. That the Senate could wink at, forget and endure many things that were past, and believ'd also that they ought to believe Demetrius. For they had his Soul still for an hostage, though they had given his body back to his father; and knew, that, as far as he could be (preserving the duty he owed to his father) he was a friend to the Romans. And that for his honours sake they would send Embassadors into Macedonia; that if any thing were done less than ought to have been done, it might be even then performed without an expiation for what was omitted. Besides which, that they would have Philip know, that he stood as fair as ever in the good of the Romans upon the score of his son Demetrius.

These things, that were done to advance his Grandeur, turn'd strait into envy, and soon XLVIII. after to the ruine of the young Man. Then the Lacedæmonians were introduced. Whereupon there were many small Controversies started, but those that held the longest were, whether those Persons, which the Acheans had condemn'd, should be restored or no? whether they had kill'd those Persons whom they had kill'd unjustly or according to Law? and farther, whether the Lacedæmonians should stay in the Achaean Council? or whether the privileged of that one City, in Peloponnesus, should be separate, as it had been formerly? Whereupon it was resolv'd, That the Men should be restored, and the judgments, that had pass'd, be revers'd; that Lacedæmon should continue in the Achaean Council; and that this Decree should be written and signed both by the Lacedæmonians and the Acheans. Q. Marcius was sent Embassador into Macedonia, being ordered at the same time to inspect the affairs of their Allies in Peloponnesus. For there also were not only dissensions still remaining from their former animosities, but the Messenians too had revolted from the Achaean Council. Of which War if I should go about to set forth the cause and management, I should seem unmindful of my design, whereby I propos'd no farther to touch upon foreign matters, than as they are coherent with the affairs of Rome.

That was a memorable event, that, when the Acheans had gotten the better in the War, XLIX. Philopæmen their State holder was taken [Prisoner] as he was going to prepossess himself of Corone, which the Enemy aimed at, being surpriz'd in a rough Vale where he, with some few Horse, was. They say, he might have escaped by the assistance of the Thracians and the Cretenians, but was ashamed to leave those Horse-men (the best in all their Nation, whom he himself had lately chosen out) and therefore staid. So whilst he, himself bringing up the Reer, made way for them to get through the narrow pass, by undergoing the shock of the Enemy, his Horse fell down, and what with the fall it self, what with the weight of the Horse that fell upon him, was almost kill'd, being now seventy Years of Age, and grown very weak through a tedious Disease, of which he was just then recovered: so the Enemy came upon him, whilst he was down, and took him. At first (since they knew him) for modesty and in contemplation of his Merits, they took him up as though he had been their own General, refresh'd him, and carry'd him out of his pathless Vale into the Road, though through their extraordinary sudden joy they could hardly believe their own Eyes. Part therefore of them sent Messengers before hand to Messene, That they

they had made an end of the War; for Philopœmen was taken, and coming thither. Which report at first seemed so incredible, that the Messenger was not only taken for a Lye, but even a mad man too. But soon after, when several came, one after another, and told the same story, at last they believ'd it. And before they were well assur'd that he was come near the City, they all flock'd out to see the show, Freemen and Slaves, Women and Children. Whereupon the crowd fill'd up the Gate, whilst each particular person, unless he were convinced by his own Eyes, thought he could not be sufficiently assur'd of so great a thing. They therefore, that brought Philopœmen, could hardly get in at the Gate for the throng of people that came out to meet them; besides, that a numerous multitude had blockt up the rest of the way. By this means the greatest part of them being debar'd from the sight of him, they got into a Theatre, which stood by the roads side, and all with one Voice desired, that he might be brought thither for the people to look upon. But the Magistrates and Nobility, fearing, lest their compassion for so great a man, when he was before them, should cause any tumult (for some of them probably would be moved by their respect to his former grandeur, compar'd with his present condition, and others by their remembrance of his extraordinary merits) they set him in view at a good distance: but immediately took him away out of their sight; since the Prætor, Dinocrates, said, that the Magistrates had a mind to ask him some questions about the great occasion of the War. Then having brought him into the Court, and called a Senate, they began to advise.

L. By this time it was toward Evening, e'r they had resolv'd (not only upon other matters, but) where they might keep him safe the next night. For they were amazed at the greatness of his former condition and courage: so that they neither durst take him home with them, nor entrust any single person with the custody of him. But by and by some of them put the rest in mind, that there was a publick Treasury under ground, which was wall'd about with square stone. Into that therefore he was (bound and) put, and a great stone, wherewith it was cover'd, by the help of an Engine laid upon it. Thus they, thinking it more secure to trust to a place, than to any man to keep him, expected till the next Morning. The day following the whole multitude, remembring his former merits toward their City, were of opinion, that they ought to spare him, and through him to seek out remedies for their present misfortunes: though the Authors of the revolt, in whose hands the Commonwealth was, did all in secret contrive his Death; but whether they should hasten or defer it, was the question. At last those who were most desirous to have him punish'd, prevail'd; and there was a person sent to carry him poyson. When he took the Cup, they say, he spoke no other words, but only ask'd, Whether Lycortas (who was the other General of the Achæans) and the Horsemen escaped safe? To which when it was answer'd, Yes; that he said; 'Tis very well; and thereupon drinking off the Cup without any fear at all, not long after expired. Nor was their joy for his death of any long continuance to the Authors of that Cruelty. For Messene being overcome in the War, deliver'd up the Criminals at the request of the Achæans, and restor'd Philopœmen's bones too, who was buried by the whole Achæan Council, and had so many humane honours by them confer'd upon him, that they could hardly abstain for [paying him] divine ones. By Writers, both Greeks and Latines, there is so much attributed to this man, that by some of them it is set down as a signal remark upon this Year; That three famous Generals deceas'd that Year, Philopœmen, Annibal, and P. Scipio: so equal did they make him to the greatest Generals of the two most puissant Nations in the World.

LJ. Mean while T. Quintus Flaminius came Embassadour to King Prusias, whom the Romans suspected, not only for having entertain'd Annibal after his flight, but also for making War against Eumenes. Thereupon, whether because it was objected against Prusias by Flaminius, that (among other things) there was a man in his Court, who was of all men living the greatest Enemy to the Romans; and had advis'd his own Country first, and next (when they were subdu'd) King Antiochus, to wage a War against the Roman people: or because Prusias himself, to gratifie Flaminius who was there present, and the Romans, resolv'd of himself to kill or deliver him up into his power; upon the first interview with Flaminius, there were Souldiers immediately sent to guard Annibal's House. Annibal had always had in his mind the prospect of such an end, in that he not only saw the inexpiable hatred of the Romans to him, but also that he ought not to put any confidence in those Kings; besides, that he had particular experience of Prusias's levity. He likewise was much concern'd at the arrival of Flaminius, as though it was like to be fatal to him. Now, that he might always have some way to escape, when ever he should be set round with danger, he had made seven wayes to go out of his House: and some of them private too, lest they might be stopp'd up by a guard. But the severe commands of Kings make every thing discoverable, that they have a mind to find out. For they surrounded the whole House with guards, so that no body could get out. Annibal therefore, when he was told, that the Kings Souldiers were in his Porch; endeavour'd to make his escape at a back Door, which was out of the way, and the most private out-let; but finding that too block'd up by a Company of Souldiers, and that all the House was environ'd quite round with Guards, he call'd for that Poyson, which he had long before prepared for such an occasion: Let us free, said he, the Roman People

People from their tedious care; since they think it long to expect the death of an old Man. Flaminius will gain no great, or memorable Victory over a person disarm'd and betray'd. How much the Roman people are alter'd in their carriage, even this day is a sufficient argument. Their Fathers gave King Pyrthus (who was their Enemy, in Arms, and with an Army in Italy) warning to take care of Poyson: but they have now sent a Consular Embassadour, to perswade King Prusias basely to murder his Guest and Friend. With that having sent some Curfes upon the Head and Kingdom of Prusias, he invoked the Gods of Hospitality as Witnesses of his violated Faith, and so drank up the Bowl. Thus dy'd Annibal.

LII. Polybius and Rutilius say, that Scipio dy'd this Year: though I agree not either with them, or Valerius: not with them, because I find L. Valerius who was Censor with M. Porcius, in the time of their Censorship, chosen President of the Senate, though Africanus had been so for two Surveys last past: who whilst he lived, unless he were put out of the Senate (which is a remark that no body has ever made upon him) no other President would have been chosen in his room. And as for Antias, M. Nevius, Tribune of the People, confutes him; against whom there is an Oration inscribed, P. Africanus. This same Nevius in the Books of the Magistrates was Tribune of the people when P. Claudius and L. Porcius were Consuls: but he enter'd upon his Tribuneship when Ap. Claudius, and M. Sempontius were Consuls upon the 9th of December: from which time 'tis three Months to the Ides of March, on which P. Claudius and L. Porcius enter'd upon their Consulate. By this account he might have lived in the time of Nevius's Tribuneship, and he have summon'd him to a Tryal at Law; but have deceas'd before the Censorship of L. Valerius and M. Porcius. Now these three men, who were the most Renowned in their several Nations, made not their Exit out of this Life more agreeably as to the time, than that ne'r an one of them came to an end that was suitable to the splendor of their lives. For first of all, they every one of them dy'd out of their native soil, nor were so much as buried there. Annibal and Philopœmen were taken off by poyson: of whom Annibal being banish'd, was betray'd by his Host; whilst Philopœmen being taken Prisoner was kept under Confinement till he dy'd: and Scipio, though he were not banish'd, yet, having a day set him, on which he did not appear upon the Summons, but was indicted though absent, condemn'd not only himself, but his Funeral too to voluntary banishment.

LIII. Whilst these things were done in Peloponnesus (from whence I digress'd) the return of Demetrius and the Embassadours into Macedonia, had variously affected the minds of several people. The commonalty of the Macedonians, who were allrighted at the War which they were like to have with the Romans, lookt upon Demetrius, as a Peace-maker, with great favour: and at the same time were very confident that they should make him King after the Death of his Father. For though he were younger than Perseus, yet he was born of a Legitimate Wife, and Perseus of an Harlot: who, as he was born of a common Prostitute, had no mark or proof of his having a certain Father; but that Demetrius was extremely like to Philip: besides, that the Romans would place Demetrius in his Fathers Throne: but did not value Perseus in the least. This they generally said: wherefore Perseus was mightily concern'd, lest his Age alone should not be prevalent enough for him, since in all other circumstances his Brother was superiour to him: besides, that Philip himself also, believing, that it would not be in his disposal which he should leave his Heir, thought his younger Son to be more troublesome to him, than he desired. He was sometimes offended at the Macedonians flocking to him, and vex'd, that there should be another Palace whilst he was alive. For as the young man was return'd (no question of it) more haughty [than before] relying upon the judgments of the Senate toward him, having those things granted to him, that were deny'd to his Father: so every mention of the Romans gained him as much Envy with his Brother and Father both, as it did honour among the other Macedonians: especially when there came other Embassadours from Rome, and he was forced to depart, and draw all his Garisons out of Thrace, as also to do other things, either by Decree of the former Embassadours, or according to some new constitution of the Senate: but all with great regret and sorrow. And that so much the more, because he saw his Son more frequently with them than with him: yet he shew'd himself obedient toward the Romans, lest he should give any present occasion for their making of a War: and to turn their minds from the suspicion of any such designs, led his Army into the middle of Thrace where the Odrysiens, Dantheletes, and Bessians inhabit. There he took Philippopolis, a City, that was deserted by its Inhabitants, who run away from it, they and their whole Families, into the tops of the adjacent Hills: and took the Champaign Barbarians, when he had pillaged their Country, by surrender. Then, having left a Garison in Philippopolis, which not long after was expell'd by the Odrysiens, he began to build a Town in Deuriopus.

LIV. That is a Region of Paonia near the River Erigonus, which running through Paonia out of Illyricum, is discharg'd into the River Axius. Not far from Stobi, an ancient City, he commanded the new City [which he built there] to be called Perseis, in honour to his eldest Son. Whilst these things were transacted in Macedonia, the Consuls going into their Provinces, Marcellus sent a Messenger before-hand to L. Porcius the Pro-Consul, that he should bring his Army up to the new Town, which the Gauls had built. But when the Consul came the Gauls surrender'd themselves; being in number twelve thousand armed men. A great many of them had Arms, that they took up in hast out of the Fields, which to their sorrow were all taken from them; besides other things, that they had plunder'd the Country people of, and brought along with them. Of which things they sent Embassadors to Rome to make complaint: who being introduced into the Senate by L. Valerius the Prætor, declared; That they, seeing their multitudes in Gaul were too abundant, being forced for want of Land [to cultivate] and other necessities, went over the Alps to seek a seat. And where they saw a place uninhabited, and solitary, there without injury to any man they sate themselves down. That they had begun likewise to build a Town: which shew'd, that they came not to molest any Country or City whatsoever. That M. Claudius sent a Message to them; that, unless they would surrender themselves, he would make War upon them. Whereupon, that they, preferring a certain, though not an honourable Peace, before the uncertain casualties of War, put themselves first into the protection of the Romans before they were absolutely subject to them. That after some few dayes they were order'd to depart both from their Country and City; and that they design'd to go quietly into what part of the World they could. But that then, first, their Arms, and, at last, all they had was taken away from them. Wherefore they desired of the Senate and people of Rome, that they would not be more severe upon them, who had innocently surrender'd themselves, than they were to Enemies. To this Speech the Senate order this Answer to be return'd, That neither they did well, in coming over into Italy, and endeavouring to build a Town in a Foreign Territory, without the leave of any Roman Magistrate, that was Governour of that Province: nor was the Senate willing, that, since they had surrender'd themselves, they should be plunder'd. Wherefore they would send Embassadors along with them to the Consuls: who, if they return'd from whence they came, should cause all things to be restored to them: and who should go forthwith beyond the Alps, to warn the Gallick People, that they should keep their mobile at home. That the Alps which was a boundary almost insuperable, was in the midst between them: nor would it be better with them, than it had been for those who first had made them passable. The Embassadors, that were sent, were L. Furius Purpureo, Q. Minucius, and P. Manlius Acidinus. [Upon whose arrival] the Gauls, having all things restored to them, that they were justly possess'd of, march'd out of Italy.

LIII

LIV

LV. The Transalpine people gave the Roman Embassadors a very kind Answer. But the Seniors of them rebuked the Roman People for their excessive lenity; in that they suffer'd those men to pass unpunished, who, without the consent of their own Nation, had gone and taken possession of a Territory belonging to the Roman Empire, and endeavour'd to build a Town in a foreign soil. That they ought to have set a good heavy mulct upon them for their temerity. But since they had even restored them their goods also, they feared, lest by such their indulgence, more of the same Nation would be excited to make the same attempt. They entertain'd and presented the Embassadors with many presents. M. Claudius the Consul, having driven the Gauls out of the Province, began to prepare for the Istrian War: having sent a Letter to the Senate [to desire leave] that he might carry his Legions over into Istria. That the Senate granted: but this they debated; whether they should carry a Colony to Aquileia: nor was it agreed upon; whether it should be a Colony of Latines, or of Roman Citizens. At last the Senate thought it best to send a Latine Colony; and the Triumviri created for the performing of that duty, were P. Scipio Nasica, C. Flaminius, and L. Manlius Acidinus. The same year Mutina and Parma, Colonies of Roman Citizens, were planted: in which two thousand men, through that Country, which was lately in the hands of the Boians, but formerly of the Tuscans, received, each one, at Parma, eight Acres, and at Modena five. The Triumviri, that carry'd them thither, were M. Amilius Lepidus, T. Abitius Cævus, and L. Quintius Crispinus. The Colony of Saturnia also, consisting of Roman Citizens, was carry'd into the Cælestran Territories, by the Triumviri, Q. Fabius Labeo, C. Afranius Stellio, and Tib. Sempronius Gracchus: and each man had ten Acres of Land given him.

LVI. The same Year A. Terentius, the Proprætor, not far from the River Iberus, in the Ausetan Dominions, not only fought several prosperous Battels with the Celtiberians, but also took some Towns which they had fortified in that Country. The farther was that Year at peace, not only for that P. Sempronius the Proprætor was long sick, but likewise that the Lusitanians, since no body provoked them, were all quiet. Nor was there any memorable action done in Liguria from the time that Q. Fabius was Consul there. M. Marcellus being recall'd out of Istria, dismissing his Army, return'd to Rome to hold the Assembly; in which he created for Consuls Cn. Babius Tamphilus, and L. Amilius Paulus, who had been Curule Ædile with M. Amilius Lepidus, and Consul five Years before, when that same Lepidus was made Consul after two repulses. Then they chose Prætors, Q. Fulvius Flaccus, M. Valerius Levinus, P. Manlius (the second time) M. Ogubnius Gallus, L. Cæcilius Dentor, and C. Terentius Istra. At the end of that Year there was a supplication appointed upon the score of certain Prodigies; for that they were satisfied, that it rained Blood two Days together in the Court of Concord; and that it was reported, That not far off of Sicily there arose out of the Sea an Island that had never before appeared. Valerius Antius says, that Annibal dyed this Year, in which Embassadors were sent about that matter to Prusias, namely (besides Quintius Flaminius, whose Fame was great in that affair) L. Scipio Asiaticus, and P. Scipio Nasica.

DECADE IV. BOOK X.

The EPILOGUE.

4. When Philip had given order that all the Noble-mens Children, whom he had in custody, should be brought together and put to Death, Theoxena, upon the account of her own and her Sisters Children, who were very young, fearing the Kings Lust, brought forth several Swords, with a Cup full of Poyson, and perswaded them, that they would avoid the imminent disgrace [that was like to come upon them] by Death; and having prevailed upon them, kill'd her self also. 5, 6, &c. The contels between Philip of Macedon's two Sons, Demetrius and Perseus, are related. 8. And how Demetrius, who through the malice of his brother, was first of all falsely accused of Parricide (among other things) and aspiring to the Kingdom. 24. It was at last, as being a friend to the Romans, destroyed by Poyson, and how the Kingdom of Macedonia, when Philip was dead, came to Perseus. 16, 25, &c. The great success that several Generals met with in Liguria and Spain against the Celtiberians. 29. The Books of Numa Pompilius, both in Greek and Latine, were found lock'd up in a stone Chest in a field belonging to L. Petillius the Notary under Janiculum, by Men that were a ploughing there. In which, when the Prætor, to whom they were carryed, had read several things tending to the dissolution of Religion, he swore to the Senate, that it was against the interest of the Commonwealth, that they should be either read or kept. And therefore by an order of Senate they were burnt in the Assembly Court. 34. The Colony of Aquileia was planted. 54, &c. Philip being sore troubled in mind, that he had made away with his Son Demetrius, by the instigation of his other Son who falsely accused him, studied how to be revenged on Perseus, and had a mind rather to leave Antigonus his Successor in the Kingdom. But whilst he was thinking of this affair he was snatch'd away by Death, and Perseus came to be King.

I. IN the beginning of the next Year the Consuls and Prætors chose their Provinces. To the Consuls there was ne'r an one to be assign'd except Liguria. M. Ogubnius Gallus happened to have the City Jurisdiction, and M. Valerius, that among Foreigners. Of the two Spains, the hither fell to Q. Fulvius Flaccus, and the farther to P. Manlius; to L. Cæcilius Dentor, Sicily; and to C. Terentius Istra, Sardinia. Then the Consuls were commanded to make their Levies. Now Q. Fabius had written word from Liguria, That the Apuians were inclining to a Rebellion; and that there was some danger, lest they should make an in-road into the Territories of Pile. And from the Spains they were likewise informed, That the hithermost was in Arms, and a War waged with the Celtiberians; but that in the farther, by reason that the Prætor had been so long sick, all their military Discipline was dissolv'd through ease and luxury. Upon these grounds they thought fit to have new Armies raised, four Legions for Liguria, each one consisting of five Thousand two Hundred Foot and three Hundred Horse; to which there were added of the Latins fifteen Thousand Foot and eight Hundred Horse; and that these should be the two Consular Armies. They were farther ordered to raise seven Thousand Foot (of the Allies and Latines) and six Hundred Horse, to send to M. Marcellus in Gaul, whose Commission, though he were out of his Consulship, was continued. They likewise gave order for the raising of four Thousand Roman Foot and two Hundred Horse, with seven Thousand Foot and three Hundred Horse (of the Allies) to go into both the Spains. And Q. Fabius Labeo too was continued in Commission for another Year, with the Army that he had in Liguria.

II. That Year it was a very stormy Spring; for the Day before the Palilia [a Feast in honour of Palis, the Goddess of Shepherds] about noon a mighty Tempest arising with a Wind, did great damage to many places both sacred and prophane. It threw down the brazen Statues in the Capitol, carried a door from the Temple of Luna, that is in the Aventine, and fix'd it in a Monument upon the back Walls of the Temple of Ceres. It likewise overturned several other Statues in the Circus Maximus, with the Pedestals on which they stood, and miserably dissipated the roots of certain Temples which it forc'd off. Wherefore the Tempest was turn'd into a Prodigy, and the Soothsayers ordered a Sacrifice to be made upon account thereof. The like was also at the same time done, for that they heard there was a Mule with three feet born at Reate; and from Formia, that the Temple of Apollo at Cajeta was burnt with Lightning. For these Prodigies, there was a Sacrifice made of twenty bigger sort of Victims, and Supplication for one Day. At the same time they were inform'd by a Letter from A. Terentius the Proprætor, that P. Sempronius was dead in the farther Province after he had been above a Year sick. Wherefore the Prætors were commanded to go the sooner into Spain. Then the Foreign Embassadors were introduced into the Senate. First those of King Eumenes and King Pharnaces and of the Rhodians, who complained of the slaughter made in Sinope. There came likewise about the same time Embassadors from the Acheans and Lacedaemonians: to whom there were Answers given, when Marcus had been first heard, who was sent to view the affairs of Greece and Macedonia. To the Kings of Asia and the Rhodians they made this Answer; That the Senate would send Embassadors to see how those things stood.

III. Marcus had encreased their concern about Philip: For he said, that Philip had done what the Senate order'd him, at such a rate, that it easily appear'd, he would no longer do so, than he of necessity was oblig'd to it: nor was it hard to guess, that he design'd to renew the War, since all things, that he at that time either said or did, tended that way. And he indeed now first brought over almost all the Horsemen out of the maritime Towns, with their Families into Emathia (as it is now called) formerly called Paeonia; delivering their Cities to be inhabited by the Thracians and other Barbarians; because he supposed that these would be a more faithful sort of men in the Roman War. That made a great disturbance in all Macedonia, and very few people when, with their Wives and Children, they left their House and home could contain their grief in silence; but you might have heard them Curse the King, as they went in Drove along, their hatred so far overcame their fear. By this means his tyrannical mind grew suspicious of all persons, places and times: till at last he began to declare openly, That there was no safety now left for him; before he had laid hold of and secured the Children of those men, that he had put to death, and taken them off one after another.

IV. That Cruelty, which was hateful in it self, was render'd yet more horrid by the destruction of one Family. He had kill'd Herodius, Prince of the Thessalians, many years before; and his Sons-in-Law sometime after. So that his Daughters were left Widows, with each of them a Son; their names being Theoxena and Archo. Of whom Theoxena, though she had many Suiters, was still against Marrying: but Archo was Married to one Poris, who was far the greatest man in all the Aenean Nation: to whom when she had born several Children, she left them all very small and dy'd. Theoxena, that her Sisters Children might be educated under her care, married Poris: and, as though she her self had bore them all, took the same care of her Sisters Children, as of her own. When therefore she heard of the Kings Edict for apprehending the Children of those persons that had been kill'd: supposing that they would be expos'd to the Lust, not only of the King, but their Keepers too, she bent her mind upon a cruel design, and dar'd to say, That she would kill them every one with her own hand before they should come into the Kings Clutches. But Poris abominating the very mention of so barbarous an action, said, he would carry them to Athens to people that would take great care of them, and would go along with them himself. Accordingly they went from Thessalonica to Aenea at a set time of Sacrifice, which was made each year with great Ceremony in honour of their Founder Aeneas. Where having spent that day in solemn Feasting, they got a board a Ship which Poris had laid ready, about the third Watch, when all people were a sleep, as though they were going back to Thessalonica; though they intended to cross over into Enbaea. But the Wind being against them it was day before they could get off far from the Land: and therefore the Kings men, who guarded that Harbour, sent an arm'd Vessel to fetch their Ship into [the Harbour] with an heavy Injunction, that they should not return without her. When they came near her, Poris was very intent upon encouraging the Rowers and Sailers; and sometimes lifting his hands to Heaven desired the Gods to assist him. In the mean time the resolute Woman, being return'd to her former project, which she had premeditated a great while before, prepared the Poyson and brought out a Sword; after which having placed the Cup, and several drawn Swords before their Eyes; Death, said she, is the only revenge. And these are the ways to Death: wherefore as each of you are most inclined, by that means make your escape from the Kings Tyranny. Come on my Lads, first, you that are the Elder, take the Swords in your hands: or drink up this Cup, if you are more inclined to die a slow Death. The Enemies were at hand, and the Author of their death at the same time urged them forward. So they being taken off by different means fell headlong over-board and half dead: till she her self at last, embracing her Husband, who was her Companion in Death, threw her self down into the Sea; and the Kings men boarded the Ship after the Owners were all out of it.

V. The cruelty of this action added new flame, as it were, to the Kings Envy; insomuch that the people in general curs'd both him and his Children: which execrations being in a short time heard by all the Gods, caus'd him to be barbarous even to his own blood. For Perseus seeing that his Brother Demetrius grew every day into greater favour and esteem with the Macedonian Commonalty, and gain'd more love still of the Romans, supposed himself to have no hopes of the Kingdom, but what depended upon wickedness, and therefore set all his thoughts upon that only. But because he saw that he was not able of himself to compass even so much as that which in his effeminate mind he had design'd, he made it his business to try, by cross questions, how every one of his Fathers Friends stood affected [to it]. Some whereof at first pretended to scorn any such thing, because they had most hopes of Demetrius. But soon after, seeing that Philip's hatred to the Romans encreas'd (which Perseus indulg'd, but Demetrius did all he could to oppose) they foreseeing what would be the end of an Youth who was so unwary to frustrate his Brothers base design, supposed it it the best way to promote what he was carrying on, and to cherish the hopes of the stronger; which made them join themselves to Perseus. As to other things they left them to be done each in its due time: but at the present they agreed, to enflame the King by all means against the Romans, and to put him upon the thoughts of a War, to which he was already inclined. And at the same time, to make Demetrius every day more suspected, they design'd their manners and customs, others their achievements, and others the form of their very City, which was not yet adorn'd either with private or publick works, and others all their great men in particular; the young man being unwary and out of love to the Roman name, as well as in opposition to his Brother, by defending all these things, made himself suspected by his Father, and more obnoxious to accusations. Wherefore his Father kept him altogether ignorant of what his designs were upon the Romans; having set his affections wholly upon Perseus, with whom he consulted about that affair both day and night. By this time those persons were come back again, that he had sent into the Basternian Dominions for aid, and brought thence certain noble young men, some of which were of the Royal Family: and one of them promised Philip's Son his Sister in Marriage; by which Alliance of their Families the King was much enlivened. Then Perseus [said], What good do these things do us? There is not near so much security in foreign aids, as there is danger from treachery at home. I will not say we have a Traitor, but I'm sure we have a Spy in our very bosom, whose body indeed (since he was an hostage at Rome) the Romans have restored to us, but keep his Soul themselves. The Eyes of almost all the Macedonians are fix'd upon him; and they say, they'll have no other King, but whom the Romans have given them. The old Mans mind, which was in it self much disturb'd, was yet by these words put into a greater Commotion, and he received those accusations more with his heart than his Countenance.

It happened, that the time of surveying and purifying the Army was then come, the manner of which solemnity is thus, The head of a Bitch cut off in the middle, and the fore part with the Entrails is laid on the right hand, and the hind part on the left hand of the way. Between this divided Victim the Army marches through. Before the front of them are carried the remarkable Arms of all the Macedonian Kings even since the original [of that Monarchy] and then the King himself follows after with his Children. Next comes the Kings Regiment and his Guard du Corps; and after all the common multitude of Macedonians bring up the Reer. By the Kings side, on each hand, march'd his two Sons, Perseus who was now thirty Years of Age, and Demetrius twenty five; the former in the strength of his Age, and the latter in the flower, and the ripe Offspring [both] of a fortunate Father, had his mind been sound. Now it was the custome, when the Rites of this lustration were over, for the Army to draw off, and dividing into two parties to engage each other as though they had been in earnest. The Kings Sons were to be the Generals in this pretended Fight. But indeed it was not only the resemblance of a Battel, for they fell on as though they were to contend for the Kingdom; and there were many Wounds made with stakes [which they had in their hands] nor was there any thing wanting, save Swords, to make it look like a real conflict. That party, which Demetrius commanded, had far the better of it; at which, though Perseus was much concern'd, yet his prudent Friends were glad of it, and said, that very thing would afford good matter of accusation against the young Man.

There was that Day a Feast made by both of them for their Companions, that were on each side; and though Perseus, invited by Demetrius to Supper, had deny'd to come, yet upon such a Festival Day, kind entertainment, and youthful merriment, made them both very mellow. There they recounted the passages of their imaginary Battel, with drollery upon their Adversaries, insomuch that they did not spare the very Captains themselves. To take an account of these words, there was a Spy sent from Perseus's entertainment, who being somewhat too negligent in his behaviour, was met by certain young Men that went by chance out of the entertaining Room, and beaten. Demetrius not knowing what was done, What then (said he) do we go to be merry with my Brother? to mitigate by our innocent mirth his passion, if any yet remain in him since the fight. With that they all cry'd out, they would go, excepting those, who fear'd a present revenge for their having beaten the Spy. But since Demetrius forc'd them also along, they hid Swords under their Coats, whereby to defend themselves, if any force should be offer'd to them. But there can be nothing kept secret in an intestine quarrel. Both Houses were full of Spies and Traytors. So there ran an Informer to Perseus before-hand, to tell him, that there were four young Men coming along with Demetrius arm'd with Swords. Now though the reason of that was manifest (for he knew that one of his guests was beaten by them) yet to make the thing appear the worse he order'd his Gate to be lock'd; and from the upper part of his House, out at the windows that look'd into the street, he forb'd the company to come near his Door, as though they had come to murder him. Demetrius therefore, after he had roared at him a little (as being somewhat in Drink) return'd to his own Feast, and was still ignorant of the whole matter.

The next day Perseus, as soon as he could come to his Father, going into the Palace with a di-

VI.

VII.

VIII.

a disturbed Countenance, stood silent at a distance before him. Whereupon when his Father ask'd him; Whether all things were well or no? What was the occasion of his melancholy? he reply'd; Know, Father, that all my life is now clear gains to me. For I am now attempted, by my Brother, not with secret Ambuscades: but he comes in the night with arm'd men to my House to kill me: where I was fain to shut my Door, and defend myself from his fury by the guard of my Walls. By this means having infused a dread into his Father, mixt with admiration, he added; And if you'll have but the patience to hear me, I'll make you understand the whole story very plainly. To which Philip made Answer, that he would hear it, and commanded Demetrius forthwith to be called, with two of his oldest Friends, who were not privy to any animosity between the Brothers, and had been seldom of late at Court, namely Lyfimachus and Onomastus, to advise with. Whilst his Friends were a coming, he walked alone, (his Son standing at a distance) and revolved many thoughts within himself. When news was brought that they were come, he went into a private room with his two Friends, and as many of his Guard du Corps, giving his Sons leave to bring three men unarm'd in along with them. Where when he was late down; I, said he, sit here, one of the most miserable Fathers in the World, being my self to act the Judge between my two Sons (the one an accuser [of his Brother] for Parricidy, and the other the person accused) and like to find in my own Children the stain either of a feigned or a real crime. Truly I long ago was afraid of this approaching storm, when I saw your faces, which did not look like those of Brothers, and heard some words [that you had spoken of one another.] But yet sometimes I was in hopes, that your passions might abate, and your suspicions be clear'd up. [I knew] that even Enemies had laid aside their Arms, and made a League; as also, that the private pique of many men had been made an end of: [and therefore I hoped] that you would one day remember the fraternal relation that is between you; with that childish innocence and conversation that was formerly between you, and my Precepts too, which I am afraid I gave in vain to deaf Ears. How often have I, in your hearing, detesting the Examples of Brotherly discords, told you the horrid events thereof? whereby they had utterly ruined themselves, their Children, Families and whole Kingdoms? I have also fit you better Examples on the other side: viz. that the sociable agreement between the two Kings of the Lacedaemonians, was the support both of them and their Country for many Ages. That the same City, when the custom came up for every one to make himself King that could, was destroy'd. And at this day, how have these two Brothers, Eumenes and Attalus, from so small a beginning, that they were almost ashamed to call themselves Kings, made themselves equal to me, Antiochus, or any other King of this Age, by nothing more than Brotherly unanimity. Nay I did not omit even Roman Examples, which I had either seen or heard of: of T. and L. Quintius; who waged War against me: of P. and L. Scipio; who conquer'd Antiochus: of their Father and Uncle, whose perpetual concord all their life time was continu'd even in their deaths: but neither could the wickedness of the one, and the issue, which looked like wickedness, deter you from ill-natur'd discord: nor the good inclinations and good fortune of the other, persuade you to Friendship and Sobriety. Even now whilst I am living here before you, you both, by your wicked hopes and desires, already enter upon my estate: and wish that I may only live so long, till by surviving the one of you, I may make the other an undoubted King at my death. You cannot endure either a Brother or a Father. You have no love or reverence for any thing: but an insatiable appetite to be a King swallows up all other desires. Come on; profane your Fathers Ears, and try who shall lay most accusations upon the other, as you are like soon after to decide it with your Swords in your hands. Say openly, what either of truth you can, or what you can devise: my Ears are unlockt, which hereafter, when I have distinguish'd one of your crimes from the other, will be shut up. When he had said thus in a great heat, all the Company cry'd, and there was a sad silence for a great while.

- IX. Then Perseus spoke: "Yes no doubt of it; we should have open'd the Door in the night, let in the arm'd Rioters, and submitted our Throats to the Sword, since 'nothing' is believ'd but an action that's already committed; and that I am scandaliz'd as much, though there be wait laid for me, as though I were a Robber or an Assassin. They do not to no end declare, that you have but one Son, and that's Demetrius; and call me a Subject born of an Harlot. For if I had the esteem, and the love of a Son with you, you would not be severe upon me, who complain of ill designs that I have discover'd, but upon those, that had contrived them; nor would my life be of so little value to you, as that you should not be moved either with my past danger, or by my future; supposing that the intended Assassins go unpunish'd. Wherefore if it ought to die in silence, let us hold our Tongues, only desiring of the Gods, that the wicked design which began at me may end in me also, and that you may not be hit through my side. Now if as men who are circumvented when alone, by the direction of meer nature are taught to implore the assistance of men that they never saw before, so it be lawful for me also, seeing a Sword drawn against me, to cry out; I beg of you for your own sake, and as you are my Father (which name whether of us has most regard for, you long before now were sensible) that you would hear me so, as though raised up by my Cries and lamentations in the night time you had come into my assistance, and caught Demetrius with his arm'd Companions then in my Porch. What I would then have roared out, when upon that present occasion I was in a consternation, the same thing I complain of now, the next day."

"Brother!

"Brother! we have not lived a great while like men that used to Feast together: you have a mind to be King: but my Age obstructs that hope of yours, as does the Law of Nations also, the ancient usage of the Macedonians, and the judgment of my Father too. You cannot attain to it but through my blood. You endeavour and attempt all you can, 'tis true; but as yet either my care or fortune has hinder'd your Parricidy. Yesterday, at the lustration, the exercise, and imaginary Battle, you made it almost a mortal conflict; nor did any thing keep me from Death, save that I suffer'd my self and my men to be overcome. After that, from an hostile Engagement, as if it had been but a Brotherly sort of sport, you would have drawn me in to Sup with you. Do you believe, Father! that I should have sup'd among unarm'd persons, when there came arm'd men to Feast with me? Do you believe I was in no danger in the night time, whom they almost kill'd in the day, even whilst you looked on? Why camest thou at this time a night; what like an Enemy to one that was angry, or with Companions all girded with Swords? I durst not trust my self with you as a Guest, shall I entertain you when you come with arm'd men to Feast with me? If the Gate had been open, you must have been preparing for my Funeral, Father! at this time, that you hear me complaining to you. I do not say any thing maliciously, as an Accuser, nor from arguments make doubtful deductions. For what? Does he deny that he came to my Gate with a multitude? or that there were arm'd men with him? Pray send for those that I shall name. They indeed may dare to do all things, that durst do this; but yet they will not dare to deny it. If I, having laid hold of them within my threshold with their Swords in their hands, should have brought them to you, you would have thought it true: and therefore take them for as good as caught, when they confess it.

"Now Curse Ambition for the Kingdom, and heighten Brotherly rage: but let not your Execrations, Father! be blind; but discern and distinguish between an Assassin, and he that was designed upon. *** That he is guilty. He that would have kill'd his Brother, let him lie under the displeasure of his Fathers Gods: and let him that was like to fall by his Brothers wickedness, find a refuge in the Mercy and Justice of his Father. For whither else shall I fly, whom neither the solemn lustration of thy Army, the exercise of thy Souldiers, nor his own House, nor a Feast, nor the Night which was by nature kindness design'd for mortals to rest in, can secure? If I go upon his invitation to my Brother, I must die; if I receive my Brother to an entertainment within my Gate, I must die also. So that I cannot avoid his evil designs upon me either by going, or slaying. Whither shall I betake my self? I have paid homage to none, Father, but the Gods and you. I have not the Romans to fly to. They desired my destruction, because I am sorry for their injuries; because I am vext that so many Cities, so many Nations, and, now of late, that the Sea Coast of Thrace was taken from thee. They do not hope that Macedonia will be there, whilst either you or I am alive. If my Brothers wickedness take off me, and old Age you, or that they have not the patience to stay till that time; they know, that the King and Kingdom of Macedonia will be theirs. If the Romans had left you any thing out of Macedonia, I should believe that left as a receptacle for me also. But there is security enough [you'll say] among the Macedonians. You saw yesterday the Souldiers violence against me. What did they lack, but Swords? But that which they wanted in the day, my Brothers guests took up in the Night. What should I speak of great part of the Nobility, who have reposed all their hopes of honour and Fortune in the Romans, and in him, who can do what he pleases with the Romans? Nor do they only prefer that [Boy] before me, who am his Elder Brother, but almost even before you, that are his King and Father: For 'tis he [forsooth] upon whose account the Senate remitted your penalty; who now protects you from the Roman Arms; and think fit that your Age should be obliged and obnoxious to his Youth. For him the Romans stickle; for his sake all the Cities were freed from thy command, and all the Macedonians too, that enjoy the Roman Peace. But for me, Father, what hopes or security is there, save in you only?

"What do you think is the design of that Letter which T. Quintius just now sent you, in which he says, that you did your self great Service, in sending your Son Demetrius to Rome: and advises you, to send him again with more Embassadors, and those the chief men of Macedonia too? T. Quintius is at present his Counsellor, and Master in all affairs. He hath renounced you, as a Father, and taken him in your stead. There first of all their sacred designs are contrived. And now they seek assistance to carry on their Counsels; when he advises thee to send more, and those the best men in Macedonia along with him. They that go hence entire, and sincere to Rome, believing that they have Philip for their King, return from thence ting'd and infected by Roman Arts. Demetrius with them is all in all; and him they call King, though his Father be yet alive. Now if I resent these things, I ought immediately to hear, not only from others, but from you, Father, also an accusation against ambition for a Kingdom. But I, if it be laid to my charge, do not acknowledge it. For whom do I put out of his place, that I may succeed him my self? My Father is the only person before me; and that he may long be so, I beseech

"the

X.

IX.

"the Gods. May I so survive him, if I deserve it, as he would have me. If my Father deliver to me the Inheritance of the Kingdom, I'll take it. But he desires the Kingdom, and that wickedly too, who hastens to leap over the order of Age, of nature, the Macedonian Customs, and the Law of nature. His elder Brother, to whom the Kingdom not only of right, but according to the will of his Father belongs, stands in his way. I'll take him off [says Demetrius]; I shall not be the first man that has got a Crown by killing of a Brother. My Father being an old man, and alone, when he has lost his Son, will be more afraid upon his own account, than to revenge his Sons death. The Romans will rejoice at it, and defend the fact. These, Father, are uncertain, but not vain hopes. For so the case stands; you may remove all danger of life from me, by punishing those, who took up Swords to kill me: but if he should second their wickedness, thou couldst not revenge my death.

XII. When Perseus had made an end of speaking, the Eyes of them, that were present, were set upon Demetrius, as though he had been going immediately to answer him. But for a good while they were all silent; till mere necessity at last (though they all saw that before he could not speak for crying) overcame his grief; and, since he was bid to speak, [Demetrius] thus began: "All those things which formerly have been the greatest help to persons accused, my Accuser, Father, hath anticipated. For by pretended tears [shed] in order to anothers ruine, he hath render'd all my real tears suspected to you. Though he himself, ever since I came back from Rome, hath plotted against me in private Cabals with his Accomplices, day and night; yet he fixes upon me the character not only of an Assassin, but of barefaced Robber and Murderer. He affrights you with his own danger, that he may hasten the destruction of his innocent Brother by your means. He says, he hath no place of refuge in all the World, that I may not have any hopes left even with you. He loads me, who am circumvented, alone, and helpless, with the Envy of foreign favour, which is more a disadvantage than a kindness to me. And how maliciously does he bring that in; when he mingles the action of this night with an ineffective against the rest of my life? that he might not only make you suspect this business, (of which you shall know the truth) by the other tenour of my life; but also might support that vain accusation touching my hopes, inclinations and designs by this nocturnal, feigned and contrived argument. He likewise studied to make the accusation appear sudden and unpremeditated; as though it had arisen from this nights unexpected fear and tumult. But, Perseus, you ought, if I had been a Traytor to my Father and the Kingdom; if I had enter'd into Conspiracies with the Romans or any others, who were my Fathers Enemies, not to have expected the story of this night, but accused me of Treason before this time: but if that distinct from this had been a vain accusation, and would have shew'd your Envy against me more than my crime, you ought even now to have omitted it, or deferr'd it to another time: that the World might see, whether I had laid wait for you, or you for me by a new and peculiar sort for malice. Yet I, as well as I can in this sudden disorder, will separate what you have confounded: and will discover the design of this night to be either yours or mine. He would have you believe, that I had a design to kill him, that so, when my Elder Brother was taken off, who, by the Law of Nations, the custom of Macedonia, and according to your judgment (as he says) is to have the Crown, I, the younger, might succeed into his place, whom I had murder'd. What then is the meaning of that other part of his Oration, in which he says that I court the Romans, and that, in confidence of them, I am put into some hopes of the Kingdom? For if I believ'd that the Romans were so powerful, that they could make whom they pleas'd King of Macedonia, and trusted so much in the favour that they had for me; what need was there to kill my Brother? Was it, that I might wear a Diadem embred in my Brothers blood? That I might be execrable and hateful to those very men, of whom by my real, or at least my counterfeit probity, I have gain'd so much good will, if any peradventure they have for me? unless you believe that T. Quintius, by whose instigation and advice you say I am now govern'd, though he himself live in so much amity with his own Brother, advis'd me to murder mine. He also hath collected not only the kindness of the Romans, but the judgments of the Macedonians, with the consent of almost all the Gods and Men, whereby to make it credible that he shall not be equal to me in the contest; and yet, as though I were weaker than him in all other things, pretends that I fled to the last refuge of wickedness. Would you have this to be the conclusion of the case; that which of us two was afraid, lest the other should seem more worthy of the Kingdom, he should be thought to have had a design to kill his Brother?

XIII. "But let us pursue by all means the order of this contrived accusation. He says, that he hath been aimed at several ways: and hath brought all those methods of destruction in to the compass of one day. I design'd to kill him in the day time after the Lustration, when we engaged, and that, forsooth, on the Lustration day: I design'd, when I invited him to Supper (as he's pleas'd to tell you) to poyson him: I design'd, when I came to be merry with him, and had some men following me with Swords, to murder him. You "see, what reasons I chose to commit Parricidy in [times] of sport, feasting and merriment. What day? What sort of a day? Why that whereon the Army was survey'd and purified; whereon the Royal Arms of all the Macedonian Kings that ever were, being carry'd before us between the divided Victim, we two alone, by their sides, Father, march'd before, and an Army of Macedonians follow'd us. When I was purified and expiated by this Sacrifice, though I had done that before which deserv'd to be atoned for; yet even at that time especially when I saw the Victim lye near the way where we march'd, was meditating upon that Parricidy, that Poyson, and those Swords which were prepared against that Feast. Pray with what other holy rites should I afterward have purg'd my mind, which was so contaminated with all sorts of wickedness? But his Soul being blinded by a desire to accuse me [right or wrong] whilst he would render all things suspicious, confounds one thing with another. For if I design'd to take you off at Supper by Poyson, what was less convenient, than by a resolute Engagement in the Field, to make you angry? so that you might justly refuse to come to Supper (as you did) though invited? Now, since you in anger deny'd me, was it my best way to endeavour to appease you, that I might have another opportunity, seeing I had once prepared the Poyson; or was it better to quit that design for another; to kill you with a Sword, and even that day too, under pretence of making merry with you? But why, if I thought you avoided my Supper for fear of death, did I not suppose you would avoid my Entertainment [or Banquet] after upon account of the same fear?

"see

"I am not ashamed, Father, to own it, if I did take a dose of Wine more than ordinary, among my Companions, upon such an holy day [as that was]: but I desire you also to inquire, with what mirth, with what sport the Feast was yesterday kept at my House; to which that joy (which you perhaps may think amiss of) made some addition; that in the youthful conflict with Arms, our side had not the worst on't. This misfortune and fear of my life] soon dispelled the strength of the Wine, which if they had not intervened, our Assassins would have been all drunk and asleep. If I had been to have storm'd thy House, and, when I had taken that, to have kill'd the Master of it, would I not have refrained from Wine for one day? Would I not have kept my Souldiers front it? But lest I only should defend my self with too much simplicity, my good Brother also, who is not at all suspicious, tell you, I know nothing else, nor argue any thing; save that they came to my House with Swords. If I should ask you, how you know that to be true: you must of necessity confess, either that my House was full of their Spies, or that they took up their Swords so openly, that all people might see them. And lest he might seem either before to have inquir'd into any thing; or now maliciously to have argu'd, he bad you ask of them whom he had named, whether they had Swords or no? that, as in a doubtful matter, when you had ask'd them that, which they confess, they be lookt upon as persons convicted. But indeed you [Brother] bid that question be ask'd; Whether they took Swords along with them to kill you? Whether by my advice and knowledge? For that's what you'd be at; and not what they confess and is evident; to wit (as they say) that they took them for their own defence. Whether they did well or ill in it, they must give an account of their own actions. Do not you mingle my case with theirs, that hath no relation to it; or declare, whether we were design'd to set upon you openly or privately. If openly, why had we not all Swords? why no body, besides them, who beat thy Spy? If privately, what order was there observ'd in the design? That when the Feast was over, and I was gone away drunk, four men should have staid behind to set upon thee when thou wast asleep? how must they have lost their aim, being strangers belonging to me, and most of all suspected, for having been in a quarrel a little before? or how could they have escaped, when they had kill'd thee? Could thy House have been storm'd and taken with four Swords?

"But you, [Perseus] omitting this nocturnal story, return to that which you are sorry for, and enflames your Envy. Why [say you] Demetrius! is there any mention ever made of thy being King? Why are you thought by some men a person, fitter to be your Fathers Successor than I am? Why dost thou render my hope (which if thou wert not in being, would be certain) doubtful and solicitous! Thus Perseus thinks, though he does not say so: this makes him my Enemy and Accuser: these things fill your Kingdom [Father] with informations and suspicions. Now I, Father, as I neither ought at present to hope for the Crown, nor perchance never contend for it, because I am an younger Brother, and because you are pleas'd that I should submit to my Elder; so neither ought I either before, or now so to behave my self, as to seem unworthy to be your Son, or of any esteem among all other men. For so I shall be lookt upon, not for my modesty, but for my Vice, in not yielding to him to whom in justice and equity I ought. You tell me of the Romans: and those things that should be my glory, you make my crime. I never desired to be deliver'd as an Hostage to the Romans, nor to be sent Embassador to Rome. When I was sent by you, I did not refuse to go. And both times I so behaved my self, as not to shame you, your Kingdom, or the Nation of the Macedonians. Wherefore you, Father, were the cause of my Friendship with the Romans. As long as you have

M m m m m

"Peace

"Peace with them, I will also be your Friend: but whensoever a War begins, I, who was formerly no useless Hostage or Embassadour for my Father, will be your bitterest Enemy. Nor do I desire, that, at this time, the favour of the Romans should stand me in any stead; I only beg it may do me no hurt. It neither began in War, nor is it reserv'd for a War. I was a pledge for Peace, and sent Embassadour to maintain Peace. Let neither of those things be reckon'd, either my honour or my crime. If I have done any thing impiously against you, Father, or wickedly against my Brother, I don't desire any Pardon. If I am innocent, I beg, that I may not be loaded with Envy, since I cannot with [just] accusations. My Brother does not accuse me first here this day; but I am the first that he accuses openly and for nothing. If my Father were angry with me, it would become you [Perseus] who are my elder Brother, to beg pardon for me, and excuse the errors of my youth: but in that which should be my security, lies my destruction. I was snatcht from Feasting and Drinking, almost half a-sleep to make my defence [upon an accusation] of Parricide: and am forced, without any Advocates, without any Patrons, to speak for my self. If I had been to speak for another, I would have taken time to study and compose an Oration, when I had nothing else to lose but the reputation of my wit. But now, being altogether ignorant upon what score I was sent for, I [came and] heard you angry, bidding me make my defence, and my Brother accuse me. He made a Speech which he prepared and studied a long time before against me; whilst I had only that time in which I was accused to think what I should say. Should I in that short space have hearken'd to my Accuser? or consider'd of my defence? Being amazed at the sudden and unexpected misfortune, I could scarce understand what was objected against me, much less do I well know how to clear my self. What hopes could I have, had I not my Father for my Judge? Before whom though I am outdone by my Elder Brother in point of love, yet I ought not to be, (as a person accused) in point of compassion. For I pray, that you may preserve your self for mine and your own sake too. He desires that you would kill me for his security. What then do you imagine he'll do to me, when you deliver the Kingdom to him, who thinks that even now, he ought to be gratified with my blood?"

XVI. As he said this, his sorrow at the same time stopp'd both his breath and mouth. Philip, commanding them to withdraw, when he had discours'd some little while with his Friends, declar'd; That he would not decide their Controversy by words only, or the Debate of one hour, but by inquiring into each of their Lives, Manners, Words and Actions, and observing them in small as well as great things: inasmuch that it was evident to them all, that the crime [charg'd upon him] for last Nights [work] was easily taken for truth; and that Demetrius's great Friendship with the Romans was much suspected. These Seeds, as it were, were sown whilst Philip was alive, of a Macedonian War, which was to be waged chiefly against Perseus. Both the Consuls went into Liguria, which at that time was the only Consular Province. And because they there met with good success, there was a Supplication appointed for one day. There came about two thousand Ligurians to the utmost Borders of the Province of Gaul, where Marcellus was Encamped, desiring to be received. Marcellus, having commanded the Ligurians to tarry in the same place, consulted the Senate by a Letter: to which the Senate order'd M. Ogulnius, the Prætor, to send for an Answer; That it was more reasonable, the Consuls, whose Province it was, should determine, what was for the good of the Commonwealth, than they. That at that juncture they did not think fit, that the Ligurians should be taken in by surrender, and have their Arms thereupon taken from them: but that the Senate judg'd it to be meet, that they should be referr'd to the Consuls. At the same time the Prætors came, P. Manlius, into the farther Spain, which he had also govern'd in his former Prætorship; and Q. Fulvius Flaccus into the hither, where he receiv'd the Army from Terentius. For the farther was destitute of a Governour by the death of P. Sempronius the Pro-Prætor. The Celtiberians set upon Fulvius Flaccus, as he was besieging a Spanish Town, call'd Urbicua. There they had several sharp Engagements: in which there were many Roman Souldiers wounded and kill'd. But Fulvius by his resolution got the better of it, in that he could not by any means be forced from the Siege: and the Celtiberians, tired out with several Battles, march'd away. Thereupon the City, when their Reliefs were gone, within few dayes was taken and plunder'd; and the Prætor gave the spoil to the Souldiers. Fulvius having taken this Town, and P. Manlius, having only muster'd up the Army into one Body, which before was scatter'd (without doing any other remarkable action) carry'd the Armies into their Winter-Quarters. These things were done that Summer in Spain. Terentius, who was come home out of that Province, enter'd the City Ovant: and brought in nine thousand three hundred and twenty pounds of silver; eighty pounds of gold, and two golden Crowns of sixty seven pounds.

XVII. The same year the Romans were Arbitrators concerning part of their Dominions then in Debate between the People of Carthage, and King Massinissa. Massinissa's Father, Gala had taken it from the Carthaginians: but Syphax had put Gala out of possession, and given it back to the Carthaginians as a present for the sake of his Father-in-Law Asdrubal: and Massinissa that year had again driven the Carthaginians thence. This Debate was managed before the Romans with no less heat, than when they engaged with their Swords in the Field. The Carthaginians demanded it, because it had originally belong'd to their Ancestors, yea and afterward came to them again by means of Syphax. Massinissa said, that he had only retaken a Territory that belong'd to his Fathers Kingdom, and kept it by the Law of Nations; being superiour [to them] both in the cause and the possession of it: and that he feared nothing else in that dispute, than, lest the modesty of the Romans, whilst they were tender of indulging a King, who was their Ally and Friend against both his and their common Enemies, should be a disadvantage to him. The Embassadours did not change the right of possession; but refer'd the whole matter to the Senate at Rome. In Liguria there was nothing afterward done: for they retired first into pathless Woods, and then dismissing their Army, got away privately into Villages and Castles all over the Country. The Consuls too had a mind to disband their Army, and consulted the Senate about it; who order'd the one of them to disband his Army and come to Rome to create Magistrates for the [ensuing] year, and the other to Winter with his Legions at Pise. There was a Report, that the Transalpine Gauls were arming their young men; but no body knew, into what part of Italy that multitude would pour it self. The Consuls so agreed between themselves, that Cn. Babius should go to hold the Assembly [at Rome] because M. Babius his Brother stood for the Consulate.

The Assembly therefore for chosing of Consuls was held: in which there were created XVIII. for Consuls P. Cornelius Cethegus, and M. Babius Tamphilus. After them the Prætors were chosen [namely] the two Q. Fabius's (Maximus, and Buteo) C. Claudius Nero, Q. Petillius Spurius, M. Pinarus Posca, and L. Dronius: to all whom, when they enter'd upon their Offices, there were allotted these Provinces. The Consuls had Liguria, and of the Prætors, Q. Petillius the City, Q. Fabius Maximus the Foreign [Jurisdiction] Q. Fabius Buteo Gaul, C. Claudius Nero Sicily, M. Pinarus Sardinia, and L. Dronius Apulia; to which the Istrians were added, because the Tarentines and Brundisians brought word, that the Sea-Coasts [thereabout] were infested by Pirates from Foreign parts. The Massilians made the same complaint concerning the Ligurians. Then the Armies were settled: four Legions to the Consuls, which were to consist of five thousand, that should be two hundred of them Roman Foot, with three hundred Horse, and fifteen thousand of the Allies and Latines with eight hundred Horse. In the Spains the old Prætors had their Commissions continu'd to them, with the Armies which they had: and for a Supplement there were allow'd three thousand Roman Citizens with two hundred Horse, of the Latine Allies six thousand Foot and three hundred Horse. Nor was the care of the Navy omitted: for the Consuls were order'd to create a Duumvirate [i. e. two Officers] for that purpose, by whom twenty Ships launch'd out from the Docks of their Allies, were to be fill'd with Roman Citizens, that had been Slaves; and that none but Freeborn persons should command them. The Sea-Coast was so divided between the Duumviri, to be defended with ten Ships [a piece,] that the Cape of Minerva was as it were the hidge in the middle, and the one of them secur'd all to the right as far as Massilia, as the other did all to the left as far as Barrum.

There were many strange Prodigies that year, not only seen at Rome, but related from abroad. In the Court of Vulcan and Concord it rained blood, and the High-Priests brought word that the Spears moved; and that at Lavinium Juno Sospita's Statue cry'd: Besides, that there was so great a pestilence in the Country, Corporations, Burroughs, and in the City too, that they [who had the care of Funerals] could hardly bury the dead. The Senate being much concern'd at these Prodigies and this mortality, decreed, that not only the Consuls should sacrifice with the greater sort of Victims to what Gods they thought fit, but that the Duumviri also should consult their Books. By their order there was a Supplication appointed for one day through all the Temples in Rome. By their advise also the Senate voted, and the Consuls set forth an Edict, that there should be a Supplication, and Holy-dayes kept through all Italy for three dayes together. The Pestilence was so strong, that when (by reason of the revolt of the Corfians, and that the Illyrians had rais'd a War in Sardinia) the Senate had order'd that eight thousand Latine Foot, and three hundred Horse should be rais'd, for M. Pinarus the Prætor to take over with him into Sardinia, there were such a multitude of men dead, and the Consuls sent word there were so many sick in all parts, that they could not make up that number of Souldiers. The Prætor therefore was order'd to take what men were wanting, of Cn. Babius the Pro-Consul, who Winter'd at Pise; and from thence to cross over into Sardinia. L. Dronius the Prætor, who happen'd to have the Province of Apulia, was injoin'd likewise to make inquiry into the Bacchanalia, whereof some remaining Seeds, as it were, appear'd since the former mischiefs in the year last past. But those Inquisitions were rather begun by L. Puppis the Prætor, than brought to any issue. The Senate therefore bid the new Prætor cut that [letter] off, lest it should creep any further. Then the Consuls also, by authority from the Senate, propos'd to the people Laws concerning canvassing for Offices.

Then they brought the several Embassadours into the Senate; first those from King Eumenes, Ariarathes the Cappadocian, and Pharnaces of Pontus: who had no other Answer, then that the Senate would send certain Deputies to inquire into and determine their Controversies. After them, the Embassadours from the banish'd Lacedæmonians and Acheans were

M m m m m 2

XX:

were introduced; and the banish'd men had some hopes given them, that the Senate would write to the Acheans, to restore them. The Acheans discours'd of the retaking of Atene, and how matters were settled there, with satisfaction to the Senate. There came likewise two Embassadors from Philip, King of Macedonia, named Philocles and Apelles, upon no business, in which the Senate was to be their assistance; they being sent more to spy, and inquire concerning those Correspondencies with the Romans, of which Perseus had accused Demetrius; and especially of those held with T. Quintius against his Brother, touching the Kingdom. These men the King had sent, as persons indifferent, that were not inclined to favour either side: but indeed they were not only instruments but Partners too in the contrivance of Perseus against his Brother. Demetrius, being ignorant of all things, except his Brothers wickedness, that had lately broken out, at first had not any great hopes, though some he had, that he might reconcile his Father. But after that, he every day had less and less confidence in his Fathers affection, since he saw his Ears so besieged (as it were) by his Brother. Wherefore looking narrowly to his words and actions, for fear of encreasing any Bodies suspicions [of him] he so far abstained from any mention of, or contagion of Romans, that he would not so much as let them write to him; because he found that by that sort of accusations his [Fathers] mind was most exasperated [against him].

XXI.

At the same time Philip, lest his Souldiers should grow useless by being idle, and also to remove all suspicions of his being about to raise a War against the Romans, having appointed his Army to Rendezvous at Stobi in Paonia, went on and led them into Medica [a Region of Thrace]. He had a desire to get to the top of the Mountain Amus; because he believ'd a vulgar opinion, that the Pontick and the Adriatick Seas, together with the River Ister and the Alps, might [from thence] be seen all at once: and that those things being all in his view, would be of no small importance toward his design of a Roman War. He therefore having enquired of people, that knew the Country, about the way up to the top of Amus, and it being agreed upon by all of them, that there was no way for an Army, and that the passage would prove very difficult for a few, though the nimblest Fellow he had; he, to cajole his younger Son with familiar Discourse, because he resolv'd not to take him along with him, ask'd him; Since the difficulty of their passage was so great, whether it were better to persist in his design, or quit it? But if he went on, he could not in these circumstances forget Antigonus: who being tost in a dreadful storm, when he had all his Family with him in the same Ship, was said to have commanded his Children, not only themselves to remember, but likewise to tell their Posterity, that none of them should dare to hazard themselves and their whole Family in one bottom. That he therefore, since he remembered that Precept, would not run the risque of losing two Sons at one throw (as it were of a Die; but, because he had a mind to take the elder along with him, would send his younger Son back into Macedonia, as a reserve to his hopes, and to secure the Kingdoms. Demetrius was not ignorant that he was sent away, lest he should be privy to his design; when, in sight of the places [his Father] consulted, which was the nearest way to the Adriatick Sea and to Italy, and how he should manage the ensuing War. But he thought fit at that time not only to obey his Father, but to shew a greater readiness than ordinary, lest by his unwillingness to obey he might have caused a [farther] suspicion. Now that his passage into Macedonia might be secure, Didas, one of the Kings Prætors, who was Governour of Paonia, was order'd to attend him with a small Guard. Him also Perseus had drawn in (as well as a great many more of his Fathers Favourites, ever since all people were fully satisfied, to whom the King inclined to leave the Inheritance of the Kingdom) to be one of the number of them that conspired his Brothers Death. He therefore at that time commanded him, that he should by all manner of address insinuate himself as much as possible into his favour, that he might find out all his secrets, and pry into his most hidden thoughts. So Demetrius departed with a Guard more dangerous to him, than if he had gone alone.

XXII.

Philip, having first march'd over Medica, and then through the Deserts that lie between that and Amus, came at last the seventh day to the Foot of the Hill. Where having staid one day to chuse out such men as he designed to take with him, the third day he began his Journey. His task at the bottom of the Hills was easy; but the higher they got, they met with places which were more and more Woody, besides that many of them were pathless also. After that they came to a dark way, where through the thicknes of the Trees and the Boughs, being woven one into another, they could hardly discern the Sky. But when they came near the top, (which is seldom seen in other places) all things were so covered with Clouds, that they were retarded as though they travelled by Night, and the third day they arrived at the very top. When they came thence, they did not at all contradict the common opinion; more, I suppose, lest the vanity of their Journey should have been exposed, than that several distant Seas, Mountains and Rivers could be seen from that one place. They were all tired, and, above the rest the King, who was very old, with the difficulty of the passage. When therefore he had sacrificed there upon two Altars, dedicated to Jupiter and the Sun; he, who had been three dayes a going up, came down in two, fearing the nocturnal Colds most of all, which there even in the Dog-Days was like to that of Winter [in other places.] Having struggled all that time with many difficulties difficulties he found no greater pleasure in his Camp: where there was the greatest scarcity that could be, as being in a Region, enclosed on every side with Deserts. Wherefore having staid only one day to rest them who had been with him, he march'd, as though he had fled, in all hast into the Country of the Dentheletes. They were his Allies; but yet the Macedonians, by reason of their necessity plunder'd them, as though they had been Enemies. For they ravaged and laid wast, first all the Country Houses round about, and some Villages too, to the great shame of the King; when he heard the Voices of his Allies, in vain imploring [the aid of] all the Gods [that had the care] of Allies, and calling upon his own name also. Having taken away Corn from thence, he went back into Medica and attack'd a City, which they call Petra, pitching his Camp upon the Plain Avenue. But he sent his Son Perseus about with a small Party, to assault the Town from the higher ground. The Townsmen, since terror beset them all around, having given Hostages, for the present surrender'd themselves: though, when the Army was retired, they, having forgot their Hostages, left their City, and fled into fortified places and the Mountain. Philip, seeing his Souldiers were tired with all sorts of toil, without any effect, and now, that his suspicions against his Son were increased by the treachery of the Prætor Didas, return'd into Macedonia.

For this person who (as I told you before) was sent to attend [Demetrius] having gain'd upon the simplicity of the young Prince, who was unwary, and not without reason very angry with his Relations) by flattering him, and pretending himself to be concern'd for his condition (freely offering his service in all adventures whatsoever) upon promise to be true to him discover'd his secrets. Demetrius designed to fly to the Romans: for which purpose he thought the Governour of Paonia sent by Heaven to be his Assistant: through whose Province he hoped he might safely escape. This design was presently betray'd to his Brother, and by him discover'd to his Father. First there was a Letter brought to him, as he was besieging Petra: whereupon Herodorus (who was the chief of Demetrius's Friends) was put into Prison, and Demetrius order'd to be so kept, as that he might think himself at liberty. These things, besides others, made the Kings coming into Macedonia very melancholy. But though he was much concern'd at the present accusations [made against Demetrius]; yet he thought fit to expect them, whom he had sent to inquire into all affairs at Rome. When he had spent some Months in anxiety upon this account, at last the Embassadors came, though all things were ready contrived before-hand in Macedonia which they should say. They (besides other wicked actions) brought the King a sham Letter, sign'd with a counterfeit Seal, as from T. Quintius: in which there was a request made; That if the young man, through his over-weening desire to be King, had held any correspondence with him, he would do nothing against any one of his own Children: and that he was not such a person, as could be thought likely to be the author of any impious design. This Letter gave credit to Perseus's accusations. Wherefore Herodorus immediately, having been long tortur'd, dy'd in torment without discovering any thing of the matter.

XXIII.

Then Perseus accused Demetrius a second time to his Father, for designing to fly through Paonia: besides, that certain persons also, who were corrupted to be his Companions, came in against him. But the counterfeit Letter from T. Quintius stuck most upon him. Yet there was no solemn Sentence given openly against him; to the end, that he might rather be privately destroy'd; though that was done, not out of regard to him, but lest his punishment should discover their designs against the Romans. Now therefore, though he himself was to go from Thessalonica to Demetrius, he sent Demetrius to Asterium in Paonia, with the same Didas for his Companion: and Perseus to Amphipolis, to receive the Thracian Hostages. But as Didas was going away from him, they say, he gave him Orders, to kill his Son. Accordingly Didas either made, or at least pretended to make a Sacrifice, to the Celebration of which Demetrius being invited, came from Asterium to Heraclea. At that Feast they say, he gave [Demetrius] Poyson; which as soon as he had drunk up the Cup, he soon perceiv'd. Thereupon being presently very sick, he left the Room, and retiring into his Bed-Chamber, in great torment, complain'd of his Fathers Cruelty, his Brothers Parricidy, and Didas's Treachery. With that, one Thyrus, a Straberean, and one Alexander, a Berrean, throwing Carpets over his Head and Mouth, stopt his breath. So the innocent Youth was made away with by Enemies, that were not content to let him dye even a single death.

XXIV.

Whilst these things were transacted in Macedonia, L. Aemilius Paulus, having his Commission continu'd to him, though he were out of his consulate, in the beginning of the Spring brought his Army into the Country of the Inganni, who are a people of Liguria. When he first Encamp'd in the Confinis of the Enemy; there came Embassadors to him as Spies, though they pretended to desire a Peace. Whereupon when Paulus deny'd that he would make any Peace with them but upon their surrender; they did not so much refuse that, as they said, that it would require time, to perswade the Country sort of people. For which end, there was a Truce granted of ten dayes; but they then desired, that the Souldiers might not go to Forage, and fetch Wood beyond the Mountains next to their Camp. For those cultivated places were part of their Territories. Which when they had obtain'd; they muster'd up all their their Army behind those very Mountains, from whence they had fore-closed the Enemy, and immediately with a great multitude began at once to attack the Roman Camp, at every Gate. They assaulted it as hard as they could for one whole day: insomuch that the Romans had not so much as time to carry forth their Ensigns, nor room to set their men in Array. Wherefore they stood thick in the Gates, and defended their Camp more by resisting than by fighting. About Sun-setting, when the Enemy was retired, he sent two Horsemen with a Letter to Cn. Babius the Pro-Consul at Pise, [to desire him] that he would come with all speed to his relief, who was besieged in the time of a Truce. Babius had deliver'd his Army to M. Pinarus, who was going into Sardinia. But he not only sent the Senate word by Letter, that L. Æmilius was besieged by the Ligurians: but he likewise wrote to M. Claudius Marcellus, who govern'd the next Province from thence [to advise him] that, if he thought fit he should carry over his Army out of Gaul into Liguria, and free L. Æmilius from the Siege. But these Auxiliaries were like to come too late. The Ligurians next day return'd to their Camp. Æmilius, because he knew they would come, though he could have led his men into the Field, kept within his Bullwark, to protract the business till such time as Babius could come with his Army from Pise.

XXV.

XXVI. Babius Letter caused a great consternation at Rome; and that so much the greater, in that, some few days after, Marcellus, having deliver'd his Army to Fabius, came to Rome, and took away all their hopes, that the Army, which was in Gaul, could be brought over into Liguria, because there was a War with the Istrians, who hinder'd the Colony to be carry'd to Aquileia: [saying] that Fabius was gone thither, nor could he return now the War was begun. That hope of relief too (which was the only hope they had) was more slow than the time it self required, if so be the Consuls hasten'd to go into their Province. Which that they might do, the Senators, every man of them, cry'd out upon them. But the Consuls said, They would not go before they had made an end of their Levy; nor was it their fault, but the force of the distemper, that made them be so long about it; yet they could not withstand the general consent of the Senate, but were forced to set forth in their Warlike Garb, and appoint the Souldiers, whom they had raised, a day to Rendezvous at Pise. They had leave, wherever they came, immediately to muster up tumultuary Souldiers, and take them along with them. The Prætors also, Q. Petillius, and Q. Fabius were order'd; Petillius, presently to raise two Legions of Roman Citizens, and to swear all of them, that were under fifty years of age: and Fabius to require of the Latine Allies fifteen thousand Foot, and eight hundred Horse. There were two Naval Officers created, namely, C. Mutinius, and C. Lucretius, and Ships provided for them: whereof Mutinius, whose Province was the Gallick Bay, was commanded, to bring his Fleet as soon as possible to the Coast of Liguria; if he might be any way serviceable to L. Æmilius and his Army.

XXVII. Æmilius, seeing there was no hopes of aid from any hand, believed his Horsemen were intercepted, and therefore thinking, he ought not any longer to defer the business, but to try his own fortune, before the Enemy came, who now attack'd [him] much more slowly and heartlessly [than before]; set his Army in Battalia at the four Gates, that upon the signal being given they might sally out on every side at once. To the four extraordinary [select] Regiments he added two; of whom he made M. Valerius, his Lieutenant, Commander; and order'd them to sally out at the extraordinary [Prætorian] Gate. At the principal Gate on the right hand he marshall'd the Spear-men of the first Legion, placing the Principes [or second division] of the same Legion in the Rear. Of these M. Servilius, and L. Sulpicius, Tribunes of the Souldiers, were made Commanders. The third Legion was set in Battalia against the left principal Gate; with this alteration only, that the Principes stood in the Front, and the Spear-men in the Rear: and this Legion was Commanded by Sea. Julius Caesar, and L. Aurelius Cotta, Tribunes of the Souldiers. Q. Fulvius Flaccus, the Lieutenant, was posted at the Questors Gate with the right Wing, two Regiments and the Triarii of two Legions being order'd to stay in defence of the Camp. Then the General himself went about and made an Harangue at every Gate, and by what provocations soever he could, whetted on the indignation of the Souldiers: one while accusing the treachery of the Enemy, who, though they desired Peace, and though they had a Truce granted them, yet even in the very time of that Truce, came to attack the Camp: another, telling them, what a shame it was, that the Roman Army should be besieged by the Ligurian (rather than Enemies) Robbers. With what face can any of you (if you escape hence by help of others, and not by your own Valour) meet (I do not say, those Souldiers, who conquer'd Annibal, Philip, or Antiochus, the greatest Kings and Generals of our Age, but) those men, who formerly pursu'd and kill'd these very Ligurians, as they ran from them through their pathless Woods, like Sheep? Shall a Ligurian Enemy come up to a Roman Bullwark; when a Spanish, a Gallick, a Macedonian, or a Carthaginian Foe dare not? Shall they now besiege us of their own accord, who formerly lay lurking in the devious Woods, where though we search'd so narrowly for them, they were hardly to be found? Upon this the Souldiers set up a general Huzza, and said; It was no fault of the Souldiers; who had no signal given them to sally forth: but if he would have given them notice, he should find, that the Ligurians and the Romans were still the same men, as before.

XXVIII. There were two Camps of the Ligurians on this side the Mountains: from which at first they they all march'd forth by Sun rising, composed, and in Battalia: but then they took not up their Arms before they were well satisfied with Meat and Wine; and went out scatter'd and in disorder; as having certain hopes, that the Enemy would not bring their Ensigns without their Bulwark. Against them therefore, as they came in such a confused manner, the Romans, who were in the Camp, setting up an universal Huzza, (all of them, even to the Snapack-Boys and Scullions) sally'd out at every Gate. Which so surprized the Ligurians, that they trembled, as though they had been circumvented by an Ambuscade. For a little time there was some show of a fight; but soon after they fled as fast as they could drive, and were kill'd (many of them in their flight: the Horsemen having a signal given them, to mount their Horses, and let no Soul escape: so they were all forced into their Camp in great consternation, and afterward even from thence too. There were that day slain above fifteen thousand Ligurians, and two thousand five hundred taken. Three days all the whole Nations of the Ingaurian Ligurians gave Hostages, and surrender'd themselves. The Masters of Ships and Mariners were then taken up, who had been Pirates, and all put into Prison: of whose Ships C. Matienius, the Duumvir, had taken thirty two upon the Coast of Liguria. L. Aurelius Cotta, and C. Sulpicius Gallus were sent to Rome to carry this news, and a Letter to the Senate: and at the same time to desire, that L. Æmilius, having totally settled the Province, might come away, bring with him the Souldiers and disband them. Both these requests were granted by the Senate, and a supplication was appointed to be made for three days in all the Temples; besides that the Prætors were order'd, Petillius, to dismiss the City Legions, and Fabius, to put a stop to the Levy of the Allies and Latines: and also, that the City Prætor should write to the Consuls, That the Senate thought fit, the tumultuary Souldiers raised upon a sudden insurrection should be disbanded as soon as possible.

XXIX. The Colony of Gravisea was that year carried into that part of the Tuscan Territories, which was formerly taken from the Tarquinius: and five Acres [of Land] given [to each Planter.] The three persons that carried them thither were C. Calpurnius Piso, P. Claudius Pulcher, and C. Terentius Istra. This Year was remarkable for great drought and scarcity of Fruits: for they say, it never rained for six months together. The same Year, in a field belonging to L. Petillius (a Notary) under Janiculum, as the Husbandmen were digging (a little too deep) they found two stone Chests about eight foot long, and four foot broad, whereof the Lids were fasten'd down with Lead. Each Chest was written upon with Latine Letters; that in the one, Numa Pompilius, the Son of Pompo, and King of the Romans, was buried; and that in the other were the Books of Numa Pompilius. Which Chests when, by the advice of his Friends, the Lord [of the soil] had open'd; that which had the name of being the Kings Coffin, was found empty, without any sign of an humane Body, or any thing else, all being wasted by the long Consumption of so many years. In the other Chest there were two Bundles, bound about with wax'd and pitch'd Cords, which had in them each seven Books, not only entire, but that lookt very fresh too. Seven of which were Latine, concerning the Priviledges and Authority of the High-Priests; and the other seven Greek, touching the Philosophy that could be in that Age. Valerius Antias says, they were Pythagorean Books: pinning his Belief upon that common Opinion, and plausible Lye, that Numa was an Auditor to Pythagoras. These Books were read, first, by his Friends, that were there present, but soon after, when several other people had, and they were grown common; Q. Petillius, the City Prætor, being desirous to read them, took them from L. Petillius, who was his menial Servant; for Q. Petillius, when he was Questor, had chosen him to be one of his ten Clerks. Having read the Arguments [or Heads] of what was in them, when he found that many things [therein contained] tended to the dissolution of Religion, he told L. Petillius, that he would throw those Books into the fire. But before he did so, that he would give him leave to try, if he thought he had either any right, or could make any Friends, to get them again: and that he should do without incurring his displeasure. The Clerk [or Scribe] therefore went to the Tribunes of the People; from whom the matter was refer'd to the Senate. The Prætor said, He was ready to make Oath, that those Books ought not to be read and kept. Whereupon the Senate Voted, That it was enough for the Prætor to promise them his Oath. That the Books should be burnt as soon as possible in the Assembly Court: And that there should be a sum of money paid to the Lord [of the soil] for the Books, as much as Q. Petillius, the Prætor, and the major part of the Tribunes should think reasonable. But that the Clerk did not take: though the Books were burnt in the Assembly Court (the Fire being made by the Priests Servants, that attended at Sacrifices) before all the People.

XXX. There was a great War arose in the hither Spain that Summer. For the Celtiberians had got together to the number of thirty five thousand men, more than they had hardly ever before had. Q. Fulvius Flaccus was then Governour of that Province: who having heard that the Celtiberians were arming their youth, had himself likewise muster'd up all the Forces he could from their Allies; though he was no way equal to the Enemy for number of Souldiers. In the beginning of the Spring he led his Army into Carpetania, and pitch'd his Camp at a Town called Ebura, having put a small Garison into the place. Some few dayes after, the Celtiberians Encamped about two thousand paces from thence under an Hill. Whom when the Roman Prætor saw there, he sent his Brother M. Fulvius with two Troops of the Allies Allies Horfe to view the Enemies Camp; commanding him to ride up as high as he could to their Bullwark, to see how big it was; but that he should not engage, but retire, if he saw the Enemies Horfe come out [upon him.] He did according as he was order'd. So for some dayes there was no farther motion made, than to show these two Troops, and strait draw them off again, if the Enemies Horfe fall'd out of their Camp. At last the Celtiberians also, marching out of their Camp at every Gate, with all their Forces, both Horfe and Foot together, stood in Battalia fronting [the Romans] in the midst between the two Camps. The place was all plain and fit to fight in, where the Spaniards stood expecting the Enemy. The Roman kept his men within the Bullwark for four whole dayes together, and they in the same place all that time kept their Army in Array. The Romans stirr'd not: wherefore the Celtiberians lay in their Camp, because they could not get an opportunity of fighting. Only their Horfe went out to their Station [or Post] that they might be in a readines, if the Enemy made any motion. Behind their Camps they both went to forrage and fetch in Wood, nor did either of them hinder the other.

XXXI. The Roman, when he thought he had given the Enemy sufficient hopes, by resting so many dayes, that he would not move first, commanded L. Acilius, with the left Wing, and six thousand Provincial Auxiliaries, to go about the Hill, which was on the Enemies back: and thence, when he heard a shout, run down into their Camp. They accordingly went, and that in the Night too, for fear of being seen. At break of day Flaccus sent C. Scribonius, Prefect of the Allies to the Enemies Bulwark, with the extraordinary Horfe of the left Wing. Whom when the Celtiberians saw, not only to come nearer than ordinary, but in greater numbers than they had used, all their Horfe fall'd out of the Camp; the Foot having also a signal given them to do the same. Scribonius (as he was order'd) as soon as he heard the noise of the Horsemen, turn'd his Horses and rode back toward the Camp. Thereupon the Enemy follow'd the more eagerly. First the Horfe, and then the Body of Foot, came, not doubting, but they that day should take the Enemies Camp. They were not above five hundred paces from the Bulwark. Wherefore, when Flaccus thought, that they were drawn away far enough from securing their own Camp (having marshall'd his Army within the Bulwark) he fall'd forth at three places together: setting up an Huzza, not only to animate his men to the fight, but also, that those, who were upon the Hills, might hear. Nor did they stay; but ran down as they were order'd, to the [Enemies] Camp: in which there were not left, for a Guard to it, above five hundred armed men; who were so terrified at their own fewness, the multitude of the Enemy, and the surprize of the thing, that the Camp was taken almost without any resistance. Acilius threw fire into the Camp upon that side which was most visible to the Defendants.

XXXII. The hindmost of the Celtiberians, who were in the Army, first saw the flame: and thereupon it was reported all over the Field, That their Camp was lost, and just then all on fire: but what terrified them encouraged the Romans. For they heard the noise of their Victorious Party, and saw the Enemies Camp on a flame. The Celtiberians for a little time stood wavering in their minds: but when they saw they had no place to retire to if they were beaten, nor any hopes but in fighting it out, they again with greater resolution renew'd the Battle. In their main Body they were hard put to it by the fifth Legion. But against the left Wing, in which they saw that the Romans had placed Provincial Auxiliaries of their kind, they with more confidence march'd up. And now the left Wing of the Romans had like to have been beaten, had not the seventh Legion come in: besides, that at the same time, in the very heat of the Battle, there came from the Town of Ebura, those that were left in Garison there, and Acilius was behind them. The Celtiberians therefore were for a long time kill'd in the middle: and all those who escaped ran every way all over the Country. After whom the Horfe was sent in two divisions, and kill'd many of them. There were that day slain twenty three thousand of the Enemies; four thousand eight hundred, with above five hundred Horses, ninety eight military Ensigns, taken. This was a great Victory, but yet not bloodless. For of the Romans there fell out of the two Legions, somewhat above two hundred, of the Latine Allies eight hundred and thirty, and of the Foreign Auxiliaries about two thousand four hundred. The Prætor carried the Victorious Army back into his Camp; Acilius being commanded to stay in the Camp that he himself had taken. The next day the spoil of the Enemy was gather'd up; and they publickly presented [with a share thereof] whose valour had been signal [in the action.]

XXXIII. After that when they had carry'd the wounded men into the Town of Ebura, they led the Legions through Carpetania to Contrebia. Which City being besieged, sent to the Celtiberians for aid, but they tarrying too long, (not that they did so on purpose, but because they being far from home were hinder'd by foul wayes (caused by continual rains) and swelling torrents) despair'd of their assistance, and so surrender themselves. Flaccus also, forced by these violent storms led all his Army into the City. The Celtiberians, who were gone from home, being ignorant of this surrender, when at last they had got over the Rivers (they being abated) and were come to Contrebia; seeing no Camp without the Walls, supposing it either to be removed to the other side, or that the Enemy was retired, running forward without any caution came up to the Town. The Romans made a sally upon them at at two Ports, and setting them in disorder routed them. That which hinder'd them not only from making resistance, but from flying too, viz. that they came not in one Body, nor thick about their Ensigns, was a great security and advantage to them in their flight. For they ran stragling all over the Plain, nor could the Enemy ever compass them in a body together. Yet twelve thousand of them were slain, and above five thousand taken, with four hundred Horses, and sixty two military Ensigns. Those that were scatter'd in the flight and ran home, turn'd back the other Body of Celtiberians that were a coming, by telling them of the surrender of Contrebia and their own misadventure. Whereupon they presently betook themselves all into their Castles and Villages. Flaccus marching from Contrebia, led his Legions through Celtiberia, plundering all the Country as he went: besides that he attack'd many Castles, till such time, as the greatest part of the Celtiberians came and made their surrender.

These things were done in the hither Spain that year: and in the farther, Manlius, the XXXIV. Prætor, fought some prosperous Battles with the Lusitanians. Aquileia, a Latine Colony, was planted in the Country belonging to the Gauls the same Year: in which three thousand Footmen had fifty Acres a piece, each Centurion a hundred, and every Horseman a hundred and forty. The three that carry'd them thither, were P. Cornelius Scipio Nasica, C. Flaminius, and L. Manlius Acidinus. There were two Temples that year dedicated; the one to Venus Erycina at the Colline Gate (which was dedicated by L. Porcius Licinus the Duumvir (Son to Lucius) and vow'd [to be dedicated] by L. Porcius the Consul, in the Ligurian War) and the other to Piety in the Herb-Market; which was dedicated by Manius Acilius Glabrio the Duumvir; who also set up a gilded Statue (the first of that kind in all Italy) for his Father Glabrio. He was himself the person, that had vow'd that Temple that day he fought with Antiochus at Thermopylae: and had agreed for the building of it by Order from the Senate. At the same time, that these Temples were dedicated, L. Aemilius Paulus the Pro-Consul triumph'd over the Ingaunians of Liguria. He brought in twenty five golden Crowns: besides which there was no other gold or silver born in that triumph. But there were many Captive Princes of Liguria led before his Chariot. He gave three hundred [Asses] of brags to each of his Souldiers. The Ligurian Embassadors enhanced the glory of that triumph, who came to desire a perpetual Peace. [Saying] that the Ligurian Nation were now resolv'd, never to take up Arms, but by command from the people of Rome. To which Q. Fabius by Order of the Senate made them this Answer; that that protestation was not new to the Ligurians: but it was very much their interest that their mind should be new, and agreeable to their words. That they should go to the Consuls and do as they bid them. For the Senate would believe no body else, save the Consuls, that the Ligurians were really and sincerely inclined to Peace. So there was Peace in Liguria. In Corfica they fought with the Corfians: of whom M. Pinaris, the Prætor, kill'd two thousand in one Battle; by means of which overthrow they were induced to give Hostages, and a hundred thousand pound of Wax. From thence the Army was led into Sardinia: where they had a prosperous Battle with the Ilians, a Nation not thoroughly subdu'd even to this day. The hundred Hostages were the same year restored to the Carthaginians, and the Romans made a Peace with them, not for themselves only, but on the behalf of King Massinissa too: who at that time kept that part of the Country, which was in debate, with an armed force.

The Consuls therefore had now nothing to do in their Province. So M. Bæbius, being re- XXXV. call'd to Rome, to hold the Assembly, created, for Consuls, A. Postumius Albinus Lusius, and C. Calpurnius Piso. After them the Prætors were made, viz. Tib. Sempronius Gracchus, L. Postumius Albinus, P. Cornelius Mammula, Tib. Minucius Molliculus, A. Hostilius Mancinus, and C. Menius: who all of them enter'd upon their Office upon the Ides of March [i.e. the fifteenth.] In the beginning of that year, in which A. Postumius Albinus, and C. Calpurnius Piso were Consuls, A. Postumius, the Consul, brought those men into the Senate, who came out of the hither Spain, from Q. Fulvius Flaccus: [namely] L. Minucius, a Lieutenant, and two Tribunes of the Souldiers, T. Manius, and L. Terentius Massa. Who having given an account of two prosperous Battles, and the surrender of Celtiberia, and the total subduing of that Province: and [consequently] that there was no necessity of sending any money, as they used to do, to pay the Souldiers, nor any Corn to the Army for that year; desired of the Senate, first, that upon the score of their good success, all honour might be paid to the Gods: and next, that Q. Fulvius, being now ready to depart that Province, might bring the Army away with him, whose valour, not only he himself, but many other Prætors before him, had had so much experience of. Which, besides that it ought to be, was almost necessary to be done. For the Souldiers were so obstinate, that they could not in all probability be any longer kept in the Province: but would come thence without orders, if they were not dismiss'd, or fly out into a pernicious Mutiny, if any man should keep them there by force. The Senate decreed that both the Consuls should have Liguria for their Province. Then the Prætors chose; [of whom] A. Hostilius happen'd to have the City, and Tib. Minucius the Foreign [Jurisdiction.] P. Cornelius Sicily, C. Menius Sardinia, L. Postumius the farther, and Tib. Sempronius the hither Spain. Who because he was to succeed Q. Fulvius, (lest the Province should be deprived of the old Army) said, I desire to know of you, L. Minucius! since you tell us, that the Province is totally subdu'd, Do you think that the Celtiberians will always continue true to us; so as that Province may be kept without an Army? If you cannot either undertake or affirm any thing touching the fidelity of those Barbarians; but think, that 'tis necessary to have an Army there; would you advise the Senate to send a Supplement into Spain? So as that those Souldiers only, who are superannuated for service, may be disbanded; and fresh men mixt with the old ones? or would you have them draw the old Legions out of that Province and raise and send new ones [in their stead] when raw men will possibly prove so contemptible, as to incite even the tamer sort of Barbarians to renew the War? 'Twas easier to say [the business was done] than really subdue a Province, that, of their own nature, were Warlike, and apt to rebel. Some few Cities (for ought I hear) whom the adjacent Winter Camp was severe upon, came and submitted to a surrender, but those that were farther off are still in Arms. Which things standing thus, I therefore now declare, Grave Fathers! That I will manage the publick business with that Army which is now in being: and, if Flaccus bring those Legions away with him, will choose only peaceful places for my Winter Quarters, nor expose new Souldiers to so fierce and Warlike a Foe.

N n n n n

Province

XXXVI. Then the Lieutenant answer'd to the questions propos'd to him: That neither he nor any body else could foretell, what the Celtiberians had either then in their minds, or would hereafter undertake. Wherefore he could not deny, but that it was better to send an Army even to subdu'd Barbarians, who were not yet sufficiently inur'd to command: but whether it were necessary that Army should be a new, or an old one, was his part to determine, who could tell, with what fidelity the Celtiberians would continue in peace: and was likewise assur'd, that the Souldiers would be quiet, if they were kept any longer in that Province. If a man might guess what their thoughts are, by what they talk among themselves, or by the shouts, that they set up, when their General was publickly speaking to them, 'tis well known that they cry'd out, that either they would keep their Leader there in the Province, or would go with him into Italy. This Debate between the Prætor and the Lieutenant was interrupted by a propos'd of the Consuls; who thought fit that their Provinces should be set in order, before they talk'd of the Prætors Army. The Consuls were order'd to have a perfect new Army: consisting of two Roman Legions with their Horse, and of the Latine Allies, as many as ever, viz. fifteen thousand Foot, and eight hundred Horse. With this Army they were charg'd to make War against the Apuan Ligurians. P. Cornelius and M. Babius were continu'd in Commission; and order'd to keep their Provinces, till the Consuls came: but then were commanded to disband the Army, that they had, and return to Rome. After that they discours'd concerning Tib. Sempronius's Army. For whom the Consuls were commanded to raise a new Legion of five thousand two hundred Foot, with four hundred Horse, besides a thousand Roman Foot, and fifty Horse, injoining the Latine Allies to bring in seven thousand Foot, and three hundred Horse. With this Army they thought fit that Tib. Sempronius should go into the hither Spain. Q. Fulvius had leave, if he thought good, to bring away with him all those Souldiers, that had been transported into Spain (being Roman Citizens, or Allies) before Sp. Postumius, and Q. Marcius were Consuls: and also, when the supply came, all above ten thousand four hundred Foot, and six hundred Horse, in the two Legions, with twelve thousand Foot, and six hundred Horse of the Latine Allies, whose valour he had made use of in the two Battles against the Celtiberians. There were supplications likewise decreed, for that he had so successfully managed the publick affairs: and the other Prætors were sent into their several Provinces. Q. Fabius Buteo was continu'd in Commission in Gaul. That year they resolv'd, there should be eight Legions, besides the old Army, that was in Liguria with great hopes of being sent: though that Army was with great difficulty made up, by reason of the pestilence, which had now for three years together wasted the City of Rome, and all Italy besides.

XXXVII. The Prætor Tib. Minucius, and, not after him, the Consul C. Calpurnius dy'd, with many other eminent men of all ranks. At last their mortality began to be thought a Prodigy: wherefore C. Servilius the High-Priest was order'd to prepare expiatory Sacrifices against the wrath of the Gods, the Decemviri to look into their Books; and the Consul to vow offerings to Apollo, Æsculapius, and to Health, as well as to give gilded Statues, all which he vow'd and gave: The Decemviri appointed a Supplication for two dayes upon the score of the sickness, in the City and through all Corporations and Burroughs: at which all above twelve years of Age were Crowned, and pray'd with Laurel in their hands. They also had some suspicion that there was humane Villany in the Case: and therefore C. Claudius the Prætor, who, chosen in Tib. Minucius's room, was order'd by the Senate to inquire concerning any Poyson that was given in the City, or within ten thousand paces thereof; and C. Manius through all the Towns and Burroughs above ten miles off, before he went over into his Province of Sardinia. The Consuls Death was most of all suspected. For he was said to be destroy'd by Quarta Hostilia, his Wife. But as soon as Q. Fulvius Flaccus, her Son, was declar'd to be Consul in his Father-in-Laws room, Piso's Death began to be a little more infamous: and there were Witnesses, who after Albinus and Piso were declared Consuls, at the Assembly where Flaccus receiv'd a repulse, said his Mother upbraided him, saying, 'twas now the third time, that he had been deny'd the Consulship, and added, that he should prepare himself to stand; for within two months she'd so order the business, that he should be Consul.

ful. Among many other testimonies, to this purpose, this saying also of hers, which was verified by too true an event, caus'd Hostilia to be condemn'd. In the beginning of this Spring, whilst the new Consuls were employ'd in the Levy at Rome, the one of them dying made all things go on so much the slower, till they had held an Assembly and chosen another in his place. In the mean time P. Cornelius and M. Babius, who, in their Consulship, had done no memorable exploit, led their Army into [the Country of] the Apuan Ligurians.

The Ligurians, who before the coming of the Consuls into the Province, had not expected a War, being surpris'd, surrender'd themselves to the number of twelve thousand. Then Cornelius and Babius (having first by Letters consult'd the Senate) resolv'd to bring down out of the Mountains into the Champaign Country a great way from their habitations, lest they should hope to return: supposing that they should never any otherwise make an end of the Ligurian War. Now there was a Territory, belonging publickly to the Romans, in the Country of the Samnites, which had formerly belong'd to the Taurasines: into which they having a mind to carry over the Apuan Ligurians, let forth an Order, That the Ligurians should come down from the Mountains with their Wives and Children, and bring all they had along with them. Whereupon the Ligurians often times desired by their Embassadors, that they might not be forced to leave the native seat, where they were begotten, and the Sepulchres of their Ancestors, promising Arms and Hostages. But seeing they were not able to prevail, nor had strength enough to make a War, they obey'd the Edict. Of them therefore were brought away at the publick charge full forty thousand Freeborn People with Women and Children: among whom there was distributed of silver a hundred and fifty thousand Sesterces, to buy them necessaries for their Families. Cornelius and Babius, (those that brought them thither) were made Overseers for dividing of the Land, and giving [each man his share.] Yet at their own request, there were five persons allow'd them, to advise with. Having transacted the affair, and brought the old Army to Rome, they had a Triumph decreed them; they being the first that ever triumph'd without making a War. There were only some of the Enemies led before their Chariot, because there was nothing taken to carry, lead, or give the Souldiers at their triumph.

The same year Fulvius Flaccus the Pro Prætor, in Spain, because his Successor came late XXXIX. into the Province, drawing out the Army from their Winter-Quarters, began to waste the farther part of Celtiberia, whence they had not come to make their surrender. By which means he provoked rather than terrified the minds of the Barbarians; who having privately muster'd up a good number of men, beset the Manlian Wood, through which they knew, the Roman Army would pass. When L. Postumius Albinus his Colleague was going into the farther Spain, Gracchus had charg'd him, that he should persuade Q. Fulvius to bring his Army to Tarraco. That there the old Souldiers should be disbanded, and the Supplement distributed, and that he himself would order the whole Army: besides that Flaccus had a short day appointed him, by which his Successor should come. This news made Flaccus leave off what he design'd to do, and all in haste to carry his Army out of Celtiberia. Whereupon the Barbarians, being ignorant of the reason [why he did so] supposing, that he perceived and feared their revolt, and that they had got Arms privately together, beset the Wood so much the more intently. Into which when the Roman Army at break of day enter'd, the Enemies arising from two places at once invaded the Romans. Which when Flaccus saw, he allay'd the first tumults by bidding the Centurions command them to stand all in a Body, every man in his Rank and File, and make ready their Arms, and having put all their Carriages, and the Beasts into one place, he partly in person, partly by his Lieutenants and Tribunes of the Souldiers, as the time and place required, let all his Forces, without any fear, in Array: telling them, that they had to do with persons, who had been twice surrender'd; had now indeed more wickedness and treachery in them; but not more courage or resolution. That they would make his return into his Country, which before was like to be ignoble, very famous and memorable: and that they should carry to their Triumph at Rome, Swords embrew'd with the fresh slaughter of their Enemies and spoils running down with blood. The time would not suffer him to say any more. For the Enemy came upon them, and they were already engaged in the utmost parts: and then the whole Army fell to it.

The Fight was severe on both sides, but the fortune of it various. The Legions fought XL. very bravely, nor did the two Wings behave themselves any worse: but the Foreign Auxiliaries were hard put to it by men of like Armour, who were somewhat a better sort of Souldiers, and could not maintain their ground. The Celtiberians perceiving that they were not equal to the Legions in a regular way of fighting, and hand to hand, made an impression into them, in a body like a wedge. At which kind of fighting they are so good, that they cannot be endured, what part soever they with their Force attempt. And then also the Legions were put into disorder, and the main Body of the Army almost interrupted. Which conternation when Flaccus perceiv'd he rode up to the Legionary Horse, and cry'd out; Are you able to afford me no assistance? Or shall this whole Army be ruin'd? To which they making a general loud reply, and saying, let him tell them, what he would have done, and they'd do it out of hand, he had them double their Troops, the Horsemen of the two Legions, and let their Horses go into the wedge of the Enemies, wherewith they gaul our men: which you will do with greater force of their Horses, if you let them go unbridled upon them: which we read, that the Roman Horsemen have done many times to their great commendation. They obey'd his command, and pulling off their Bridles ran to and fro to the great slaughter of the Enemy, and broke through all their spears. The wedge being dissipated, in which lay all their hopes, the Celtiberians trembled, and, being ready to quit the fight, lookt about, which way to make their escape. The Alary Horse too, when they saw so memorable an exploit done by the Roman Horse, were themselves inflamed by their valour, and without any word of command rode in among the disorder'd Enemies. With that all the Celtiberians were put to flight, and the Roman General seeing the Enemy run away, vow'd to build a Temple to Fortuna Equestris, and to make Games in honour of the Good and Great Jupiter: so the Celtiberians were scatter'd and slain over all the Wood. 'Tis said, there were seventeen thousand of the Enemies slain that day, above three thousand taken, with two hundred seventy seven military Ensigns, and Horses near eleven hundred. That day the conquering Army lodg'd in no Camp. But yet this Victory was not gain'd without the loss of Souldiers; for of the Romans there were slain four hundred seventy two, and of the Latine Allies a thousand and nineteen, with whom there also fell, of Auxiliaries three thousand. By this means the conquering Army having regain'd their former honour, was led to Tarracon. Tib. Sempronius the Prætor (who came thither two days before) went out to meet Fulvius at his arrival, and congratulated his good management of the publick affairs. Whereupon, they agreed unanimously as to the Souldiers, whom to disband, and whom to keep [still upon duty.] Then Fulvius, when he had shipped the Souldiers, that were dismiss'd, went to Rome, and Sempronius carry'd the Legions into Celtiberia; whilst both the Consuls led their Armies into Liguria two several ways.

XLII. Postumius, with the first and the third Legion, beset two Mountains, called Baliffa and Suifmontium, keeping the narrow passes of those places so close, that he hinder'd them from getting any provisions; and subdu'd them by meer want of all necessaries. Fulvius, having, with the second and fourth Legion, attack'd the Apuan Lignrians from Pisa, received the surrender of all of them, that dwelt upon the River Macra, and putting seven thousand of them on Board certain Ships [that he had provided] sent them over to Naples, along the Coast of the Tuscan Sea: from whence they were brought into Samnium, and a place assigned them to inhabit among the Natives of that Country. In the mean time A. Postumius cut down the Vines and burnt the Corn belonging to the Ligurians that lived upon the Mountains; till they were forced by the misfortunes of War, to submit and surrender their Arms. From thence Postumius departed and put to Sea, to visit the Coast of the Ingurian Ligurians, and Intermelians. But before these Consuls arrived at the Army, which was appointed to Rendezvous at Pise, A. Postumius, and M. Fulvius Nobilior, Brother to Q. Fulvius, were Commanders of it. Fulvius was a Tribune military in the second Legion; who, during his months [wherein he was to command] disbanded that Legion, engaging the Centurions upon Oath to return the money [designed for their pay] into the Roman Treasury to the Questors. Which when Postumius heard of at Placentia (for thither, as it happen'd, he was then gone) he pursu'd those disbanded men with some of his nimblest Horse, and brought as many of them as he could overtake, after he had rebuked them, back to Pisa. Concerning the rest he sent word to the Consul: who, upon his proposal of the case, got an Order of Senate made, that M. Fulvius should be banish'd into Spain, beyond new Carthage: besides that Letters were given him by the Consul to carry to P. Manlius in the farther Spain. The Souldiers were order'd to repair back to their Colours; and for a mark of disgrace to them, it was decreed, that they should have but six months pay for that year; and that every Souldier, who did not return to the Army, should be sold by the Consul, he and all he had.

XLII. The same year L. Dronius, who was come out of Illyricum (where he had been Prætor the year before) to Brundisium, leaving his Ships there in Harbour, came to Rome; [and there,] discoursing of the exploits that he had done, very confidently laid the blame of all the Piracy that was practis'd upon the Sea-Coast to the charge of Gentius King of the Illyrians: [saying] That all the Ships that pillaged the Coast of the upper Sea, came out of his Kingdom. Concerning which affair he had sent Embassadors to the King, but they could never have the liberty of speaking with the King. Now at the same time there were Embassadors come from Gentius to Rome, who said, that at that time when the Roman Embassadors would have had admittance to the King, he was sick in the farthest parts of his Kingdom. And therefore, that Gentius begg'd of the Senate; that they would not believe those false accusations, which his Enemies had forged against him. But Dronius added farther; that several persons (both Citizens of Rome, and Latine Allies) had receiv'd great abuses in his Kingdom; as also, that, by report, some Roman Citizens were detained at Corcyra. Thereupon it was by the Senate thought fit, that they should all be brought to Rome, where C. Claudius the Prætor should be judge of the case, and that till then Answer should be given to King Gentius or his Embassadors. Among many others, who dy'd this year of the Plague, there were several Priests also taken off; of whom L. Valerius Flaccus, the High-Priest was one; into whose place they chose Q. Fabius

Labeo:

Labeo: and P. Manlius who was lately come back out of the farther Spain) Triumvir in the ordering of the sacred Feasts; in whose room they Elect'd Q. Fulvius Son to Marcus; being then under seventeen years of Age. Concerning the choice of a King of the Sacrificers into the place of C. Cornelius Dolabella, there was a Contest between C. Servilius the Arch-Priest, and Cornelius Dolabella, Duumvir of the Navy, whom the High Priest commanded to lay down that Office, that he might instal him in the other: But he refused it, and for that reason the Priest set a Fine upon him; upon which Dolabella appealed, and argu'd the case before the people. When many of the Tribes, being called in, voted, that the Duumvir ought to be obedient to the High-Priest, and that the Fine should be remitted, if he laid down his Office, at last it thunder'd, and that broke up the Assembly. Then the Priests thought it a sin to inaugurate Dolabella, but inaugurated P. Cælius Siculus, who had been instal'd in the second place. At the end of this year C. Servilius Geminus the High Priest himself also deceas'd, who was one of the Decemviri appointed to oversee the holy rites: and in his place of Priest the College of Priests chose Q. Fulvius Flaccus. But M. Aemilius Lepidus was chosen to be High-Priest (though many great men stood for that office) and Q. Marcus Philippus was made Decemvir of the holy rites in the room of the same [C. Servilius Geminus.] Besides him there died Sp. Postumius Albinus, an Augur [or Soothsayer] into whose place P. Scipio, Son to Africanus, was by the Augurs Elect'd: The same year the Cumans had leave (upon their Petition) publickly to speak Latine, and for their Cryers to sell [goods] in Latine.

The Senate gave the Pisans thanks for a promise which they had made of Lands, wherein the Romans might plant a Latine Colony: and three persons were Elect'd for that purpose, viz. Q. Fabius Buteo, with M. and Publius, both surnam'd Popillius Lenas. Then there were Letters brought from C. Manius the Prætor (who, besides that he was to be Governour of Sardinia, had this charge also given him, That he should inquire into the Arts of poisoning, practis'd in all places, above ten miles off Rome.) That he had already condemn'd three thousand persons, and that upon informations, which were made to him, that affair every day encreas'd: inasmuch that he must either quit that business, or resign his Province. Q. Fulvius Flaccus return'd from Spain to Rome with great Fame for the actions that he had done: laid without the City, to expect his triumph, was chosen Consul with L. Manlius Acidinus; and after some few dayes rode into the City triumphant, with the Souldiers, whom he had brought home, attending upon him. He carried in his Triumph a hundred twenty four golden Crowns; of Gold thirty one pounds, and a hundred seventy three thousand two hundred Coined pieces of Oscan Silver. He distributed among his men fifty Deniers apiece out of the Booty; double of which he gave to each Centurion, and to the Horsemen treble: doing the same to the Latine Allies, and bestowing upon every Souldier double pay. That year L. Villius, Tribune of the People, prefer'd a Bill for the determining how many years of Age every man should necessarily be, before he should be capable of standing for, or having any publick Office. Thence it was, that all their Family was surnam'd Annales [from Annus, an Year.]

XLIV. Many Years after that, there were Created four Prætors (pursuant to the Bebian Law, which ordained that every other Year there should be four Elect'd) namely, Cn. Cornelius Scipio, L. Valerius Levinus, Q. and M. both named Mucii, and surnam'd Scævola. Q. Fulvius and L. Manlius had the Government of the same Province with those of the year before, and the same numbers of Horse and Foot, both Citizens and Allies. Tib. Sempronius and L. Postumius were still continu'd in Commision in the two Spains with the same Forces that they had. And for a Supplement, the Consuls were order'd to raise three thousand Roman Foot, three hundred Horse, five thousand Latine Foot, and four hundred Horse, P. Mucius Scævola happen'd to have the City Jurisdiction, and was to inquire concerning the practice of poisoning within the City and without for ten miles round. Cn. Cornelius Scipio had the Foreign Jurisdiction; Q. Mucius Scævola was made Governour of Sicily, and C. Valerius of Sardinia. Q. Fulvius, the Consul, before he did any publick business, said, he would acquit both himself and the Commonwealth in point of Religion by performing those Vows that he had made. For he declared, that on the day, when he fought the last Battle with the Celtiberians, he made a Vow to set forth Games in honour of (the great and good) Jupiter: as also to build a Temple to * Fortuna Equestris; and that for that end the Spaniards had rais'd him money. Thereupon those Games were resolv'd upon in the Senate, and order was given for the Creating of two Duumviri, to contract for the building of such a Temple. But as to the money it was prefix'd, That the sum, spent upon those Games, should not be more, than was allow'd to Q. Fulvius Nobilior for his Games, after the Ætolian War. And that in order to these Games, he should not send for, raise, receive, or do any thing, against the Order of Senate, that was made, touching Sports, in the year, when L. Æmilius and Cn. Bebius were Consuls. This order of Senate was made by reason of the extravagant expences, laid out upon the Games of Tib. Sempronius, the Ædile: which were very burdensome, not only to Italy and the Latine Allies, but to the Foreign Provinces also.

The Winter that year was very severe, for Snow and all kind of stormy weather; which kill'd all the Trees that were in danger of nipping colds: besides that that tempestuous Season * God-defs of Horsemanship.

Season was of a longer duration than other years it used to be. By which means the Latine Holy dayes were so disturb'd by a sudden and intolerable storm that then arose upon the Mountain, that the Priests gave order they should be celebrated a second time. The same tempest threw down several Statues in the Capitol, disfiguring many places with Thunderbolts. It overturn'd the Temple of Jupiter at Taracina, the white Temple at Capua, with the Gate called Porta Romana, and the Battlements of the Wall in several places. Among these Prodiges it was reported also from Reate, that there was a Mule foaled with three Feet. Upon which score the Decemviri were order'd to consult the Sibylls Books; and by direction out of them, declar'd, to what Gods, and with what Victims Sacrifice should be made: and (seeing many places were defaced with Thunder) that there should be a supplication made in the Temple of Jupiter one whole day. After this, the Games that Q. Fulvius had vow'd were set forth with great solemnity for ten days together: and then was the Assembly held for chusing of Censors, in which there were Elected M. Aemilius Lepidus, the High-Priest, and M. Fulvius Nobilior, who had triumph'd over the Aetolians. Now between these two persons there was a known grudge, which was many times very publicly shewn in several fierce contests both in the Senate, and before the People. When this Assembly was over, the two Censors, (as it was the ancient usage) fate together in their Curule Chairs [of State] in the Campus Martius, near the Altar of Mars: to which place there soon flock'd the best men of the Senate, with a numerous train of Citizens at their Heels; among whom Q. Caelius Metellus made this Speech: Censors! We have not forgotten, that you were very lately chosin by the whole Roman People as Overseers of our manners; and that we ought to be admonish'd, and ruled by you, and not you by us. Yet we ought nevertheless to shew, what, in you, either offends all good men, or they at least would wish to be alter'd. When we consider you singly (M. Aemilius! and you, M. Fulvius!) we have not this day in the City any persons, whom, if we were to chuse again, we would sooner prefer than you. But when we look upon you both together, we cannot but fear, that you are very ill paired, and that it will not be so great an advantage to the Common-wealth in that you please all of us so well, as it may be a disadvantage, that you displease one another. For many years together there have been great animosities between you, very prejudicial to you your selves; which we are afraid, may from this time forward prove much more fatal to us and the Common-wealth, than to you. For what reasons we fear this, we could give you a long account, but that perhaps your implacable enmity hath already captivated your minds. These grudges we all desire you this day, and in this Temple, to make an end of; and, since the Roman People have join'd you together by their Votes [in the same office] that you would let us unite you in reconciliation and Friendship also. With one mind, with one design, chuse the Senate; survey the Knighthood; number the Citizens, and set up a Pole [in order to view and purifie the people.] And whereas you in almost all your Prayers you are to use these words; That such or such a thing fall out successfully to me and my Colleague, look, that you wish it truly and heartily, and make men believe, that what you desire of the Gods, you sincerely pray may come to pass. T. Tatius and Romulus reigned together in this very City with great unanimity, though they had formerly fought as Enemies in the midst of the Forum. Not only animosities, but Wars too have their periods: and oftentimes the greatest Foes become the most faithful Friends, yea and our Fellow-Citizens also. The Albanes, when their City was utterly ruin'd were brought to Rome, and the Latines with the Sabines were taken into the freedom of the City. That common saying, because 'twas so true, became a Proverb, viz. That Friendship should be immortal, and animosity mortal. Hereupon arose an humme, to shew their assent, and soon after their Voices all at once desiring the same thing, interrupted Metellus's Oration. Then Aemilius, among other things, complain'd, that M. Fulvius had hinder'd him twice of having the Consulate, which otherwise he had been sure to carry. And Fulvius on the contrary urged, that he had always been by Aemilius malign'd, and that he had brought an action against him, with security to answer the judgment, to his great disgrace. Yet both of them pretended, that if the other would, he would submit to the arbitrement of so many great persons of the City. Thereupon, at the instant request of all who were there present, they shook hands, and promised, to forgive and put an end to all manner of quarrels: and then (all the Company commending them for what they had done) they were carried to the Capitol. Where the Senate much approved of and praised, not only the care of the Nobility in such an affair, but the easy compliance of the Censors also. And therefore when the Censors desired, to have a Summ of money for the carrying on of publick works, they had an years Revenue allotted them.

XLVII. The same year L. Postumius, and Tib. Sempronius the Pro-Prætors in Spain agreed so between themselves, that Albinus should go through Lusitania against the Vaccæ, and come back into Celtiberia. But Gracchus went into the most remote parts of Celtiberia, because in that Country there was a greater War. First he took the City of Munda by storm, surprizing it suddenly in the night time: from whence having receiv'd Hostages, and put a Garison into it, he march'd on, attacking Forts, and burning all the Country Towns, till he came to another very strong City, which the Celtiberians call Certima. Where, being about to apply his Engines to the Walls, there came Embassadors out of the Town, who made a Speech to him full of ancient simplicity and plainness; not denying but that they were were minded to fight him, if their strength had been sufficient. For they desired leave to go into the Celtiberian Camp, to get Auxiliaries: but if they could not get any, then they would consult themselves apart from those people what 'twas best to do. Gracchus gave them leave, and they went; but some few dayes afterward brought along with them ten Embassadors more. It was then Noon; and therefore the first thing they desired of the Prætor, was, that he would order them some drink. When they had drank each of them one Cup round, they call'd for another, to the great diversion of all that stood about them, they being so rude, and void of all manner of breeding. Then the eldest of them began and said; We are sent to you from our Nation, to ask you, upon what assurance you make War against us? To which Gracchus reply'd; He came upon the confidence, that he had in a gallant Army: which if they had a mind to see, he would give them the satisfaction of it, that they might be the better able to inform their Countrymen how things stood: and thereupon commanded the Tribunes military, to put all the Forces both Horse and Foot in Battalia, and let them charge one the other, as in a fight. The Embassadors, when they had seen this show, went and deterr'd their Countrymen from sending any succours to the besieged City. The Townsmen therefore having to no purpose set Fires (which was the signal agreed upon) in their Turrets, when they saw themselves disappointed of their only hope of succours, came and made their surrender. Thereupon they were order'd to pay two Millions four hundred thousand Sesterces, and to deliver up forty of their best and noblest Horsemen; not as Hostages (for they were injoin'd to serve as Souldiers) though they really were as a pledge for their future fidelity.

From thence he march'd next to the City of Alce, where the Celtiberians Camp lay, XLVIII. from whom the Embassadors so lately came. And when he had for some dayes teased with small Skirmishes, by sending his Light-armour against their several Guards, he daily contrived still greater occasions of fighting, that he might draw them all out of their Fortifications. And when he saw, that he had effected what he wish'd for, he order'd the Commanders of the Auxiliaries, that after a short conflict, they should on the sudden turn their backs and run toward the Camp as with all speed, as though they had been outdone in numbers: whilst he himself set the Army in Array within the Bulwark at every Gate. Nor was it long before he saw his own men running away (as he had design'd they should) and the Barbarians pursuing them as hard as they could. By which time he had got all his Forces ready marshall'd for this very purpose within the Bulwark: and therefore staying only so long, till his own party had made their free passage into the Camp, he set up a shout, and sall'y'd forth at all Gates together. The Enemy was not able to bear this unexpected Effort; nor were they, who came to assault another's Camp now able so much as to defend their own. For they were presently routed, put to flight, forced back with consternation into their Bulwark, and, at last, turn'd out of their Camp. That day there were nine thousand of the Enemy slain, three hundred and twenty were taken Prisoners, with a hundred and twelve Horses, and thirty seven military Ensigns. Of the Roman Army there fell a hundred and nine.

After this Battle Gracchus march'd with his Legions, to ravage Celtiberia; and whilst he plunder'd all places as he pass'd along, (inasmuch that the people, some for fear, and some of their own free-will, submitted to him) he in a few dayes took a hundred and three Towns by surrender, and got a vast booty. Thence therefore he carry'd his Army back to Alce, from whence he came, and began to attack that City. The Townsmen sustained the first assault of the Enemies, but when they saw they were not only attempted by force of Arms, but with Engines and Works also, they trusted no longer to the strength of the City, but all ran into the Castle: though from thence also at length they resign'd (having sent Envoys before hand) both themselves and all they had into the hands of the Romans. Thence therefore they carry'd a great Booty: for many noble Captives were at their disposal, among whom there were two Sons and one Daughter of one Turris; who was a petit King of those parts, for the most puissant of all the Spaniards. He, having heard of the misfortune that had befallen his Children, sent Messengers to procure him a secure passage to Gracchus, and came into the Camp. And first he ask'd Gracchus, Whether he and his should live? To which the Prætor answer'd; They should: Whereupon he again desired to know; whether he might serve as a Souldier under the Romans? Which seeing Gracchus also granted; Then (said he) I'll follow you against all my old Allies, since they neglect to assist me. From which time he follow'd the Romans, and assisted them with his stout and faithful endeavours upon many occasions.

After that, Ergavia, a noble and a powerful City, being terrified at the misfortunes of other people round about, open'd their Gates to the Romans. Some Authors say, that these Towns did not surrender themselves truly and sincerely; but that as soon as he had drawn his Legions out of any Region, they presently in that part of the Country renew'd the War, and that he afterward fought a great Battle hand to hand with the Celtiberians, near the Mountain Cauris, from break of day, till Noon: in which there were many men slain on both sides: and that the Romans had not much the better of it in any other respect, save that, the next day, when the Celtiberians staid within their Rampier, they provoked them out to fight; gather'd up the spoils spoils of the field from Morning to Night, on the Morrow, and, the third day, engaged again in a fiercer Battle: in which at last the Celtiberians were undoubtedly conquer'd, and their Camp taken and rifled. That there were twenty two thousand Enemies that day slain; above three hundred taken, with about the same number of Horses, and seventy two military Ensigns. That by this means the War was made an end of, and that the Celtiberians made a true and a real Peace, without any such like inconstancy as they formerly were guilty of. They tell us farther, that the same Summer Postumius fought a remarkable Battle in the farther Spain with the Vaccei; of whom he slew thirty five thousand, and took their Camp. But 'tis more likely, that he came too late into that Province to do any such thing that Summer.

LI. The Censors made a new choice of Senators with great unanimity: and for President of the Senate was Elected M. Aemilius Lepidus, who was himself Censor, and High-Priest. Three Senators were turn'd out of the House: but Lepidus kept some in, whom his Colleague (by Skipping their names) design'd to leave out. Out of that summ of money which was given and divided between them, they caus'd these works to be made; Lepidus rais'd a Mound or Wharf at Tarracina, which was a work not at all agreeable to the people, for that he had an estate there himself, and seem'd to defray his private charges with the publick money. He built a Theatre, and a stage near the Temple of Apollo. He likewise bargain'd for the polishing and white-washing of Jupiter's Temple in the Capitol, and of all the Pillars about it. From which Pillars he also removed all such Statues, as seem'd to be inconveniently placed one opposite to the other; taking away all the shield and military Ensigns of all sorts, that were fasten'd to them. But M. Fulvius contract'd for the doing of more works than he, and those too of greater use: namely for the making of a Port, and Piles in the River Tiber; upon which Piles some years after P. Scipio Africanus, and L. Mummius (when they were Censors) caus'd Arches to be built: and likewise, a Palace behind the new Banquers Shops, with a Fish-Market that had other Shops round about it, which he sold to private people. He likewise made a Market-place and a Portico without the Gate, called Tergemina, and another behind the Docks, near the Temple of Hercules: besides that he built a Temple, behind that of Hope, to Apollo, the Physician. But they had, besides this, another summ of money in common, which they laid out in procuring Water to be brought into the City, and Arches to be made. This work was obstructed by M. Licinius Crassus, who would not suffer the Water to be convey'd through his ground. They also set up several new Taxes for importation of goods and customs: taking care likewise that many publick Chappels, that were then in the hands of private persons, should be reduced to the common service of the City, and ly open for all the people. They alter'd the manner of giving Votes, and divided the Tribes into Wards, according to the different ranks of men, and their several Occupations or Callings.

LII. At that time also one of the Censors, M. Aemilius Lepidus, petition'd the Senate, that he might be allow'd a summ of money, whereby to set forth the Games at the Dedication of the Temples of Queen Juno, and Diana, which he had vow'd to build in the Lignrian War eight years before: and accordingly for that end the Senate decreed him twenty thousand Aſſes. He therefore dedicated both those Temples in the Circus Flaminius; setting forth Stage-Plays three dayes together, after the Dedication of the Temple of Juno, and two days after that of Diana; and every one of those dayes in the cirque [or publick place for shews.] The same person also dedicated a Temple in the Campus Martius to the Sea-Gods, which L. Aemilius Regillus eleven years before had vow'd in a Sea fight against the Fleet of King Antiochus. Over the Gates of that Temple was fix'd a Table with this Inscription. To put an end to a great War between two Kings * the head * to subdue * for making of Peace * this consist * when L. Aemilius Regillus the Prætor, Son of M. Aemilius was going forth * Under the Protection, Command, good Fortune, and Conduct of him, between Ephesus, Samos and Chios, the Consul himself looking on, with Antiochus, all the Army, Horse and Elephants, the Fleet of King Antiochus was before so conquer'd, routed, batter'd, and put to flight, and there that day sixty two long Ships taken with all their Allies. After which fight * King Antiochus and his Kingdom. * For that reason he vow'd to build a Temple to the Sea Gods. In the same manner there was another Table with the like Inscription was set up over the Gates of the Temple of Jupiter in the Capitol.

LIII. Two dayes after the Censors had chosen a new Senate, Q. Fulvius the Consul went into Liguria, and having pass'd with his Army over pathless Mountains, Vales and Forests, fought a pitch'd Battle with the Enemy: in which he not only won the day, but at the same time forced their Camp too. Thereupon three thousand of the Enemies, and all that part of Liguria came and surrender'd themselves to him. All which the Consul plant'd in the Champaign part of the Country; placing Garisons upon the Hills. About this affair there were Letters brought in all hast to Rome; where, upon the score of those Atchievements, there was a Supplication appointed for three dayes: during which time the Prætors sacrific'd forty of the bigger sort of Victims. By the other Consul L. Manlius there was nothing done in Liguria worth taking notice of. Three thousand Transalpine Gauls pass'd over the Alpes into Italy, without offering any act of Hostility, to desire of the Consul and the Senate, that they might be quiet under the Command of the Roman People. But the Senate order'd order'd them to depart out of Italy; and commanded the Consul Q. Fulvius to make inquiry into that matter, and to punish them, who had been the Authors and Ring Leaders of their passage over the Alpes.

This same year King Philip of Macedon, who was consumed partly for Age, and partly for grief about the death of his Son [Demetrius] died. He Winter'd at Demetrias, tormented for want of his Son, as well as with remorse for his own Cruelty. His other Son also stung his mind, who was, no doubt on't, to be King both in his own, and other Peoples Opinion. He saw how all men fix'd their Eyes upon his Son, but forsook him, as being old; some expecting his death, and others not so much even as that. That troubled him so much the more; and with him Antigonus, Son of Echerates, who bore the name of his Uncle Antigonus, that had been Philip's Tutor [or Guardian;] and a man of a Kingly presence, renowned for a famous Battle against Cleomenes of Lacedæmon. The Greeks call'd him Guardian, to distinguish him by his surname from all the other Kings of Macedonia. His Brothers Son, Antigonus was the only man that continu'd firm to Philip's Interest, and without corruption, among all the honourable Friends or Favourites that he had: which fidelity of his made Perseus, who indeed never was his Friend, then the greatest Enemy to him that could be. He therefore foreseeing, what danger he was in, if the Inheritance of the Kingdom came to Perseus, when he first perceiv'd the King to be troubled in mind, and that he sigh'd now and then for the loss of his Son, he one while gave attention, and another time provok'd the mentioning of that rash act; and was himself oftentimes a Companion to him in his sorrow. And (as truth uses to afford many tokens of it self whereby it may be traced out) he usually promoted the business with all the industry he could, that all things might the sooner be brought to light. The persons most suspected, to be the Instruments in that villanous action, were Apelles and Philocles, who had been sent Embassadors to Rome, and had brought those Letters, under the name of Flaminius, that had been so fatal to Demetrius. For they generally talk'd about the Court, that those Letters were counterfeit, forged by the Kings Secretary, and sealed with a false Signet.

But this thing being rather suspected, than evident, it happen'd that Antigonus met with Xychus [the Secretary, probably, that forged the Letter] and laying hold upon him brought him into the Court: where having left him in custody, he went directly on to Philip, and said: I have heard your Majesty often talk, as if you would give a good deal to know the truth concerning your two Sons, and be satisfied, which of them it was that sought to take away the others life. Now the only person that can untie that knot, and free you from that doubt is now in your power, namely Xychus: whom he advis'd the King, since he was by chance already brought into the Court, to summon into his presence. When he was brought, at first, he deny'd it, but with such inconstancy, that it appear'd, if he were put into some little fright, he would readily discover the whole matter: for at the very sight of the Executioner and the Rods he was dismay'd, and declared all the contrivance of that wicked act, both as to the Embassadors and his own performance in it. Thereupon there were certain persons immediately sent to lay hold on the Embassadors: of whom they took Philocles, who was hard by, upon surprize; but Apelles (who had been sent to pursue one Chereas) being inform'd that Xychus had discover'd all the business, went over into Italy. Concerning Philocles there is no certain account given. Some say; That at first he boldly deny'd it, but afterward when Xychus was brought before him face to face, he persifted in it no longer: others say; That he deny'd it even upon the rack. By this means Philip's sorrow was renew'd and doubled; who thought his unhappiness, in respect to his Children, so much the greater, in that one of them was lost [in such a manner.]

Perseus, though sure that all was detected, yet lookt upon himself as too great a person to think it necessary for him to fly; and therefore only took care to keep out of the way; intending to secure himself, as long as Philip lived, from the fire, as it were, of his wrath. Philip, seeing that he could not take his body to punish it, consider'd upon the only way which was left him, how to prevent Perseus from having, besides impunity, a reward for his wicked deeds. He therefore call'd Antigonus to him, to whom he was already oblig'd for discovering that barbarous murder; nor did he think that he would prove a King of whom the Macedonians would have any cause to repent or be ashamed, by reason that his Uncle Antigonus had been of late so renowned a person: and thus he open'd his mind to him: Antigonus! said he, since I am fallen into that condition, that to be Childless (which other people detest and abhor) ought to be my greatest wish, I do design to deliver up into thy hands this Kingdom, which I received from thy valiant Uncle, after he had been my faithful Guardian, yes and augmented it [during the time of my nonage.] You are the only person, that I can think deserves the Crown: but if there were no body at all, I had rather the Kingdom should perish, and be utterly extinct, than that Perseus should have it as the reward of his wicked treachery. I shall fancy that Demetrius is rais'd from the dead, and here again, if I leave you in his room, who was the only man that mourn'd for the death of that innocent [youth] and my unhappy error. After this Speech [to Antigonus] Philip never fail'd to shew him all the publick respect imaginable. For, since Perseus was in Thrace, Philip went about to all the Cities of Macedonia, recommending Antigonus to all the Princes of the Country: and, no question, but, if his life had been somewhat longer, he would have left him in full possession of the Kingdom. Going from Demetrias, he spent a great deal of time at Theſſalonica. From whence coming to Amphipolis he fell sick of a grievous distemper. But yet it was evident that he was more disorder'd in his mind than his body: and that he was destroy'd by care and watching, whilst the Image and Ghost as it were, of his murder'd (though innocent) Son tormented him with direful thoughts, inſomuch that he died cursing the other. Nevertheless Antigonus might have been put into the Throne, had not the Kings Death been on a sudden divulged. But Calligenes, the Phyſician, who took care of him in his sickness, without ſtaying till the King was quite dead, upon the first symptoms of despair, sent Meſſengers, that were laid ready before hand (as they two had agreed) to Perſeus, and concealed the Kings Death from all People that were out of the Palace, till his coming.

LVII. By this means Perſeus surpriz'd them all, before they were aware of his coming, or knew that the King was dead, and so invaded that Kingdom, which by his wickedness he had gain'd. Philip's Death was very opportune, to gain time for raising new Forces in order to a War. For some few days after the Nation of the Bastarnians having been a long time ſollicitated thereunto, had forsaken their own Country, and with a great force of Horse and Foot came over the River Iſter. Now there came from thence before-hand, two Meſſengers to inform the King, Antigonus and Cotto; the latter whereof was a noble Bastarnian; and Antigonus was sent much against his will Embaſſadour with Cotto to instigate the Bastarnians. Not far from Amphipolis they met with news, though uncertain, that the King was dead: which spoilt all their whole design. For thus it was agreed, that Philip should secure the Bastarnians a free passage through Thrace, and provide them all necessaries; in order whereunto, he had engaged the Princes of those parts with presents; and promised them, that the Bastarnians should go peaceably through their Territories. Now his design was to extinguish the Nation of the Dardans, and to settle the Bastarnians in their Country. By which he proposed to himself a twofold advantage, the one, that the Dardans (who were a Nation always great Enemies to Macedonia, and ready upon all occasions to take the opportunity of maligning the Kings, when they were in any adverse circumstances) should be destroy'd; and the other, that the Bastarnians, leaving their Wives and Children in Dardania might be sent to ravage Italy. They were to go to the Adriatick Sea, and so to Italy through the Scordiscians Territories (for there was no other way to lead an Army) who would easily grant the Bastarnians a passage: for they differ'd not from each other, either in language or manners; yea, they were like enough to join with them, when they saw that they were going to plunder so opulent a Nation. These designs were accommodated to all kinds of events: so that, whether the Bastarnians were kill'd by the Romans, yet this was a comfort still, that the Dardans were rooted out, that he should have the spoil of what the Bastarnians had left behind them, and that Dardania would be his free possession: or whether they met with success, that, whilst the Romans were employ'd in a War with the Bastarnians, he should recover what he had lost in Greece. And these were Philip's designs.

LVIII. They enter'd peaceably and march'd along according to the promise made by Antigonus and Cotto. But shortly after, when they heard of Philip's death, neither were the Thracians so easy in point of Commerce, nor could the Bastarnians be content with what they bought, or be kept in their ranks from going out of the way. Upon this ground they did injuries to one another on both sides, by the daily increase whereof there broke out a War. At last the Thracians, who were not able to endure the force and multitude of these Enemies left their Villages in the Plains, and went up into a Mountain of a vast height, called Donuca. Whither when the Bastarnians also would have gone, they were surprized (though they came almost to the tops of the Hills) with such a storm, as that whereby, 'tis said, the Gauls were destroy'd when they plunder'd Delphi. For they were not only first wash'd with violent showres of rain, that poured upon them, and after that pelted with thick storms of hail, which was accompanied with great cracks of thunder, and lightening, that flash in their Eyes, but the thunderbolts shone so round about them, that their bodies seemed to be aimed and shot at: inſomuch that not only the common Souldiers, but the great Officers also were smitten and fell to the ground. By which means, being put into a great consternation, as they fell and tumbled down the high Rocks head foremost, the Thracians pressed hard upon them in that astonish'd condition: but they themselves said, the Gods were the occasion of their flight, and that the Sky fell down upon them. After they had been scatter'd by the storm, when most of them were come back, as out of a Shipwrack, half-arm'd, into the Camp from whence they set out, they began to consult, what to do. Whereupon there arose a Debate; some saying, that they ought to return, and others, that they ought to force their way into Dardania. About thirty thousand men (under the Conduct of Clondicus) went quite through: and the rest return'd the same way they came into the parts beyond Danubius. Perſeus having got possession of the Kingdom, commanded Antigonus to be kill'd: and, whilst he was settling affairs, sent Embaſſadours to Rome, to renew his Fathers Alliance [with the Romans] and to desire, that he might have, from the Senate, the Style of King. And these were the Transactions in Macedonia that year.

The

The other Consul, Q. Fulvius, triumphed over the Ligurians, more through favour, than upon the score of any great Achievements. He brought in a great quantity of the Enemies Armour, but very little Money. Yet he divided among his Soldiers thirty Asses a Man, giving to each Centurion double, and to each Horseman treble. There was nothing in this Triumph, than that, as it happened, he triumph'd upon the same Day, on which the Year before he had done after his Prætorship. After his Triumph he appointed the Grand Assembly, at which there were chosen for Consuls, M. Junius Brutus, and A. Manlius Vulſo. After which, when three of the Prætors were now chosen, a Tempest dissolved the Assembly. The next Day the other three were elected (upon the 11th of March) whose Names were M. Titinius Curvus, Tib. Claudius Nero, and T. Fonteius Capito. Then the Roman Games were set forth anew by the Curule Ædiles, Cn. Servilius Capto, and Ap. Claudius Cento, upon the score of certain Prodigies that then fell out. For the Earth quaked in the publick Tabernacles, where the Beds, on which they were to celebrate the Sacred Feast, lay; the heads of the Gods, that were upon those Beds, turn'd of themselves the contrary way; and the Wooll, with the Coverlets, that lay before Jupiter, fell down. It was interpreted also as a Prodigy, that the Mice had tasted before [any Body else] of the Olives [upon Jupiter's Table]. For the expiation of these ominous Events, there was nothing else done, save that those Games were celebrated over again.

DECADE V. BOOK I.

The E P I T O M E.

The Fire in the Temple of Vesta went out. 7. Tib. Sempronius Gracchus, the Proconsul, conquer'd the Celiberians accepted of their surrender; and, for a monument of his Achievements, built a Town in Spain call'd Gracchuris. Postumius Albinus, the Proconsul, subdued the Vaccæans and Lusitanians. Both of them triumphed. Antiochus Son to King Antiochus, whom his Father had given as an Hostage to the Romans, upon the Death of his Brother Seleucus, who succeeded his Father, lately Dead, was sent away into the Kingdom of Syria. The Consuls erected a Pole, at which there was an account taken of two Hundred seventy three Thousand two Hundred forty four Citizens. Q. Vocomius Sarca, Tribune of the People, proposed a Law, that no Man should make a woman his Heir; which Law M. Cato stood up for, and enforced in an Oration of his that is yet extant. The successful Actions of many Generals against the Ligurians, Iſtrians, Sardians, and Celiberians. The grounds of the Macedonian War, which Perſeus, Son to Philip, raised. For he had sent an Embaſſage to the Carthaginians, which had its audience in the Night. 22, &c. He ſollicitated other Cities of Greece in like manner. This Man, excepting his Religion (for he built many stately Temples in several places) (as at Athens, that of Jupiter Olympius, and at Antiochia, that of Jup. Capitollinus) was the worst of Kings.

The beginning of this Book is wanting.

** TO have armed that which he had in Peace received from his Father; and for that reason, they say, he was very much beloved by the young Men, who were mighty desirous of plunder. When the Consul was deliberating concerning a War in Iſtria, some were of opinion, That they ought to go about it immediately, before the Enemies could muster up their Forces, though others said, They ought first to consult the Senate. But their advice took, who were not for making any delay. The Consul therefore march'd from Aquileia, and encamped at the Lake Timarus, that lies near the Sea side. Thither also came C. Furius, the Naval Duumvir, with ten Ships; he and another having chosen to oppose the Illyrian Fleet, and with twenty Ships, in the upper, to defend all the Sea Coasts, of which Ancora was (as it were) the hinge: L. Cornelius having the care of all the right hand Shore as far as Tarentum, and C. Furius of the left, as far as Aquileia. Those ten Ships were sent to the next Port, into the Confines of Iſtria, with other Vessels of burden, full of Provisions; and the Consul following after with his Legions, pitched his Camp five Miles from the Sea. In a short time there was a full throng'd Mart set up in the Port, from whence were conveyed all manner of necessaries to the Camp; which that it might be the more secure, there were Guards set on all sides quite round. Towards Iſtria [in particular] there was a Garrison planted, consisting of a tumultuary Regiment of Placentines, between the Camp and the Sea, which might be a security also to them, when they went to water at the River. M. Aebutius, a Tribune Military of the second Legions, was commanded to add [unto them] two Companies. T. and C. Ælius, both Tribunes

O o o o o 2

Military

Military too, had led the third Legion by the way that carries you to Aquileia, to protect the Foragers and those that went to fetch in Wood. From that place about a Thousand Paces was the Gallick Camp; in which there was one Carmelus, a petty King, who had under him three Thousand Men, or somewhat more.

II. When the Romans came and encamped near the Lake Timavus, the Istrians fate down in a close place behind an Hill; from whence they followed the Army [as it march'd] through crooked ways, ready to take all advantageous opportunities, as having notice of all that was done either at Sea or Land. So, when a company of their Men, who were unarm'd and merchandizing between the Camp and the Sea, saw the Guards before the Camp very weak, without any defence either at Land or by Sea, they attack'd the two Guards together, namely, the Placentine Regiment, and the two Companies of the second Legion. Their enterprise at first was concealed by a Morning Mist, which beginning to disperse with the enterprize of the Sun, the light began, in some measure, though very dimly, to shine through it, but in such a manner (as it uses to do) that it represented every single thing manifold to the Eye, and then especially deceived the Romans, shewing them a far greater Army of Enemies than there really was. At which the Soldiers that were upon both Guards, being affrighted, fled into their Camp in great disorder, and there caused far more distraction than that which they themselves had brought along with them. For they were neither able to say why they fled, nor to give an answer to those that ask'd them; besides that a noise was heard at the Gates (where there was no Guard to receive the blow, or effort [of the Foe]) and the running together of People in the dark, who fell one over another, had made it uncertain whether the Enemy were within the Bulwark or no. The only cry, that was heard, was of those who called out, To Sea, To Sea; which being by chance set up by one single Person, rung presently all through the Camp. Whereupon at first (as though they had been commanded so to do) they ran to the Sea, some few of them arm'd, but the greater part without any Weapons at all. After them follow'd more still, and at last almost all, yea the Consul himself, having in vain attempted to recal them (for neither his Command, Authority, or even Intreaties at last, would prevail upon them) went after them. M. L. Strabo, a Tribune Military of the third Legion, was the only Man that staid behind, being left by all his Legion excepting three Companies. The Istrians therefore, having made an eruption into the empty Camp (since no body was there but him, to resist them) surpris'd him as he was marshalling and encouraging his Men in that part of the Camp by the Generals Tent. The sight was much sharper than could well be expected where there were so few to make resistance; nor was it ended before the Tribune, and those that were about him, were all slain. Having thrown down the Generals Tent and all that were about it (which they also rifled) they went to the Market Place before the Questor, or Treasurers Tent, and into the street call'd Quintana [which was between the great Officers Quarters and those of the common Soldiers] where they met with great plenty of all things ready to their hands; and, within the Questors Tent, Tables spread. Thereupon the petty King immediately fate down and fell to eating; and so, by his example, soon after did all the rest, as if they had forgot they had either Arms or Enemies, glutting themselves with Wine and Meat, like People that had never been used to eat or drink at such a liberal rate.

III. The Romans at that time were in a quite different condition, for they were consternated both by Land and Sea; the Sailors pull'd down their Tents, carryed the Provisions that lay upon the Shore as fast as possible into the Ships; and the Soldiers, who were all terrified, ran to the Sea side to get into the Boats in all haste. The Mariners, for fear their Vessels should be overladen, some of them flopp'd the crowd, whilst others put off with their Ships to Sea; inso much that the Soldiers and Sea-men fell together by the Ears, wounded and kill'd one another, till by the Consuls order the Fleet was removed a great way from the Land. After that, he began to separate the unarm'd from the arm'd; of all which there were scarce twelve Thousand found that had Arms, and very few Horse men that had brought their Horses thither with them; the rest being a rascally sort of People, as scullions, snafack-boys, and the like, who were like to be only a prey to the Enemy, if they once bethought themselves of the War. But then at last came a Messenger, to recal the third Legion and the Gallick Garrison; whereupon they began from all parts to attempt the recovery of their Camp, and clear themselves from that dishonour [which then lay upon them]. The Tribunes Military of the third Legion Commanded the Soldiers to throw down their forage and fowel, and charged the Centurions to mount the elder Men two and two upon the Beasts, which they had unloaded; bidding the Horse-men to take up behind them each one a lusty young Foot-Soldier; and telling them withal, what a mighty honour it would be to the third Legion to recover by their valour that Camp, which the second Legion by their fear had lost. For it was no hard task (they said) to regain it, if the Barbarians, who were employ'd in plundering of it, were but surpris'd, and taken as they took them. This exhortation of his was heard with the greatest alacrity that could be among the Soldiers. Whereupon they presently carried forth the Ensigns in all haste, but the Soldiers staid not for the Ensign-bearers, though the Consul and the Forces that were brought back from the Sea, came first to the Bulwark.

L. Atius

L. Atius the Eldest Tribune of the second Legion did not only exhort the Souldiers, but also demonstrated to them; that if the Istrians, who were now Victorious, had ever intended to keep the Camp with the same Arms wherewith they took it, they would first have pursu'd their Enemy (whom they had forced out of it) and then have set good guards at least before the Bulwark: but it was likely enough that they were all now drown'd in Wine and sleep.

With that he commanded A. Baculonius, his own Ensign Bearer, a person of known Courage, to carry forward his Ensign. To which he reply'd, that if they would follow him, he'd so order the matter, that the business should be done so much the sooner: and thereupon with all his strength, having flung the Ensign over the Bulwark, he was the first man of all that enter'd in at the [Camp] Gate. On the other side T. and C. Aelius, Tribunes of the third Legion, were come up with their Horse: being presently follow'd by those, whom they had put two and two upon the labouring Beasts [for Carriage] and, after them, by the Consul also with his whole Army. But some few of the Istrians, who were not quite drunk, had wit enough to run away by times, whilst others of them were kill'd as they lay asleep; and the Romans recover'd all their goods again, except only the Wine and Meat that was devoured. The Roman Souldiers also, who being sick were left behind in the Camp, when they perceived that their own party was come within the Bulwark, took up their Arms again and made a great slaughter. But above all the rest, one C. Popilius, surnamed Sabellus, behaved himself after a signal manner: for he, who was left in the Camp, as having a wound in his Foot, slew far the greatest of the Enemies; of whom there were eight thousand Istrians kill'd, but not a man taken: for that their fury and indignation had made the Roman Souldiers unmindful of the booty. Yet the King of the Istrians was taken in halt, drunk from the Table, and being by his own men set on Horseback, made his escape. On the Conquerors side there fell two hundred thirty seven Souldiers; but more in their morning flight than in recovering their Camp.

Now it so fell out, that Cn. and L. both surnamed Gavillius, new Inhabitants of Aquileia, as they came thither with provisions, had like to have fallen into the hands of the Istrians, whilst they had possession of the Camp. They therefore leaving all their Carriages behind them, and flying back to Aquileia, fill'd all people, not only at Aquileia, but at Rome too with fear and tumult within some few days after: there having been a report brought thither, that the Enemies had not only forced the Camp, and that the Romans were run away (which was true) but that they had lost all, and the whole Army was utterly destroy'd. Wherefore, as is usual in such an hurry, there were extraordinary Levies appointed to be made, not only in the City, but through all Italy too. There were two Legions raised of Roman Citizens, besides that the Latine Allies were injoin'd to send out ten thousand Foot, and three hundred Horse. M. Junius the Consul had Orders to go over into Gaul and muster up out of the Cities of that Province as many as each place could afford. It was likewise decreed, That Tib. Claudius the Prætor should give notice to the Souldiers of the fourth Legions, with five thousand Foot, and two hundred and fifty Horse of the Latine Allies, to rendezvous at Pise; and that in the Consuls absence he should defend that Province: as also, that M. Titinius the Prætor should appoint a day whereon the first Legion, and an equal number of Foot and Horse should meet at Ariminum. Then Nero set forth in his Warlike Garb for Pise, his Province; and Titinius having sent C. Cassius a Tribune military to Ariminum to Command the Legion there, made a Levy at Rome. M. Junius the Consul marched out of Liguria into Gaul, and having raised Auxiliaries as he went out of all the Cities and Colonies in those parts, arriv'd at Aquileia; where he heard that the Army was safe. Thereupon having written Letters to Rome, to allay their tumults, he discharged the Gauls for their obligation to raise such and such Auxiliaries, and went to his Colleague. There was great joy at Rome upon this unexpected news; the Levies were omitted, the Souldiers disbanded, that had taken the military Oath, and the Army, which at Ariminum was sick of the Plague, sent home again. The Istrians, though Encamped with great Forces, not far from the Consuls Camp, when they heard, that the other Consul was come with a new Army, betook themselves every man to his Native City; whilst the Consuls led the Legions back to take up their Winter-Quarters at Aquileia.

The tumults in Istria being thus appeas'd, there was an Order of Senate made; that the Consuls should agree between themselves, which of them should return to Rome to hold the Assembly. At which time, whereas A. Licinius Nerva, and C. Papirius Turdas, in their publick meeting, inveighed severely against Manlius, whilst he was absent, and promulgated a Law to this purpose, That he, after the Ides of March (for the Consuls were already continu'd in Commission for an year longer) should not keep his place; that, when he laid down his Office, he might presently be called to make his defence: Q. Ailius, one of their Collegues, oppos'd the Bill, and after much debate prevailed so far, that it was thrown out. At the same time Tib. Sempronius Gracchus, and L. Postumius Albinus, being return'd out of Spain to Rome, had Audience given them by the Prætor M. Titinius in the Temple of Bellona, to tell what they had perform'd, and to demand their just honours, to the end, that all due praise and worship might be likewise given to the immortal Gods. At the same time they were inform'd by a Letter from T. Aebutius the Prætor, which his Son had brought to the Senate.

IV.

V.

VI.

Senate, that there were great commotions in Sardinia. For the Ilians, united with the Ba-lurians, had invaded the Province, when it was now in a peaceable state. Neither was he able to cope with them, having so weak an Army, that was great part of it destroyed by the Plague. The Sardian Embassadors also brought the same News, humbly begging of the Senate, that they would succour their Cities at least, for their Country was now in a desperate condition. This Embassy, and all things else relating to Sardinia, were referr'd to the new Magistrates; and then there came as lamentable an Embassy from the Lycians, who complained much of the cruelty of the Rhodians, to whom they had been subjected by L. Cornelius Scipio, saying, That they were once under the command of King Antiochus, but that servitude under him, compared to their present circumstances, seemed to us even a glorious liberty. For they were now not only oppress'd by publick Authority in general, but every single Person was made a mere slave. They themselves were abus'd, and not only they, but their Wives and Children also. That their Bodies and their Backs felt the effects of the Rhodian severities; yea their good names too (which was an indignity not to be born) were bespatter'd and defam'd; nor did they stick even openly to commit outrages upon them, to gain and usurp a greater Authority over them, lest they should question, whether there were any difference between themselves and slaves bought for Money. The Senate being concerned at this complaint, sent Letters to the Rhodians to this effect, That they never intended the Lycians should be slaves to the Rhodians, any more than any other Men, that were free born, to any other State or Person; but they design'd that the Lycians should so live under the command and protection of the Rhodians, that both Cities might continue in alliance under the Roman Empire.

VII. Then followed two Triumphs over Spain one after another; in which, first, Sempronius Gracchus triumphed over the Celtiberians and their Allies; and the next Day L. Postumius over the Lusitanians and other Spaniards of that same Country. Tib. Gracchus carried, in his Triumph, through the City forty Thousand Pound weight of Silver, and Albinus twenty Thousand. Both of them divided among their Soldiers twenty five Denarii a piece, to each Centurion double, and to every Horse-man treble; given as much also to Allies as they did to the Romans. It happened at that time, that M. Junius the Consul came out of Istria to Rome upon occasion of that Assembly. Whom when the Tribunes of the People, Papinius and Licinius had in the Senate tired out with their Interrogatories concerning what had been done in Istria, they brought him forth before the People also. To which when People reply'd, That he was not above eleven Days in that Province; and that, as to what was transacted in his absence, he knew no more than they did, but only by common report; they went on still asking him, Why A. Manlius came not to Rome to give the Roman People an account, wherefore he went out of the Province of Gaul (which fell to his lot) into Istria? When the Senate resolv'd upon that War? or the People of Rome consented to it? But (you'll say, no doubt on) though the War was undertaken upon a private design, yet it was carried on with prudence and valour. To which I answer the quite contrary, That 'tis impossible to tell, whether it were undertaken more absurdly, or carry'd on more unadvisedly. For there were two Posts of Guards surpris'd by the Istrians, and their Camp taken with all their Horse and Foot that was in it, the rest scatter'd and disarm'd; among whom the Consul, before all the rest, ran away to the Ships that lay upon the Sea side. Of all which things he should give an account when he was a private Man again, since he would not do it whilst he was Consul.

VIII. After this the Assembly was held, wherein there were Elected for Consuls C. Claudius Pulcher, and Tib. Sempronius Gracchus. The next Day after the Prætors were chosen, P. Aelius Tubero (a second time) C. Quintius Flaminius, C. Numisius, C. Mummius, Cn. Cornelius Scipio, and P. Valerius Levis. Tubero happen'd to have the City Jurisdiction, and Quintius the Foreign; Numisius, Sicily, and Mummius, Sardinia. But that by reason of the great War in it was made a Consul Province, and so Gracchus had it; Claudius had Istria, and Scipio, together with Levis, had Gaul divided between them into two several Provinces. Upon the Ides of March, on which Sempronius and Claudius entered upon their Office, there was only some mention made concerning the Provinces of Sardinia and Istria, and both their Enemies, that had stirr'd up Rebellion in those parts. The next Day the Sardian Embassadors, who were referr'd to the new Magistrates, and L. Minucius Thermus, who had been Lieutenant to the Consul Manlius in Istria, came into the Senate. By them the Senate was informed, how great the War was in those Provinces. The Embassadors of the Latine Allies, who had teaz'd both the Censors, and the former Consuls, were at last brought into the Senate, the sum of whose complaint was, That most of their Citizens, who had been taxed at Rome, were settled there. Which if it were permitted, it would so come to pass within a very few surveys of the People, that their Towns and Country being deserted, would not be able to afford any Soldiers. The Samnites also and the Pelignians complained, That four Thousand Families were gone from them over to Fregellæ, and yet they did not for all that raise a lesser quota in the Army. Now there were two kinds of fraud introduced by this way of single Persons changing their place of abode. The Law allow'd, that all the Allies and Latines who left issue behind them at home, might be made Roman Citizens. But by making an ill use of the Law, some injur'd the Allies, and others the Roman People. For as those, that had Children (that they might not leave any issue in their own Country) made them them Slaves to any Roman Citizens that would take them, upon condition, that they should [after a while] be made free; so those, that had none to leave, were made Roman Citizens themselves. Nay afterward, despising these shadows of Law, they went over promiscuously, with any Law, and without any issue at all, by removing and being taxed, and were admitted into the freedom of Rome. The Embassadors therefore desired a redress of these things: first, that they would order their Allies to return into their several Cities; and next, that they would make a Law, that no man should make any other person his [Slave or alienate him, so as that he might change the place of his abode; or, if any man were in that manner made a Roman Citizen, he should be disfranchis'd. These things were accordingly commanded by the Senate [to be observed.]

IX. After this, the Provinces, that were at War (Sardinia and Istria) were taken care of. For Sardinia there were two Legions order'd to be rais'd, five thousand men in each of them, with two hundred Foot, three hundred Horse, twelve thousand Foot of the Allies and Latines, six hundred Horse, and ten Gallies of five Banks, if he [that had the charge of that Province] would take them out of the Docks. For Istria also there were allow'd as many Foot and Horse, as for Sardinia. The Consuls were likewise commanded to send into Spain, to M. Titinius, one Legion, with three hundred Horse, five thousand Foot of the Allies, and two hundred and fifty Horse. Before the Consuls chose their Provinces, there were several Prodigies related: That a Stone fell in the Cruustumine Territories, from Heaven, into the Lake of Mars. That a Boy was born in the Dominions of Rome without Legs, Arms, or an Head, and that there was a Snake seen with four feet. That at Capua, a great many Houses in the Market-place, were burnt by Lightning; and that, at Putcoli, two Ships were burnt by the stroke of a Thunderbolt. Besides these things which came by report, a Wolf also that was couf'd at Rome in the day time, having enter'd in at the Colline Gate, got out again at the Esquiline, with a great crowd of people pursuing him. Upon the score of those Prodigies, the Consuls sacrificed the bigger sort of Victims, and there was a Supplication made one whole day in all the Temples. When these Sacrifices were duly perform'd, they chose their Provinces: of which Claudius happen'd to have Istria, and Sempronius Sardinia. Then C. Claudius pass'd a Law by Order of Senate, and set out a Proclamation thereupon; That whoever of the Allies and Latines, they or their Ancestors, were taxed (when M. Claudius and Titus Quintius were Censors, or since that time) among the Latine Allies, should every man of them return into their own Cities before the first of November [then ensuing.] The inquiry concerning those that did not so return, was committed to L. Mummius the Prætor. To which Law and Edict of the Consuls there was added this Order of Senate; That the Dictator, Consul, Intervex, Censor, or Prætor, for the time being, then upon the Bench, should not admit any man to his freedom, upon any other terms, than that the person, who came to be made free, would swear, that he did not do it with design, to change the place of his abode: and that he who would not take that Oath, should not be made free. This charge and jurisdiction was afterward committed to C. Claudius the Consul.

X. Whilst these things were transacted at Rome, M. Junius, and A. Manlius, who had been Consuls the year before, having Winter'd at Aquileia, in the beginning of the Spring brought their Army into Istria. Where since they made an extravagant ravage, grief and indignation, more than any confidence that they had strength enough to cope with two Armies, excited the Istrians, when they saw their Country plunder'd in that manner. Thereupon, the youth flocking together from all the quarters of their Country, they made up a tumultuary Army of a sudden, that fought at the first onset more keenly than that they could long hold out. There were four thousand of them kill'd in the Battle, and the rest, quitting the Field, fled several ways into their respective Cities. Thereupon they sent Embassadors, first into the Roman Camp, to desire a Peace, and afterward Hostages, as they were commanded. When these things were known at Rome, by means of Letters from the Pro-Consuls, C. Claudius the Consul fearing, lest that perchance might be the occasion of his losing the Province, and the Army, he went with all speed in the night time into his Province, without making any Vows, without his Warlike Garb, and without any Lictors, telling no body in the World but his Colleague of his departure; but behaved himself there more unadvisedly than he came. For when, in a publick Assembly, that he called, he had given out that A. Manlius fled from the Camp, very disagreeably to the Souldiers (for they themselves were the first that moved) and had reproach'd M. Junius, for having made himself his Colleagues Partner in the dishonour, at last he commanded both of them to depart the Province. Whereupon when the Souldiers said, They should obey the Consuls Order, when he, according to the custom of his Ancestors, was come from the City, after he had made his Vows in the Capitol, with Lictors, and in his Warlike Garb; he was raving mad with anger, and calling to him one, who was as Questor to Manlius, bid him bring thither Chains; for he'd send Junius and Manlius bound to Rome. But that person too condemn'd the Consuls Order; and all the Army, standing round about, and favouring the cause of their Generals as much as they hated the Consul, gave him encouragement not to obey it. At last the Consul, being tired with the reproaches of particular persons, and the taunts (for they jeered him too) of the multitude, he return'd to Aquileia in the same Ship, wherein he came.

came. Then he wrote to his Colleague; to give order to that part of the Souldiery, who were design'd for Istria, to meet at Aquileia; left any thing should keep him at Rome longer than he could make his Vows, and go out of the City in his Warlike Garb. This his Colleague did very carefully, and gave them a short day to make their Rendezvous in. Claudius almost overtook his Letter: and when he came, having made a publick Speech concerning Junius and Manlius, he staid not above three dayes at Rome, but, after he had got on his Armour, and made his Vows in the Capitol, went with Licitors into the Province in the same halt as before.

XI. Some few dayes before Junius and Manlius with all their force attack'd the Town of Nesattium, into which the Istrian Princes, and their petit King Apulo himself was fled. To which place Claudius having brought the two new Legions, and dismiss'd the old Army with all its Officers, himself beset the Town, and began to attempt it with Galleries; turning a River that ran by the Walls (which was not only an hinderance to the Besiegers, but afforded Water also to the Istrians) by many days pains and toil into a new Channel. That terrified the Barbarians, who were amazed to see their Water cut off: though even then they never thought of Peace; but turning their fury upon their Wives and Children (that their barbarity might appear to the Enemy also) they kill'd and tumbled them down from the Walls. Amidst the cries and cruel slaughter of the Women and Children, the Souldiers got over the Wall and enter'd the Town. Upon the taking whereof, when the King heard the hurly-burly by the frightful noise of those that endeavour'd to make their escape, he ran himself through, that he might not be taken alive: the rest were all either taken or slain. After that, there were two other Towns, Mutula and Favaria, taken by storm and utterly destroy'd. The booty, for a poor Country, was more than they hoped for, but all given to the Souldiers. There were sold for Slaves five thousand six hundred thirty two persons. The Authors of the War were lash'd with Rods, and beheaded with an Axe. So Istria in general was reduced into a peaceable condition by the sacking of three Towns, and the Death of their King; and all the Nations round about came with Hostages and made their surrender. About the end of the Istrian War there were consultations held in Liguria about another.

XII. Tib. Claudius, the Pro-Consul, who had been Prætor the year before, was Governour of Pise, where he had a Garison consisting of one Legion. By whose Letters the Senate being inform'd, thought fit that those very Letters should be carry'd to C. Claudius the other Consul, who was gone over into Sardinia: and added a Decree; that, since the Province of Istria was now settled, if he thought fit, he might bring his Army over into Liguria. At the same time, upon the account of the Consuls Letter, which he wrote out of Istria, concerning his achievements there, there was a Supplication appointed for two dayes. The other Consul also, Tib. Sempronius Gracchus, had good success in Sardinia. For he led his Army into the Territory of Ilian Sardinians; whither there came a great number of Auxiliaries from the Balarians. He therefore engaged hand to hand with both Nations; utterly routing the Enemy, and forced them from their Camp, twelve thousand of them being slain. The next day the Consul gave order, that the Arms should be all gather'd together into an heap, which he burnt as a Sacrifice to Vulcan. Then he led his victorious Army back into their Winter Quarters, which were the affociated Cities; and C. Claudius, having receiv'd Tib. Claudius's Letter, together with the Order of Senate, brought over his Legions out of Istria into Liguria. The Enemy by that time having marched forward were Encamped in a Plain near the River Scultenna: where he fought them; kill'd fifteen thousand and took above seven hundred, either in the Field, or in the Camp (for that he also made himself Master of) with fifty one military Ensigns. The Ligurians that escaped alive fled several wayes into the Mountains, nor did any of them appear in Arms all the while the Consul was pillaging the Champaign Country. Then Claudius, being Conqueror of two Nations in one year, which seldom any one had been before him, and having settled the Provinces, return'd in his Consulship to Rome.

XIII. There were certain Prodigies related that year: That at Crustumium a Bird, which they call an Osprey, cut a sacred Stone [or Statue of some God perchance] with its Beak. That in Campania an Oxe spoke. That a brazen Cow, at Syracuse, was bull'd by a Bull of that Country, that had straid from the Herd, and sprinkled with his seed. For which, at Crustumium, there was a Supplication one whole day in the very place. In Campania, the Oxe was given to be kept by the publick: and the Syracusan Prodigy was expiated by supplication to such Gods as the Soothsayers named. M. Claudius Marcellus, who had been Consul and Censor, dy'd that year: and in his place was chosen M. Marcellus his Son. There was also a Colony of two thousand Roman Citizens carry'd to Luna the same year, by three persons [chosen for that purpose] whose names were, P. Aelius, L. Egilius, and Cn. Sicinius. There were fifty one Acres and an half of Land given to each man; which Land was taken from the Ligurians, having belong'd to the Tuscanes before it did to the Ligurians. C. Claudius the Consul came to the City, and, (having discours'd in the Senate concerning his prosperous Achievements in Istria and Liguria) upon his request, had a triumph decreed him. So he triumph'd, in his Magistracy, over two Nations at once: and carry'd in his triumph three hundred hundred and seven thousand Denarii, with eighty five thousand seven hundred and two Victoriati [i. e. pieces of money with the Goddess of Victories Image upon them.] He gave to every private Souldier fifteen Denarii; double to a Centurion, and treble to an Horseman: and to the Allies half as much as to Citizens: wherefore they follow'd his Chariot, and (that you might perceive they were angry) said nothing.

Whilest that Triumph over the Ligurians was celebrated, the Ligurians, perceiving that not only the Consular Army was carry'd away to Rome, but the Legion at Pise disbanded by Tib. Claudius, were delivered from their fear, and therefore, having raised an Army privately, they went through cross-wayes over the Mountains into the Plains, where having plunder'd the Territory of Mutina, they surpriz'd the Colony and took it. Of which when the news came to Rome, the Senate order'd C. Claudius the Consul to call the Assembly as soon as possible, and, when he had chosen Magistrates for the year ensuing, to return into his Province, to rescue the Colony from the Enemy. Accordingly, as the Senate would have it, the Assembly was held; at which there were Created for Consuls, Cn. Cornelius Scipio Hispanus, and Q. Petillius Spurinus. Then the Prætors were EleCted, viz. M. Popillius Lenas, P. Licinius Crassus, M. Cornelius Scipio, L. Papirius Maso, and L. Aquilius Gallus. C. Claudius was continu'd in Commission for another year (Gaul being his Province) and order'd, left the Istrians also should do the same, that the Ligurians had done, to send those Latine Allies, whom he had brought out of the Province upon the score of his triumph, into Istria. As Cn. Cornelius, and Q. Petillius the Consuls, that day they enter'd upon their Office, were sacrificing to Jupiter, each of them an Oxe (according as the custom is) in that Victim, which Q. Petillius offer'd, the Liver was found without an Head [or upper Lobe.] Which when the Senate heard of, they order'd him to make a new Sacrifice of another Oxe. After that, the Senate, being consulted concerning the Provinces, assign'd Pise and Liguria to the Consuls; with a charge, that he, to whose Lot Pise fell, when the time for electing of Magistrates came, should come home, to hold the Assembly. To which Decree there was this addition made; that they should raise two new Legions, and three hundred Horse, in-joining the Allies and Latines, to bring in ten thousand Foot, and six hundred Horse. T. Claudius was continu'd in Commission till the Consul came into the Province.

Whilest the Senate consulted about these affairs, C. Cornelius, who was called out [of the House] by a Messenger, having gone forth of the Temple, return'd immediately with a troubled Countenance, and told the Senate, that the Liver of an Oxe, which he had sacrificed, turn'd all to Water: which because he did not believe upon the Sacrificers bare relation, he himself caused the water to be poured out of the Pot, in which the Entrails were boiled, and saw all the rest of the Entrails whole, but the Liver strangely consumed. The Senate being affrighted at this Prodigy, the other Consul also made them yet more concern'd, by telling them, that he could not make a grateful Sacrifice, though he had offer'd three Oxen, the head of the Liver having been wanting. Thereupon the Senate gave Order, that they should Sacrifice the bigger sort of Victims, till they found a pleasing Sacrifice. Now they say all the other Gods were pleased, but that Petillius did not make any Sacrifice that was acceptable to [the God of] Health [or Safety.] Then the Consuls and Prætors chose their Provinces. Cn. Cornelius happen'd to have Pise, and Petillius Liguria. The Prætors, L. Papirius Maso, the City, and M. Abarius the Foreign Jurisdiction. M. Cornelius Scipio Maluginensis the farther Spain, and L. Aquilius Gallus Sicily. Two of them desired, that they might not go into their Provinces: M. Popillius into Sardinia; saying; That Gracchus was at that time settling that Province, and that T. Aebutius was assign'd him by the Senate to be his assistant. That therefore it was not at all convenient, that the tenour of affairs should be interrupted, in which the very continuation of them was most effectual toward their performance. For between the resignation of a command, and the rawness of a Successor, who was to be informed before he could do any business, the occasions of good management were often lost. Popillius excuse was approved of: and then P. Licinius Crassus said, That he was hinder'd from going into his Province by solemn Sacrifices [which he had offer'd:] (He happen'd to have the hither Spain) but he was order'd, either to go, or to swear in a publick Assembly, that he was hinder'd by solemn Sacrifice. Which being so resolv'd upon in the case of P. Licinius, M. Cornelius also desired, that they would take an Oath of him too, that he might not go into the farther Spain. Both the Prætors swore the same thing. So M. Titinius and T. Fonteius, the Pro-Consuls were order'd to stay in Spain with the same Commission as before: and that, for a Supplement to them, there should be sent thither three thousand Roman Citizens, with two hundred Horse, five thousand Latine Allies, and three hundred Horse.

The Latine Holy-Days were then kept upon the fourth of May, on which because at the making of one Sacrifice the Lanuvian Officer did not pray in these Words, Populo Romano Quiritium [i. e. for the People of Rome call'd Quirites] it was look'd upon as matter of Religious concernment. Which being reported in the Senate, they referr'd it to the College of Priests, who, seeing the Latine Holy-Days had not been duly kept, resolv'd, that the Lanuvians, by whose default it became necessary to celebrate them anew, should provide the Sacrifices for the instauration thereof. It increas'd their Religious dread too, in that Cn. Cornelius the Consul, as he came back from the Mountain of Alba, fell down, and being being disabled in part of his Limbs, went to the Waters at Cuma, but there (his distemper growing upon him) dy'd; and being brought from thence to Rome, had a Noble Funeral made for him, and was buried. He had been High Priest. Then the Consul Q. Petillius being commanded, as soon as he could by any tokens from the Sooth-sayers, to hold an Assembly for Electing of a Collegue, and let forth an order for the keeping of the Latine Holy Days, appointed the Assembly to be on the second of August, and the Latine Holy Days to begin on the tenth of the same Month. But now when their minds were full of Religious thoughts, there were Prodigies also related, That at Tusculum there was a blaze seen in the Sky; that at Gabii the Temple of Apollo and many private Houses, and, at Graviscæ, the Wall and a Gate were burnt by Lightning, all which the Senate ordered to be expiated, as the Priests should think fit. In the mean time, whilst, first, Religious Matters, and next the Death of one the other (together with the renewing of the Latine Holy Days) hindered the Consuls, C. Claudius advanced with his Army to Mutina, which the Ligurians the Year before had taken. Before three Days were past, from the time that he began to attack it, he retriev'd it from the Enemy, and restor'd it to the former Inhabitants. There were eight Thousand Ligurians slain within the Walls of it, and a Letter immediately sent to Rome, in which he did not only tell the story, but boasted also, That, through his valour and good success, there was no Enemy of the Roman People now on this side the Alps; and that he had taken as much Land, as might be divided, share and share like, among many Thousands of Men.

XVII. Tib. Sempronius also at the same time in Sardinia subdu'd the Sardians in several successful Battels, in which he slew fifteen Thousand Men. All the Sardians, who had revolted, were reduced: the old stipendiaries had a Tax laid upon and exacted from them, and the rest contributed Corn. Having settled the Province, and received two Hundred and thirty Hostages out of the whole Island, he sent Embassadors to Rome to tell the News, and to desire of the Senate, That for those things which had been so prosperously carry'd on, by the conduct and good fortune of Tib. Sempronius, all honour might be paid to the Immortal Gods, and he might have leave, when he quitted the Province, to bring his Army home with him. The Senate, having given the Embassadors Audience in Apollo's Temple, appointed a Supplication for two Days, ordered the Consuls to sacrifice forty of the bigger sort of Victims, and Voted that Tib. Sempronius the Proconsul, with his Army, should stay that Year in his Province. Then the Assembly, for choosing of one Consul [in the place of him that was Dead] which was appointed to be on the second of August, was held that very Day; on which Q. Petillius created M. Valerius Levinus for his Collegue, to begin his Office forthwith. He having been a long time desirous to have a Province (to comply with his desire) there were Letters brought, That the Ligurians had renewed the War; and therefore on the fifth of August he put himself in Armour, and to appease that Tumult sent the third Legion into Gaul to C. Claudius the Proconsul, ordering two Naval Duumvirs [Admirals] to go with a Fleet to Pise, and Coast about Liguria, to terrifie them from the Sea also. Q. Petillius likewise had appointed his Army a Day to Rendezvous at the same place. And C. Claudius the Proconsul too, having heard of the Rebellion in Liguria (besides those Forces that he had with him at Parma) muster'd up a Body of subitary Soldiers, and march with an Army to the Confines of the Ligurians.

XVIII. Upon the arrival of C. Claudius (by whose Conduct they remember'd they had been lately conquer'd and routed near the River Scutenna) resolving to defend themselves against that Force of which they had had such fatal experience, more by the strength and secure situation of the places, than by their Arms, possessed themselves of two Mountains call'd Latus and Baliffa; which though they had encompassed, besides, with a Wall, yet, going somewhat too late out of the Plains, they were surpris'd and perish'd, to the number of fifteen hundred. The rest kept up in the Mountains, where, not forgetting (even amidst their fear) their native barbarity, they commit many outrages upon the Booty that they had gotten at Mutina. For they kill'd (and not only so, but shamelessly tore) the Captives, rather killing than duly and properly sacrificing Beasts in every Temple. When they were glutted with the slaughter of living Creatures, they hung up upon the Walls things that were inanimate (Vessels of all sorts, made more for use than ornament) for a shew. Then Q. Petillius the Consul (for fear the War should be ended in his absence) sent a Letter to C. Claudius, To come to him with his Army into Gaul, and that he would stay for him in the Macrian Plains. Claudius, as soon as he received the Letter, decamp'd out of Liguria, and deliver'd up his Army to the Consul upon the fore-mentioned Plains. Thither also, some few Days after, came the other Consul, C. Valerius. And then, dividing the Forces, before they parted, they both survey'd and purified their Armies; and, after that, cast lots which way they should go, because they resolv'd not to attack the Enemy both on the same side. Now it was evident that Valerius made a due choice, because he was in the Temple; but the Augurs said, that Petillius had done it with some defect, for that he put the lot into the balloting box without the Temple, and then brought it in. After this, they went into several parts of the Country; Petillius being encamped against the top of Baliffa and Latus, that joyns those Mountains together with a perpetual ridge. There, they lay, as he was publicly publicly encouraging his men, he, not taking notice of the ambiguity of the word, said (ominously) Se eo die Letum captivum esse [i.e. either, that he would take the Hill Letus, or (which he did not intend to say) that he would, that day, catch his death; Letum signifying death also.] Thereupon he began to ascend the opposite Mountains in two places together: and that part [of the Forces] where he himself was, came up very nimbly after him; but the other was beaten off by the Enemy. Whom when the Consul rode up to retrieve, he recover'd his Souldiers from their flight; though he himself, whilst he stood too negligently before the Ensigns, was struck through the Body with a Javelin and fell down dead. But the Enemy did not perceive that the General was kill'd; besides that those few of his own men, who saw it, were very careful to conceal the Body, as knowing, that thereupon depended their Victory. The other multitude of Horse and Foot, having forced the Enemy down, took the Mountains without a General. In which action there were full five thousand Ligurians slain; though there fell not of the Roman Army above fifty two. Besides the manifest event of so sad an Omen [as was in the Consuls own words] they were informed by the Augur also, that there was a defect in their divination by the Birds too, and that the Consul knew. C. Valerius having heard * * Those that were well skill'd in religious Rites, and the common Laws of the Nation, said, that, seeing the two ordinary Consuls of that year were dead; one of a Disease, and the other in the Wars, the Consul, [Levinus] who was chosen into the room of the former, could not old the Assembly, carried away.

Now on this side the Apennine were the Garules, Lapicines, and Hercates, and beyond the Apennine, the Brinnates. Near the River Audena P. Mucius made War against them, who had plunder'd Luna and Pise, and, having reduced all of them, took away their Arms. Upon the score of those things which were perform'd in Gaul and Liguria, by the Conduct and good Fortune of the two Consuls, the Senate appointed supplications to be made three dayes together, and forty Victims to be sacrificed. The Gallick and Ligurian tumult also, which arose in the beginning of that year, was quickly and with ease suppress'd. And now the concern of a Macedonian War came on, since Perseus did what he could to create animosities between the Bastarnians and the Dardans: besides that, the Embassadors, who were sent into Macedonia, to see how things stood, were now come back to Rome, and brought word, that there was War already made in Dardania. There came likewise at the same time from King Perseus certain Envoys, to acquit him; [saying] that he neither sent for the Bastarnians, nor did they do any thing by his instigation. The Senate neither clear'd the King of their Charge, nor yet condemn'd him: only bid the Embassadors advise him, to be very careful religiously to preserve the League, which he was known to be obliged by to the Romans. The Dardans, seeing that the Bastarnians would not only not depart their Country (as they had hopes they would have done) but that they grew more intolerable also every day than other (as relying upon the assistance of the Neighbouring Thracians, and the Scordians) thought fit to make even some rash attempt, and so met all together from every part of their Country, at a Town that lay next to the Bastarnian Camp. It was Winter and they had chosen that time of the year, that the Thracians and Scordians might go into their own Territories. Which being done, when they heard that the Bastarnians were now alone, they divided their Forces into two parts; the one to go strait forward and attack them openly, the other round about through a pathless Wood, and set upon them behind. But before they could get round the Enemies Camp, the Battle was begun: and the Dardanes being conquer'd were forced back into their City, which was near twelve thousand paces from the Bastarnian Camp. The Conquerers presently beset the City, not doubting, but either the Enemy would surrender the next day for fear, or they should take it by force. In the mean time the other Party of Dardans, that went about, not knowing what their fellows had suffer'd, [attack'd] the Bastarnian Camp, which was left without defence — Manner, sat on an Ivory Throne as Judge, and debated the smallest points in Controversie: and so fickle was his mind to every kind of Fortune (wandering through all conditions of life) that neither he nor any Body else knew, what a sort of a man he was. He would not speak to his best Friends, nor hardly smile upon those that were his most intimate acquaintance. He would Fool both himself and others with his unequal munificence: for to some, persons of quality, that thought very greatly of themselves, he would make childish Presents, as Sweet-meats and toys, and to enrich others, who expected nothing from him. Wherefore some people thought he knew not what he did: others, that he did it in a kind of an humour; and others, that he was absolutely mad. Yet in two great and honourable things he shew'd himself much a King, that is to say, in his Presents that he made to several Cities, and his worship of the Gods. He promised the Megalopolitans in Arcadia, that he would Wall their City round, and actually gave them the major part of the money [toward it.] At Tegea he began to build a magnificent Theatre all of marble. At

P P P P P 2

Cyzicus

XIX.

XX.

Cyzicum, he gave the golden Vellels of one Table to the Prytaneum, that is, the Council-House of the City, where, those that arrived to that honour, were publickly maintain'd. To the Rhodians he gave many gifts of all sorts, as their use required, though ne'r an one of them were very remarkable. But of his magnificence to the Gods, that one Temple of Jupiter Olympius at Athens, which is the only one in the World, design'd to sute the grandeur of that God, may be a witness: though he adorn'd Delos too with curious Altars and a great number of Statues. At Antioch also he promised to build a Temple to Jupiter Capitolinus, not only ciel'd with gold, but cover'd (all its Walls) with golden Plates; besides many other things to several other places, which, because his reign was so very short, he had not time to perform. He likewise outdid all former Kings in the magnificence of his publick shows of all sorts; particularly in those that were proper to his own Country Fashion, and in variety of Grecian Artifts. He set forth a Prize of Gladiators, [i.e. Sword-men] after the Roman way, which, at first, rather terrified than pleas'd the people [of Macedonia] who were not used to such fights: though in process of time, by often repeating of it, sometimes, till they wounded one another, and sometimes even to death, he made it a grateful sight to their Eyes, yea, and thereby enflamed many of the young sparks with the love of Arms. So that he, who, at first, was wont to send for Gladiators from Rome at a great rate, now by his own

XXI.

L. Cornelius Scipio had the Foreign Jurisdiction [of the City;] and M. Atilius the Prætor happen'd to have Sardinia: but was order'd to go over into Corfica with the new Legion, which the Consuls had rais'd, consisting of five thousand Foot and three hundred Horse. Whilst he was making War there, Cornelius was continu'd in Commission, and to have the Government of Sardinia. Cn. Servilius was to go into the farther Spain, and P. Furius Philus into the hither, with three thousand Roman Foot, a hundred and fifty Horse, five thousand Latine Foot, and three hundred Horse; L. Claudius being to have Sicily without any supply. The Consuls were likewise order'd to raise two new Legions, with a due number of Horse and Foot, to impose the raising of ten thousand Foot and six hundred Horse upon the Allies. The Levy of the Consuls was so much the more difficult, for that the pestilence, which was so rife the year before among the Beasts, was then turn'd to a distemper among men. They who happen'd to have it, scarce ever out-lived the seventh day; or if they did escape, were troubled with some tedious Disease, most commonly a Quartan [Ague.] The Slaves died most; for there were heaps of them unburied in every Street; nor could they bury all even of the Freemen. The dead Bodies lay untoucht by Dogs or Vulturs, till the plague consumed them, and it was well known, that, neither that nor the year before, though there were such a mortality of men and Beasts, there was ne'r a Vultur seen. The publick Priests dy'd of that Plague; viz. Cn. Servilius Capio, the Priest, Father to the Prætor; Tib. Sempronius, Son to Caius; Longus Decemvir of the sacred Rites; P. Aelius Patius the Augur; Tib. Sempronius Gracchus; C. Mamilius Vitulus the Grand Curio [Chief Alderman] and M. Sempronius Tuditanus the Priest; in whose place was chosen C. Sulpicius Galba; For Augurs there were Elected into the room of Gracchus, T. Veturius Gracchus Sempronianus: into that of P. Aelius, Q. Aelius Pætus; C. Sempronius Longus being made Decemvir of the sacred Rites, and C. Scribonius Curio, chief Alderman of all the Wards in the City. Then, seeing the Plague continued, the Senate decreed, that the Decemviri should consult the Sibylls Books: and by their Order, there was a Supplication for one day. Besides that, Q. Marcins Philippus saying the words before them, the people made a Vow in the Forum; that, if the Disease and the Pestilence were once removed out of the Roman Territory, they would keep Holy-Day, and make supplication for two dayes together. In the Vician Dominions there was a Boy born with two Heads, as at Sinuessa, with one hand; and at Oximum, a Girl, with Teeth. There was a Bow likewise seen bent in the Sky, by day, when the Heaven was clear, with three Suns shining at one time: besides that several blazes the same night streamed through the air in the Territory of Lanuvium. The Cerites also affirmed that there appeared, in their Town, a Snake with a Crest, adorn'd all over with golden spots: and it was well known, that in the Territory of Campania, an Oxe spoke.

XXII.

The Embassadors return'd out of Africa on the fifth of June, who, having first waited upon King Massinissa, had gone to Carthage: but they had been inform'd somewhat more certainly by the King of what was done at Carthage, than by the Carthaginians themselves. Yet they affirm'd, of their own knowledge, that there came Embassadors from King Perseus, and that they had an Audience of the Senate there, by night, in the Temple of Aesculapius. Moreover, as the King had said, That there were Embassadors sent from Carthage into Macedonia, so they themselves could scarce deny it. The Roman Senate too thought fit to send Embassadors into Macedonia; and accordingly three were sent, viz. C. Laelius, M. Valerius Messala, and Sex. Digittus. At that time Perseus, because some of the Dolopes did not obey him, but, besides that, referr'd the Debate concerning some things in question, from him, again to the Romans, went out with an Army, and forced the whole Nation to submit to his power and determination. From thence he went over the Atean Mountains, having some religious thoughts in his mind, and so up toward the Oracle at Delphi. But when he appeared peared in the middle of Greece, he gave great disturbance, not only to the adjacent Cities, but the news of that tumult came even into Asia also, to King Eumenes. Having staid not above three dayes at Delphi, he return'd through Achaia Phthoris [in Thessaly] and Thessaly, without doing any damage or injury to the Countries through which he travelled. Nor was he satisfied with making those Cities only through which he was to go, his Friends: but he sent either Embassadors or Letters, to desire them, that they would no longer remember those animosities, that had been between them and his Father: for they were not so fatal, but that they might and ought to be compos'd and made an end of with him. That he, for his part, was entirely dispos'd to contract an Alliance with them. But he desired most of all to find out a way, how he might reconcile the Achaens to him.

This Nation alone, of all Greece, and the City of Athens, were arriv'd at that pitch of anger, That they forbade the Macedonians from coming to their Dominions. Wherefore when the slaves fled out of Achaia, Macedonia was their refuge; because when the Achaens had forbidden the Macedonians their Country, they themselves durst not enter into the Confines of that Kingdom. When Perseus had observ'd, he seiz'd them all, and then sent a Letter to the Achaens, wherein he told them, That he had freely and kindly sent back their Servants, who had fled away into his Kingdom; but they themselves ought to take care, that there were no such flight of their slaves for the future. This Letter being read by Xenarchus, the State-holder, who sought an opportunity of contracting a private friendship with the King; and many of them being of opinion that the Letter was written with moderation and kindness (especially those, who, beyond all expectation, were to receive their shares again, whom they had lost) Callicrates (who was one of them, that thought the safety of their Nation depended upon their keeping their League with the Romans inviolably) said, Some of you, Achaens! think 'tis a small, indifferent business which we are now upon; but I am of opinion, that the greatest and most weighty affair, that we have, is not only now in hand, but also, in a manner, done. For we, who had interdicted the Kings of Macedon and the Macedonians themselves, our Consines, and have resolv'd that that Decree should stand good; viz. that we would not admit of any Embassadors, or Messengers from those Kings, by whom the minds of any of us might be disturb'd, we even we, in some sense, hear the King himself making Speeches to us, though at a distance, and (in good time) approve of his Oration; and though wild Beasts most commonly are shy, and fly from meat that is laid for a bait to them, we are so blind, as to be drawn in by the specious offer of a small Courtship: and out of hopes to have a few inconsiderable Slaves again, suffer our own liberty to be struck at and subverted. For who does not see, that an Alliance with the King is aimed at, by which the Roman League, wherein is contain'd all we have, is certainly violated? Unless there be any body, that question, whether the Romans must have a War with Perseus, or that what was expected when Philip was alive, but interrupted by his death, will come to pass now since he is gone. Philip, you know, had two Sons, Demetrius and Perseus: of whom Demetrius was far beyond [the other] as to his extract by the Mothers side, for Courage, Wit, and in the favour of the Macedonians. But, because he had made his Kingdom the reward of hatred to the Romans, he murder'd Demetrius for no other crime, than because he was a Friend to the Romans; and made Perseus, who, the Roman People resolv'd, should inherit punishment, before the Kingdom, King. Upon which score, what hath this Perseus done ever since his Fathers death but prepare for a War? He first sent the Bastarnians (to the terror of all people) into Dardania: who if they had kept that seat, would have been more troublesome Neighbours to Greece, than ever the Gauls were to Asia. But, though he were disappointed of that hope, yet he did not totally lay aside the thoughts of a War: but rather, if we would tell the truth, hath already begun a War. For he hath by his Arms subdu'd Dolopia, nor would he bear them when they call'd him back to take the judgment of the Roman People concerning the Provinces in debate. From thence going over Æta, that he might be seen of a sudden in the very Centre of Greece, he went up to Delphi. What do you think this usurpation of an unusual rode means? Then he travelled through Thessaly: which because he did without doing any of them the least injury, I fear his design so much the more. From thence he sent a Letter to us with a specious show of a present: and bids us take care, that we do not want such a kindness another time; that is to say, that we rescind the Decree, whereby the Macedonians are prohibited to come into Peloponnesus: and that we [so order the business as that we] may see the Kings Embassadors again, Friendships contracted with our great men, and soon after the Macedonian Army, yea the King himself from Delphi (for how small a freight runs between us?) coming over into Peloponnesus: that we may be mixt with the Macedonians who are arming themselves against the Romans. I, for my part, am of opinion, that we ought not to make any new Decree, but keep all things entire as they are, till we come to a certain resolution, whether this fear of mine be true, or false: If the Peace shall continue inviolate between the Romans and the Macedonians, let us also contract a Friendship and Commerce with them; but at this time I think it dangerous and unreasonable to think of any such matter.

Alter him Archo, Brother to Xenarchus the Stateholder, discours'd to this effect: Callicrates hath made it an hard matter, either for me any body else of us, that dissent from him, to speak upon this occasion; for he, by pleading the cause of the Roman Alliance, and saying, that it is attempted and attack'd, when no body either attempts or attacks it, so order'd the business, that whoever should dissent from him, might seem to speak against the Romans. And first of all, as though:

XXIV.

though he had not been here with us, but either come from the Roman Senate, or had been of the Kings Cabinet Council, he knows and tells us all manner of things, though done never so privately: yea he divines too, what would have come to pass, if Philip had lived. Why Perseus was made Heir to the Crown; why the Macedonians obey him, and what the Romans think. But it behoves us, who neither know for what cause, nor how Demetrius died; nor what Philip, if he had lived, would have done, to accommodate our Counsels to things, that are publicly transacted. We know indeed, that Perseus, when he had received the Kingdom, sent Embassadors to Rome, and that he was stiled King by the Romans: and we hear also, that there came Embassadors from Rome to him, whom he very kindly received. Now all these things I take to be signs of Peace, and not of War: nor that the Romans can be offended, if, as we follow'd them, when they waged War, so now also we agree with them, as the Authors of Peace. For truly I don't see, Why we, above all mankind, should undertake an inexpiable War against the Kingdom of Macedonia. We obnoxious to Macedonia by our being too near that Kingdom; or the weakest people in the World; even like the Dolopes, whom he so lately subdu'd? No, quite contrary; we are secure in our own strength, through the blessing of the Gods, or by the distance of place: But granting that were equally subject unto him, as the Thessalians and Aetolians are; admit, that we who were always their Friends and Allies, had no greater credit and authority with the Romans, than the Aetolians, who were but t'other day their professed Enemies, why should not we have the same privilege and correspondence with the Macedonians, as the Aetolians, Thessalians, Epirotes, and all Greece hath? Why should we alone so execrably desert, as it were, the very Laws of humane Society? Suppose that Philip did do somewhat, to give us occasion of making this Decree against him, arm'd as he then was, and making War upon us; yet what hath Perseus done, the new King, who is innocent of any injury to us, yea by his own kindness blots out the memory of his Fathers animosities? Why are we, above all others, his Enemies? Though I could tell you too, that the merits of the former Macedonian Kings toward our Nation were so great, that we ought to forget the particular injuries of Philip, if he did us any, especially after his death. When the Roman Fleet stood at Cenchreae, and the Consul was with an Army at Velatiae, we were three dayes in debate, whether we should side with the Romans, or with Philip. The present fear of the Romans somewhat inclin'd our minds: yet certainly there was something, that caus'd so long a deliberation; and that was really the ancient Alliance between us and the Macedonians, together with the former and great deserts of their Kings toward us. Let those therefore at this time too prevail with us, that we may be, though not their greatest Friends, yet at least, not their greatest Enemies. Let us not pretend, Callicrates, to that, which is no part of our present business: no man desires a new Alliance, or a new League whereby we should engage and oblige our selves: but only that we may have a free Commerce, to do and require what is right and just; left by forbidding them our Country we should keep our selves out of that Kingdom, and so prepare a place for our Slaves to fly to. What's this to the Roman League? Why do we make a small, and an evident thing so great and so suspected? Why do we stir up vain tumults? Why do we make other people suspected and hated, that we our selves may have an opportunity of flattering the Romans? If there be a War, Perseus, to be sure, does not question, but we'll join with the Romans. However, whilst there is Peace, let our animosities (though they are not ended) be at least intermitted. Now though the same persons who had assented to the Kings Letter, agreed to this Speech also, yet through the indignation of some of the Nobility, who were mightily concern'd that Perseus should think to obtain that by a few lines, which he did not think worth so much as an Embassy, the Decree was deferr'd. After that there were Embassadors sent from the King, when the Council sat at Megalopolis: where they, who were afraid of offending the Romans, endeavour'd to hinder their being admitted.

XXV. About this time the fury of the Aetolians, being turn'd upon themselves, seem'd likely by their much bloodshed to be the utter ruine of their Nation. But then both Parties, being tired out, sent Embassadors to Rome, and among themselves also treated concerning a reconciliation: though that was impeded by a new unhappy accident, which reinforced all their former animosities. For though the banish'd Hypataeans, who were of Proxenus's Faction, were promised to return into their Country, and that Eupolemus, the Governour of their City had given them his word upon it, yet eighty brave men, whom, at their arrival, among the rest of the multitude, Eupolemus went out to meet (after they had been received with all kindness and shook hands one with another) as they were going into the Gate, were murder'd, though they conjured him by his promise, of which they call'd the Gods to witness. Upon that the War broke out more vehement than before. Wherefore C. Valerius Levinus, Appianus Claudius Pulcher, C. Memmius, M. Popilius, and L. Caninius, being sent by the Senate were come thither. Before whom, when the Embassadors of both parties pleaded very earnestly at Delphi, Proxenus seem'd to outdo them all, both in his cause and his Eloquence: who some few dayes after was poyson'd by his Wife Orthobula; for which she was Condemn'd, and Banish'd. The same rage also tore the Cretans in pieces: though soon after, upon the arrival of Q. Minucius, the Lieutenant, who was sent with ten Ships to appease their differences, they had some hopes of Peace: but they made only a Truce of six Months; after which the War grew much more violent than before. The Lycians too, at the same time, were teaz'd by the Rhodians. But 'tis not my business to prosecute prosecute the story of Wars that Foreigners made, one with another, or to shew how they were carried on, who have work enough upon my hands, to write the actions of the Romans.

The Celtiberians in Spain, who, being subdu'd in War, had surrender'd themselves to Tib. Gracchus, remained quiet, whilst M. Titinius the Praetor govern'd that Province; but rebell'd a little before the coming of Ap. Claudius, beginning their War with a sudden attempt upon the Roman Camp. It was about break of day, when the Sentinels upon the Rampier, and those that were upon the guards at the several Gates, seeing the Enemy come at a distance, gave the Alarm. Thereupon Ap. Claudius having set up the signal for Battle, and made a short Speech to encourage his men, drew them forth at three Gates together. The Celtiberians made such resistance at their coming out, that at first the fight was equal on both sides: because all the Romans could not engage in those strait places, by reason that they had not room enough. But soon after, thrusting one another forward, they got without the Rampier; so that they then could spread their Army, and make themselves equal to the Enemies Wings, by whom they were Encompass'd: and they broke forth so suddenly, that the Celtiberians could not endure the shock of them. Before seven a Clock in the Morning they were beaten, and fifteen thousand of them either slain, or taken, with thirty two military Ensigns. Their Camp was also that day seiz'd; and the War made an end of. For they that surviv'd the Battle, made their escape into their several Towns, where they afterward lay quiet, and were obedient to Government.

The Censors created for that year were Q. Fulvius Flaccus, and A. Postumius Albinus, who survey'd the Senate, chosing M. Aemilius Lepidus, the High-Priest, President thereof. They turn'd nine out of the House; of whom the most remarkable persons were M. Cornelius Maluginensis, who two years before had been Praetor in Spain; L. Cornelius Scipio the Praetor, who had then the jurisdiction among Citizens and Foreigners; and Cn. Fulvius, who was the Censors own Brother, and, as Valerius Antias tells us, a sharer with him in the same Patrimony. The Consuls also, having made their Vows in the Capitol, went into their Provinces. Of whom the Senate imploy'd M. Aemilius, to suppress the insurrection of the Patavians in Venetia, who, according to the report even of their own Embassadors, were, through the opposition of different Factions, engaged very hotly in a Civil War. The Embassadors that went into Aetolia to suppress the like Tumults, sent word back, that the fury of that Nation could not be restrain'd. But the Patavians were advantaged by the arrival of the Consul: who, having nothing else to do in that Province, return'd to Rome. The Censors agreed for paving of the streets in the City with Flint-stones, and with gravel without the City, being the first Censors that ever made Borders of stone to that kind of pavement. They also took order to have Bridges made in many places, and a stage for the Aediles and Praetors [to set forth Playes upon] with Barriers in the Circus [where the Horses ran] and Ovals to tell the several heats with.

They also caus'd the descent from the Capitol to be paved with Flint; and the Portico also that reaches from the Temple of Saturn into the Capitol, as far as the Senaculum, and Court above it. They likewise paved the Exchange, or Wharf, without the Gate Tergemina with Stone, and propt it up with pieces of Timber; taking care also to repair the Portico of Aemilius, and made ascent by stairs from the Tiber to the Exchange, or Key aforc'd. Without the same Gate also they paved the Portico going toward the Aventine with Flint, and that at the publick charge from the Temple of Venus. Those same persons took Order also for building of Walls at Culatia and Oximum: where having fold certain publick places, they laid out the money, which they had for them, in building of Shops round the Market-places of each City. One of them also, that is to say, Fulvius Flaccus (for Postumius said, he would order nothing to be done with their money but what the Senate and People of Rome commanded) built the Temple of Jupiter at Pisaurum, and at Fundae, and at Pollentia too caus'd the Water to be brought by Conduits, and at Pisaurum order'd the street to be paved with Flint. At these places he likewise caus'd a common shore to be made, and the Market-places to be all Encompass'd with Porticoes and Shops, as also three Januses to be made. All these works were taken care for by one Censor, who upon that score was mightily beloved of the Inhabitants. This Censorship was also diligent and severe in regulating peoples manners; and many [of the Knights] had their Horses taken from them.

When their year was almost out, there was a Supplication for one whole day, upon the score of the success, which they had in Spain, under the conduct and good fortune of Ap. Claudius the Pro-Consul: at which they sacrificed twenty of the bigger sort of Victims. There was likewise Supplication made another day at the Temple of Ceres, Liber & Libera, for that they had news out of the Sabine Territories, that there had been an Earthquake in those parts which had thrown down many Houses. When Ap. Claudius was come out of Spain to Rome, the Senate decreed, that he should enter the City Ouant. By this time the Consular Assembly came on, which being held with great stickling, by reason of

of the great number of Candidates, L. Postumius Albinus, and M. Popilius Lenas were created Consuls. Then the Prætors were made, viz. Numerius Fabius Butco, M. Matienus, C. Cicerius, M. Furius Crassipes (a second time) A. Atilius Serranus (a second time) and C. Cluvius Saxula, a second time. When the Assembly was over Ap. Claudius Cento, coming out of Celtiberia into the City Ovant, brought into the Treasury ten thousand pound of silver, and five thousand pound of gold. Cn. Cornelius was inaugurated as Flamen Dialis [Jupiter's High Priest:] and the same year there was a Table set up in the Temple of the Goddess Matuta with this Inscription:

By the Conduct and good Fortune of Tib. Sempronius Gracchus, the Consul, the Legion and Army of the Roman People subdu'd Sardinia. In which Province there were slain or taken, of the Enemies, above eighty thousand. He, having managed the publick affairs with great success; retrieved and cleared the Revenues * * * brought home the Army safe and sound, and loaded with booty: so that he return'd a second time in triumph to Rome; upon which score he set up this Table, as an offering to Jupiter.

There was also the Map of Sardinia, and upon it several painted representations of Battles. There were some other small Sword-prizes that year exhibited, but there was one very signal above the rest, set forth by T. Flamininus, which he gave upon the account of his Fathers Death, with a dole of Flesh, a Feast and Stage-Playes. But of that great show the chief part was, that seventy four men fought in three dayes.

DECADE V. BOOK II.

The EPILOGUE.

3. Q. Fulvius Flaccus, the Censor, robb'd the Temple of Juno Lacinia, of its marble Tiles, to cover a Temple, that he had dedicated. But the Tiles were brought back again by order of Senate. 11, 12, &c. Eumenes, King of Asia complain'd, in the Senate of Perseus, King of Macedonia; whose injuries to the Roman People are related. 32, &c. For which, they having declar'd war against him, P. Licinius Crassus the Consul, who had Macedonia decreed him, went thither, and in slight Expeditions, fought against Perseus several Horse Battles in Thessaly, though with no very good success. 23, &c. There was a day given by the Senate, to debate the matter between Maffinilla and the Carthaginians, concerning that [tract of] ground [which each of them pretended to.] There were also Embassadors sent to the associated Cities, and to ask the Kings, whether they would continue faithful, because the Rhodians doubted of it. 10. There was a Survey of the people appointed by the Censors: at which there were poled two hundred fifty seven thousand two hundred thirty one. 7, &c. The fortunate success of the Romans against the Corsians and Ligurians.

I. L Postumius Albinus, and M. Popilius Lenas, having first propos'd to the Senate the settling of the Provinces and the Armies, they had Liguria decreed to them both: That each of them should raise new Legions (two apiece) whereby to preserve that Province; and of the Latine Allies ten thousand Foot, and six hundred Horse; with a supply for Spain of three thousand Roman Foot, and two hundred Horse. Besides these, they were order'd to muster up fifteen hundred Roman Foot, and a hundred Horse, with whom the Prætor, to whose Lot Sardinia fell, should go over and make War in Corsica: and M. Atilius the old Prætor was appointed in the mean time to take care of the Province. After that the Prætors chose their Provinces: A. Atilius Serranus had the City jurisdiction; C. Cluvius Saxula that between Citizens and Strangers; Num. Fabius Butco the hither Spain, M. Matienus the farther; M. Furius Crassipes Sicily; and C. Cicerius Sardinia. Before the Magistrates went to these commands, the Senate thought fit, That L. Postumius the Consul should go into Campania to bound and separate the publick from private Lands: because it was well known, that private persons had by degrees gotten possession of a great deal thereof, in that they stretch'd their bounds still farther and farther. He, being angry with the Prænestines (for that, when he once came thither, as a private person, to Sacrifice in the Temple of Fortuna, they did nothing either publickly or privately that shew'd any great respect to to him) before he went from Rome, sent a Letter to Præneste, to tell them, that their Magistrates must come out to meet him; that they must provide him a Lodging at the publick charge, and all Beasts necessary for his Journey, when he went thence. Before him, no Consul ever put the Allies to any cost or trouble. Wherefore the Magistrates were furnished with Mules, Tents; and all other military instruments, lest they should command any such thing from the Allies: had private Lodgings [upon the rode] at their Friends Houses, whom they at another time as kindly entertained: and their Houses at Rome were open for such guests, as they had formerly been entertained by. So that Embassadors, who were, on a sudden, sent to any place, exacted of the Towns through which they went, but one Sumpter Horse a piece; nor were the Allies put to any farther charge upon account of the Romans. But this anger of the Consuls (which though just, was not to be shown in his Magistracy) and the silence of the Prænestines (which was the effect of too much modesty, or too much fear) gave the Magistrates ever after a right every day to impose heavier burdens of that kind, as if the Example had been approv'd of.

In the beginning of this year, the Embassadors, that were sent into Ætolia and Macedonia, brought word, That they could not have admission to King Perseus, some of his Courtiers (though falsely) pretending, that he was not there, and others, that he was sick. But for all that they were well enough satisfied, that he was preparing for a War, and that he would no longer defer putting himself in Arms. So also, that in Ætolia the sedition grew daily higher and higher, nor could the heads of the Factions be by their authority taken off. When the Macedonian War was in expectation, before it was undertaken, the Senate thought fit that the Prodigies should be expiated, and the favour of those Gods, who were appointed by the fatal [Sybilles] Books, by Prayers begg'd. At Lavinium 'twas reported, that they saw the form of a great Fleet in the Sky: at Privernum, that black Wooll grew out of the Earth, and that in the Veian Territories, at Remens, it rained Stones: that all Pomptinum was cover'd with Clouds (as it were) of Locusts; and that in the Gallick Dominions, as they Plowed there arose up Fishes out of the Furrows. Upon the score of these Prodigies the fatal Books were lookt into, and the Decemviri declar'd, to what Gods, and with what Victims they should Sacrifice, as also, that there should be a Supplication made, to expiate those Prodigies; besides that other and the holy dayes, which had been vowed the year before upon account of the Roman Peoples health. So they sacrificed, as the Decemviri gave directions.

The same year the Temple of Juno Lacinia was uncover'd. For Q. Fulvius Flaccus the Censor built the Temple to Fortuna Equestris, which he had vow'd in the Celtiberian War, when he was Prætor, in Spain, with great ambition, that ne'r a Temple at Rome should be either larger or more magnificent. He therefore thinking, that he should add a great Ornament to the Temple if the Tiles were of Marble, he went into the Bruttian Territories and uncover'd half the Temple of Juno Lacinia, supposing that would be enough to Tile that which he was then a building. He had Ships ready, to receive and bring the Tiles away; the Allies being deterr'd from withstanding that Sacrilege by his Authority, as Censor. When the Censor return'd, the Tiles being landed were brought to the Temple. Now though they did not tell, whence those Tiles came, yet it could not be concealed. Whereupon there was a murmur arose in the Senate-House; and they desired of all sides, that the Consuls might make report of that matter to the Senate. But as soon as the Censor, being sent for, came into the Court, they (every particular person of them, as well as all in general) more bitterly inveigh'd against him there present: That he should thin' it a small matter to violate the most august Temple of that Region, which neither Pyrrhus, nor Annibal had violated, unless he sacrilegiously uncover'd it too, and almost pull'd it down. That he had taken the Tiles off, and left the roof quite bare, to be rotted by the showers. That he, who was created Censor, to regulate mens manners; and whose care it ought to have been (according to ancient custom) to see that the publick Temples were in repair, and to keep them so, went about through the associated Cities, demolishing Temples and uncovering the roofs of holy places. Yea that, which, if he should do even in the private Houses of our Allies, would seem an indignity, he does, in demolishing the Temples of the Immortal Gods: and layes the Roman people under religious obligations, by building one Temple out of the ruins of another: as though there were not the same immortal Gods in all places, but that some of them were to be worshipped and adorn'd with the spoils of others. Now whereas, before the report was made, it appeared what the Senate intended to do, the report being made, they all were of opinion, that those Tiles ought to be carry'd back to the same Temple again, and that there should be atoning Sacrifices made to Juno. What concern'd Religion was accordingly done with all diligence: but the Persons that undertook, at such a rate, to carry them back, brought word, that they had left the Tiles in the Court before the Temple, because there was never a Workman, that could tell how to place them as they were before.

Of those Prætors, that were gone into their Provinces, Num. Fabius died at Massilia, as he was going into the hither Spain. Wherefore when that was told by the Massilian Embassadors, the Senate decreed, that P. Furius and Cn. Servilius, whom he was to succeed, should cast Lots between them, which should continue in Commission, and have the Government of the hither Spain. The Lot fell very luckily, for P. Furius, the same person, whose Province that had been, should stay there. The same year, since part of the Ligurian and Gallick Territories, that was taken in the War, was now vacant, there was an Order of Senate made, that that Land should be divided among so many men. A. Atilius the City Prætor created Decemviri [i. e. ten Officers] for that purpose, by Order of Senate, whose names were M. Emilius Lepidus, C. Cassius, T. Aebutius Carnus, C. Tremelius, P. Cornelius Cethegus, Q. and L. Apuleius, M. Cæcilius, C. Salinius, and E. Mumatius. They divided ten Acres to each Roman, but to the Latine Allies only three apiece. At the same time that these things were transacted, there came Embassadors out of Ætolia to Rome concerning their discords and seditions, and the Thessalian Embassadors too, to tell what was done in Macedonia.

V. Perseus revolving in his thoughts the War which, whilst his Father was alive, he design'd, he reconciled to himself, not only all the Nations of Greece, but the Cities also, by sending Embassies to them, and promising more than he performed. But indeed the minds of the people were generally inclined to favour him, and that something more than they did Eumenes; though all the Cities of Greece, and most of the Nobility were obliged to Eumenes for his many kindnesses and favours that he had confer'd upon them, and though he so behaved himself in his own Kingdom, that those Cities, which were under his Government would not change conditions with any free City. But, on the other hand, it was reported, that Perseus, after his Fathers Death, kill'd his Wife with his own hand; and that he privately murder'd Apelles, who was formerly the instrument of his treachery in taking off of his Brother (for which, when Philip fought him out, to punish him, he went into exile) though he sent for him after his Fathers Death, with great promises of rewarding him for doing so great an action. Yet him, who was infamous for many other domestic as well as Foreign Murders, and no way at all commendable upon the score of merit, the Cities commonly prefer'd, before a King; who was so kind to his Neighbours, so just to his Subjects and Countrymen, and so munificent toward all men: whether out of a prejudice, taken up through the Fame and Grandeur of the Macedonian Kings, which moved them to despise the origine of a new Kingdom; or through desire of innovation; or because they had a mind he should be exposed to the Romans. Now, not only the Ætolians were in an uproar upon the score of their vast Debts, but the Thessalians also: by which contagion, that evil, like a Plague, had got into Perræbia too. When the news came, that the Thessalians were up in Arms, the Senate sent Ap. Claudius the Lieutenant to inspect and compose those matters. Who, having checked the Heads of both Factions, and eased the Debtors of a great part of their use money which they were to pay, even with the good liking of some that had occasion'd that burden upon them, he order'd all that was justly and truly due to be paid at such and such dayes, or terms, for several years to come. By the same Appius, in the same manner, were the affairs in Perræbia compos'd. As for the causes of the Ætolians, Marcellus heard them then at Delphi, where they were pleas'd with hostile vehemency, as fierce as a civil War. Wherefore when he saw, that both sides contended as rashly as boldly, he would not, by his own Decree, or ease or load either party; but desired of them both together, that they would desist from War, and, by forgetting what was past, make an end of all differences between them. The promise of this reconciliation was back'd with Hostages that were given to and fro: for performance whereof they met at Corinth, where the Hostages were to be deposited.

VI. From Delphi and the Ætolian Council Marcellus went over into Peloponnesus, where he had appointed a Convention of the Acheans. And there, having commended that Nation, in that they had constantly adhered to that old Decree, for keeping the Macedonian Kings out of their Dominions, he made the hatred of the Romans against Perseus very evident: which that it might the sooner break forth, King Eumenes, bringing a Book with him, which he had made, after a full inquiry into all things, concerning the preparations for the War, came to Rome. At the same time there were five Embassadors sent to the King, to view the state of Affairs in Macedonia: who were also order'd to go to Ptolomy at Alexandria, to renew their Alliance with him. The Embassadors were these, C. Valerius, Cn. Lutatius Cerco, Q. Babius Sulca, M. Cornelius Mammula, and M. Cæcilius Denter. There came Embassadors also from Antiochus about the same time: of whom Apollonius, who was the chief, being introduced into the Senate, for many and just causes, excus'd the King, and said; that they had brought all that stipend, which the King was a little behind hand in the payment of, as to the day; that the King might not be beholding to them for any thing more than time. That they likewise had brought golden Vessels of five hundred pound weight. That the King desired, that what Friendship and Alliance they had contracted with his Father, they would renew the same with him: and that the Roman People would injoin him to do, what was fit for a good and a faithful Ally, that was a King, to do: that he would not be backward in any duty. That the Senate deserv'd so well of him, when he was at Rome, and the young Gentlemen were so civil, that he was treated by all degrees of people like a King, not like an Hostage. The Embassadors received a very kind Answer, A. Atilius, the City Prætor, was order'd to renew that Alliance with Antiochus, which they formerly had with his Father. The City Questors received ceived the money, and the Censors the golden Vessels: who were imploy'd to lay them up in what Temples they thought fit. To the Embassadors they sent a hundred thousand Asses for a present, and gave him an House by himself to live in Rent-free, bearing his charges all the while he was in Italy. The Embassadors, that had been in Syria, brought word back; that he was in greatest favour with the King; and a very great Friend to the Romans.

In the Provinces that year there were these transactions. C. Cicereius, in Corfica, fought a pitch'd Battle: in which there were seven thousand of the Corfians slain, and above seven hundred taken. The Prætor, at that Battle, had vow'd [to build] a Temple to Juno Moneta. After that the Corfians, upon their Petition, had a Peace granted them, and two hundred thousand pound of Wax exacted of them. From Corfica, when he had subdu'd it, Cicereius went over into Sardinia. He also fought a Battle in Liguria, in the Statiellian Territory, near a Town called Carystum: where a great Army of Ligurians had Rendezvous'd. At first, upon the arrival of M. Popilius, the Consul, they kept within their Walls: but soon after, when they saw, that the Roman was about to attack their Town; they went forth, and before the Gates set their Army in Battalia; nor did the Consul (who, by threatening to attack them, had aimed at that very thing) make any delay of the fight. So they fought three hours and more, before they could tell which would win the day. But when the Consul saw, that the Ligurian Ensigns did not stir in any part, he commanded his Horsemen to mount, and on three sides together run in upon the Enemy with all the force they could. Accordingly great part of the Horse broke through the midst of the Army, and got as far as the Reer of the Battle. Thereupon the Ligurians were dismay'd, and ran several wayes on all sides; but very few of them back to the Town, because the Horse came most from that way upon them: so that not only the resolute fight had destroy'd a great number of the Ligurians, but they were kill'd all along as they fled too, to the number, they say, of ten thousand. There were above seven hundred men taken about the Country, and eighty two military Ensigns carry'd off. But it was not a bloodless Victory, on the conquering side, for they lost above three thousand Souldiers; by reason, that neither of them yielding, the Front of each Army fell.

After this Fight the Ligurians being muster'd up again, after their stragling flight into one Body, when they saw that far more of their fellow Citizens were lost, than were alive (for they were not above ten thousand men) they surrender'd themselves, without making any conditions at all: because they hoped that the Consul would not be more severe upon them, than former Generals had been. But he took all their Arms from them, demolish'd their Town, and sold both them and their goods, and sent Letters to the Senate concerning his own achievements. Which when A. Atilius the Prætor had read in the Senate (for the other Consul was gone into Campania to settle the Lands there) they thought it a cruel thing: that the Statiellians, who were the only Nation of all Liguria, that had not born Arms against the Romans, who were then attack'd, and did not make War of their own head, but surrender'd themselves into the hands of the Roman People, should be torn and destroy'd by such extreme Cruelty. That so many thousand people who put themselves under the protection of the Roman People, would [in that case] be so sad an Example [of ruine and destruction] that it would deter all others from ever daring hereafter to surrender themselves: and that being carried to several distant parts of the Country, they were Slaves to those who had been formerly avowed Enemies to the Roman People, though, now, they were reconciled. For which reasons, the Senate made an Order; That M. Popilius the Consul, should give the Buyers of such men their money, and restore the persons to their liberty: and that he should take care, that all their goods, that could be recover'd, should be render'd back unto them; and Arms made as soon as possible in that Country. That the Consul should depart out of the Province, after he had resettled the surrender'd Ligurians in their Town again: [and said.] That a Victory became famous by conquering those that oppos'd us, not by tyrannizing over the afflicted.

The Consul maintain'd the same briskness of mind in opposition to the Senate, as he had shewn before in Liguria; and therefore when he had sent his Legions into their Winter Quarters at Pise, being angry at the Senate, and vexed at the Prætor, return'd to Rome. Where the Senate being immediately called in the Temple of Bellona, he inveighed mightily against the Prætor; who, when he ought to have propos'd to the Senate, that, upon the score of his good success in the War, all honour might be paid the immortal Gods, had made an Order of Senate against him, for the Enemy: whereby the Prætor transfer'd his Pillory to the Ligurians, and commanded almost the Consul himself to be deliver'd up to them. Wherefore he laid a Fine upon him: and desired of the Senate, that they would cause the Order of Senate made against him, to be annul'd; and decree that supplication (first, in honour to the Gods, and then out of some respect to him also) now he was there, which they ought to have appointed when he was at a distance from them, upon receipt of his Letter concerning his good and prosperous management of the Commonwealth. But being blamed by some of the Senators, as much as when he was absent, and having obtain'd neither thing, that he desir'd, he return'd into his Province. The other Consul Postumius, having spent the Summer in settling the Lands, having never so much as seen his own Province, return'd to Rome, to hold the Assembly. He

U. C. created for Consuls, C. Popilius Lanus, and P. Aelius Ligur. Then the Prætors were made, viz. C. Licinius Crassus, M. Junius Pennus, Sp. Lucretius, Sp. Cluvius, Cn. Sicinius, and C. Memmius, a second time.

X. That year there was a Survey of the people set up: at which the Censors were Q. Fulvius Flaccus, and A. Postumius Albinus. Postumius took the Pole; and there were enroll'd, of Roman Citizens, two hundred sixty nine thousand and fifteen Souls: somewhat fewer than would have been, because the Consul L. Postumius had publickly proclaimed, that all those Latine Allies, who ought, by virtue of the Edict of C. Claudius the Consul, to return into their respective Cities, should not any one of them be poled at Rome, but every man in his own City. This Censorship was managed with Concord, and for the good of the Common wealth. All that they turn'd out of the Senate, or degraded from their Knighthood, they disfranchiz'd so as to make them pay all duties, like strangers, and put them out of their Tribe: nor did one of them set a mark of disgrace upon any men whom the other approved of. Fulvius dedicated a Temple to Fortuna Equestris, which he had vow'd in Spain at a Battle against the Celtiberians, six years after he had vow'd it: and set forth Stage Plays four dayes together, keeping one day in the Circus. L. Cornelius Lentulus the Decemvir of the holy Rites dyed that year, in whose place they put A. Postumius Albinus. There were such Clouds (as it were) of Locusts brought on a sudden from the Sea into Apulia, that with their swarms they covered all the Fields. For the removal of which pest from the Fruits, C. Sicinius who was design'd for Prætor, being sent with command into Apulia, got a great body of people about him, to gather them up, in which he spent some time. In the beginning of the following year, in which C. Popilius and P. Aelius were Consuls, there arose the remaining part of the animosities that had been the year before. For the Senate would needs have a report made touching Liguria, and the Order of Senate renew'd; of which the Consul Aelius accordingly made report to the House. Popilius desired both his Collegues and the Senates pardon for his Brother; and by pretending, that, if they decreed any thing, he would interpose against it, deterr'd his Collegue. The Senate being so much the more incens'd at both the Consuls, persisted in their design. Wherefore when they began to Discourse of the Provinces, and Macedonia, now that the War with Perseus was at hand, was aimed, Liguria was assigned to both the Consuls. But they said they would not make any determination at all concerning Macedonia, unless there were a report made concerning M. Popilius. Afterwards, when they moved for the raising of new Forces, or at least that the old might be recruited, both were deny'd. The Prætors also, requiring a supply with them into Spain, were refused; M. Junius into the hither Province, and P. Lucretius into the farther. As for C. Licinius Crassus, it was allotted him to have the jurisdiction over the Citizens, and Cn. Sicinius over the Foreigners; C. Memmius was sent to Sicily, Sp. Cluvius to Sardinia. The Consuls for these reasons highly offended with the Senate, caus'd the Latine Holy-Days to be immediately celebrated, purposing to retire soon after to their Commands, and not to engage themselves in the publick affairs any farther than what related to their own Governments.

XI. Valerius Antias writeth, That Attalus Brother of King Eumenes, the year that these were Consuls, came Embassadour to Rome, to accuse Perseus for making preparations of War; But the Annales of many other Writers (of greater Authority) report that King Eumenes, came himself in Person, where, after an honourable reception, such as the people of Rome thought due to his merits, and suitable to those great favours they had already conferr'd upon him, he was brought before the Senate. He told them, The occasion of his coming thither was, a desire he had to see those Gods and Men, by whose bounty he did possess so large a Fortune, than which he durst not wish a greater, as also to incite the Senate to obviate the designs of Perseus; Then continuing his Speech with the purposes of Philip, he recounted the death of his Son Demetrius, for opposing the War with the Romans; and that he had compell'd the Bactrians to quit their own Country to assist him in his passage into Italy; That, during these agitations, death having seiz'd upon him, he determin'd to leave his Kingdom to him whom he knew the most inveterate Enemy to the Romans: Perseus therefore inheriting this War, together with his Fathers Crown, had, since the first step to the Throne apply'd his greatest efforts to nourish and foment it; besides, his Kingdom flourish'd with strong and hardy youth for War, encreas'd by a long Peace; his Treasuries repleat, himself in the vigour of his Age, and to a strenuous body a mind no less expert in the Discipline and Arts of War; brought up from his infancy in his Fathers Tent, frequently employ'd in Expeditions, and always acquainted with the Wars, not only of other Nations, but those also against the Romans. That he had himself since he first possess'd the Kingdom, which marvellous felicity accomplished many things, which Philip in spite of all his force and subtilty could ne'r perform; and to encrease his greatness, had already purchas'd repute and authority in the World, the reward of age and meritorious actions.

XII. Thus Greece and all the Asian Cities paid homage to his Scepter; But whether they honour'd him for any personal merits of his own, or munificence towards them, he could not tell; or whether it proceeded from the peculiar felicity of his Fortune, or (what he fear'd himself to speak) from the hatred themselves had conceiv'd against the Romans, he could not determine. Kings themselves esteem'd and honour'd him; The Daughter of Seleucus he had lately married, without any suit of his his own, but by the voluntary request of her Father, and after great importunity had given his Sister in Marriage to Prusias. Both these Weddings were solemniz'd with great pomp and infinite Embassies of the noblest Nations. That the Boeotians having been much solicited by Philip could never be brought into any Friendship or Confederacy; but now there was to be seen a League engraven in no less than three Cities, one at Thebes, a second at Sidenum, within the famous Temple, and the other at Delphis. In the Achaian Council, had not the designs been quash'd by some few that espous'd the Roman interest, the result would have been no less than the invasion of Achaia. But on the contrary, those honours I deserve from that people, both for private and publick obligations, are through base neglect, or envy, forgotten and withdrawn. As for the Ætolians, none were so ignorant, but well knew in their civil Wars they sought not aid from the Romans but from Perseus; Being thus supported with these Confederacies, he had made such domestick provisions of his own for War, that he needed no Foreign assistance. His Army consisted of thirty thousand Foot, and five thousand Horse, stored with Corn for ten years, whereby he might the better forbear his own Country, nor trouble himself to seek for Forage in that of his Enemies. That he had so large a Treasure, that besides the Forces of his own Territories he kept in pay ten thousand mercenary Souldiers, and had besides his annual revenue sufficient for the expences of ten years more. His Armories were full of Arms, and all accoutrements of War, enough for three such Armies. And for a continual supply of Souldiers, if Macedonia should prove deficient, all Thrace being subject under him, he could not fail of constant recruits, which he might draw from thence as from an unexhaustible Fountain.

The remainder of his Speech was by way of perswasion. My Lords! I relate not these things, said he, from the mouth of uncertain Fame, or a greedy desire to believe or wish, that the truth of ill things should be prov'd upon my Enemy, but on my own knowledge and experience, in the same manner as if I had been sent a spy to report to you the things I saw: nor would I have left my own Kingdom, and the share of glory, which by your benignity I possess, to pass so vast a Sea to bring you trifling Tales, to forfeit your esteem. I have survey'd the noblest Cities of Asia as well as Greece, discovering daily their intentions, in which, if they should be suffer'd to proceed, they would not have it in their power to retrieve their safety by repentance. I have observed, how Perseus not contented within the limits of Macedonia, sometimes by force of Arms, sometimes by favour and benevolence obtains those Countries he ne'r could get by Conquest. I have weigh'd the unequal conditions, whilst he prepareth War on you, and you perform the terms of Peace with him, although it appears no less to me than his being already in actual Hostility. Adrupolis your Friend, he hath driven from his Kingdom. Artetarus the Illyrian, another of your Allies, he slew; because he found he had written Letters unto you. Everfa and Callicrates, Thebans and Princes of that City, because in the Boeotian Council they spoke something too freely against him, declaring they would relate to you those proceedings, he commanded they should be put to death. He sent Auxiliaries to the Bizantines, contrary to agreement. He made War on Dolopia, invaded Thessaly and Doris, and subdu'd them both, that in civil War, by the help of the stronger side he might afflict and trouble the other. He made a mixture and confusion of all things in Thessaly and Perræbia, hoping thereby to cancel Book-Debts and other accounts, by which, releasing Debtors from their Engagements, he oblig'd them to assist him in oppressing their Creditors and principal Officers. While this is doing you quietly look on, your suffering him to act these things in Greece without controul, makes him presume, that not a man will dare to arm himself to oppose his passage into Italy; how this consisteth with your honour and safety is not for me to judge; it was my duty as your Friend and Ally, to prevent your being surpris'd in Italy by Perseus. And now, having perform'd this necessary Office, and in some measure acquitted my self as became my fidelity, what more remains? but that I pray the Gods and Goddeses, you may protect your own Republick, and defend your Allies that depend upon you.

This Oration extreamly mov'd the Fathers; but for the present, none knew more than that the King had been before the Senate, so silent were they all; but the War being finish'd, both the Kings Speech and the Senates Answer were divulg'd. Some few dayes after the Senate gave Audience to Perseus's Embassadours; but being prepossess'd by King Eumenes, their defence and supplications were reject'd; the fierce deportment of Harpalus the chief Embassadour, did not a little exasperate the Senate, who endeavour'd to perswade them to credit the Apology of his Master, that he never acted any thing tending to Hostility, but if he perceiv'd they came upon him in this manner, seeking occasions of War, he resolv'd to defend himself with courage; for the hazard of the Field was common, and the event of War uncertain. All the Cities of Greece and Asia were extreamly solicitous to know the proceedings of Perseus's Embassadours, and King Eumenes, with the Senate; for upon his coming most of the States (supposing he might occasion some commotion) had sent their Embassadours to Rome, speciously pretending other affairs. Among others there was an Embassy from the Rhodians, the chief of which was Satyrus, who doubted not but that Eumenes had join'd the crimes of his City with those of Perseus, and therefore by interest of his Patrons and Friends, he had obtain'd leave to debate their business with the King before the Senate; wherein he inveiy'd against Eumenes with too much heat, upbraiding him for his fomenting Wars between the Lycians and the Rhodians, and that he had been a greater Enemy to Asia than Antiochus; This Oration was well receiv'd by those of Asia, who began already to incline to Perseus, but it prov'd not so with the Senate, nor was it in the least advantageous to their City; but on the contrary, these Conspiracies against Eumenes rais'd his estimation with the Romans, still increasing their honours and gifts upon him, presenting him a Chariot of State, with a Staff and Scepter of Ivory.

XIII.

XIV.

not

XV. These Embassies being dispatch'd, Harpalus returns with all speed into Macedonia, and tells the King, That he had left the Romans making no preparations as yet for War, but so offended, it easily appeared they would not long defer it; nor was Perseus displeased with this relation relying on the valour of his Souldiers; But of all others he hated Eumenes most, with whose blood he laid the foundation of the War; for harboring one Evander a Candiote and Captain of some Auxiliaries, and with him three Macedonians (accustom'd to such actions) to kill the King; He gave them Letters to one Praxo an Hostess of great esteem and wealth among the Delphians, being well assured Eumenes would be at Delphis to Sacrifice to Apollo. These Traytors with Evander watched all opportunities to execute their design; in the passage where men ascend from Cirrho to the Temple, before they come to the place frequented with the usual concourse of the people, there stood on the left of the path a Mud-Wall or Bank, arising a little above the foundation, by which one at once could only pass, for on the right hand the Earth was fallen down, and a breach made of a great depth; behind this Bank the Traytors hid themselves, and rais'd some steps like stairs, that from above, as from the top of a Wall they might discharge their Treason on the King. Before him, coming from the Sea, there march'd his Friends and Guards disorderly mixt; when the way grew streight and narrow, his train by degrees waxt thinner; but when they came to the place where they could not go but one by one; Pantoleon an Aetolian Prince, with whom the King was then engaged in some Discourse, enter'd first that narrow passage; immediately the Traytors roll'd two mighty stones upon the King; one fell upon his head, the other on his shoulder; the people seeing Eumenes fall, confusedly deserted him, Pantoleon only had the Courage to stay and relieve the King.

XVI. The Traytors by a short compass about the Wall might soon have reach'd the place where the King lay, and finish'd what they had begun; but supposing the deed was done, they fled to the top of Parnassus with that hast, that they kill'd one of their Companions, being unable to keep pace with them through that steep and craggy Mountain, lest being taken he should have discover'd their Treason. The Kings Friends and Guards coming at last about him, and raising his body from the ground, found him astonish'd with the stroke; by the motion of his Pulse, and some warmth they perceiv'd he was not dead, although but little hope of life. Some of his Guards pursu'd the Villains with great difficulty by their footsteps as far as the top of the Mountain, but finding it ineffectual, gave over the pursuit. The Macedonians, as they had begun their attempt inconsiderately, so they fearfully left it unfinish'd with as little discretion. By this time the King return'd to himself, and the morrow after was convey'd to his Ship; from thence to Corinth, and from Corinth sailing along the Straights of Isthmus, they arrived at Agina; where his care was performed with such secrecy that a report of his death ran over all Asia. His Brother Attalus gave a willing credit to the rumour than became a Brother, expressing such things to his Brothers Wife, and the Commander of the Castle, as if he had been the undoubted Heir of the Crown; All which was afterwards deliver'd to Eumenes; at first he purpos'd to dissemble and bury those matters in silence; nevertheless he could not refrain at their first interview, to tell his Brother he was too hasty so suddenly to make a love-address to his Wife. The Fame of Eumenes death was also carried to Rome.

XVII. About that time C. Valerius was return'd from Greece, sent thither Embassadour to observe the state of that Country, and to watch the Counsels of King Perseus; all his intelligence was agreeable to the report of Eumenes, and withall he brought with him from Delphis the Hostess Praxo, whose House had been the receptacle of those Traytors, and with her, one L. Raminus a Brundusian, who gave the following information. This Raminus was one of the principal Citizens of Brundisium, and us'd in his House to entertain not only the Roman Captains, but all Embassadours of the greatest quality, especially such as were sent from Kings; by this means he came to be known to Perseus; being invited by the Kings Letters, the hope and promises of his favour and friendship brought him to the Court of Macedon; and shortly after he was carress'd with the greatest familiarity, and received farther than he himself approv'd of into the closest secrets; the King endeavouring to oblige him by promises of large rewards; That, seeing the Roman Captains and Embassadours were constantly entertain'd at his House, he would take care that such persons whom he mentioned by his Letters, should be dispatch'd by poyson; and because he knew it both difficult and dangerous to effect this design, but with all the caution and secrecy imaginable, the event being also uncertain, either through deficiency of the drug, or the secret working of it, or discovery, if known to many; he would himself deliver him such a poyson which neither in giving nor being receiv'd should ever be discover'd by any mark whatever. Aminius fearing if he refused he might be the first should make experiment of the poyson, promised the performance and then departed; but he would not return to Brundisium before he waited on C. Valerius the Embassadour, who resided somewhere about Chalcis; to whom he first revealed this Plot, and went with him him by his Command to Rome, where he discover'd the whole matter before the Senate.

This discovery being added to those of Eumenes, gave occasion, that Perseus was the sooner XVIII. declared an Enemy; whom they saw beginning an unjust War, not with Princely magnanimity, but with secret poysonings and other base perfidious acts and treasons. The management of this War was refer'd to the new Consuls; however for the present it was decreed, That Cn. Sicinius the Prætor, whose jurisdiction was between the Citizens and Strangers should levy Souldiers, who being conducted to Brundisium, should with all expedition put to Sea for Apollonia in Epirus, to fortify the Maritime Cities, where the Consul to whom the Macedonian Provinces should be committed might have safe harbour for his Fleet, and conveniency of landing his Forces. Eumenes after a long retention at Agina, as soon as he might with safety, went to Pergamus, and being incited by his ancient hatred as well as the late practices of Perseus, prepar'd for War with all his power. Embassadours were sent from Rome to congratulate with him for his escape from so eminent a danger. When the Macedonian War was deferr'd for a year, and the other Prætors retired into their Provinces, M. Junius and Sp. Lucretius (who had the Government of the Spanish Province) with great importunities, at last obtained from the Senate to recruit the Army, with additional Forces consisting of three thousand Foot, and a hundred and fifty Horse, for the Roman Legions, five thousand Foot and three hundred Horse for the Army of the Allies; These new Levies were transported into Spain with the new Prætors.

The same year, after that a great part of the Campane Territory, which private persons every where possess'd without regard of title, was (upon a diligent survey of Posthumus the Consul) recover'd for the Republick; M. Lucretius a Tribune of the Commons, proclaim'd a Law, That the Censors should let out to Farm the Campane Lands for an annual Rent; which had not been done since the taking of Capua, that private men should covetously incroach upon the wast and common. The Macedonian War being now determined though not proclaimed, and the Senate in expectation what Princes would join with them, and what with Perseus; there came Embassadours from Ariates, bringing with them the Kings Son a Child; who told the Senate, That their Master had sent his Son to Rome to be educated in the Roman manners, and to be accustomed to the dispositions of the Roman People; that he desired they would receive him into their protection, not only as a private person, but also afford him their publick Patronage as their Pupil. The Embassy of this King was very grateful to the Senate; whereupon they decreed that Cn. Sicinius the Prætor should prepare an apartment for the Prince and his Attendants: The Thracian Embassadours likewise presented themselves to debate their affairs, and Petition for the Friendship of the Senate; their Suit was granted, and were dismiss'd with a Present to each of two thousand Asses. The affection of these people much rejoiced the Senate, in regard that Thrace joins to the back of Macedonia: But to the end they might have perfect intelligence of the affairs of Asia, they sent Embassadours thither. T. Claudius Nero and M. Decimius; commanding them also to visit Creet and Rhodes, as well to renew their annuities as observe whether the minds of those Allies had been solicited by King Perseus.

While the City was in suspense and expectation of this new War, there arose in the night a tempest of thunder and lightning, which rent asunder the Rostrate Pillar, erected in the Capitol by M. Amilius the Consul during the first punick War: this was esteem'd a Prodigy, and related to the Senate. The Fathers command that the Southsayers should be consulted, and that the Decemviri should bring their Books [of Sibil]. The Decemviri declared, the City to be purg'd by Sacrifice, and that great Victims should be sacrificed, as well in the Capitol at Rome, as on the Plains near the Promontories of Minerva; That Games should be forth-with prepar'd in honour of Jupiter; all which was religiously observed. The Southsayers declared that the Prodigy portended the good and enlargement of their own Territories, because those Beaks of Ships thrown down by the Tempest, were the spoils of their Enemies. There happened many other things which added no less Religion to their minds; It was reported, that at Saturnia it rained blood three dayes together; at Galatia an Ass foled a Colt with three Feet, and a Bull with five Cows were struck dead by Thunder, and that at Oximum it rained Earth: These Prodigies proceeding from divine causes, produced likewise new Devotions.

The Consuls were not as yet departed to their Provinces, because they would not obey the Senate in the debate concerning Popilius, the Fathers were also resolv'd, that no Decree should pass before that were determin'd. Their hatred towards Popilius was increas'd by his Letters, wherein he told them, That being Pro-Consul he had fought the Ligurians, and slain ten thousand of their Souldiers, provok'd by the injuries and extremities of this War, others of the Ligurian People had taken Arms. At which news the absent Popilius was not only blamed for inciting to Rebellion by an unjust War those people who were before at Peace; but the Consuls were also reprov'd in open Senate for not retiring to their commands. M. Martius Sermo, and Quintius Marcius Scylla, two Tribunes of the Commons, being animated by this proceeding of the Fathers, threatened to Fine the Consuls unless they hasten'd to their Provinces; And also recited a Law which they had provided concerning concerning the submitting of the Ligurians, and intended speedily to promulge; which was to this effect. It was decreed, that if any person of Statellæ submitted himself, and was not restored to his liberty before the Calends of August following, the Senate would order a Commissioner to inquire by whom he was detain'd in servitude, and punish him accordingly. Which was published by Authority. Before the Consuls took their leave, a Senate was held in the Temple of Bellona, in favour of Caius Cicerius, Prætor of the former year; He told them what he had done in Corfica, and demanded triumph, which being deny'd him in the Alban Mountain (which was now a custom grown without authority) he rode in triumph. The Marcian Law was now by a general Sanction ratified and enacted. C. Licinius, moving the Senate to nominate the person for the execution of that Edict, the Fathers placed it on himself.

XXII. At length the Consuls departed to their Provinces, and receiv'd the charge of the Army from Popilius. However Marcus Popilius durst not as yet return to Rome, greatly dreading to answer the Prætors accusation before the incensed Senate and enraged multitude: But the Tribunes had found another Law to punish this delay of his; That if he came not to Rome before the Ides of November following, it should be lawful for C. Licinius to pronounce Sentence against him in his absence. Being drawn by this Cord, he return'd to Rome and presented himself before the Senate, fill'd with the sharpest Envy; where after he had been torn with infinite reproaches it was decreed, That as many Ligurians as had not been Enemies since the Consulships of Q. Fulvius and L. Manlius, should be re-established by the Prætors C. Licinius and Cn. Sicinius, in their former liberties; And that the Consul C. Popilius should give them Lands beyond the Pô. Many thousands were by this Decree restor'd to liberty, and a Country accordingly bestow'd upon them. M. Popilius upon the Marcian Law, twice made his defence before the Prætor C. Licinius; The third time, the Prætor being overcome with the respect he bore the absent Consuls, and the supplications of the Popillian Family, adjourn'd the Defendants appearance to the Ides of March; on which day the new Magistrates enter'd on their Offices, and himself then resigning his Authority should become a private person; and thus the Ligurian Act was by this fallacious Art evaded.

XXIII. There was at this time at Rome, Embassadors from Carthage, and Gulussa the Son of Masinissa; between whom a great contention arose before the Senate: The Carthaginians complaining, That Masinissa within two years, had (besides that Country about which Commissioners had been sent from Rome to consider the affair) by force of Arms possess'd himself of more than seventy Towns and Castles within the Carthaginian Dominions; this, to him who regarded nothing, was very easy to be effected, since the Carthaginians were obliged by capitulation quietly to suffer all; as being prohibited bearing Arms beyond the limits of their own Country; And although they were assured the War would be within themselves if they repell'd the Numidians; yet were they doubtful lest they should stretch too far that part of their Articles which strictly forbade them to make War on the Roman Allies. Nevertheless the Carthaginians no longer able to endure his Pride, Cruelty and Avarice, sent them therefore to implore the Senate would grant them one of these three Propositions; That since they were both Allies, their differences might be debated before them; or to permit the Carthaginians to defend themselves by a just War against unlawful force; or at the worst, if partiality was more prevalent with them than truth, they would then determine what part of their Country should be given to Masinissa; that by their prescription they might be satisfied in what they gave; well-knowing that to his insatiate desires there were no limits; But if neither of these could be obtain'd, or if they had committed any crime since the Peace granted them by Scipio, that they themselves would punish them; chusing rather to live in safety under the Roman servitude, than be exposed to these injuries; it being better at once to perish, than suffer such Butcheries under the rugged yoke of bloody Masinissa. These expressions accompanied with tears and prostration, procured no less compassion to themselves than Envy to the King.

XXIV. Gulussa was then demanded what he had to offer against those complaints, or if he had rather to declare the occasion of his coming to Rome. To which he reply'd, it was a difficult thing for him to answer those matters, having no authority from his Father; nor was it easy for his Father to give it him, since the Carthaginians neither declared their negotiation at Rome, nor any intention of their going thither; it was only heard, that in Esculapius's Temple for some Nights they held a secret Council, from whence the Carthaginian Governours had dispatch'd an Embassy to Rome, with Credentials of privacy. This was the reason his Father had sent him thither, to implore the Senate would not credit such false accusations as should be prefer'd by those who were no less theirs than his Enemies, for no other cause but that he always prefer'd a constant fidelity to the Romans. The Senate having heard both their Allegations, Commanded this Answer to be return'd to the demands of the Carthaginians; That Gulussa should immediately return to Numidia, that his Father might soon after send Embassadors to answer those complaints of the Carthaginians, and that the Carthaginians should also have notice given them to come and debate the business: If any thing should be in their power to express their honour for Masinissa, they would be as ready to perform it for the future as they heretofore had always been; That affection did not sway their Justice; desirous that every one should possess their own, they were unwilling to prescribe new limits, but rather exhort to observance of the old; that since the Conquest of the Carthaginians, they had given them Cities and Possessions, not that those things should be torn away away in Peace by private injuries, which never could be taken from them by a lawful War. Thus the young Prince with the Carthaginians, after they had receiv'd their Presents, and the usual Ceremonies were dismiss'd.

About the same time Cn. Servilius Cæpio, Ap. Claudius Cento, T. Amnius Læscus, Embassadors sent into Macedonia, to demand restitution, and to renounce the Friendship of that King, return'd to Rome; The relation they gave of what they had there seen and heard, added fuel to that Fire which had already inflam'd the Senate against King Perseus. "They observ'd through all the Cities of Macedonia open preparation for War; after they had attended many dayes without admission, at length despairing of their access to the King, prepar'd for their departure; but were recall'd from their Journey which was already begun to receive their Audience; the intent of their Oration was to remind him of the League contracted with Philip, and confirm'd by himself since his Fathers Death, wherein he was prohibited to make War on any of the Roman Confederates; then they recounted the whole particulars of that Declaration themselves had heard from King Eumenes, who openly asserted the truth of those things he reported on his own knowledge; moreover, that the King had held a secret Consultation with Embassadors from the Asiatick Cities; In regard of which injuries, the Senate thought it just he should restore to them and their Confederates those things he had unjustly taken from them, and contrary to the Covenants of their League. The hearing of these matters greatly incens'd the King; his passion transported him into revilings, often reproaching the Romans for their Avarice and Insolency; and esteem'd their Embassadors which came so fast upon him, no otherwise than Spies to watch his words and actions, they thinking it necessary that all his measures should be receiv'd from them: After he had finish'd this fierce Speech, he commanded them to repair to him again the next day, and they should receive his Answer in writing; then he deliver'd them a Paper, wherein he affirm'd, That the League his Father had sign'd had no force at all on him; if he suffer'd it to be renew'd, it proceeded not from his approbation, but because he was newly possess'd of his Kingdom, he was compell'd to endure all things; But if they were desirous of a new Confederacy, it was requisite a capitulation were made concerning the conditions; should they be induc'd to accept of reasonable Proposals, yet he thought it necessary first considerately to weigh his own advantages, as he doubted not but they would well consult those of their Republick; and thus he abruptly left them, they immediately withdrawing themselves from the Palace. Whereupon according to our Commission we abandon'd his Friendship and Alliance; which made him return upon us in great fury, and with a loud Voice commanded us within three dayes to leave his Kingdom; In fine, they accordingly forthwith departed, having found but an inhospitable Entertainment during the whole time of their aboad. When they had finish'd this Relation the Etolian Embassadors receiv'd their Audience. The Senate, that they might forthwith understand what Commanders were to be employ'd by the Common-wealth; dispatch'd their Letters to the Consuls, that one of them should hasten to Rome, to the Election of new Magistrates.

No action worthy commemorating was done that year by the Consuls. The Republick esteem'd it more expedient to suppress and appease the exasperated Ligurians. The Iffean Embassadors, considering the expectation of the Macedonian War, gave no small occasion to suspect Gentius King of the Illyrians, "complaining he had twice over-run their Country; that the Macedonians and Illyrians unanimously prepared to make War upon the Romans; and that the Illyrian were then at Rome disguis'd under a specious Embassy, but sent thither by Perseus's instigation to observe their motions. The Illyrians being sent for before the Senate, declared their business there was to obviate such accusations which their Master suspected might be brought against him by the Iffæans; It was urged, why they did not present themselves to the Magistrate, in order to receive the usual Ceremonies of the City, and the appointment of their Apartments, that their coming and their business might both be publick; but hesitating in their reply, it was commanded them to leave the Court, not deserving an Answer as became Embassadors who had not offer'd themselves as such before the Senate; determining rather to dispatch Embassadors to the King, to advise him which of his Associates had complain'd against for committing outrages on their Territories, and to animadvert the injustice of those injuries offer'd their Confederates. A. Terentius Varro, C. Pletorius, and C. Cicerius, were employed in this Embassy. Those Embassadors sent to visit the Confederate Princes, returning from Asia, reported, they saw Eumenes there, Antiochus in Syria, and in Alexandria they confer'd with Ptolemy; All which had been solicited by sundry Embassies from Perseus, but still continued firm in their fidelity to the Romans, and assur'd them to perform whatever should be commanded them. They had also visited the associate Cities, finding them all, except the Rhodiensians, who began to stagger (having too deeply imbibed the poisonous persuasions of Perseus) thoroughly stedfast to their interest. The Rhodian Embassadors were now at Rome to obviate those crimes they knew were publickly alledg'd against their City; but the Senate would not allow them Audience before the new Consuls were initiated into their Consulships.

XXVII. The War was now determin'd. C. Licinius the Prætor was order'd to draw from the Docks as many Gallies as should be necessary for that Expedition; and also to fit out a Fleet of fifty Ships of War, but if he could not equip so many, to send to C. Memmius his Collegue to rig out those Ships as were in Sicily, and immediately transport them to Brundisium: He was also commanded to muster as many of the Roman Citizens, and Enfranchis'd Bondmen as might serve in five and twenty Ships; C. Licinius was also Commissioned to raise a proportionable number out of the Latine Allies for the like Service, and likewise to charge them with eight thousand Foot, and three hundred Horse. A. Attulus who had been Prætor the preceding year, was chosen to receive those Forces at Brundisium, and to conduct them into Macedonia; Cn. Sicinius the Prætor was appointed to put the Army in readiness to be transported; C. Licinius the Prætor was directed to send to C. Popilius the Consul, a Commission to command the second Legion, which had been longest employ'd in Liguria, and consisted of the most experienc'd Souldiers; together with four thousand Foot, and two hundred Horse out of the Latine Allies, and to be in readiness at Brundisium on the Ides of February. With this Fleet and Army, Cn. Sicinius was commanded to keep the Macedonian Province until another was appointed to succeed him; and to this purpose his command was continued for a year longer. All which directions of the Senate were managed with great vigour and celerity: thirty eight Gallies were drawn from the Docks, which were conducted by L. Porcius Licinius to Brundisium; twelve were sent from Sicily. Sex. Digitius, T. Juventius, and M. Cæcilius, were sent Embassadors into Apulia and Calabria, to buy Provisions for the Fleet and Army; Thus all things being fully adjusted, Cn. Sicinius departing from the City in his Warlike Accoutrements arrived at Brundisium.

XXVIII. About the end of that year C. Popilius the Consul came to Rome, something later than the Senate had ordain'd, who considering the approach of so great a War drew near, commanded him to hasten to the Election of new Magistrates; Therefore when the Consul in the Temple of Bellona rehears'd his Exploits in Liguria, the Fathers instead of applauding the Relation, reprov'd him for not restoring to their former Liberties those Ligurians that had been oppress'd by the Tyranny of his Brother? The twelfth day before the Calends of March was held according to the Edicts the Election of the Consuls, wherein P. Licinius Crassus, and C. Cassius Longinus were created. The following day, Caius Sulpitius Galba, L. Furius Philus, L. Camilius Dives, C. Lucretius Gallus, C. Caninius Rubinius, and L. Villius Annalis were Elected Prætors; to these Prætors the Provinces were thus assign'd; two of them were to administer the Laws in Rome; three to have the Government of the Spanish, Sicilian and Sardinian Provinces; the other was reserv'd for such affairs as the Senate should have occasion to employ him in. The elected Consuls were commanded to celebrate the day of their inauguration with Sacrifices and Prayers, that the gods would be auspicious to the War the Roman People were now preparing. The same day the Senate decreed, That C. Popilius should offer Vows, that (if the Republick continued for ten years in the same state) ten dayes sports should be dedicated to Jupiter, and gifts devoted to all the Shrines; the Consul accordingly exhibited those Vows in the Capitol, and that the donations should be perform'd to what value the Senate should propose; this was pronounc'd in the presence of an hundred and fifty people, and Lepidus the chief Priest recorded the Vow. This year dyed these Priests of quality, L. Æmilius Pappus one of the Decemviri or Priests of the holy Rites, and Q. Fulvius Flaccus the chief Priest, who had been Censor the year before; This man had but an ill end; news having been brought him of his two Sons, who had serv'd in the Illyrick Wars, that one was lately dead, and the other labouring under a dangerous distemper, this report so oppress'd his mind with grief and fear, that his Servants entering his Bedchamber in the Morning found him hang'd. It was the common opinion he had not been Compos sui since his Censorship, that Juno Lacinia, angry at the spoil he committed on her Temple, had depriv'd him of his right mind. M. Valerius Messala succeeded the Decemvir Æmilius, Cneus Domitius Anobarbus, the chief Priest Fulvius, too young a man for such a Function.

XXIX. That year P. Licinius and C. Cassius were Consuls, not only the City of Rome, with the whole Country of Italy, but all the European and Asiatick Princes and Cities, had converted their minds on the prospect of the War between the Romans and Macedonians. Eumenes was urged by a double stimulation, as well the core of his old hatred, as the late treachery at Delphis, wherein he had almost fallen a Victim to Perseus's rage; Prusias King of Bithynia, resolv'd to stand neuter and attend the issue, esteeming it unjust to bear Arms for the Romans against the Brother of his Wife, by whose intercession he doubted not if Perseus prov'd Victorious to obtain his pardon. Ariates King of the Cappadocians, besides the promise he had made to aid the Romans on his own account, since the time his Alliantie with Eumenes shar'd with him in all his Counsels both of Peace and War. Antiochus bent his purposes on the Kingdom of Egypt, despising the Kings Childhood and insufficiency of his Guardians, resolv'd to renew his pretensions to Cælosyria; supposing to manage this War without impediment, while the Romans were busied about that of Macedonia, contrary to the large promises he had made the Senate. Ptolomy [the young King of Egypt] in regard of his youth, was wholly at the disposal of others: His Protectors not only made preparations to oppose Antiochus in in Cælosyria, but likewise assur'd the Romans to assist them against the Macedonians. Mastinissa [King of the Numidians] purpos'd to furnish the Romans with Corn, and that his Son Misagenes should attend them in that service with an Auxiliary of Elephants; however he took those measures to provide for himself against both Fortunes; if Victory declar'd for Rome, his affairs would not be at all advanc'd, or in a better posture than before; nor would they ever suffer him to exercise his Arms against the Carthaginians; But if the Roman greatness fell, who then could protect the Carthaginians, or hinder the subduing all Africa under his subjection? Gentius [King of Illyria] had given the Romans occasion of suspicion rather than a demonstration which part he would join with, and that if he declared for either, it would proceed more from the impetuosity of his temper than a mature result. Cotys the Thracian, King of the Odrysiens, openly appear'd for Macedonia.

These were the inclinations of the Kings concerning the War; the generality of the common people almost thorough all the liberal Nations (leaning as they usually do to the baser side) inclin'd their affections towards the Macedonians; but one might easily perceive the Nobility to be differently affected: some therefore with great eagerness joined with the Romans, by which immoderate favour they impair'd their authority at home; few being induc'd by the justice of the Roman Government, but rather with an opinion that the more vigorous they appear'd for them, the more should they encrease their power in their own Cities. On the Kings side were three sorts, the first whereof were of profuse Court-Flatterers, who being too deeply involv'd in credits of others, and desperate in their own Fortunes, without some turns of State, endeavour'd to precipitate all things into confusion; another, that ill resent'd the favour Perseus seem'd to shew the popularity; a third consisted of persons of the greatest ability and integrity, who (had it been in their power to give the prebeminency) would rather have been subject to the Romans than the King; but if they had been absolute Arbiters of Fortune, neither part should get advancement by the depression of the other, but rather their Forces being preserv'd intire, Peace should have been embrac'd by both; from whence the Cities would have remained in a flourishing condition, while that the weaker was preserv'd from the oppression of the stronger; however they kept these opinions to themselves, and with a discreet silence beheld the deportment of those that adher'd to either side. The Consuls that day they took possession of their Government, when they had done the Sacrifice in all the Temples, where the sacred Beds for most part of the year were prepared, and prefaging their Prayers were accepted by the Gods, made a report hereof to the Senate. The Amuspices likewise prefaged a happy event to all new Enterprizes they should undertake, promising Victory, triumph and enlargement of their Dominions. The Fathers commanded the Consuls on the first day the Centuries made their general Parade to publish to the People, That whereas Perseus Son of Philip King of the Macedonians had (contrary to the League made by his Father, and since his death by him renew'd) invaded the Territories of the Roman Allies, harass'd their Countries, and possess'd their Cities, had enter'd into Counsels of War against the Romans, had rais'd Armies and fitted out a Fleet; that unless he made satisfaction for these wrongs, War should be made upon him. The Gods preserve the happiness of the Roman People.

This Proclamation was published to the People. Afterwards the Senate decreed, the Consuls should either agree the matter between themselves, concerning the Provinces of Italy and Macedonia, or else to be determined by Lot; and that he to whom the Province of Macedonia fell, should vigorously prosecute the War against that King, and his Adherents, unless they made satisfaction to the Romans. It was also concluded, that four Legions should be rais'd and divided between the Consuls. The Macedonian Province was chiefly consider'd, that seeing, according to the old institution, there went in the Legions of the other Consul but five thousand Foot, and two hundred Horse to each, it was commanded they should now be advanc'd to six thousand Foot, and three hundred Horse a-piece. The number of the other Consul in the associate Army was likewise augmented, that (besides those six hundred Horse Cn. Sicinius had already conducted) out of those Allies he should transport sixteen thousand Foot and eight hundred Horse into Macedonia, twelve thousand Foot of the Confederates, and six hundred Horse were thought sufficient for Italy. This further care was taken concerning Macedonia, that the Consul might at his own discretion make Captains and private Souldiers out of the Elder sort, that exceeded not the Age of fifty. The old method of chusing Colonels in respect of the Macedonian War was this Year changed; That the Consuls by the Senates Authority should move the people that those Colonels might not that year be Elected by their Suffrages, but according to the judgment and discretion of the Consuls and Prætors. The commands among the Prætors were thus divided. The Prætor, whose Office it was to be the Senates Itinerant, was dispatch'd to the Fleet at Brundisium, to muster the Squadron of the Associates, dismissing such as were unfit for service, and supply their vacancy out of the Libertines; and to take care that two parts consisted of Roman Citizens, the third of the Alliances. That Provisions of the Fleet and Army should be supplied from Sicily and Sardinia; the Prætors of those Provinces were commanded to levy a Tax of two Tenths on the people, and transport the Corn to the Army in Macedonia. The Sicilian Province fell to C. Caninius Rubinus, the Sardinian, to L. Furius Philus, and that of Spain to L. Canuleius. C. Sulpitius Galba possess'd the

the jurisdiction over the City, and L. Villius Annalis over the Strangers. C. Lucretius Gal- lus was the Senate's Itinerant.

XXXII. Between the Consuls the debate of the Province was rather a cavil than a great contention. Cassius affirm'd it was his right, without obtaining it by Lot, to fight in Macedonia, nor could his Collegue put it to the hazard with him without perjury; for being Prætor he had sworn in a great Assembly (to defer the return to his Province) that in a particular place, on certain dayes, he purpos'd to do some Sacrifices which could not rightly be perform'd in his absence; which now in his Consulship could be no better effected in his absence than when he was Prætor; But if the Senate should not have respect rather to the Oath in his Prætorship, than his ambition in his Consulship, himself would notwithstanding preserve his obedience to the Senate. The Fathers were consulted, who judg'd it insolence to deny him a Province on whom the people of Rome had plac'd the dignity of a Consul, and therefore commanded that Lots should be cast; Macedonia fell to P. Licinius, Italy to C. Cassius. Afterwards the Legions were also divided by Lot, the first and third were to be transported into Macedonia, the second and fourth to remain in Italy. The Consuls in their musters were stricter in their view of the Souldiers than they had been at other times. Licinius drew out of the elder sort both Captains and Souldiers; many also voluntarily list'd themselves, observing the riches that others had procured in the former Macedonian War, and that against Antiochus in Asia. When the Colonels called over the names of the private Captains (the principal first) they were found twenty three in number, who had formerly been plac'd in the first ranks of the Pilieri; when they had been call'd over they appeal'd for redress to the Tribunes of the people; but M. Fulvius Nobilior, and M. Claudius Marcellus, two of those Tribunes refer'd them to the Consuls; Alledging that it only belong'd to those who had been chosen Generals of the War to determine in those matters; The rest assum'd the authority to themselves, and if any injury were offer'd their Fellow Citizens, they should not want their assistance.

XXXIII. This was done in the Tribunes Court; M. Popilius, a Consular person was called thither, and with him the Consul attended by the Centurion Captains; He mov'd the matter might be decided in a publick Convocation of the people, who were accordingly assembled; where M. Popilius, who had been Consul two years before, spoke these words in behalf of the Centurion Captains: These military men (said he) have serv'd the state during the time the Law prescribes, and carry now about them Bodies harass'd with labour, in the publick service, and are ready still to serve their Country; they only beg they may not be dispos'd in more inferiour posts than those they have posses'd in former Wars. Then P. Licinius the Consul commanded the Senate's Decree to be openly read, wherein it was ordain'd, That War should be levy'd on Perseus, to raise as many as they could of the old Centurion Captains for that service, and that none should be exempted that exceeded not the Age of fifty; after this he humbly exhorted them; That in a War so nearly concerning Italy, and against so formidable an Enemy; they would not hinder the Colonels in raising Souldiers, nor the Consul appointing to every one such Posts, as should be thought most advantageous to the Common-wealth; and if any thing arose that should be dubious they would submit it to the Senate.

XXXIV. After the Consul had finish'd his Discourse, Sp. Ligustinus, one of those who had appeal'd to the popular Tribunes, beg'd leave of the Consul to speak a few words to the people, and having obtain'd it, he thus spoke. *I Spurius Ligustinus of the Crustumian Bands, am descended, Fellow Souldiers! from the Sabines; My Father left me an Acre of Land, and a small Cottage, wherein I was born and nourished, and at this day inhabit; when I came to full Age I married my Fathers Neece by the Brother, who brought with her no other portion than a free birth and chastity, and with these a fecundity would have besitt'd a plentiful Fortune; we have had six Sons and two Daughters both now marriageable; four of our Sons are arriv'd to manhood, two are under Age; I first became a Souldier in the Consulships of P. Sulpicius and C. Aurelius, and serv'd a private Souldier in that Army transported into Macedonia against King Philip; the third year T. Quintius Flaminius, to encourage my forwardness, assign'd me the command of the tenth division of the Spear-men; our Army being disbanded after the Victory over the Macedonians, I immediately went a Volunteer under M. Porcius the Consul into Spain, than whom there is not a Commander now living could better judge of a Souldiers Courage and Vertue, which those who by long service in the Wars under him, and other Leaders have well experienc'd; This great man (I say) thought me worthy the command he bestow'd upon me; a third time I went a Volunteer in the Expedition against the Ætolians and Antiochus, where from Manius Acilius I receiv'd the command of the first Centurion division; Antiochus being repuls'd, and the Ætolians vanquish'd, we return'd into Italy, and two years together I received pay with the pentionary Legions; twice after this I bore Arms in Spain, once under Q. Fulvius Flaccus, a second time under Tib. Sempronius Gracchus the Prætor; By Flaccus I was brought home from that Province, among those who had purchas'd his favour by their courage and merits, to attend his triumph; At the entreaty of Tib. Gracchus I went with him into that Province, where in few years I was advanc'd to the command of the first division of the Pilieri; thirty four times I have receiv'd from my Generals hand the rewards of Valour and Vertue; six civick Coronets I have obtain'd; twenty two years have followed the Wars, and am now above fifty years o'd; Thus, since I have serv'd the State during the age of prescription,* prescription, and may plead the immunity of my years, it is but just methinks, Licinius! I should now retire, considering too I leave four Souldiers to supply my room; But this I speak no otherwise than what might be modestly said in my own behalf; for as long as I am able to bear Arms, I will never excuse my self, or oppose the authority of such deputed Officers as shall think me fit for service, and shall readily obey their commands in any Post they shall esteem me worthy of; nor shall the Army Comrades) hath ever been my constant industry; And you also, my Fellow Souldiers! that exercise the privilege of appealing to the Tribunes, it is necessary ye now preserve that reverence and obedience to the authority of the Senate, and their Officers, which ye kept inviolate in your younger age; and esteem all places honourable wherein ye are posted for the defence of the Republick.

When he had finish'd his Speech, the Consul highly applauded him, and brought him XXXV. from the people into the Senate, where he was graciously received, and the military Tribunes commanded to assign him the Post of the right hand Pilier, in the first Legion; and to the rest of the Centurion Captains letting fall their appeal obediently submitted. That the Generals might hasten the sooner to their Provinces, the Latine Anniversary was celebrated on the Calends of March; which annual solemnity being ended, C. Lucretius the Prætor, after he had provided all things necessary for the Fleet, departed for Brundisium. Besides those Forces levy'd by the Consuls, a Commission was directed to C. Sulpicius Gal the Prætor, to raise four Legions of Roman Citizens, with a just proportion of Cavalry and Infantry, and to chuse out of the Senate four military Tribunes to command them; to levy likewise out of the Latine Alliances fifteen thousand Foot, and twelve hundred Horse, and to prepare them in readiness to obey such Orders as should be sent them from the Senate. P. Licinius the Consul desiring an addition might be made to the civil and associate Armies, obtained an Auxiliary of two thousand Ligurians, and as many Archers as the Cretensians thought fit to send; and also a certain number of Numidian Horse and Elephants; to which purpose L. Posthumus Albinus, Q. Terentius Culleo, and C. Aburnius, were sent Embassadors to Maf- sinissa and the Carthaginians; It was likewise thought expedient to send A. Posthumus Albi- nus, C. Decimius, and A. Lucius Nerva Embassadors into Greet.

At the same time arriv'd Embassadors from King Perseus; but it was not thought fit XXXVI. they should be admitted into the City, seeing it was decreed by the Senate, and the peoples Suffrages, to make War on their King, and the Macedonians; they had Audience in the Temple of Bellona where they deliver'd this Message. That the King their Master much wonder'd that an Army should be landed in his Dominions; if he could obtain of the Senate to recal them home, he was ready to repair the injuries he had offer'd their Alliances, and therein to obey their directions; there was at that time in the Senate-House Sp. Carvilius, sent back from Greece by Cn. Sicinius, on purpose to present the state of that affair; he remonstrated that Perrhœbia was over run by Arms, and certain Cities of Thessaly vanquish'd; with other designs that King had either effected, or was ready to att. These Allegations the Embassadors were commanded to answer; who after some hesitations declared, their Commission did not extend to those particulars; they were therefore bid tell their Master, That P. Licinius the Consul would shortly be with the Army in Macedonia, to whom he might send his Embassadors if he intended (as he said) to make satisfaction, for that his Ministers should have no further passport thorough Italy. Being thus dismiss'd, P. Licinius the Consul was commanded to bid them depart from Italy within eleven dayes; and that Sp. Carvilius should guard them till they went aboard. These Occurrences happen'd in Rome before the Consuls went to their Provinces. Now Cn. Sicinius, before he quitted his jurisdiction, was sent before to the Fleet and Army at Brundisium; having landed in Epirus five thousand Foot, and three hundred Horse, Encamped before Nymphæum in the Poloniate Campane; from hence he sent a Detachment of two thousand men to possess the Forts of the Dassaretians and Illyrians, themselves having desired their Garisons might be fortified, to defend them from the incursions of the Macedonians.

A few dayes after Q. Marcius, A. Atilius, P. and Ser. Cornelius Lentulus, with L. Deci- XXXVII. mius, who were sent Embassadors into Greece, brought with them to Corcyra a thousand Foot, where they divided between themselves their Souldiers and the places they were to go to. Decimius was sent to Gentius King of the Illyrians, with advice, to sound him whether they could find him any way inclinable to the Friendship of the Romans, and if possibly, to draw him into the League of War. The two Lentuli were sent into Cephalania, from thence to cross over to Peloponnesus, and before Winter to scour the Western Seas. Martius and Atilius were assigned to visit Epirus, Ætolia, and Thessaly; from thence they were bid to touch at Bœotia and Eubœa, and so to sail over to Peloponnesus, there to meet the Lentuli; But before they departed from Corcyra Letters were brought from Perseus; wherein he demanded for what reason the Romans had landed Forces in Greece, and seized Cities? they thought not good to return an answer in writing, but only bid the Envoy tell his Master, That the Romans did it for the defence and safety of those Towns. The Lentuli, as they made their progress thorough Peloponnesus, exhorting both Nobility and people indifferently, to assist the Romans against Perseus, with the same courage and fidelity they maintain'd in the Wars against against Philip and Antiochus; they observed a murmuring through the crowd; The Achæans ill-repented that they (who from the beginning of the Macedonian Wars had shew'd themselves in all things no less Friends to the Romans than Enemies to King Philip) should be plac'd in the same rank with the Mæcenians and Eleans, who had born Arms against the Romans for Antiochus their Enemy; and being lately added to the Achæan community, complain'd they were deliver'd to the Victorious Achæans as a reward of their Conquest.

XXXVIII. Marcus and Attilius, when they arrived at Gitana, a Town of Epirus ten Miles from the Sea, in an Assembly of the Epirots, receiv'd their Audience with a welcome reception, four hundred young men were sent to the Orestians to ly in Garison to defend those Macedonians that were by them set at liberty; From thence they arriv'd in Etolia, where after tarrying some dayes (while a new Prætor was Elested in the room of the deceased, and Lyciscus appointed Governour, a man the Romans knew firm to their interest) they pass'd over into Theffaly. Thither came Embassadours from the Acarnanians and the banish'd Bæotians; the Acarnanians were bid declare what they had committed against the people of Rome, deceived by the promises of Philip and Antiochus, during those two Wars, since occasion of atonement was now offer'd them, for if they had experienc'd the Roman Clemency when they ill-deserv'd, they had reason to hope their benignity when they well-deserv'd. The Bæotians were reprov'd for entering into an Alliance with Persens; But when they began to lay the fault on Ismerias a Captain of the other Faction, and on certain Cities that had been drawn away by different opinions; Marcus told them, that the truth of that should soon be manifest by the severall Examination of each City. The Diet of Theffalia was now held at Larissa; where the Theffalonians took occasion of rendering their acknowledgments to the Romans by whose munificence they enjoy'd their Liberties, the Roman Deputies on the other side, as readily own'd the obligations receiv'd by the Romans from the Theffalians, who first in the War with Philip, and afterwards that against Antiochus, had assist'd them with so much vigour and constancy. This mutual commemoration of benefits inflam'd the mind of the multitude with a zeal to follow the Romans in all their undertakings. After the Council broke up there came Embassadours from Persens to Marcus, in confidence of that private Friendship that had pass'd between Philip and Marcus [the elder;] The Embassadours began with commemorating that familiarity, desiring he would permit the King might have some Conference with him; Marcus reply'd, that he had heard his Father speak of that mutual affection betwixt him and Philip; and himself being a religious observer of Friendship, had on purpose undertaken that Embassy; as to the Parley he would not in the least have deserv'd it, if it could have been commodiously done; but assur'd them he would very suddenly send a Courier to advertise the King, to meet him at the River Peneus, where a passage lyeth from Omolium over to Dium.

XXXIX. And truly at that time Persens retired from Dium to the interior parts of his Kingdom, entertaining some light hopes, in that Marcus had confess'd it was for his sake he had undertaken that Legation. After some few dayes they repair'd to the appointed place; The King came attended with a great train of Guards and other Officers of State; The Roman Legates were accompanied with no lesser a Troop of Followers; as well those that came with them from Larissa, as the Deputies of those States which were assembled at Larissa; who were desirous to report at home the things they had seen there; every one was fill'd with ambition to behold the approaches of that great King, and the Representatives of the mightiest people of the Universe; when they came to an interview they stood still on both sides of the River which separated them, and spent some time in disputing by their Messengers which should first pass the River; They insist'd on the respect due to the majesty of a King, and these thought no less was due to the Roman greatness, especially since Persens was the first aggressor to the Parly; Marcus being mov'd at these delays; let the younger (said he pleasantly) because his own surname was Philip) come to the older, the Son to the Father, to which the King was easily perswaded; but now another doubt arose, with what number he should pass over; the King thought it requisite to come with his whole Train; but the Romans that he should pass either with but three attendance, or if he came with all his Followers, that he should deliver them hostages that no violence should be committed during the Parly; Persens therefore sent as Pledges Hippias and Pentarchus his greatest Favourites, whom he had before employ'd in the Embassy; nor were these Hostages required so much for their security as to let their Allies see that the King parlied with them upon unequal terms of grandeur; their salutation was not like that of Enemies, but benign and affable, sitting down by each other on Chairs already prepar'd.

XL. After some little silence; 'Tis expected I suppose (said Marcus) we should answer those Letters you sent to Corcyra, wherein you demanded why we came thus with Forces and plac'd Garisons in every City; to which, should I not answer at all, I fear you might interpret it pride in me, and to answer truly it may seem ingrateful to your self; but since he who breaks the League must be chastis'd by word or Sword (although to make War on you, I had much rather were anothers charge than mine.) I shall accost you (however it be receiv'd) with a friendly roughness, following the Physicians method who uses bitter remedies for the sake of curing. Since the coming to your Kingdom, the Senate

"Senate thinks you have done but one thing you ought, your sending Embassadours to Rome to renew the League, nevertheless they judge you had better not to have renew'd it than being once done to break it: you have driven Adrupolis out of his Kingdom, their Friend and Ally; you receiv'd the murderers of Artetarius that it might appear (to say no more) you were not displeased with them who had kill'd a Prince of all the Illyrians the most faithful to the Roman interest; thorough Theffaly and Malia you have march'd an Army (contrary to the League) as far as Delphos, and have also sent relief to the Bæotians against the same agreement; you have confirm'd by Oath a secret Confederacy with our Allies the Bæotians, which you ought not have done; concerning the death of the Theban Embassadours, Eversæ and Callicritus (coming from us) I had rather enquire than accuse; and to whom should I impute the civil Wars and slaughter of the Nobility in Atolia but the Macedonians? nor do the Delopians owe their ruine to any other arm than yours; It troubles me to tell, whom King Eumenes accuses for contriving his destruction at Delphi; where on his return from Rome to his own Kingdom in that sacred place before the Altars he had well nigh like a Victim been sacrificed: The wicked practices related by your Brundusian Host, I am well assur'd you have receiv'd by Letters from Rome as well as the report of your own Embassadours; if you would not have had me related these things, you might have avoided it by forbearing these demands, why our Army was transported into Macedonia, and the Cities of our Confederates fortified; which to have obviated with silence would have been a greater argument of our pride than with ingenuous truths; and do withal assure you the memory of our Fathers Friendship makes me grant you this request, and also wish you'd shew me how my interest may serve you with the Senate.

"I shall now defend a cause (reply'd the King) before those who are at once both Judges and Accusers; but were the debate before impartial Judges, I should not doubt its goodness. As to the matters objected against me, they are partly such as I know not whether I may not glory in them, or such I cannot blush to own, and partly such as are merely verbal, for which a plain denial may serve; For, were I this day accus'd by your own Laws, what could that Brundusian discoverer, or Eumenes object against me, that would not seem rather a reproach than a fair accusation? Is it likely Eumenes (considering his many both private and publick wrongs) should have no other Enemy than my self, or that I could find no fitter a minister of mischief than Rammius? one whom I ne'r had seen before, nor was ever likely to see hereafter; must an account of the Theban's death (who, 'tis manifest, have perished by Shipwrack) be rendered by me, and of the murder of Artetarius; wherein there is nothing farther objected, than that his murderers were banish'd into my Kingdom? and yet I will not refuse this hard imposition, if you will also agree to own your selves to be the Authors of all those crimes committed by such banish'd Malefactors as have transported themselves into Italy or Rome; but if you as well as other Nations shall excuse your selves from this, I shall not among others exempt my self; and, by Hercules, the banishment of one place will signify but little to him that may not be suffer'd to live in another; and yet as soon as I was inform'd by you that they were in Macedonia, I immediately commanded them to depart my Kingdom, and forbad them ever after to appear in my Dominions; and thus far I have answer'd these objections like one accused at the Bar; those things which regard me as a King, and your Confederate, must be disputed; for if it be mentioned in the Treaty, that if any one should levy War upon me it shall not be lawful for me to defend my self and Kingdom, then indeed it must be confessed that in defending my self by Arms against Adrupolis (a Confederate of Rome) the Treaty was violated; but if this might be done by virtue of the League, and that by the Law of Nations Arms may be repuls'd by Arms, what measures pray should I then have taken when Adrupolis had invaded the Frontiers of my Kingdom as far as Amphipolis, seiz'd many free-born Subjects with a great multitude of Peasants, and drove away many thousands of Cattle? should I have sat still and suffer'd him till he came to Pella, even arm'd into my Palace? No! I pursu'd him with a just War, though to vanquish him I would not, nor ought he to suffer those calamities that attend the conquer'd; if I, who was provok'd to arms underwent the chance of War, how can he complain to have tasted the same fate, who was the first aggressor? I shall not, Romans! in the same manner defend my Arms for the suppression of the Dolopeans; having done therein what was agreeable to my own right, if not to their merits, seeing they were of my own Kingdom and Jurisdiction, made subject to my Father by your own Decree; neither, if the thing were now to be disputed (not before you, nor my Confederates, but) those who approve not of unjust authority, even our Slaves, can I be thought to have been more rigorous towards them than Equity and Justice will allow; having murder'd Euphranor the Governour, I set over them, so barbarously, that death was the lightest of his sufferings.

"From thence as I made my progress to visit Larissa, Antrona and Peleon, I ascended up to Delphi to do sacrifice, and pay those Vows I had long before promised; and here 'tis thrown upon me to augment my crime; that I was there with my Army, to seize on Cities,

XLI.

XLII.

"Cities, and fortifie their Garisons, the thing for which I now complain of you: Assemble all the Cities of Greece through which I pass'd, and let any Souldier complain I injur'd him, I will not then deny, but that under a pretence of Sacrifice I might seem to seek another thing; we sent assistance, I confess, to the Aetolians and Byzantines, and made a League with the Boeotians: These things of what sort soever they were, by my Embassadours were not only declared, but often excused before your Senate; where I had some Arbiters, not so equal to my cause as you Quintius Martins my Fathers Friend and Guest; For, Eumenes my Accuser was not as yet come to Rome, who by wrestling and calumniating, had rendered all things odious and suspected; endeavouring to persuade you, that Greece could not possess it's liberty, and enjoy your benignity, as long as the Kingdom of Macedonia flourished: But, you'll see a new face of things; and there will be ere long some that may shew, it was to little purpose Antiochus was removed beyond the head of Taurus; and that Eumenes is become a much greater troubler of Asia than Antiochus ever was; nor your Confederates be able to live in Peace as long as his Palace is at Pergamus, that Cittadel o'retopping the heads of all the adjacent Cities. I know, O Q. Marcins, and you A. Atilius, the things which are by you objected and me excused, will be such as are the Ears and Opinions of the Auditory; nor will it be reflected, with what intention I have done them, as being done, how you may censure them: I am conscious to my self of nothing wherein I e'r offended willingly; and if I have done any thing thorough inadvertency or imprudence, it may by this reprehension be corrected and amended; I have committed nothing that you may judge incurable, or worthy to be pursued with War and force of Arms, or surely it is in vain the fame of your clemency and gravity hath spread it self thorough all Nations, if for such trifling matters (scarcely worth complaint or disputation) ye take up Arms and levy War against your Confederate Princes.

XLIII. Marcins then assenting to these things, moved him to address Embassadours to Rome, seeing all things ought to be pursued to the last, nor should he in the least despair. The remainder of the consultation was, how his Embassadours might pass in safety; to this purpose, though a Truce of Arms might seem but a reasonable request, and Marcins himself willing to it, (nor had he any other intention by this Treaty) yet he conceded with some difficulty, as if it had proceeded meerly from his respect and favour of the Petitioner. For the Romans were not at all as yet sufficiently prepared for the War, neither in their Army nor Leaders; whereas Perseus (had he not been blinded with a vain hope of Peace) had all things in full order and preparation, and might have begun the War, in a time most advantageous to himself, and unseasonable to his Enemies. From this Conference (a cessation of Arms being on both sides concluded) the Roman Deputies determin'd to advance towards Boetia; there being now begun some commotions, occasioned by the dissenting of certain people from the Society of the common Council of the Boeotians, ever since it was reported back, the Roman Legates to have answered, that it should appear particularly what people disliked to be joined in Alliance with the King. First, Embassadours from Cheronea, then others from Thebes met them on their way, assuring them they were not in that counsel wherein that Alliance was decreed; at this time no Answer was returned, they were only commanded to attend them to Chalcis. At Thebes also there was begun a tumult, arising from another contention: In the Assembly for the electing of the Boeotian Prætors, that part which received the repulse (resenting the injury) gathering the multitude together, made a Vote; That the Boeotarches should not be received within their Cities; who like banished men retired all to Theffia; From whence (for they were received there without delay) being upon second thoughts recall'd, they made a Decree; That if the number of twelve private persons had Congregated themselves into an Assembly and Council, they should be condemned to banishment: After this Ismenias the new Prætor, a Nobleman, and of great power, by Decree in their absence, condemn'd them to lose their lives; They had fled to Chalcis, and from thence they went to the Romans at Larissa; laying the occasion of their Alliance with Perseus wholly on Ismenias; From these contentions they grew to a fierce Conflict, nevertheless Embassadours from both sides came to the Romans, as well the banished and accusers of Ismenias as Ismenias himself.

XLIV. When they arrived at Chalcis, the Nobility of other Cities (a thing most grateful to the Romans) every one by his own particular suffrage renouncing Society with Perseus, united themselves to the Romans. Ismenias thought it just the Boeotian people should be committed to the trust of the Romans, whereupon arose so fierce a contention, that unless he had fled into the tribunal of the Legates, he had with no small difficulty preserved his life from the enraged exiles and their party. Thebes it self, which is the Metropolis of Boetia, was likewise in great commotion; these endeavouring to draw the City to the King, and those inclined it to the Romans; besides, a great multitude of Coroneans and Heliartians had reformed together to assert the Decree of Alliance with the King; but the constancy of the Nobility remonstrating by the Calamities of Philip and Antiochus, the power and fortune of the Roman Empire, so over-ruled the multitude, that they not only decreed the regal Alliance should be dissolv'd; but also sent those who had been the promoters of that contracted Friendship, Friendship, to render satisfaction to the Legates at Chalcis; and commanded them to submit their City under their protection. Marcins and Atilius heard the Thebans and the promoters very gladly, and advised them separately to send Embassadours to Rome, to renew their amity; but before all things they commanded the restoring of the Exiles; and the Authors of the regal Society they condemn'd by their own Decree. Having thus dissolved the Boeotick Council (a thing they earnestly coveted) they went to Poloponnesus with Serv. Cornelius, whom they had sent for to Chalcis; a Council was assembled for them at Argos; where they requested nothing of the Achaians, but that they would supply them with a thousand Souldiers; this recruit was sent to fortifie Chalcis till the Roman Army was transported into Greece: Thus Marcins and Atilius having finished what affairs were to be done in Greece, about the beginning of Winter return'd to Rome.

About this time an Embassy was sent round the Asiatick Isles wherein were three Embassadours, Ti. Claudius, P. Posthumius and M. Junius: These, as they travelled round, incited their Allies to join with the Romans in this War against Perseus; and the more opulent each City was, the more forcible were their persuasions; because the lesser, they concluded, would follow the authority of the greater. The Rhodians of all others were esteemed of the greatest moment; because they could not only favour, but with their Forces aid the War; and by the advice of Hegesilochus had fitted out a Fleet of forty Sail; Who, seeing he was their chief Magistrate (which they call Prytanis) had overcome the Rhodians by many reasons, That abandoning all hope of regal Patronage (which they had too often proved but vain) they should adhere to the Alliance of the Romans, the only support as well for fidelity as power that was then to be found in the whole Universe: That since the War was drawing near with Perseus, the Romans would suddenly desire the same Fleet, which they had lately seen in the War against Antiochus, and formerly in that against Philip; and, unless they had already begun to refit the Ships and furnish them with Mariners and Souldiers, they would be then in a hurry and confusion when the Fleet was to be prepared and fitted out; And this ought to be done with greater solicitude, that by the proof of these proceedings, those related by Eumenes might be refuted. Incited by these motives, upon the arrival of the Roman Legates, they shew'd them a Fleet of forty Ships repleat and fitted out, that it might appear, persuasion was not by them expected: And this Embassy was of great moment in procuring the affections of the Asiatick Cities. Decimus alone without any effect (and not without the disgrace of being suspected for taking bribes of the Kings of the Illyrians) return'd to Rome.

Perseus, when he had retired himself from the Parly with the Romans into Macedonia, XLVI. sent Embassadours to Rome concerning the conditions of Peace, already begun with Marcins; He also dispatch'd his Credentials by his Embassadours to Byzantium and Rhodes; the purport whereof was to the same effect in all; That he had had some Conference with the Roman Deputies; But he had express'd as well the things he had heard as those he spoke, in such a manner, that he might seem to have gain'd the advantage in the dispute: The Embassadours likewise added, They were confident that Peace would be concluded, being sent themselves Embassadours to Rome by the instigation of Marcins and Atilius; But if the Romans contrary to the Treaty should proceed to War, that then the Rhodians with all their power and interest should endeavour to reunite the Peace: if all their attempts should prove in vain, it would require their care, lest the right and power of all things should wholly devolve on this one people; and if this consideration was of such import to others, then chiefly to the Rhodians, who among other Cities so much excell'd in dignity and wealth; all which would be obnoxious and enslav'd, should there be no regard to any other than the Romans. The Kings Letters and Discourse of the Embassadours, found rather a civil entertainment than an effectual persuasiveness in changing their minds, which, the authority of the better part had already begun to sway. This Answer was voted to be return'd; That Peace was wished by the Rhodians; But if War should happen, their King should neither seek nor hope any thing from the Rhodians, that might dissolve their antient Friendship with the Romans, purchaced by many and great obligations both in Peace and War. Returning from Rhodes, they visited those Cities of Boetia, Thebes, Coronea and Haliartus: From whom it did seem a thing forced from them against their wills, that quitting the royal Alliance, they were joined with the Romans: The Thebans continued stedfast, although they were something discontented with the Romans, in condemning their Nobility, and restoring the Exiles: The Coroneans and Haliartians, possessed with a certain affection towards Kings, sent Embassadours into Macedonia, intreating a Garison, whereby they might be protected against the excessive insolence of the Thebans; To which Embassy the King thus answered; That a Garison was not in his power to send them, because of the Truce with the Romans, but only to persuade that they should in such a manner defend themselves from the injuries of the Thebans, as thereby they offer'd no occasion to the Romans to exercise severity against them.

When Marcins and Atilius had arriv'd at Rome, they thus related their Legation in the Capitol; That they gloried in nothing more, than the Kings being deceived by a Cessation from Arms and the hope of Peace; for so well appointed as he was in all things requisite for War, and they so ill, all places of advantages might have been prepossess'd by him, before their Army could be transported into Greece: That the King would not return any thing advantaged by the interval.

S S S S

of that Truce; though the Romans might thereby be more repleat in all things to begin the War: They had also by a stratagem divided the Council of the Boeotians, that they could not any more hereafter be joined in any Confederacy with the Macedonians. These things were approved by the greatest part of the Senate, as perform'd with the greatest discretion; But the old Senators, who remembered the customs of elder times, did refuse to allow the policies of that Negotiation, That their Predecessors used to make War, not by Ambushes, and nocturnal Skirmishes, or by a dissembled flight to make sudden rallies on their unwary Enemy; nor were they wont to glory more in their subtilty than true Valour and Vertue; They w'd to declare, nay proclaim War before they made it; and sometimes to appoint the place where they would fight the Battle: With the same confidence they discovered the Physician to King Pyrrhus that designed his death, and delivered to the Faliscians the betrayer of the Children of their King. These were the Roman Arts of War; not those of the crafty Carthaginians, or the subtle Greeks, with whom it was more glorious, to beguile their Enemies than conquer them by Courage; That sometimes, indeed, cunning might more avail than valour, although the mind of an Enemy was then only said to be overcome, when he was forced to confess, the conquest was not deriv'd from policy or chance; but hand to hand by grappling force with force in just and pious War. Thus spake the Fathers, who were not much taken with this new policy; nevertheless that part of the Senate overcame, whose care extended more to that which was profitable than honourable; and so far that Marcus was not only commended for his former Embally, but was employed a second time into Greece, with certain five-oar'd Gallies, and commanded to act all other things as should appear to himself most advantageous for the Republick. A. Atilius they likewise sent to possess himself of Larissa in Thessaly; fearing lest when the Truce had been expired, Perseus, sending thither a Garrison, should have seiz'd into his power the Metropolis of Thessaly, to effect which, Atilius was commanded to take two thousand Foot from Cn. Sicinius; And to P. Lentulus who had returned from Achaia, was given three hundred Soldiers of the Italian Nation; that at Thebes he should endeavour to bring Boeotia under their subjection.

XLVIII. Things being in this readiness, although War was absolutely determined, yet the Senate thought good to give Audience to the Embassadors of Perseus; where almost, the same things uttered by the King in the Conference, were deliver'd by the Embassadors; they earnestly endeavoured to wipe off that imputation of treachery towards Eumenes, but with little probability, the thing appearing too manifest; other things were matter of supplication, but they were heard with such minds which would not be inclined or inform'd; and were commanded to depart immediately from the Walls of the City of Rome, and within thirty dayes from Italy. It was afterwards ordered, That Licinius the Consul (who had the Government of the Spanish Province) should appoint the Army the first day he could a general Rendezvous. C. Lucretius the Praetor, Admiral of the Fleet, left the City with forty five-oar'd Gallies, (for the Ships that had been refitted were kept at home for other uses about the City) sending his Brother Lucretius before with one Quinqueme, to receive those Ships from the Allies which were promised by Treaty, and with them to meet the Fleet at Cephalenia; From the Rhegines one Trireme Galliot, from the Locrians two, and from the Oristes four; with which compassing the extreame promontory of Calabria in the Ionian Sea, along the Italian shore, he sailed to Dyrrhachium; there he found ten Barks of the Dyrrhachians, twelve of the Issians, and fifty four belonging to King Centius; taking all these along with him (pretending that he supposed they were all provided for the use of the Romans) the third day he clear'd Corcyra, from whence he soon after arrived at Cephalenia. C. Lucretius the Praetor having put to Sea from Naples, and crossing the Streight, the fifth day arrived also at Cephalenia; where the Fleet came to Anchor, expecting the Land-Forces should be transported thither, and that those Vessels of burthen which had been scattered thorough the Sea from the Fleet should there also overtake them.

XLIX. It happened about this time, that P. Licinius the Consul, having offered up his Vows in the Capitol, in his accoutrements of War, took leave of the City; which Ceremony was always certainly performed with the greatest state and dignity; but then their Eyes and Minds were both especially employ'd, when they beheld their Consul marching against so noble an Enemy, great no less in Fortune than in Courage; nor was respect and duty the only inducive hither, but also to behold the shew, and see their Captain, by whose Conduct they had consented the whole Commonwealth should be preserved: From hence the mind proceeds to some reflections, on the chance of War, the unconstancy of Fortune, the event of Battle, common unto both; The bad and good success, and those things which too often by the inadvertancy and temerity of Leaders, have been the occasion of fatal overthrow; as well as those which on the contrary, have been produced by prudence and fortitude: what mortal could divine whether of these Conducts or Fortunes should attend the Consul they employ'd in War; whether they were likely to behold him not long after, triumphantly ascend the Capitol with his Victorious Army, to revisit those Gods which he was then about to leave, or whether they should give the like opportunity of rejoicing to their Enemies. Perseus, the King against whom he was now a going, had purchas'd Fame by being Prince of the Warlike Macedonians, as well as from his Father Philip, who among many fortunate achievements, was renowned for his War against the the Romans, nor was the name of Perseus (since the time he first possess'd the Kingdom) ever given over to be celebrated in expectation of this War. With these cogitations, men of all Orders followed the Consul at his departure; C. Claudius and Q. Mucius, two military Tribunes that had been Consuls, were sent along with him, and P. Lentulus, and the two Manlii Acidini, three young Gentlemen of quality, one the Son of M. Manlius, the other of L. Manlius: with these the Consul went to the Army at Brundisium, and from thence carrying his whole Forces over to Nymphæum, he incamped in the Territory of Apollonia.

Perseus, some few dayes before (upon return of his Embassadors, relinquishing all hope of Peace) call'd a Council; which was a good while divided with different Opinions; some advised, That if the Tribute should be injoined to be paid, or if they should condemn them to yield some part of their Country; nay it seem'd to them that no conditions were to be refused, but to submit to all things for the sake of Peace; nor that the King should throw himself and Kingdom on the chance of so great an uncertainty; for if the real possession of his Kingdom remained in his own power; opportunity might offer many advantages, which being improved, he might be able hereafter not only to recover his past losses, but also become terrible to those whom now he fear'd. But a much greater number was of a fiercer Opinion; Affirming, that whatsoever Perseus had yielded, he must, not long after, have given his Kingdom with it; for 'twas not Money or Land the Romans wanted; But this they were assured that all humane things were subject to changes, nor were the greatest Kingdoms and Empires exempt from revolutions; That they had themselves subdued the Carthaginian Power, imposing on their necks a mighty King their Neighbour; Antiochus too with all his race remov'd beyond Mount Taurus: That Macedonia was the only Kingdom, both near in Region, and which (if at any time the Roman People should decline in Fortune) seem'd able to restore their Kings their ancient magnanimity; Therefore while things stood intire, Perseus ought to resolve; whether he had rather (conceding to particulars) and being at last divested of his Kingdom, and his wealth extorted) be forc'd to intreat the Romans, either for Samotheacian, or some such petty Isle; where like a private man, surviving his Royal State, he might grow old in base contempt and poverty; or whether arming himself in defence of his dignity and fortune as became a gallant man, he would suffer the utmost chance of War, or victoriously release the World from the Roman sway: nor would it be a greater wonder to chase the Romans out of Greece, than that Annibal was driven out of Italy; nor could they see how it did consist, that he who had resisted with the highest courage his ambitious Brothers injurious attempt upon his lawful Kingdom, to yield it up to strangers. Lastly, Peace and War was so disputed, that in the end they all consented, That nothing was more shameful than to abandon a Kingdom without a Battle, nor any thing more honourable than for a Throne and Majesty to attempt all Fortunes.

This Council was held at Pella, in the ancient Royal Palace of the Macedonians. Let us then make War, said he, since you are so resolv'd, and may the Gods be propitious to us. Then sending Letters to all his chief Officers, he drew up all his Forces near Citium (a Town in Macedonia; After he had offer'd the Princely Sacrifice of an Hecatomb to Minerva, whom they call Aleides, with a great Train of Guards and Courtiers he went to Citium; where already were gathered his whole Forces, both of Macedonians and Auxiliary Strangers; He incamp'd before the City, and drew up his Army in the Plain, which consisted in the whole of forty thousand men; almost the half part of which were composed of the Phalangite, commanded by Hippias a Berean; There were also two Companies selected for their youth and agility out of the whole number of the Targetiers, which they called the Legion, commanded by Leonatus and Thrasippus Eulyestans; The rest of the Targetiers, almost three thousand were led by Antiphibus of Edessa; The Paeonians, and those of Parorea and Pastrymonia (places subject to Thrace) and the Agrians, with some Inhabitants of Thrace mixt amongst them, amounted almost to the number of three thousand, and Didas the Paeonian (who murder'd the young Demetrius) was he who had armed and mulctured them; There were also two thousand Gauls under the command of Asclepiodotus; From Heracles among the Sintians three thousand Free-born Thracians, having a Commander of their own; almost the like number followed their Leaders Susus the Phaliscian, and Syllus the Gnosian; Leonides also the Lacedemonian brought five hundred out of Greece, being a mixt number of all Nations; This person was reported to be of the blood Royal, condemn'd to banishment in a publick Assembly of the Acheans, certain Letters being intercepted that were sent to Perseus; The Aetolians and Boeotians, in all not above five hundred, were commanded by Lycus the Achean; From these mixt Auxiliaries of so many people and Nations, he made almost the Complement of twelve thousand; and he himself had drawn out of all Macedonia three thousand Horse, and Corys Son of Scutha, King of the Odrysians, had brought thither a thousand well appointed Horse, and well nigh as many Foot; The whole Army amounted to thirty nine thousand Foot, and four thousand Horse; which manifestly appeared to have been the greatest Army (except it were that second Army which Alexander the Great carried into Asia) that any King of the Macedonians ever had.

The twenty sixth year was now expired since Peace was granted to the Suit of Philip; during which peaceable interval, Macedonia had brought forth a new Progeny, great part whereof were ripe for Martial Discipline, and by the light Skirmishes with the Thracians their Neighbours (which rather exercised than fatigued them) were always kept in Warlike Discipline; And now, that Roman War (which had been long ago design'd by Philip, and afterwards by Perseus) was in all things fitted and prepared. The Army moved gently, not in a full march, but only, that they might not seem to have stood still in their Arms; And thus armed as they were, he call'd them to a Council of War; The King sat on a Throne, having about him his two Sons, the Elder of which was Philip, his natural Brother, but his Son by adoption, the younger whom they called Alexander, his Son Legitimate; He encourag'd the Souldiers to the War, telling them the injuries done by the Romans, both to his Father and himself: That his Father (being compell'd by all sorts of indignities to renew the War) in the midst of his preparation was seized by the hand of fate; That at one time Embassadors were sent to himself and Souldiers to possess the Cities of Greece; afterwards, by a fallacious party under pretence of a Peace to be reconciled, a whole Winter was wasted, that they might gain time to prepare themselves; That then the Consul was advancing with two Roman Legions, each having three hundred Horse, and about the like number of Horse and Foot from their Confederates; and if the Auxiliaries of the Kings Eumenes and Mallinilla should happen to come along with him, they would not exceed the number of seven thousand Foot, and two of Horse; having heard these things of the Enemies Forces, they should reflect upon their own Army, how much they excell'd them in number, how much in the disposition of their Souldiers, mere novices hurried to the War in haste, while they, from their Childhood had learn'd the martial Arts, harden'd and exercis'd by frequent Wars; That those who aided the Romans were none but Lydians, Phrygians and Numidians; but they had Thracians and the Gauls the fiercest of all Nations; Their Arms were no better than every poor Souldier could provide for himself, but the Macedonians were furnished with those that were ready fixt out of the Royal stores, so many years provided by the care and great expence of his Father: That provision was a great distance from the Romans, and liable to the Casualties of the Sea; while that they had (besides the revenue from the ruins) both Money and Corn reserved for ten years; and that the Macedonians enjoyed all things which the gods indulg'd, and which the Royal care had made accumulate; That they ought to have the courage of their Ancestors, who, all Europe being subdued, and passing over into Asia, have by their Arms discovered a World unknown to Fame; nor did they give o'r their Conquests till debarr'd by the red Sea, having then no more to conquer; But now Fortune had rais'd a dispute, not for the farthest shores of India, but concerning the possession of Macedonia itself: The Romans in the War with his Father, pretended to have made it for the liberty of Greece; but their ambition was now to bring the Macedonian People into servitude, lest any King should be Neighbour to the Roman Empire, or that a gallant people should have Arms for War; All these things with their King and Kingdom, they would be compell'd to resign to those proud Lords, if they refrain'd the War, and did what they would have them.

LIII. Hitherto thorough the whole Oration he had been sufficiently applauded by the general assent; but then there arose so great an exclamation, partly of indignation and menacings, and partly of bidding the King be of good Courage; that he was forced to make an end of speaking, only bidding them to make ready for their march, for that the Romans were already reported to remove their Camp from Nymphaeum. The Assembly being dismiss'd he prepared himself to give Audience to the Embassadors of the Macedonian Cities, who were come to promise money and grain to maintain the War, every one according to his ability; Thanks were returned to all (remitting those charges) with this Answer, that the Kings provisions were sufficient for that purpose; Carriages were only commanded to be provided, for the Ordnance, and a large number of hurling Darts, with other Warlike instruments. Then he march'd with his whole Army towards Eordea, and near the Lake which they call Begorrites he Encamped, from whence he came to Elimia on the River Ha-liaemona; then passing over those they call the Cambanian Mountains thorough a narrow passage, he descended among the Inhabitants of Azorus, Pythius and Doliche, which place they call Tripolis; these three Towns held out a little while, because they had given Hostages to the Larissians; but being overcome with the present fear, yielded themselves into his power; these he saluted courteously; not doubting but that the Perrhabians would also do the same, nor did the inhabitants make the least resistance, but at his first approach they surrender'd the City; Cyretia endeavouring to make resistance, the first day in a sharp Skirmish he was repulsed from the Gates, but the day following attacking it with all his force, they all before night yielded him submission.

LIV. Myla was the next Town, and so strong, that the hope of it's being impregnable, had render'd the Inhabitants a great deal fiercer; thinking it not sufficient to shut the Gates against the King, but they also cast out many scurrilous reproaches on him and the Macedonians; which proceeding, seeing it had more enraged the Enemy to the assault, and themselves likewise despairing of pardon, inflam'd them the more fiercely to defend themselves; so that for the space of three dayes they were attack'd and defended with much gallantry on both sides; The number was so great of the Macedonians, that relieving one another by turns, they easily maintain'd the assault; but the Townsmen that defended the Walls night and day, not only their wounds but continual watching and labour had quite worn them out: The fourth day when the Scaling-Ladders were every where rais'd on the Walls, Walls, and the Gates assailed with greater force, the Townsmen being driven from the Walls ran to defend the Gate, and made a sudden sally on the Enemy; which was rather an effect of blind rage than a true confidence of their strength, but (being few in number and quite tired out) they were beaten back by those that were fresh and vigorous, and in the pursuit their Enemies were received with them thorough the open Gate: Thus the City was taken and sacked, and the free people that survived the slaughter were expos'd to sale; The greatest part of the Town being burnt and ruined, the Camp moved to Phalanna, and the day after came to Gyrtone; but hearing that T. Minucius Rufus and Hyppias the Thessalian Prætors had fortified that place, he pass'd by without making any attempt, however he surprized Elatia and Gonnus, being smitten with terror at his unexpected approach; which two Towns are situate in the Straights which lead to Tempe, Gonnus especially, and therefore he left it fortified with a very strong Garison both of Horse and Foot, and a triple Ditch and Rampier; He determined to go himself to Sycurium, there to expect the Enemy, and commanded his Army to Forage all the Country of the Enemy that lay under him; For Sycurium is seated at the Foot of the Mountain Ossa, having on the South-side lying under it the Thessalian Plains, and behind Macedonia and Magnesia; To these commodities may be added the extraordinary healthfulness of the clime, and the multitude of Fountains continually running round about it.

The Roman Consul by this time marching with his Army towards Thessaly, at first began his expedition with some celerity thorough Epirus, but when he had pass'd over into Athamania, with great difficulty and slow marches thorough a rough and almost unpassable Country, he arriv'd at Gomphi: If the King at that time and place, with his Forces in order, had met him at the head of a young disciplin'd Army, compos'd of tired men and Horses, the Romans themselves cannot deny, but that they must have received a very great overthrow; but when they arriv'd at Gomphi, without any opposition, besides their joy for overcoming those difficulties, they began also to despise their Enemies for their ignorance of their own advantages. The Consul having duly sacrificed and distributed Corn to the Souldiers, remained there some few dayes for the refreshing of his men and Horses; When he heard that the Macedonians overran all Thessaly, and destroyed the Countries of their Allies, being now sufficiently recruited, he led his Army to Larissa; afterwards when he was about three miles distant from Tripolis (which they call Scea) he incamped by the River Peneus. About this time Eumenes came by Sea to Chalcis, with his Brothers Attalus and Athenus; leaving his Brother Philoterus at Pergamus Protector of his Kingdom; departing hence with his Brother Attalus, and four thousand Foot, and a thousand Horse, he came to the Consul; leaving at Chalcis two thousand Foot under the Command of his Brother Athenus: Thither also came other Auxiliaries to the Romans from all the parts of Greece, many of which particulars (being so inconsiderable) are lost in oblivion. The Appolloniats sent three hundred Horse and a hundred Foot; From the Etolians came one Company only the greatest number of Horse the whole Nation could raise: nor did all the Thessalonians which were separated and quartered asunder in the Roman Camp exceed three hundred Horse; and the Achæans sent a thousand of their youth armed for the most part like the Cretesians.

About this time also came C. Lucretius the Prætor, who went before with the Ships to Cephalonia; after he had appointed his to sail above Malea with his Fleet to Chalcis, himself went aboard a Trireme Galliot, passing the Gulf of Corinth to pre-pose the affairs in Bœotia; his Voyage was the slower because of the infirmity of his Body; M. Lucretius coming to Chalcis, and hearing that the City of Haliartus was besieged by P. Lentulus, sent a Messenger to command him in the name of the Prætor to depart thence; The Lieutenant having entered on that affair with the Bœotian youth, who had taken part with the Romans left the Walls; The raising of this Siege made room for another; For M. Lucretius with a Naval Army of ten thousand Souldiers, with two thousand of the Kings which were under Athenus, immediately besieged Haliartus, and being just ready to make an attack, the Prætor from Crensa joined with them; And about the same time Ships from the Allies arriv'd at Chalcis; Two Punicean Quinquereme Galliot, two Trireme Galliot from Heracles in Pontus, four from Chalcedon, as many from Samos, and five four-oar'd Gallies from Rhodes; the Prætor because there was no where any Sea-War, remitted all these again to the Allies; Q. Marcius also, after he had taken Halops and assaulted Larissa which is called Cremaste, came by Sea to Chalcis. This was the State of affairs in Bœotia, when Perseus (as was said before) lay incamped at Sycurium; having drawn together all the Forage of that Country round about, sent Souldiers to destroy the Territory of the Phereans; supposing that the Romans, being drawn far from their Camp to the relief of their Confederates might be surprized; But when he found them nothing moved by tumult, he gave the Booty (except the men) which was large in Cattle of all sorts to be merrily devoured among his Souldiers.

Afterwards, about the same time, the King and Consul both consulted where they should begin the War. The King's Courage was much increased by the devastation of the Phereans permitted by the Enemy; and therefore resolved (nor to give any space of further prolonging) prolonging) to march immediately towards their Camp. The Romans also were of opinion, that delay would have rendered them infamous among their Confederates, resolving it as a thing extremely dishonourable, that the Phœnians were not succoured; as they were consulting what they were to do (Eumenes and Attalus being both in Council) a Scout in haſt reported, that the Enemy were at hand with a mighty Army; The Council being riſen, a ſign was immediately given to arm; in the mean time an hundred Horſe was ordered to march forth, drawn out of the Royal Auxiliaries, with an equal number of Foot Darts. Perſeus about the fourth hour of the day, being about a thouſand paces from the Roman Camp, bid the Enſigns of the Foot to halt, himſelf advancing with the gens d' arms, and light-armed Souldiers, with King Corys and the Captains of the other Auxiliaries marched before; when they came about fifty paces from the Camp, the Enemies Horſemen were in view: They were two Cornets moſt part Gauls commanded by Caffignatus; beſides about an hundred and fifty light-armed Myſians and Cretenſians; here the King halted, the Enemies number being uncertain; Then he ſent out of the Regiment two Companies of Thracians, and two of Macedonians, with two Cohorts of Cretenſians, and as many Thracians. The Skirmiſh (being both ſides were equal, nor any recruits ſent from either ſide) was finiſhed with uncertain Victory; about thirty of Eumenes Souldiers were ſlain, among whom fell Caffignatus Captain of the Gauls; for that time Perſeus retired with his Forces back to Syeurium: The next day about the ſame hour, and to the ſame place, the King advanced his Army, certain Carriages with Water following after; for all the way for a dozen miles was without Water and very duſty, and if they had been forc'd to fight when they were firſt in view, and almoſt choak'd with thirſt, they had encounter'd with great diſadvantage: But ſeeing the Romans ly ſtill, drawing their Centinels within the Curtain, the King alſo returned to his Camp: This they did for ſome days, hoping ſtill the Roman Horſe would charge their Reer in the Retreat; that being once begun, and the Romans inticed far from their Camp, they (who were beſt able in Horſe and light-armed Souldiers) could every where face about.

LVIII. The King perceiving that this deſign did not ſucceed, moved his Camp nearer the Enemy, and fortified it for five miles: Then by break of day in the uſual place he drew up his Battalion of Foot, and led all the light-armed Horſe near the Enemies Camp; the fight of greater duſt and numbers, and nearer than uſually, occaſion'd a great conſternation in the Roman Camp; at firſt the Scout was hardly credited, for during the former dayes the Enemy never appeared before the fourth hour, then 'twas but Sun-riſing; afterwards (by the clamour and running from the Gates, all doubt being removed) there aroſe a mighty tumult; The Tribunes and chief Officers, with the Centurions, ran to the Patrons Tent, the Souldiers every one to his own. Perſeus had marſhall'd his men about five hundred paces from the Rampier; near an Hill, which they call Galleimus. King Corys commanded the left Wing, with all thoſe of his Nation: and the light-armour was placed between the ſeveral ranks of Horſe. In the right Wing were the Macedonian Horſe; among whoſe Troops the Cretans were mixt. This Regiment one Milo a Berean led, but Meno of Antigonis commanded the Horſe, and the chief part of it. The Kings Horſe ſtood next the Wings, and a mixt ſort of people, which were choiſe Auxiliaries of ſeveral Nations. Thoſe that commanded theſe men were Patrocles of Antigonis, and Didas, Prefect of Pæonia. The King was in the middle of them all; about whom ſtood the Agema (as they call it) [i. e. a Battalion of Horſe] and the ſacred Wings of Horſe. Before himſelf he placed the Slingers and Darters; both of which made up the number of four hundred; being commanded by Ion of Theſſalonica, and Timanor of the Dolepian. Thus ſtood the Kings men. The Conſul alſo, having marſhall'd his Foot within the Rampier, ſent out all his Horſe, who were ſet in Array before the Rampier. The right Wing was commanded by C. Licinius Craſſus the Conſuls Brother, with all the Italian Horſe, the light Horſemen being mixt among them: and the left Wing by M. Valerius Lavinius, who likewiſe had the Horſe of the Grecian Allies, and the light armour of the ſame Nation. But Q. Minucius led the main body with the extraordinary choiſe Horſe. Before the Enſigns of theſe there were two hundred Gallick Horſe ranged of Eumenes's Auxiliaries, who were Cyrtians, in number three hundred. There were alſo four hundred Theſſalian Horſe planted at a little diſtance above the left Wing; whilſt King Eumenes and Attalus ſtood with all their Forces behind, between the Reer of the Army and the Rampier.

LIX. The two Armies being ranged much after this manner, and conſiſting of almoſt an equal number of Horſe and light armour, fell to it, the Battle being begun by the Slingers and Darters, who were the ſolorn hope. Firſt of all the Thracians, like ſavage Beaſts, that have been long ſhut up in a Den, ran in, with a mighty ſhout, upon the right Wing conſiſting of the Italian Horſe, to put that Nation, which by their experience in War, as well as their natural diſpoſition, were not to be daunted [if poſſible] into diſorder. The Foot with their Swords ſtruck at the [Enemies] Spears; cutting ſometimes the Horſes Legs, and another while running them into the Bellies. Perſeus charging up upon the main body, made the Grecians give ground at the firſt effort: upon whom ſince the Enemy preſt harder behind, the Theſſalian Horſe, who ſtood at a ſmall diſtance from the left Wing, and was in the place of the reſerves, at firſt, being yet diſengaged, were only Spectators of the fight, though ſoon after, when their party began to decline, they were of greateſt uſe. For giving ground by degrees with their entire ranks, after they join'd Eumenes's Auxiliaries, not only gave their Allies who were diſſipated and fled, a ſafe reception among their Ranks; but alſo, ſeeing the Enemy came not very thick upon them, were ſo bold as to advance forward, and meet many of thoſe that fled. Nor durſt the Kings [i. e. Eumenes's] men, who were now themſelves ſcatter'd here and there by purſuing [the Enemy], join Battle with an orderly body of men that march'd in ſo regular a manner. Now when the King, who had won the day in the Horſe Engagement, if he had pull'd on but a little farther, might have made an end of the War, the Phalanx [a Body of Foot peculiar to the Macedonians] came very opportunely up, as he was encouraging his men, led in all haſt by Hippias and Leonatus, on their own accord (when they heard that the Horſe had fought ſo ſucceſſfully) leſt they ſhould be behind hand in that daring attempt. The King thereupon wavering in his mind between hope and fear of undertaking ſo great an Enterprize, Evander of Creet, whom he had uſed as an inſtrument at Delphi in his deſign upon King Eumenes, when he ſaw that body of Foot, coming under their Enſigns, ran to the King, and carneſtly adviſed him, that he ſhould not be ſo proud of his ſucceſs, as raſhly to venture all upon one unneceſſary hazard. If he lay ſtill that day, content with what he had ſo proſperouſly done, he would either have terms of an honourable Peace, or a great many Allies in the War, if he choſe rather to fight. The Kings mind was moſt inclined to take this adviſe: wherefore, having commended Evander, he order'd the Enſigns to be carry'd back, and the body of Foot to retreat into the Camp, together with the Horſe.

in

There fell that day, on the Roman ſide, two hundred Horſe, and full two thouſand Foot; there being about two hundred Horſe taken. And of the Kings men there were twenty Horſe, and forty Foot ſlain; When the Conquerors return'd into their Camp, they were all of them very jocund, but the unuſual joy of the Thracians was moſt ſignal: for they went back ſinging and carrying the heads of the Enemies upon their Spears points. Among the Romans there was not only a ſadneſs for their defeat, but a fear alſo, leſt the Enemy ſhould immediately ſet upon their Camp. Eumenes therefore perſwaded [the Conſul] to carry his men over the River Peneus; that he might have the River for his ſecurity, till the diſhearten'd Souldiers had rallied up their ſpirits. The Conſul thought it a great crime for him to ſhew any tokens of fear: but yet, being convinced by reaſon, he, in the dead time of the night, put over his Forces, and Encamped upon the farther Bank [of the River.] The King coming forth the next day to provoke the Enemy to an Engagement, when he ſaw that they had pitch'd their Camp in a ſafe place, beyond the River, confeſſed indeed, that he was to blame, he had not follow'd his blow the day before: but ſaid, it was ſomewhat a greater fault in him, that he had lain ſtill all that night. For, though he had not ſtirred any one man beſides, had he but ſent the light armour in upon them, the Forces of the Enemy, who were in ſuch a conſternation, might have been, great part of them, cut off as they paſſ'd over the River. The Romans indeed had now no preſent fear upon them; but though their Camp was ſecure, yet they were particularly concern'd (among other things) for the loſs of their honour. And in Council before the Conſul every one of them laid the blame chiefly upon the Ætolians; [ſaying] that from them aroſe the firſt ground of their flight and fear; they following the apprehenſions of the Ætolians, and the other Greek Nations. For five Ætolian Princes were ſaid to be the firſt, that were ſeen to turn their backs.

The Theſſalians being publickly commended, and their Officers alſo rewarded for their Courage, the ſpoils of the ſlain Enemies were brought to the King: out of which he gave ſome preſents of ſignal Arms, to others Horſes, and to ſome Captives. There were above a thouſand and fifty ſhields; with Coats of Mail and Breſt-Plates more than a thouſand, beſides a greater number of Helmets, Swords and Weapons to throw at a diſtance, of all ſorts. Now though theſe things were in themſelves very great, yet moſt of them were multiplied and augmented by the Kings Speech, which he made publickly before his Army: [which was this.] You ſee already (ſaid he) what is like to be the iſſue of the War; in that you have routed the better part of the Enemy, viz. the Roman Horſe, in which they were uſed to boaſt themſelves invincible. For their Horſemen are the flower of their youth, and the ſeminary of the Senate. Thence the Conſuls take choiſe men into the number of the Senate, and out of them make Generals. But the ſpoils of theſe men we have juſt now divided among you. Nor have you gain'd a leſſer Victory over the Legions of Foot, who, making their eſcape in the night time, fill'd the River like a Company of frighted wretches that are Shipwreck'd, and ſwim here and there in the Sea. But it will be eaſier for us, who follow a conquer'd Army, to get over Peneus, than it was for them, who were in ſuch a fright; and when we are over we will preſently attack their Camp, which we this day ſhould have taken, had they not fled. Or if they'll fight us fairly in the Field, you may expect the ſame event of a Foot Battle, as the Horſe in their Engagement met with. Thereupon not only they who had conquer'd were glad to hear him (having the ſpoils of their ſlain Enemies upon their ſhoulders and before their faces, and receiving encouragement toward a future attempt from what had already fallen out) but the Foot alſo, being inflamed with others glory (eſpecially thoſe who were in the Macedonian Phalanx) wiſh'd, they they also might have an opportunity to serve the King, and gain the like honour from the Enemy. The Assembly being dismiss'd, the next day he went and Encamped at Mopsius; which is a little Hill between Tempe and Larissa.

LXI.

LXII. The Romans stirr'd not from the Bank of Peneus, but only removed their Camp into a more secure place. Thither came Misagenes, a Numidian, with a thousand Horse, and an equal number of Foot, besides twenty two Elephants. At that time as the King sat in Council concerning the grand affair, after his pride, upon the score of his good Fortune, was now abated, some of his Friends were so bold as to advise him, that he would make use of his happy success toward the gaining of conditions for an honourable Peace, rather than being puff'd up with a vain hope, cast himself upon an irrevocable hazard. That he would set bounds to his prosperity, and not give too much credit to the serenity of his present fortune: for that was the part of a prudent man, and one that was deservedly happy. That he would send such men to the Consul, as might renew the League upon the same terms on which his Father Philip had accepted of a Peace when T. Quintius was Conquerer. For the War could not be ended with greater glory, than with such a memorable fight; nor could he have any surer hopes of a perpetual Peace than now, when the Romans were so defeated, and would of consequence, be more easily induced to enter into an Alliance. But if the Romans should even at that time, through their native Stubbornness, refuse what was just; both the Gods and men would be witnesses of Perseus's moderation, and of their obstinate pride. The Kings mind was never much averse to such Counsel, wherefore by the assent of the major part that opinion was approved. Thereupon Embassadors were sent to the Consul, and had their audience in a full Council. In which they desired a Peace, and promised that Perseus should give the Romans as much Tribute, as his Father Philip had promised: as also, that Perseus would remove from those Cities, Territories and places, from whence Philip had removed. This said the Embassadors: who being desired to withdraw, upon the debate in Council, the Roman constancy at last prevailed. For such was the custom in those days, to put on the face of prosperity even in adversity, and to restrain their minds in happy circumstances. Wherefore they thought fit to make this Answer; That they would grant them a Peace, upon condition, that the King would leave the whole matter freely to the Senate, to determine concerning him and all Macedonia, as they pleased. Which when the Embassadors had related to the King, he and those about him, being ignorant of the custom [of those times] looked upon the Roman obstinacy as a miracle: and many of them advised, not to make any farther mention of Peace; for they would in a short time sue for what they now disdain'd. But Perseus feared this very pride, supposing it to proceed from a confidence they had in their own strength; and therefore increasing the sum of money, to see if at least he could purchase peace with gold, he never ceased to tempt the Consuls mind. But seeing that he would not alter any thing of his first resolution, Perseus, despairing of Peace, return'd to Sycurium, from whence he came, with a design again to try the fortune of War.

LXIII. The fame of his Horse Engagement being spread all over Greece, discover'd the peoples inclination. For not only they that were of the Macedonians side, but many also that were highly obliged to the Romans, and some too, that had felt their force and pride, were glad when they heard it; in the same manner, as, in mock Fights, ye commonly use to favour the worse and weaker side. At the same time Lucretius the Prætor had attack'd Haliartus in Beotia with all his force; and though the besieged had no foreign aids, except some young men of Corone (who had come into their Walls in the first Siege) yet they made resistance with their Courage more than their strength. For they not only made frequent sallies out upon the works; but also, when the battering Ram was apply'd to their Walls, forced it down to the ground with a weight of Lead: and, if they that guided the blow by any means avoided them, in the place of that part of their Wall which was demolish'd they presently built a new one, with stones gather'd of the very ruins. But seeing the attack by works was too slow, the Prætor order'd scaling Ladders to be distributed among the several Companies, resolving to beset the Walls quite round: for he thought that his number was sufficient for that purpose, because on that side where the City is encompass'd by a Fenn, it neither was to any purpose, or possible to attack it. He himself therefore, on that side, where two Turrets, and all the Wall between them were thrown down, planted two thousand choice men; to the end, that at the same time, when he endeavour'd to get over the ruins, and the Towns came all flocking together against him, the Walls, being destitute of any body to defend them might be taken in some place or other. The Townsmen were very active to repel his force: for standing in the breach of the Wall, upon dry Faggots of twigs, which they had laid there, with burning Torches in their hands, they often threaten'd to set them on fire, that so, being intercepted from the Enemy by the flames, they might have time to build a new Wall for their defence; but their desire by chance was spoiled. For there poured down on a sudden such an impetuous shower, that it not only hinder'd them from lighting the Wood, but also put it out, when lighted. By which means the Romans gain'd a passage through the divided smoking twigs; and, (seeing all the Townsmen were employ'd in the defence of one place only) took the Walls too with their Ladders in many places at once. In the first tumult upon the taking of the City, the old men and young Boyes, all that came in the way, were kill'd; but the Souldiers fled into into the Castle: though the next day, having no hope left, they surrender'd themselves, and were all sold publickly for Slaves, being about fifteen hundred in number. The Ornaments of the City, as Statues, Paintings, and all other pretious Booty, was carried down to the Ships, and the City razed from the very foundations. From thence he led the Army to Thebes; which being retaken without any opposition, he gave the City to the banish'd party; and those that were of the Roman side: but sold the whole Families of the adverse Faction, who were favourers of the King and Macedonians, for Slaves. Having done these things in Beotia he return'd to his Fleet at Sea.

Whilst these things pass'd in Beotia, Perseus lay Encamped for some dayes at Sycurium. LXIV. Where having heard, that the Romans by stealth reaped and carried away the Corn out of the Country round about them; and that, by cutting off the Ears every one before his Tent, that they might have the Corn the freer and purer to grind, had made great heaps of straw all over the Camp; thought that a good opportunity for him to set fire on them; and therefore, ordering Flambeaus, Torches, and bundles of Hemp dawbed all over with pitch to be made ready, he march'd forth in the night time, that he might surprize them as soon as it was break of day. But all to no purpose, for as soon as the first Guards were disturb'd, they by their tumult and terrour, raised all the the rest; and immediately the Alarm was given, the Souldiers being at the same time set in Battalia within the Bullwark, at the Gates, and intent upon the defence of their Camp. Perseus therefore commanded his Army strait to face about, bidding the Carriages go first, and after them the Foot, whilst he with the Horse staid to bring up the Reer; supposing (what did really happen) that the Enemy would pursue him; to seize upon the Reer behind. There was a short Skirmish between the light-armour chiefly and the light Horsemen, that used to run before the Army: but the Horse and Foot return'd without any trouble into their Camp; and having reaped down all the Corn thereabout, the Romans removed their Camp to the Crannonian Territories, which was a place as yet untouch'd. Where whilst they lay secure, not only by reason of the great distance between them and the Enemy, but because the rode, being without Water, was difficult to pass, between Sycurium and Crannonia, all on a sudden, by break of day, the Kings Horse appearing, with the light armour upon the Hills just above them; caused a great disorder. They came from Sycurium the day before at noon: and had left the Body of Foot, a little before it was light, in the adjacent Plain. They stood for some time upon the Hills, thinking that the Romans might be drawn forth to an Horse Fight: who not stirring, the King sent a Trooper to bid the Foot march back to Sycurium, whither he himself soon after follow'd them. The Roman Horse following them at a small distance, to see if they could have an opportunity at any place to set upon them when they were scatter'd and dispers'd, when they saw them march off in a close body, observing their Ensigns and their Ranks, themselves also return'd into their Camp.

Thereupon the King being offended with the length of the Journey, removed his Camp to Mopsius, and the Romans, having reaped down all the Corn at Crannonia, went over into the Territory of Phalanna. Where, when the King understood by a Fugitive, that the Romans stragled all about the Country, without any guard at all, he went with a thousand Horse, and two thousand Thracians and Cretans, who marching with all the speed they possibly could, surprized the Romans. By which means their Waggon (with the Beasts yoked into them) and those most of them loaded, were taken, to the number of almost a thousand, besides about six hundred men. He committed the care of keeping and bringing the booty into the Camp to three hundred Cretans: whilst he himself, having recalled the Horse from their extravagant slaughter [of the Foe] and the remaining part of the Foot, drew off to the next Guards [of the Romans;] supposing it would be no difficulty to defeat them. L. Pompeius the Tribune military commanded [that Post] who led away the Souldiers, being amazed at the sudden arrival of the Enemy, to an adjacent Hill, with a resolution to defend himself by the secure situation of the place, since he was too weak for them both in number and strength. Where when he put his men into a round figure, that by joining of their shields together they might defend themselves from the stroke of Arrows and Darts; Perseus, having encompassed the Hill with his Souldiers, order'd some of them to attempt the ascent of it on all sides, and to join Battle hand to hand, whilst others threw Weapons at a distance. The Romans were environ'd with doubtful terrour: for they could not fight in close order, for those that endeavour'd to ascend the Hill: besides that, having broken their ranks by the sallies that they made, they lay open to Darts and Arrows. But they were wounded most by the Cestrophendone [i.e. Slings that Slung Darts] which was a new sort of instrument, invented in the time of that War. It had a Dart of two Spans length fix'd to an handle of half a Cubit long, about which there were set three Feathers to poize it, as there are upon Arrows. The middle of the Sling had two Cords of unequal length, so that when the Slinger whirl'd about the Weapon in the larger cavity of the Sling, it flew out like a Bullet. Now seeing that by this and all other sorts of Weapons, part of the Souldiers were wounded, so that they could not now (being tired) well bear their Arms, the King prest them to a Surrender, gave them his word [for their security] and sometimes promised them rewards: though none of their minds for all that were inclined to a surrender, till at last, by meer chance, when they were resolv'd to die, they had some hopes given them. For when some of the Foragers, who fled back into the Camp, had told the Consul, that the guard was beset; he, moved by the danger that so many Citizens were in (for there were nigh eight hundred of them, and all Romans) with the Horse and Light-armour (to which there was an addition made of new Auxiliaries, viz. the Numidian Foot and Horse, besides Elephants) went out of the Camp, and commanded the Tribunes military to follow the Ensigns of the Legions: whilst he himself went before to the Hill, to strengthen the light-arm'd Auxiliaries; and along with the Consul went Eumenes, Attalus and Misagenes, the petit King of the Numidians.

LXVI. When the besieged saw the foremost Ensigns of their party, the Roman spirits were recover'd from their extream despair: and Persens, whose chief design was, to be content with what success he had happen'd to have, and, having taken and kill'd some Foragers, not to lose time in besieging a small Garison; and his next, when he had however made some attempt upon it, since he knew he had not strength enough about him, to march off, whilst he with safety might; not only staid himself (being proud of his success) till the Enemy came, but sent with all speed, to fetch the Phalanx. Which being brought not only too late to do the business, but in an hurry too, were likely to come all in disorder (by reason of their hast) against a regular and prepar'd body of men. But the Consul, who came before, join'd Battle forthwith. In which the Macedonians at first oppos'd him; though in a little while, being no way equal they endeavour'd to march off, having lost three hundred Foot, twenty four of their best Horsemen out of that Wing which they call the Sacred [Wing]; among whom Antimachus also the Captain of that Wing fell: But their flight was full as tumultuous as the Battle it self. The Phalanx being sent for by a timorous Messenger, and led in hast, met first, in narrow passages with the body of Captives, and the Waggon that were laden with Corn: who being slain, there was a great distraction on both sides, since no body staid till the Army was ranged; but the Souldiers threw the Carriages down the Precipice (for otherwise they could not have made way) and the Beasts when they were prick'd or goaded, flounced in the crowd. Nor had they well clear'd themselves from the ill disciplin'd Body of Captives, when they met the Kings Army, and the discouraged Horsemen. Whereupon the very shout of them, who had them turn back again, put them into a consternation much like that which happens in a general ruine; so that if the Enemy had dar'd to follow them any farther into the streights, they might have received a great overthrow. The Consul having drawn his Garison off the Hill, and being content with moderate success, led his Forces back into his Camp. There are, who say, there was a great Battle fought that day, and eight thousand of the Enemy slain (among whom there were Sopater and Antipater, the Kings Generals) and that there were taken alive two thousand eight hundred, with twenty seven military Ensigns. But that it was not a bloodless Victory [to the Romans]; of whom there fell above four thousand three hundred out of the Consuls Army; besides that there were lost five Ensigns out of the left Wing.

LXVII. This day, as it recruited the Romans hearts, so it damp'd Persens: insomuch that having staid but a few dayes at Mopsus (more to bury his dead men than any thing else) and left a good strong Garison at Gonnus, he retreated with his Forces into Macedonia. He left one Timotheus, a Captain of his, with a small party at Phila, having order'd him to tempt the Magnesians and the adjacent Nations. When he came to Pella, having sent his Army away into their Winter-Quarters, he himself went with Cotys to Thessalonica. Where there was news brought, that Atlesbis, petit King of the Thracians, and Corragus, Eumenes's Prefect, had made an incursion into Cotys's Dominions: and had taken that part of the Country, which they call Marene. Wherefore supposing it to be the best way to send Cotys to defend his own Dominions, he presented him with great gifts at his departure: viz. two hundred Talents, and six months pay for his Horsemen, though at first he had resolv'd to give them an years. The Consul when he heard that Persens was gone, removed his Camp to Gonnus, to try, if he could gain the Town: which being situate in the very streights before Tempe, is a secure bar to Macedonia, and an opportune inlet for the Macedonians into Thessaly. Since therefore it was a place impregnable both for its situation, and the guard that was in it, he desisted from his attempt: and turning his course into Perrabia, he took and rised Mallaa upon the first effort; and, having taken Tripolis, with the rest of Perrabia, return'd to Larissa. From thence, having sent Eumenes and Attalus back home, he distributed Misagenes and the Numidians into Winter-Quarters in the adjacent Cities of Thessaly, and divided part of the Army in such a manner through all Thessaly, that they not only had, all of them, convenient Quarters, but were also a guard to the several Cities. He sent Q. Mucius the Lieutenant, with two thousand men to keep Ambracia; and dismiss'd all the Allies of Greece, except the Achaeans. Then going with part of his Army into Achaia Phiotis, he razed Pteleum (whence the Townsmen were all fled) from the very foundations; and took possession of Antron by the voluntary surrender of the Inhabitants. Thence he removed his Army to Larissa; where the City was deserted, and all the people fled into the Castle, which he began to attack. The Macedonians first of all, who were a Garison of the Kings, Kings, were gone out for fear; by whom since the Townsmen saw themselves forsaken, they came immediately and surrender'd themselves. After that, he was at a stand, whether he should first attack Demetrias, or get what he could before that in Boeotia. For the Thebans, who were molested by the Coroneans, desired him to come into Boeotia: so, at their request, because it was a Country more convenient for Winter-Quarters, than Magnesia, he march'd into Boeotia.

DECADE V. BOOK III.

The EPI TOME.

2. Some of the Praetors, for that they had behaved themselves very covetously and cruelly in the management of their Provinces were condemn'd, P. Licinius Crassus, the Pro-Consul, took a great many Cities in Greece, and plunder'd them very cruelly. For which the Captives, who, under him, were sold for Slaves, were afterward restored. There were also many tyrannical actions done by the Captains of the Roman Fleet, against their Allies. 18, &c. The successful actions of King Persens in Thrace: after he had conquer'd the Dardans and Illyricum, the King whereof was named Gentius. The insurrection, that was made in Spain under Olonicus; was appeas'd by his being slain. M. Aemilius Lepidus was chosen President of the Senate by the Censors.

THE same Summer, that the Roman got the Victory by an Horse Engagement in Thessaly, a Lieutenant sent by the Consul into Illyricum, forced two rich Towns by force of Arms to submit; but gave them all their goods, that by their good opinion of his Clemency, he might have drawn in the Inhabitants of Carnus, a strong City. But when he saw he could not either bring them to a surrender, nor take them by a Siege, lest his Souldiers should be tired to no purpose with two attacks together, he rised a City, which he before had left untouch'd. The other Consul, C. Cassius, did nothing memorable in Gaul, which happen'd to be his Province; besides, that he in vain attempted to lead his Legions through Illyricum into Macedonia. For the Senate knew, the Consul was gone that way, from the Aquileian Embassadors; who complaining, That their Colony was new and weak; nor as yet well secured against those hostile Nations of the Istrians and Illyrians, amidst whom they lived; and therefore desiring, that the Senate would take some care to secure that Colony; were ask'd, whether they were willing to have that affair committed to C. Cassius the Consul? To which they answer'd, That Cassius having appointed his Army to meet at Aquileia, was gone through Illyricum into Macedonia. That news at first seem'd incredible; and every one thought that he might have made War upon the Carnians perchance or the Istrians. Whereupon the Aquileians reply'd, That they neither knew, nor durst affirm any thing farther, than that he had given his men thirty dayes Corn, and that there were guides hired and taken away, who knew the roads out of Italy into Macedonia. At which the Senate was very angry, that the Consul should dare to leave his own Province and go into another, leading the Army a new and dangerous way among so many Foreign Nations, whereby he open'd a passage for such a number of people into Italy. So they decreed in a full Assembly, that C. Sulpicius the Praetor should nominate three Embassadors out of the Senate, who should go that day from the City; and, with all the speed they could, should find out the Consul Cassius, wherever he was, and warn him, not to make War with any Nation; before he had orders for it from the Senate. Accordingly these Embassadors went, who were M. Cornelius Cethegus, M. Fulvius, and P. Marcius Rex. Their fear for the Consul and the Army deferr'd their care of fortifying Aquileia at that time.

Then several Embassadors from divers Nations in both the Spains were introduced into the Senate: who complain'd of the avarice and tyranny of the Roman Magistrates, and upon their Knees desired of the Senate, that they would not suffer them to be more barbarously pillaged and tormented, now they were Allies, than when they were Enemies. Now therefore seeing they complain'd of many other indignities, and that it was evident, that money had been taken [from them] L. Canuleius, the Praetor, who was the Governour in Spain, was employ'd; to assign five Delegates of the rank of Senators, for every single person, from whom the Spaniards demand'd any money, and to give them leave to chose, whom they pleas'd, for their Advocates, so the Embassadors being called into the House, the order of Senate was read to them, and they were bid to name their Advocates. Upon which they named four, viz. M. Porcius Cato, P. Cornelius Scipio, Son of Cneius, L. Aemilius Paulus, Son of Lucius, and C. Sulpicius Gallus. First then the Delegates began with M. Titinius, who had been Praetor in the hither Spain, when A. Manlius and M. Junius were Consuls: who, having been twice put off to a farther hearing, was at last acquitted. Then there arose a dissention between the Lieutenants of two Provinces: the people of the hither Spain having taken M. Cato and Scipio for their Advocates, and those of the farther L. Paulus and Sulpicius Gallus. By the hither people there was conven'd before the Delegates, P. Furius Philus, and by the farther M. Matienus: the former of whom had been Prætor three years before, when Sp. Postumius and Q. Mucius were Consuls, and the latter two years before, when L. Postumius and M. Popilius were Consuls. They were both accused of horrid crimes, but their Tryal was deferred till a longer day; whereon when they should have come to plead a fresh, they were excused upon the score of their voluntary banishing of themselves: for Furius went to Præneste, and Matienus to Tibur. There was a report, That they were forbid, by the Advocates, to accuse any noble or potent man: and Canuleius the Prætor encreased that suspicion, in that, omitting that affair, he began to make a Levy. Whereupon he went of a sudden into his Province, lest any more men should be brought into trouble by the Spaniards. Thus having buried all past things in silence, the Senate consulted the safety of the Spaniards for the future, who prevailed so far as to procure an Order, That the Roman Magistrates should not have the rating of their Corn; nor force the Spaniards to sell the twentieth part of it at what price they pleased; and that no Officers should be placed in their Towns to raise money [against their wills.]

III. There came also another Embassy from a new sort of people out of Spain: who saying, that they were born of Roman Souldiers, and Spanish Women (with whom the Romans were not allow'd to marry) to the number of above four thousand, desired, that they might have a Town allotted them, wherein to live. Whereupon the Senate decreed; That they should tell their names to L. Canuleius: and that those of them, whom he had made free, should be carried to Carteia, near the Ocean. And likewise, that all those of Carteia who had a mind to stay there, should be lookt upon as part of that Colony, and have Land assign'd them: that having been a Latin Colony, called by the name of the Libertines [Colony.] At the same time came out of Africa, Gulussa, Son to Massinissa, as Embassadors from his Father, together with the Carthaginians. Gulussa was first introduced into the Senate, and there declared, what his Father had sent to the Macedonian War; besides which he promised, that, if they would command any thing else from him, he would do it for the sake of the Roman people: but advised the Senate, to take care of the Carthaginians fraud. For they were about to set forth a great Fleet, in shew, for the Romans, and against the Macedonians: but when it was ready and fit for service, it would be in their power to make whom they pleased their Friend or Enemy.

IV. When they came into the Camp, they caused such a consternation, by shewing the heads, that, if the Army had been presently brought thither, the Camp might have been taken. Then also was there a great flight; and there were some, who thought it fit, that Embassadors should be sent with a Petition to desire Peace: and many Cities, when they heard that news, came and made their surrender. Who clearing themselves, and laying the fault upon the madness of two men, who freely offer'd themselves to punishment, though the Prætor had pardon'd them: he went immediately to the other Cities, and, seeing all of them obey'd his commands, march'd with his Army quietly through the Country, which was now appeas'd, though just before it had been all enflamed with a mighty tumult. This mildness of the Prætor, whereby he had subdu'd so Warlike a Nation without any bloodshed, was so much the more grateful to the people and the Senate, by how much the Consul Licinius and the Prætor Lucretius had carry'd on the War in Greece with greater Cruelty and Avarice. For the Tribunes of the people continually inveigh'd against Lucretius, when he was absent, in their publick Assemblies; though he were said (by way of excuse) to be absent about the business of the Common-wealth. But at that time, what was done even in the Neighbourhood, was so little inquired into, that he was then at his Country House at Antium, and bringing the Water (with the money that the spoils of the War were sold for) thither, out of the River of Loracina: He is said to have bargain'd for the doing of that work at the rate of a hundred and thirty thousand pounds of brass: besides which he likewise adorn'd the Temple of Asculapius with several paintings [purchased] out of the booty. The Abderite Embassadors turn'd the Envy and Infamy off from Lucretius upon his Successor Hortensius, weeping before the Senate-House, and complaining, that their Town was taken and rifled by Hortensius. That the reason, why their City was so sack'd, was, because, when he required of them a hundred thousand Deniers, and fifty thousand Bushels of Wheat, they desired time, to send Embassadors concerning that affair, both to the Consul Hortilius, and to Rome. That they were scarce yet come to the Consul before they heard, that the Town was taken, the Nobility and Gentry in it boheaded with an Axe, and the rest sold for Slaves. This seemed to the Senate a great indignity; and therefore they decreed the same thing concerning the Abderites, as they had done concerning the Coroneans the year before: commanding Q. Menius the Prætor, to declare it publicly before the people. There were also two Embassadors (C. Sempronius Blasus, and Sext. Julius Cesar) sent to restore the Abderites their liberty: being also charg'd to tell the Consul Hortilius, and Hortensius the Prætor, that the Senate

Senate thought, the War made against the Abderites, was unjust, and were of opinion, that all those, who were in slavery should be inquir'd after, and restored to their liberty.

V. At the same time there were complaints brought to the Senate against C. Cassius (who the year before had been Consul, but was then a Tribune military with A. Hostilius in Macedonia; and Embassadors came from a King of the Gauls, called Cincibilis. His Brother made a Speech in the Senate, wherein he complain'd, that C. Cassius had pillaged the Countries belonging to the Alpine people, their Allies: and had taken many thousand of the Inhabitants thence into slavery. About that time came the Embassadors of the Cirrnians, Istrians and Japides: [Complaining] that C. Cassius was the first that ever required of them to find guides, to shew him the way, when he led his Army into Macedonia: that he went quietly from them, as though it had been to wage another War; but came back, when he was half way, and in an hostile manner over-ran their Country: that he committed all kind of rapine in every place, and burnt their Towns; nor did they know to that day, for what reason the Consul lookt upon them as Enemies. To which several Nations (and to the petit King of the Gauls too) the Senate made Answer; that they neither knew that he would do those things, which they complain'd of, nor, if they were done, did they approve of them. But it was unjust to condemn a consular person, before he had said what he could for himself and in his absence; especially since he was absent upon the publick account. When C. Cassius return'd out of Macedonia, then, if they would accuse him face to face, when they heard the case, the Senate would endeavour to see satisfaction made. Nor did they think fit only to give this Answer to those Nations, but to send Embassadors also; two to the petit King beyond the Alps, and three about to those several States, to let them see, what the Senates intentions were. They likewise voted, that there should be Presents sent to the Embassadors of two thousand pounds of brass: but to the two Brothers, the petit Kings, these things in particular; viz. two Chains made of five pounds of gold, and five silver Vessels of twenty pounds, with two Horses, that had all their trappings on, Grooms to look after them, Horse Arms, and Souldiers Cloaks: besides Garments for their retinue, both Freeman and Slaves. Those things were sent them, and this granted them, upon their request, viz. that they might buy ten Horses, and carry them out of Italy. The Embassadors sent with the Gauls beyond the Alps were C. Lolius and M. Aemilius Lepidus; but to the other Nations, C. Scinius, P. Cornelius Blasio, and T. Memmius.

VI. About that time there met at Rome Embassadors from many Cities of Greece and Asia together. Of which the Athenians being first introduced, said; They had sent P. Licinius the Consul, and C. Lucretius the Prætor all the Shipping and Souldiers, that they had, though they had not made use of them. That they required of their City a hundred thousand Bushels of Corn; which (though their soil were barren, insomuch that they were fain to feed their Country People with Foreign Corn, yet) that they might not be behind hand in their duty, they had provided: being ready still to do what was imposed upon them. The Milesians, who said they had as yet done nothing at all, promised, that they would be ready to obey what ever the Senate should please to command them in order to the War. The Alabandians put them in mind, that they built the Temple of the City of Rome, and set forth anniversary Games in honour of that Godde's: as also, that they had brought a golden Crown of fifty pounds which they laid up in the Capitol, as an offering to the thrice good and great Jupiter: and would deliver three hundred Horsemen's Shields to any one that they should order. Wherefore they desired, that they might leave their present in the Capitol, and sacrifice. This the Lampsacenes also, who brought a golden Crown of eighty pound, desired; saying, That they deserted Perseus, when the Roman Army was come into Macedonia, though they had been under the command of Perseus, as before of Philip. For which, and that they had obey'd the Roman Generals in all things whatsoever, they only begg'd, that they might be received into an Alliance with the Romans, and, if a Peace were concluded with Perseus, excepted, for fear of coming again under that Kings lash. The other Embassadors received a kind Answer: but Q. Menius the Prætor was order'd to admit the Lampsacenes into the number of Allies. They had each of them presents made to them of two thousand pound of brass a man; the Alabandians being bid to carry their Shields back to the Consul A. Hostilius in Macedonia. The Embassadors of the Carthaginians also came at the same time out of Africa, and told the Senate, that they had ten hundred thousand Bushels of Wheat, and five hundred of Barley, ready at the Sea-side, to carry, whither the Senate pleased. That they knew that present and service of theirs was less than either the Roman People deserv'd, or they could wish it were: but that they had several other times, when both Nations were in prosperity, done the part of grateful and faithful Allies. The Embassadors of Massinissa too promised the same quantity of Wheat, with twelve hundred Horses, twelve Elephants, and said, that whatever else the Senate should think fit to command, he would perform as willingly, as that which he himself of his own accord had promised. The Senate gave both the Carthaginians and the King thanks; desiring them, that they would carry, what they promised to the Consul Hortilius in Macedonia. The Embassadors had each of them two thousand pounds of brass sent them.

VII. Then the Cretan Embassadors put them in mind that they had sent into Macedonia all the Archers which they had been by P. Licinius the Consul commanded to raise; but since, when they were ask'd, they could not deny, but that a greater number of their Archers fought under under Perseus then under the Romans, Answer was made to them; if the Cretans truly, and in good earnest, design'd to prefer the Friendship of the Roman People before that of King Perseus, the Roman Senate also would give them such an answer as they would to trusty Allies. But that in the mean time, they should tell their Principals, that the Senate thought fit, the Cretans should endeavour as soon as possible to recal home those Souldiers, that they had among the Forces of King Perseus. The Cretans being dismissed with this Answer, the Chalcidenses were called; whose Embassy at the very entrance of it (for that Miltion, the chief of them, being lame, was brought in a Litter) seemed at first sight a business of extream necessity: in which a person so infirm as he, either thought he ought not to excuse himself upon the score of his weakness, or if he had, would not have been admitted to make that Plea. He therefore having told them before, that he had nothing left alive, besides his tongue, to deplore the calamities of their Country, recounted first the kindnesses done by his City, not only of old, but also in the time of the War against Perseus, to the Roman Officers and their Armies: and next, what C. Lucretius principally (the Roman Prætor) had formerly done with so much pride and avarice against his Country-men; and then what L. Hortensius was at that very time a doing. How they thought it their duty to endure all things, even worse things than what they already suffer'd, rather than yield to Perseus. As for Lucretius and Hortensius; they knew, it had been safer for them to have shut their Gates, than received them into their City. That those who had kept them out, namely Emaxia, Amphipolis, Maronea, and Oenus, were safe; but that, with them, their Temples were robbed of all their Ornaments, and plunder'd by sacrilegious hands: and that C. Lucretius had carried them away to Antium. That their Freemen were forced into slavery; and that the estates of the Allies of the Roman People were not only before, but even at that time also daily ravaged. For by the Example of C. Lucretius, Hortensius too kept his Seamen both Winter and Summer in Houses, and that their Houses were fill'd with Tarpaulins, who convers'd with them, their Wives and Children, though they cared not either what they said or did.

VIII. Thereupon the Senate thought good to send for Lucretius, to argue the matter and clear himself face to face. But when he came he heard much more, than was said against him in his absence: and there came more grievous and powerful accusers, viz. two Tribunes of the People, M. Juvencius Thalna, and Cn. Aufidius. They inveigh'd against him not only in the Senate, but bringing him into the publick Assembly of the people also, they laid many shameful crimes to his charge, and appointed him a day [for his Tryal.] Then Q. Menius the Prætor, by the Senates order, gave the Chalcidenses this Answer; That as to what they said, they had deseru'd of the Roman People, both before, and in that present War, the Senate knew they spoke truth, and it was, as it ought to be, very grateful to them. But as to what they complain'd, that C. Lucretius had done, and L. Hortensius (both Roman Prætors) was then a doing, every body would believe, they never did any of those things by the consent or order of the Senate; who knows, that the Roman People made War against Perseus, and before against Philip, his Father for the liberty of all Greece, and not that they should suffer those kind of indignities from Magistrates that were their Allies, and Friends. That they would give them a Letter to the Prætor L. Hortensius, [showing] that what the Chalcidenses complain'd of did not please the Senate. That if any Freemen were made slaves of, that he would take care as soon as possible to find them out, and restore them to their liberty; and that they thought fit, that no Seaman, except the Masters [of Ships] should be admitted into private Lodgings. These things were written to Hortensius by order of Senate. There were Presents made to the Embassadors of two thousand pounds of Brads and Chariots publickly hired for Miltion, to carry him conveniently to Brundisium. C. Lucretius, when the day appointed came, was accused before the people by the Tribunes, and had a mulct set upon him of a million of brads: and when the Assembly was called, all the twenty five Tribes unanimously condemn'd him.

IX. In Liguria that year there was no memorable action done: for neither did the Enemy stir, nor did the Consul lead his Legions into their Country; but, having sufficiently secur'd himself of Peace for that year, within sixty days from his coming into his Province, dismiss'd the Souldiers of two Roman Legions: and having put the Latin Army betimes into their Winter Quarters at Pisa and Luna, he himself, with the Horse, went to several Towns in the Province of Gaul. There was no War any where else but in Macedonia: though they suspected Gentius also, King of the Illyrians. Wherefore the Senate thought fit to send eight Ships from Brundisium to C. Furius the Lieutenant at Issa, who with a guard of two Iffian Ships was Governour of the Island. There were two thousand Souldiers put on board those Ships, which Q. Menius the Prætor rais'd by order of Senate, in that part of Italy, which is opposite to Illyricum. The Consul Hostilius also sent Ap. Claudius into Illyricum with four thousand Foot, to defend those that border'd upon Illyricum. Who not content with those Forces that he had brought along with him, by mustering up all the Auxiliaries he could get of the Allies, armed full eight thousand of several sorts: and when he had march'd through all that Country safe down at Lychnidum in the Dassaretium Dominions.

X. Not far from thence was the Town of Uscana, for the most part within the Confines of Perseus; which had in it ten thousand Inhabitants, and a small Guard (to secure it) of Cretans. From that Town came there secret Messengers to Claudius [to inform him.] That if

if he would advance with his Army somewhat nearer, there would be those ready that would betray the City. And, that it was worth his while: for he might load not only himself and his Friends, but all his Souldiers to with the spoil. This hope being added to his desire so blinded his mind, that he neither kept ever an one of those that came, nor desired Hostages, as a pledge for the performance of that piece of treachery; nor sent to see, how things stood, nor took so much as their honour for it: but only going from Lychnidum upon a set day he pitch'd his Camp twelve thousand paces from the City whither he was bound. From thence again he removed at the fourth watch, having left about a thousand to guard the Camp. They march'd very disorderly, in a mighty long body, and came in small Companies (as being scatter'd from each other through their mistakes of the way in the night time) to the City. Their negligence too increas'd when they saw no body in Arms on the Walls. But when they came within Darts cast, the Enemy sallied forth at two Gates together; and upon the shout of them that sallied forth, there was a mighty noise arose from the Walls of howling Women, with the ringing of brads Vessels on all sides; whilst the rude rabble, with the Slaves mix'd among them, set up a different tone. This so various a terrour, that presented it self on all hands made the Romans unable to endure the first storm of their eruption. By which means there were more of them kill'd running away, than fighting: for there were scarce two thousand men that escaped with the Lieutenant himself into the Camp. The farther it was into the Camp, so much more time had the Enemy to follow the tired men. Appius staid not at all in the Camp, that he might muster up his men who were scatter'd in the flight (which would have saved those that straggled about the Country) but immediately led the remaining part of his Army back to Lychnidum.

These and other stories of unfortunate actions in Macedonia, were related by Sex. Diginius, a Tribune military, who came to sacrifice at Rome. Upon which account the Senate fearing, lest they should fall into any greater disgrace, sent M. Fulvius Flaccus, and M. Caninius Rebilus Embassadors into Macedonia, to bring them word, upon their own knowledge, how matters really stood there: and to tell A. Hostilius, the Consul, that he should so appoint the Assembly for chusing of new Consuls, that it might be held in the month of January, and that he should come back into the City as soon as possibly he could. In the mean time they gave order to M. Recius the Prætor, to recall all the Senators out of all Italy (except those who were absent upon publick business) by his Edit to Rome: and command'd, that none of those that were at Rome should go above a mile out of Town: All which was done as the Senate would have it. The Consular Assembly was held upon the 27th of August: at which there were created for Consuls, Q. Marcus Philippus (a second time) and Cn. Servilius Capius. Three dayes after the Prætors were made, viz. C. Decimius, M. Claudius Marcellus, C. Sulpicius Galbus, C. Marcus Figulus, Ser. Cornelius Lentulus, and P. Fonteius Capito. To the Elected Prætors, besides the two City Provinces, there were assign'd four more; Spain, Sardinia, Sicily and the Fleet: The Embassadors return'd out of Macedonia when the month of February was almost out; who brought word, what good success King Perseus had met with that Summer; and what a fright had seiz'd the Allies of the Roman People, seeing so many Cities were reduced into subjection to the King. That the Consuls Army was very thin, because they had Furlows commonly given them out of ambition [in the Officers:] the blame whereof the Consul laid upon the Tribunes military, and they again upon the Consuls. The Senate heard, that they made light of the dishonour received by the temerity of Claudius, who brought word that there were but a very few Italians, and those too, great part of them, rais'd on a sudden, lost in that action. The Consuls being Elected, when they were just enter'd upon their Office, they were order'd to make a report to the Senate concerning Macedonia; and the Provinces allotted them were Italy and Macedonia. This was leap Year, in which the odd day happen'd to be the third after the Feast called Terminalia [in honour of the God Terminus.] The Priests that died that year were L. Flaminius, the Augur, with two other Pontifices [or Priests] called L. Furius Philus, and C. Livius Salinator. Into the place of Furius the Priests chose T. Manlius Torquatus, and into the place of Livius, M. Servilius.

In the beginning of the ensuing year, when the new Consuls, Q. Marcus and Cn. Servilius had made report concerning the Provinces, the Senate gave order, that, as soon as might be, they should either agree between themselves, or cast Lots for Italy and Macedonia. But before Fortune had determin'd that, and whilst it was yet uncertain, left favour should be of any moment in the case, they thought fit, that what supplies were wanting should be allotted for both the Provinces. For Macedonia six thousand Roman Foot, of the Latin Allies six thousand, with two hundred and fifty Roman Horse, and three hundred of the Allies. That the old Souldiers should be dismiss'd; so that, in every Roman Legion, there should not be above six thousand Foot, and three hundred Horse. To the other Consul there was not allow'd any certain and definite number of Roman Citizens, for him to take, by way of supplement: only he was bound to raise two Legions, which should consist of twelve hundred Foot, and three hundred Horse: but he had a greater number of Latin Foot allow'd him, than his Colleague had, viz. ten thousand Foot, and six hundred Horse. There were also four Legions more to be rais'd, that might be sent any whither, where there was occasion: over whom the Consuls were not permitted to make Tribunes, but the people chose chose them. From the Latine Allies were required sixteen thousand Foot, and a thousand Horse. This Army they order'd to be only in a readiness, to go forth, if their affairs at any time required it. Macedonia gave them the greatest trouble. For the Navy they order'd, that a thousand Seamen, who were Citizens of Rome, of the Libertine rank, should be rais'd in Italy; and as many in Sicily: besides that, it was injoin'd him who happen'd to have that Province, that he should take care to transport them into Macedonia, wherever the Navy then were. For Spain there were allotted, as a supply, three thousand Roman Foot, and three hundred Horse: and the number of the Legions there too was determin'd, to be five thousand Foot, and three hundred and thirty Horse: besides whom the Prætor who happen'd to have that Province, was to demand four thousand Foot, and three hundred Horse of the Allies.

XIII. I am not ignorant, that through the same negligence, that makes men now a-days commonly believe, that the gods portend to us nothing at all, there were but few prodigies at this time related, or put into the Annals. Yet not only I, who write Antiquities, have (I cannot tell by what means) a mind addicted to old things, but a kind of religious regard also upon me, that makes me esteem those things, which those so very prudent persons thought fit publicly to take care of, worth the putting into my Annals. From Anagnina there were two Prodigies that year related; viz. That an extraordinary light, like a Torch, was seen in the Sky, and that an Heifer, that spoke, was kept at the publick charge. At Minturnæ also about the same time, the Sky lookt as if it had been all of a flame. At Reate it rained stones. At Cuma, in the Castle, Apollo cry'd three dayes and three nights. In the City of Rome two Sextons brought word; the one, that in the Temple of Fortune there was a Snake seen with a Crest, by many people; and the other; that, in the Temple of Fortuna Primigenia, which stands upon an Hill, there were two several Prodigies seen; viz. that a Palm-Tree sprung up in the Court Yard, and that it rained blood in the day time. But there were two Prodigies not at all regarded, the one, for that it happen'd in a private place; as when T. Marcii Figulus brought word, that a Palm-Tree sprung up in his Yard: and the other, because it was in a Foreign place: when it was reported, that at Fregellæ, in the House of one L. Atreus, a Spear, which he had bought for his Son, who was a Souldier, was on a flame in the day time for two hours together, and yet the fire never burnt it. Upon the score of these publick Prodigies the Decemviri consulted their Books, and declar'd that the Consuls must offer forty of the bigger sort of Victims, and to what Gods: adding, that there should be a supplication made, and that all the Magistrates should Sacrifice with the bigger sort of Victims in every Temple, and the people be Crowned: So all things were done according to the Decemviri's directions.

XIV. Then the Assembly was appointed for chusing of Censors. The chief men of the City stood for the Censorship; namely, C. Valerius Lavinius, L. Postumius Albinus, P. Mucius Scævola, M. Junius Brutus, C. Claudius Pulcher, and Tib. Sempronius Gracchus: which two last the Roman People chose for Censors. Now, seeing they were at this time more concern'd than at another, for making their Levies, upon the score of the Macedonian War, the Consuls accused the Commons before the Senate, for that even the younger men did not answer [to their names.] Against whom C. Sulpicius, and M. Claudius, Tribunes of the people, maintain'd the cause; and said, The levy was hard, not for Consuls, but for such ambitious Consuls: for they (forsooth) would make no man a Souldier against his will. And that the Senate might know, it was so; the Prætors, who had less power and authority, if the Senate pleas'd, would perfect the Levy. Accordingly that affair was committed to the Prætors by universal consent of the House, not without some lashes at the Consuls: and the Censors to help forward the business, made this publick Declaration. That they would make a Law concerning the surveying and poling of the people, that besides the common Oath of all Cities, they should take this also: Thou art under forty six years of age, and therefore according to the Edict of C. Claudius and Tib. Sempronius the Censors, do thou come forth at the Levy, and as often as there shall be a Levy made, who ever are Censors, if thou art not already a Souldier, thou shalt appear at the Levy. So also, because there was a report, that many, in the Macedonian Legions, were absent from the Army, by reason that they had uncertain Furlows given them through the ambition of their Commanders; they made an Edict concerning the Souldiers that were rais'd, when P. Ælius, and C. Popilius were Consuls, or since their time, for Macedonia; that all of them, who were in Italy, should return (having been first poled in their own Towns) within thirty dayes into that Province. That those who were under the Tutelage of their Fathers or Grandfathers, should give in their names to them. That they would also inquire into the reasons, why such and such men had been discharg'd from serving in the Wars; and order all those, that they thought had been, through favour, discharg'd before their time, to become Souldiers again. This Edict, together with a Letter from the Censors, having been sent through all the Corporations and Burroughs, there flock'd such a multitude of young people to Rome, that the City was burden'd with the unusual throng of them.

XV. Besides the Levy of those that they were to send for a Supplement, there were four Legions rais'd by C. Sulpicius the Prætor, and within eleven dayes the Levy was made an end of. After that, the Consuls chose their Provinces: for the Prætors, by reason of their jurisdiction tion [i. e. their necessity to hear causes] had chosen sooner. Among whom there fell to C. Sulpicius the City, and to C. Decimius the Foreign Jurisdiction; Spain to M. Claudius Marcellus, Sicily to Ser. Cornelius Lentulus, Sardinia to P. Fonteius Capito, and the Fleet to C. Marcus Tigulus. Of the Consuls, Cn. Servilius had Italy, and Q. Marcus Macedonia: whither, after the Latine Holy Dayes were over, he immediately went. Then, Capito making a reference to the Senate, which two of the new Legions he should carry with him into Gaul? the Senate decreed, that C. Sulpicius, and M. Claudius the Prætors should give the Consul what number they thought good, out of the Legions, which they had rais'd. Whereupon he, taking it very ill, that a Consul should be made subject to the pleasure of Prætors, when the Senate was dismiss'd, he stood before the Tribunal of the Prætors, and required, that, according to the order of Senate, they would assign him two Legions: and the Prætors gave the Consul his own choice. After that the Censors review'd the Senate: whereof M. Æmilius Lepidus was now chosen President, as he had been by two pair of Censors before. They turn'd seven out of the Senate. In taking the pole of the people, they commanded the Souldiers belonging to the Macedonian Army (of whom, how many were absent from their Colours the pole made known) to go into that Province; inquir'd into the reasons, why several people were discharg'd from serving in the Wars; and to every man, who they thought was not duly discharg'd, they gave this Oath: Thou shalt well and truly swear, without any mental reservation, to return into the Province of Macedonia, as far as it lies in thy power.

In the survey of the Knights their Censorship was very severe and rough: for from many they took their Horses; in which when they had offended the order of Knights, they added thereunto the flame of Envy by Edict which they put forth; that none of those who, when Q. Fulvius, and A. Postumius were Censors, had farm'd the publick Revenues, or voluntary loans, should come to their publick sale, or be any ways concern'd in that farm. The old Publicans [Farmers of publick Revenues] seeing they could not get the Senate, to set any bounds to the Censors power; at last, engaged P. Rutilius, Tribune of the People, who was angry with the Censors upon a private account to be the Patron [or Advocate] of their cause. They had a Client [of Rutilius's] who was a Libertine [Son of one that had been a Slave] to pull down a certain Wall that stood in the Via sacra [a street so called] over against the publick Buildings, for that it was built upon the publick [ground.] The private person [to whom it belong'd] appealed to the Tribunes, of whom, seeing no one interpos'd, besides Rutilius, the Censors sent certain persons to take pledges, and in the publick Assembly set a fine upon the private person. Hereupon a quarrel arose, and, the Publicans having made their application to the Tribune, there was a Bill immediately promulg'd in the name of one Tribune only; That as to all publick Revenues, and Loans, which C. Claudius, and Tib. Sempronius had farm'd out, their contract should be void; that they should be farm'd anew, and that all people might have the liberty to purchase, or farm them promiscuously, one as well as another. Then the Tribunes appointed a day for the passing of that Bill in Council; which when it came, as soon as the Censors slept forth to dissuade [the confirming of it] Gracchus spoke, and there was silence; but Claudius interrupting him, he had the Cryer make an O yes. Which being done, the Tribune complain'd, that the Assembly was called away from him, and he himself rebuk'd, out of the Capitol where the Council was. The next day they caus'd mighty tumults. He first consecrated Tib. Gracchus's goods, because, by not submitting to his intercession, in the case of the fine and pledges of him who had appealed to the Tribune, he had affronted him: appointed C. Claudius a day for trial; for calling the Assembly away from him: and declared, that he judg'd both the Censors to be common Enemies; desiring C. Sulpicius the City Prætor to appoint a day for the Assembly. The Censors being willing, that the people should sit in judgment upon them as soon as possible; the dayes appointed for the Tryal of the Censors upon the Indictment of Treason, were the 22th and 23th of September. The Censors presently went up into the Court before the Temple of Liberty, and there sealing up the publick Books, locking up the Office Door, and sending away the publick Servants, they said, They would not do any publick business before the people had pass'd judgment upon them. Claudius first made his defence: and when of the eighteen Centuries of Knights, eight had condemn'd the Censor, besides many others of the first Ward; immediately the heads of the City, in the sight of the people, having laid aside their gold Rings, changed their habit, that they might appear and sollicite the common people the more like suppliants. But Tib. Gracchus is said most to have changed their minds, who, when the people on every side, cry'd out, That Gracchus was in no danger, swore in plain terms; that if his Colleague were condemn'd, and they would not stay to judge him too, he would accompany him in his banishment; and yet he was in great danger of being condemn'd, there being eight Centuries against him. When Claudius was acquitted, the Tribune of the people said, he had nothing to say to Gracchus.

That year the Aquileian Embassadors desiring the Senate, that they would augment the number of their inhabitants, there were fifteen hundred Families, by order of Senate rais'd, and the three who were sent, to carry them thither, were T. Annius Luscius, P. Decius Subulo, and M. Cornelius Cethegus. The same year C. Popilius and Cn. Octavius, the Embassadors, who were sent into Greece, having read the order of Senate, first, at Thebes, carry'd it about to all the Cities of Peloponnesus; That no person whatsoever should give the Roman Magistrates any thing toward the War, but what the Senate first thought fit. This gave them a confidence for the future also, that they should be eased of the burdens and expences, whereby (several Magistrates commanding several things one after the other) they were exhausted and drain'd. The Achaean Council being held at Argos, they spoke, and were heard very kindly; and then, having left that most trusty Nation under great hopes of their future state, went over into Aetolia. Where though there was not any insurrection as yet made, all places were full of suspicion and accusations among themselves. For which reason, having demanded Hostages, but put no end to the business, the Embassadors went thence into Acarnania: where the Acarnanians gave them Audience at Thyrium. In that Country too there was a difference between two opposite Factions; some of the chief men desiring, that there might be guards brought into their Cities, in opposition to the madness of those men, who endeavour'd to make the Nation side with the Macedonians: which others refused; lest they who were peaceable and allied Cities should receive that disgrace which usually befalls those, that are taken in War, and common Enemies. This seem'd to be a just disswave: and so the Embassadors return'd to the Pro Consul Hostilius (for from him they were sent) at Larissa. He kept Octavius with him, but sent Popilius with about a thousand men into Winter-Quarters at Ambracia.

V V V V V

to

XVIII. Perseus not daring to go out of the Confines of Macedonia in the beginning of Winter, lest the Romans should break in any way upon his Kingdom when it was empty, a little before the hard weather, when the depth of the Snow makes the Mountains from Thessaly unpassable, thinking he had a good opportunity of breaking and damping all the hopes and courage of the Neighbour Nations, that there might be no danger, whilst he himself was employ'd in the Roman War (now that Cotys from Thrace, and Cephalus out of Epirus (by his sudden defection from the Romans) offer'd him Peace, and he had subdu'd the Dardani) because he saw that that side of Macedonia only, which lay toward Illyricum, was molested; (nor were the Illyrians themselves quiet, but, besides that, gave the Romans leave to come into their Country) and, if he once had tamed the Nations next to Illyricum, that King Gentius, who had been a long time wavering in his mind, might be drawn into an Alliance, march'd out with ten thousand Foot, whereof part were Phalangites [a particular sort of Foot-Souldiers in Macedonia] and two thousand light arm'd men, together with five hundred Horse, and came to Stubera. Where having taken up Corn for a good many dayes, and order'd the preparations for attacking of Towns to follow after, he Encamped the third day at Uscana, which is the biggest City in all the Peneftian Territories: having sent (before he offer'd any violence to them) certain persons to try which way the Garison and the Townsmen were inclined. (Now there were in that City a Roman Garison, and the Illyrian Youth.) But having answer brought him, that there was no hopes of Peace, he began to attack them, and attempted to take the City by besieging it quite round. Yet notwithstanding, that they, one after another, both day and night, without intermission, some of them rear'd Ladders against the Walls, and others threw fire against the Gates, the besieged made a good defence against that storm: because they well hoped, that the Macedonians could neither any longer endure the sharpness of the Winter in the open air; nor that the King would have so much respite from the Roman War, as to be able to stay. But when they saw the Galleries come near and Towers set up, their resolution was defeated. For besides that they were not equal in point of strength, there was not a sufficient quantity of Corn, or any other Provisions within, they having been surpriz'd by that Siege. Wherefore when there was no hope of making resistance, C. Carvilius Spoletinus, and C. Afranius were sent from the Roman Garison, to demand of Perseus, first, that he would let the Souldiers depart with Bag and Baggage: and secondly (if they could not obtain that) that they would accept of a solemn promise of life only, and their liberty. This was more freely promised by Perseus, than 'twas perform'd. For when he had order'd them to depart with Bag and Baggage, he first took from them their Arms. But when these men were departed the City, the Regiment of Illyrians (in number five hundred) and the Uscanians surrender'd themselves and the City.

XIX. Perseus having put a Garison into Uscana, led the whole Body of those that were surrender'd (which was almost, in number, equal to his Army) to Stubera: where, after the Romans (who were in all four thousand men, besides the chief Officers) were distributed to secure the several Cities; having sold the Uscanians and Illyrians, he led his Army back to reduce the Town of Oeneum, which, as it is otherwise commodiously situated, is also an Avenue into the Labeatian Dominions, whereof Gentius was then King. But as he pass'd by a Castle, called Daudracum, certain persons that well knew that part of the Country, told him, that he need not to take Oeneum, unless he made Daudracum also his own: for that was seated more advantageously for all purposes. Whereupon when he approached with his Army to that place, they all immediately surrender'd themselves. By which surrender (that was made much sooner, than he could hope for) he was so animated, that when he observ'd how great the terror of his Army was, he reduced eleven other Castles by help of the same consternation. For the taking of some (very few) he was constrain'd to use force, force, but the rest were voluntarily surrender'd: and in them were retaken fifteen hundred Roman Souldiers, who were distributed through the several Garisons. Carvilius Spoletinus was of great use in his Parleys with them, by saying, that there was no severity used against them. After this, he came to Oeneum, which could not be taken without a formal Siege: that being a Town not only guarded by a somewhat greater number of younger men than the rest, but also well-fortified with Walls; besides that on one hand the River Artatus, and on the other an exceeding high, inaccessible Mountain compass'd it round. These things gave the Townsmen courage to make resistance. Perseus therefore, when he made a Line quite round the Town, began to make a Work or Mound on the upper side, by the height whereof he might get over the Walls. Which whilst it was a making, great numbers of the Townsmen, in the mean time, were taken off by several accidents in frequent Skirmishes, in which they, falling out, strove to defend their own Walls, and hinder the progress of the Enemies Works; and even those that remained were render'd useless through their continual toil both day and night, together with their loss of blood. As soon as the Mound was made up close to the Wall, the Kings Regiment, whom they call Nicatores [i. e. Conquerours] got upon it, and with Ladders made a forceable entry into the City in many places at once: killing all that were at mans estate, and committing the Women and Children to Custody, but the rest of the booty fell to the Souldiers shares. From thence returning Conquerour to Stubera, he sent Pleuratus an Illyrian who was in banishment under his protection, and Aputeus a Macedonian from Berea, Embassadors to Gentius: charging them; to declare what he had done that Summer and Winter against the Romans, and the Dardani: together with his late Achievements in Illyricum, even in a Winters Expedition: and also to advise Gentius, that he would enter into an Alliance with him and the Macedonians.

When these persons were got over the top of the Mountain Scordus, they came at last with much ado (through the deserts of Illyricum, which by ravaging the Country, the Macedonians had made on purpose, that the Dardani might not have an easy access into Illyricum, or Macedonia) to Scodra. King Gentius was at Lissus; and so the Embassadors being summon'd thither, when they came to tell their message, had a very favourable Audience, but receiv'd an Answer to no effect; viz. That he wanted not an inclination to make War against the Romans; but, to put what he desired in execution, he wanted money, more than any thing else. This Answer they carry'd back to the King at Stubera, whilst he was selling the Illyrian Captives. Thereupon the same Embassadors, together with Glaucias, one of his Lifeguard, were sent back again, without any mention of money, by which alone the poor Barbarian could be induced to join in the War. In the mean time Perseus having pillaged Ancyra, led his Army back again into Penefta; and when he had secur'd the Garison of Uscana, with those about it in all the several Castles which he had taken, and went back into Macedonia.

XXI. L. Calpurnius, a Roman Lieutenant was Governour of Illyricum, who not daring to stir, when the King was in those parts, endeavour'd, after his departure, in Penefta to retake Uscana, but being repuls'd by a Garison of Macedonians, that were in it, after he had received many Wounds, led his Forces back to Lychnidum. From whence, after some few dayes, he sent M. Trebellius of Fregelle with a very considerable body of men into Penefta, to take Hostages of such Cities, as had continu'd in Alliance with, and faithful [to the Romans]. He likewise order'd them to proceed as far as the Parthimians (for they too had agreed to give Hostages) and to make their demands from both Nations without tumult. The Hostages of Penefta were sent to Apollonia, and those of the Parthimi to Dyrrachium, which the Greeks at that time more frequently called Epidamnus. In the mean time Ap. Claudius being desirous to take off the ignominy, which he had contracted in Illyricum, began to attack the Castle of Phomotes in Epirus, against which he brought with him the Athaman and Thesprotian Auxiliaries, besides the Roman Army, to the number of six hundred men: but it was not worth his while; for Clevas, whom Perseus had left there with a strong Garison to defend it. At that time Perseus going into Elimeia, after he had muster'd up an Army about those parts, march'd, by the desire of the Epirotes, to Startus, which was then the strongest City of Aetolia, and is seated above the Ambracian Bay, near the River Achelous. He went thither with ten thousand Foot, and three hundred Horse: of which he took along with him the less number by reason of the streightness and roughness of the wayes. The third day, when he was come to the Mountain Citius, he could scarce get over it for the depth of the Snow, nor hardly find a place to Encamp in. Wherefore departing thence, because he could not stay there rather than because either the way, or the season was tolerable, with great toil (especially to his beasts) the second day, he Encamp'd at the Temple of Jupiter, whom they call Nicens. From thence, after a tedious Journey, he came and was stopp'd at the River Arachthus, by the depth of it. During which stay of his there, having made a Bridge, he led his Forces over it, and, when he had gone forward one dayes Journey, met Archdamus Prince of the Aetolians, who deliver'd Stratus up into his hands.

That day he pitch'd his Camp upon the Confines of Aetolia; and march'd from thence the day after to Stratus: where, having incamped near the River Achelous, when he was in expectation expectation that the Ætolians would come in throngs out at every Gate to put themselves under his protection, he found the Gates all shut, and the very night that he came, the Roman Garison retaken, with C. Popilius the Lieutenant. The Noblemen, who, being compelled thereunto by the authority of Archidamus, (then present) had invited the King thither, going out somewhat slower than Archidamus, to meet him, had given opportunity to the adverse Faction, to send for Popilius with a thousand Foot from Ambracia. Dinarchus also Colonel of the Ætolian Horse, came very seasonably with six hundred Foot, and a hundred Horse. It was well known, that he came to Stratus with a design to serve Perseus; but that afterward (his mind being alter'd with the event) he sided with the Romans, against whom he at first set out. Nor was Popilius more secure, than he ought to be, among such fickle dispositions: wherefore he got the Keyes of the Gates, and the keeping of the Walls immediately into his own hands, removing Dinarchus, the Ætolians and the Stratian Youth into the Castle, under pretence of making them a guard to it. Perseus having attempted to gain several Parleys from the Hills that he above the upper side of the City, when he saw they were obstinate, and endeavour'd with Darts at a distance to beat him off, Encamped five miles from the City beyond the River Petitarus. Where when he had call'd a Council, Archidamus and the Renegadoes of Epirus dissuaded him, and the Macedonian Nobility were of opinion, that he ought not to fight against the unreasonable time of the year, having no Provisions before hand; for that the Besiegers were like to feel the want of every thing, sooner than the Besieged, especially since the Enemies Winter-Quarters were not far from thence, whereby he was so discouraged that he removed his Camp into Aperantia. The Aperantians unanimously received him, for the sake of Archidamus, who was very much beloved, and had great authority in that Nation; and therefore he was made Governour of that people with a guard of eight hundred Souldiers.

XXIII. The King return'd into Macedonia with the same toil both to his Beasts and Men, as he before came thence. But yet he removed Appius from the Siege of Phanotes, by the rumour of his own marching toward Stratus. Cleuas follow'd him with a body of active young men, and at the almost unpassable Feet of the Mountains kill'd a thousand men out of his Army which there were stop'd, besides that he took to the number of two hundred. Appius having got through the Streights, lay Encamped for some few dayes in a Plain called Eleos; whilst, in the mean time, Cleuas, taking along with him Philostratus, Governour of the Epirotes, went over into the Antigonian Territories. There the Macedonians went a plundering; but Philostratus with his Regiment lay perdieu in an obscure place. So when the people of Antigonis came out arm'd against the stragling Ravagers, they pursu'd them as they fled, and forced them headlong into a Valley which was taken up by the Enemy. Where having kill'd a thousand, taken about a hundred, and had good success upon all occasions, they moved their Camp near to the place where Appius lay, lest the Roman Army should do their Allies any injury. Appius having spent his time to no purpose in these parts, sent away the Guards of Chaonia, with all other Epirotes (if any there were) and marching back with the Italian Souldiers into Illyricum, sent them into the allied Cities of the Parthe-nians for Winter-Quarters, whilst he himself return'd to Rome to Sacrifice. King Perseus having recall'd a thousand Foot and two hundred Horse out of the Penestian Territories, sent them to Cassandria to be a guard there. In the mean time the Embassadors return'd from Gentius with the same news. But for all that Perseus did not cease to importune him, by sending several Embassies one after another, when it appear'd what strength he could afford, and yet he could not perswade himself to lay out any money upon a thing of the greatest moment to him to all intents and purposes.

* * * * *

DECADE

DECADE V. BOOK IV.

The EPILOGUE.

1, 2, &c. Quintus Marcius Philip pass'd through pathless woods into Macedonia, and possess'd himself of many Cities. 14. The Rhodians sent Embassadors to Rome, threatening, that they would assist Perseus, unless the Roman People enter'd into a League and Alliance with him: which was very ill taken. 18, &c. When that war was committed to the management of L. Æmilius Paulus, who was a second time Consul for the ensuing year, he in a publick Assembly of the People pray'd, that all the mischief that hung over the Roman People might fall upon his Family: and so going into Macedonia he conquer'd Perseus, and reduced all Macedonia. 37. Before he began the Battle, C. Sulpicius Gallus forewarn'd the Army, that they should not wonder, if the Moon the next night were Eclips'd. 31, 32. Gentius also, King of the Illyrians, having rebell'd, was conquer'd by Anicius the Prætor, and submitted himself, being sent to Rome, with his Wife, Children and Relations. 19. Embassadors came from Alexandria on the behalf of Cleopatra and Ptolemy: Sovereigns of that place, complaining of Antiochus, King of Syria, that he made war against them. 23, &c. Perseus, after he had solicited Eumenes King of Pergamus and Gentius, King of Illyricum, because he did not give them the money, that he had promised, was deserted by them.

I. In the beginning of the Spring, which ensued that Winter, in which these things were transacted, Q. Marcius Philippus, the Consul, setting out from Rome, with five thousand men (which he was to take over along with him, as a Supplement to the Legions) came to Brundisium. M. Popilius a Consular man, and other young men of equal Nobility, who were Tribunes of the Souldiers, follow'd the Consul into the Legions that were in Macedonia. At that time also C. Marcius Figulus the Prætor, who happen'd to have the Navy for his Province, came to Brundisium: and then likewise those that came out of Italy, arriv'd the second day at Coryra, and the third at Ægium, a Port of Acarnania. From thence the Consul, going a shore at Ambracia, went by Land toward Thessaly. The Prætor, having pass'd Leucates [a Promontory] sail'd into the Corinthian Bay, and having left his Ships at Crensa, went himself likewise by Land through the middle of Boeotia, and with great speed, in one day, came to the Navy at Chalcis. At that time A. Hostilius lay Encamp'd near Palepharalus in Thessaly; where as he had done no memorable Warlike exploit, so he reform'd the Souldiers from their exorbitant Libertinism into all kind of military Discipline, taking care of his Allies with all fidelity, and defending them from all manner of injury. When he heard that his Successor was a coming, having diligently view'd the Arms, Men, and Horses, he put his Army in Array, and went forth to meet the Consul on the rode. Their first interview was not only agreeable to their own dignity, and that of the Roman name, but of great advantage also to Philip the Consul in order to the future manage of affairs. For the Pro-Consul, turning to the Army, encourag'd them to behave themselves like men of valour, and then, having deliver'd them up to the Consul, return'd to Rome. Some few dayes after, the Consul made a Speech to the Souldiers; beginning with the Paricide [unnatural murder] which Perseus committed upon his Brother, and intended upon his Father: to which he added, that he gain'd the Kingdom by wicked means, his Poisonings, Murders, how he attempted basely to rob Eumenes, his injuries to the Roman People, his ravaging of their allied Cities against the League: all which how much even the Gods resented, he would find by the event of his affairs. For the Gods favour'd Piety and Justice, by which the Roman People came to such a pitch [of grandeur]. After which he compar'd the strength of the Roman People, who were now Masters of the whole World, with that of Macedonia, and the Armies of the one with those of the other: adding, that the vast Armies of Philip and Antiochus were vanquish'd by no more than such a number of Forces.

The minds of the Souldiers being inflamed by this kind of Discourse, he began to consult concerning the grand affair and manage of the War. C. Marcius the Prætor also, having received the Navy from Chalcis, came thither. Thereupon the Consul thought fit, no longer to spend time by staying in Thessaly, but immediately to Decamp and march on into Macedonia; and that the Prætor should endeavour to come with the Navy at the same time, upon the Enemies Coasts. Having dismiss'd the Prætor, the Consul, giving order, that each Souldier should carry a Months Provisions along with him, began the tenth day after he receiv'd the Army to remove his Camp; and having gone forward one dayes march, he call'd the rode-guides together; whom when he had commanded to declare before the Council, which way each of them would carry the Army, he made them withdraw, and referr'd it to the Council, to advise him, which way he had best to take. Some were for going through Pythium; others through the Cambunian Mountains, the way, that Consul Hostilius had march'd the year before, and others by the Fen of Ascuris. But there was some space of the common way still remaining; and therefore they defer'd the debate of that matter till such time, as they should Encamp near the parting of the several rodes. From thence he march'd into Perræbia, bia, and Encamp'd between Azorus and Doliche, to consult again, which way he had best to take. At the same time Perseus, knowing that the Enemy was nigh at hand, but being ignorant which rode to pitch upon, resolv'd to beset all the passes with guards. With that he sent ten thousand young men in light armour to the top of the Cambunian Mountains (which they call Volufana) under the Command of Asclepiodorus; whilst Hippias was order'd to keep the Avenues near the Castle which stands upon the Fen Ascuris (at a place called Lapathus) with a guard of twelve thousand Macedonians. He himself, with the rest of the Forces, lay Encamp'd, first about Dium; but afterward posting with his nimblest Horse along the shore, one while to Heraclea, and another to Phila, he came back the same way thence to Dium.

II.

III. In the mean while the Consul resolv'd to march through that Lawn, where I told you formerly King Philip's Camp was, near Oëolophus: but thought it necessary to send four thousand Souldiers before, to take possession of advantageous places, under the conduct of M. Claudius, and Q. Marcius the Consul's Son; whom the whole Army presently follow'd. But the way was so steep, rough, and craggy, that the light arm'd Souldiers, who were sent before, having with much ado gone five miles in two dayes, pitch'd their Camp, in a place which they call Turris Enaierus [from the pleasant and transparent Waters thereabout.] From thence next day having gone forward seven Miles, they sat down upon an Hill not far from the Enemies Camp, and sent back a Messenger to the Consul, to tell him, that they were come to the Foe, and had posted themselves in a safe place which was commodious upon all accounts; that he might come up to them as fast as he could. So whilst the Consul was concern'd, not only for the roughness of the rode that he had taken, but likewise for their sakes whom he had sent before in so small a number amidst the Enemies Garisons, the Messenger met him at the Fen Assuris. Thereupon he himself also took Courage, and having joined the Forces together, form'd his Camp upon the side of that Hill which the Romans were possess'd of, as advantageously as the nature of the place would permit him to do. From whence they could see not only the Enemies Camp, (which was but a little more than a mile distant from them) but all the Country to Dium and Phila, together with the Sea-Coast, the prospect from so high an Hill was so vast and wide. This so enflamed the Souldiers minds, when they saw the main stress of the War, all the Kings Forces, and the Enemies Country at so near a view, that they all very earnestly desir'd the Consul, that he would march forthwith to the Enemies Camp. But he gave them one day of rest to relieve themselves from the toil of their Journey, and the third day, leaving part of his Forces to guard the Camp, march'd to the Enemy.

IV. Hippias had been lately sent by the King to defend the pass; who ever since he saw the Roman Camp upon the Hill, having prepared the spirits of his Souldiers for a fight, met the Consul's Army as it was a coming: whilst the Roman light-armour, and the Enemies too, who were the readiest and nimblest sort of Fellows to provoke a Battle, were already gone forth to the fight. They therefore coming up with one another, threw their Darts, receiving and giving many wounds on both sides by their rash onset, besides, that some few on both sides were slain. By this means their spirits being irritated against the next day, they would then have fallen on with greater numbers, and more vehemency, had there been room enough to display and marshal their whole body: but the top of the Mountain going up wedgewise into a narrow ridge, there were scarce space enough for three to stand a breast. Wherefore whilst a few of them fought, the rest stood looking on, especially those in heavy armour: but the light armour ran forward even through the windings of the Hill, and engaged on the sides thereof with the [Enemies] light-armour, making in to the fight through rough or smooth ways, all alike. And after there had been more wounded than kill'd that day, the night put an end to the fight. The third day the Roman General wanted advice; for he could neither stay on the barren Hills top, nor return without dishonour and even danger also. For the Enemy could pursue and press upon him, as he retired from the higher ground, nor had he any other way left, than to correct what he had so resolutely begun with a pertinacious boldness, which sometimes in the end grows prudent. Well, it was come to that pass, that if the Consul had had an Enemy like to the ancient Macedonian Kings, he might have receiv'd a great overthrow; but that the King wander'd up and down with his Horse along the shores at Dium, and only heard the clamour and noise of the fight almost twelve miles off; nor augmented his Forces by putting fresh men in the room of them that were tired; nor was himself (which was a matter of greatest moment) present at the Battle: whilst the Roman General, though above sixty years of Age, and a corpulent Man, performed all the Offices of War with great activity; continu'd bravely to the last to carry on what he had so boldly begun: and leaving Popilius to keep the top of the Hill, went over through pathless places; but sent certain persons before to clear the way, commanding Attalus and Misagenes, each with the Auxiliaries of their own Nation, to be a guard to them that open'd the pass, whilst he himself, having his Horse and Carriages before him, with the Legions, brought up the Reer.

V. 'Twas an unspeakable toil and pains for them to get down, since the Beasts and their loads tumbled down as they went; and yet when they were scarce gone forward four miles, they desired desired nothing more, than to have been able if possible, to return to the place from whence they came. For the Elephants made almost as great a disturbance among them as an Enemy would have done: who when they came to the pathless places, threw off their Riders, and with an horrid noise put the Horses especially into a mighty confusion; till such time, as they consider'd of means to get them through. As they went down the Hill, they fix'd two long and strong pieces of Timber into the ground below, not much more distant from each other than the breadth of the Beast, upon which there were Rasters laid across, thirty Feet long, in form of a Bridge; with Earth thrown over them. And then at a little distance below, there was another Bridge of the like nature; and so a third, with several others in the same order, where the Rocks were craggy and abrupt. Thus the Elephant went firm upon the Bridge; but before he came to the end of it, the Posts were cut down, and the Bridge falling down made him slide down gently to the edge of another Bridge: some of the Elephants standing on their Feet, and others resting on their Buttocks. When the second Plain of the Bridge had received them, they were let down again by the like fall of that Bridge too, till they came into a plain Vale. The Romans march'd not much above seven miles in a day: of which they went the least part of the way on their Feet. For they rouled forward themselves, with their Arms and other things which they had to carry to their great vexation in all respects; insomuch that the very Guide, and he that advis'd them to go that way could not deny, but that the whole Army might have been destroy'd by a very small body of Enemies. By night they came into a little Plain, where they had not room to look about and see whether the place were beset, it being every way enclosed and hedg'd in [with Woods and Rocks.] Now therefore when they at last, with much ado, and beyond all expectation, had gotten firm ground to stand upon, it was necessary for them the day after also, in that hollow Vale, to stay for Popilius and the Forces left with him: to whom likewise, though the Enemy had not at all affrighted them, the roughness of the places [through which they pass'd] gave the same vexation as an Enemy. The third day they join'd their Forces together, and march'd through a Lawn, which the Inhabitants call Callipeuce. But the fourth day again they came to places as pathless as before, but pass'd them with greater ease, and more Courage, by reason that they had been already us'd to the like, no Enemy appeared, and they were near the Sea. So turning down into the Plains they pitch'd the Camp of their Foot (greatest part whereof were on the Hills) between Heraclea and Libethrum: so they lay round the Vale, and part of the Plain, where the Horse were posted.

'Tis said, news came to the King as he was washing himself, That the Enemy was at hand: Upon which he leap'd immediately in great consternation from his Throne, and crying out, That he was conquer'd without fighting, flung away. Nor could he come to any resolution, being so distracted in all his Counsels and Commands, but of two particular Favourites and Friends that he had, call'd back one, which was Asclepiodorus, from his Garisons [upon the Frontiers] to Pella, where all his money lay, and open'd all passages to a War. He himself, having got all the gilded Statues in hast from Dium into the Fleet, lest they should be a prey to the Enemy caus'd them to be carry'd with all speed to Pydna: so that what might have seem'd rashness in the Consul (viz. that he should go so far, as that he could not come back without the Enemies consent) proved no disadvantageous boldness. For the Romans had two passes, whereby to get out of that place; the one through Tempe into Thessaly, and the other into Macedonia by Dium, both of which were secur'd by the Kings Guards. Wherefore if the chief Officer there had been so courageous as to have born the first appearance of that approaching terror for ten days, the Romans could neither have pass'd through Tempe into Thessaly, nor had there been room enough that way to have carried their Baggage. For Tempe is a streight, which though it be not infested by War, is yet very difficult to pass. For besides the narrowness of it for five miles, in which the way is too little for a Beast that's loaded to go along, the Rocks on both sides are so abrupt and craggy, that a man can scarce look down without a kind of swimming and disturbance, both in his Eyes and Mind too. Besides, the noise and the depth of the River Peneus, which runs through the midst of the Vale, is very terrible. Now this place, which in its own nature is so rugged and unpassable, was secur'd in four several places by the Kings Guards. Of whom one Party lay in the very entrance at Gomus; another at Condylus in an impregnable Castle; a third about Lapathus, which they call Charax, and the fourth posted in the very way, in the middle and the narrowest part of the Vale; which even ten Souldiers may easily defend. So then, seeing the way through Tempe was block'd up against their carriages, and their way back too unpassable; they must of necessity make to the Mountains from whence they before came down. But this as they could not compass privately, so neither could they openly, by reason that the Enemy were on the tops of the Hills; besides, that the difficulty which they so lately met with, balk'd all their hopes. Wherefore in such a case as this, where they had put themselves upon so rash an enterprize, there was no other way for them, but to make their way to Dium in Macedonia, through the very midst of their Enemies; which (unless the Gods had infatuated the King) was a matter of very great difficulty. For since the bottom of the Mountain Olympus, leaves little more than the space of a mile between that and the Sea, half of which the wide mouth of the River Baphyrus takes up; whilst either the Temple of Jupiter, or a Town [Heraclea] stands on another part of the Plain, the rest being but very narrow might have been secur'd and block'd up with a small Ditch and a Rampire: besides, that there were so much Stone and Wood nigh at hand, that they might even have built a Wall, and Towers upon it. But the Kings mind being blinded with sudden fear, he consider'd none of these advantages; and therefore having expos'd and laid open all his Garisons to the Enemy, he retired to Pydna.

VI.

space

VII.

The Consul seeing that there was great safety and hopes in the folly and sloth of the Enemy, sent a Messenger back to Sp. Lucretius at Larissa, [to advise him] that he would possess himself of all the Castles that were forsaken by the Enemy about Tempe; having sent Popilius before to view the places about Dium. When he found that all the Coast was every way clear, he arriv'd in two dayes march at Dium; and order'd his Camp to be pitch'd under the very Temple, lest any thing in that sacred place should be violated. Then he himself going into the City (which though it be not large, is curiously adorn'd with public Buildings, and a multitude of Statues, besides, that it is very well fortified) could scarce believe, but that, seeing all those splendid and magnificent Works and Ornaments were left without any reason, there must be some design at the bottom of it. Wherefore he staid one day to search all places round about it, and then decamp'd: and being confident that there would be Corn enough ready for him, he march'd forward that day to a River called Mrys. The next day he went on, and took the City of Agassia by voluntary surrender. Whereupon, that he might engage the affections of the other Macedonians unto him, he was content with Hostages only, and promised them to leave their City without any guard in it, and that they should live freely under their own Laws. From thence he march'd a dayes Journey, and Encamp'd by the River Ascordus: but seeing, that the farther he went from Thessaly, the greater scarcity there was of all sorts of Provisions, he went back to Dium; by which means every body came to understand, what inconveniences he must have undergone by being foreclosed from Thessaly, who could not with any safety move any considerable distance from that Country. In the mean time Perseus, having muster'd all his Forces and Officers before him in one Body, began to blame the Governours of Garisons, but especially Asclepiodotus and Hippias, saying, that by them the inlets or barriers of Macedonia were betray'd to the Romans: though no body had been more justly guilty of that fault than he himself. When the Consul saw a Navy out at Sea, and from thence conceiv'd some hopes, that the Roman Ships were coming with Provisions (for there was great scarcity of all necessaries, and almost extream want) he was told by some that came into the Port, that the Ships of burden were left at Magnesia. Whereupon he being uncertain what he had best to do (for he had now work enough, to grapple with the difficulty of his present circumstances, without the help of an Enemy to aggravate his ill fortune) there was a Letter very opportunely brought from Sp. Lucretius, That he was master of all the Castles that were upon Tempe, and about Phila, and that he had found in them great plenty of Corn and other things, fit for present use.

VIII.

The Consul was very glad of this news, and thereupon march'd from Dium to Phila, not only to strengthen that Garison, but likewise to distribute Corn, which was too long a coming by Sea, among his Souldiers. But that Journey of his had no good report: for some said, he retreated for fear, because if he, the General, had staid, he must of necessity have engaged in a Battle: others, that he knew not the daily vicissitudes of War; since when a fair opportunity was offer'd to him, he omitted that which he could not easily retrieve. For as soon as he quitted the possession of Dium, he excited the Enemy; so that he [Perseus] then grew sensible that those things might be recover'd, which he had by his own remissions, or cowardise formerly lost. For when he heard that the Consul was gone, returning to Dium, he repaired all such things as the Romans had either demolish'd or defaced; setting up the Battlements of the Walls, that were knock'd down, and making them tight again on every side: and when he had so done he Encamp'd on this side the River Enipeus five miles from the City, that he might have the very River, which was very difficult to pass, for his security. This River runs out of the Vale under the Mountain Olympus, being but small in Summer time, though in the Winter when 'tis raised by the rains, it not only runs over the Cliffs a great depth, but likewise by carrying the Earth along with it into the Sea makes very deep gulphs, and by hollowing the main Channel, turns the Banks on each side into Precipices. Perseus supposing that by this River the passage of his Enemy might be obstructed, design'd there to spend the remaining part of that Summer. But at this juncture the Consul sent Popilius from Phila with two thousand arm'd men to Heraclea; which is distant from Phila about five miles, in the midway between Dium and Tempe, and situate upon a Rock that hangs over a River.

IX.

Popilius, before he drew his men up to the Walls, sent certain persons to perswade the Magistrates and Nobility, that they would rather try the honour and clemency of the Romans, than the force of their Arms. But that advice did no good, because there appeared Fires near Enipeus, out of the Kings Camp. With that Popilius began to attack them both by Land and Sea (for the Navy being arriv'd lay ready near the shore) with Arms, Works, and Engines

Engines all at once. There were also certain young men of Rome, who converting the Games of the Circus to a Warlike use, took the lowest part of the Wall. For the custom was in those days, before this excess was introduced, to fill the Circus with Beasts out of all Nations, and to contrive several sorts of shews, nor did they make above one match of Chariot-driving, and another of Vaulting from one Horse to another, both which took not up above one hours time. Among other things, there were about sixty young men, and sometimes more, brought in arm'd, by the Marshals of the Games. The bringing in of these persons was partly an imitation of an Army exercising, and partly of a more gentle exercise than that of Souldiers, somewhat nearer to the Gladiators or Fencers use of Arms. And when they had made other motions in point of exercise; they put themselves into a square Body, with their shields close over their Heads, the first standing, the other bending somewhat lower, the third lower than they, the fourth lower than the third, and the last kneeling, till they made a Teltudo [a covering for their heads and bodies like a Tortoise-shell] sloping up, like the roof of an House. Then at the distance of about fifty Feet, two of them ran forth arm'd, and daring one the other, when they had got up from the bottom to the top of the Tortoise, over the closed Shields, they one while skipt about the exterior part of it, as though they had been to make a defence, and anon engaged each other in the midst of it, as though they had been on firm ground. Now they having made a Tortoise, or Target Fence very like to this [used in the Games of the Circus] and apply'd it to such a part of the Wall, when the Souldiers that were upon it came near, they were as high as those that defended the Town: and having beaten them off the Walls, the Souldiers belonging to two Ensigns got over into the City. In this one thing only they differ'd, that in the Front and Flanks they held not their Shields above their Heads (lest they might expose their Bodies) but before them, as men do when they fight. By which means the Darts slung from the Wall did not hurt them, whilst they made their approach, but being thrown upon their united Shields, slid down to the bottom as rain does off the side of an House. The Consul, when Heraclea was now taken, removed his Camp so much forward, as though he intended to go to Dium, and, when he had routed the King from thence, into Pieria also. But being now preparing for his Winter-Quarters, he order'd rodes to be made, for carrying of Corn out of Thessaly; convenient places to be chosen for Bains, and Houses to be built, where they that brought the provisions might lodge or Inn [by the way.]

Perseus at last having recover'd himself from that fright wherewith he had been stunned, would rather his commands had not been obey'd, when in a consternation he order'd his treasure at Pella to be thrown into the Sea, and the Ships at Thessalonica to be burnt. [Correspondent to which desire of his] Andronicus, who was sent to Thessalonica, had delay'd the time, and, as it happen'd, left him room for repentance: but Nicias being more unwary at Pella threw all the money away that he could get; but his error was capable of being corrected, in that it was almost all retrieved by men that dived to fetch it out again. Now the King was so much affraid of that fright, that he order'd the Divers to be privately murder'd: and after them, Andronicus and Nicias; that there might be no body remaining that should be privy to so mad a command. At this juncture C. Marcus, going with the Fleet from Heraclea to Thessalonica, not only ravaged the Country in many places very much, by landing his men upon that Coast, but likewise, when they sallied forth from the City, forc'd them back, upon some prosperous Skirmishes, that he had with them, with consternation into their very Walls. And now he was terrible to the very City, till the Inhabitants, having planted Engines of all sorts, smote not only those that straggled, in their rash approaches, about the Walls, but those also that were in the Ships, with stones slung from the Town. Wherefore recalling the Souldiers into the Ships, and omitting the Siege of Thessalonica, they went from thence to Enia: which is a City fifteen miles from that place, opposite to Pydna, in a fertile soil. And when they wasted the Confines thereof they came coasting all along to Antigonea. Where, after they were landed, they first wasted the Country all thereabout, and brought some booty to the Ships; and then the Macedonians (Horse and Foot mixt together) pursuing them as they fled in all haste to the Sea, kill'd near five hundred of them, and took as many. Nor did any thing but extream necessity, seeing they were hinder'd from returning safely to their Ships, provoke the minds of the Romans, not only with despair of any other way to save themselves, but indignation too. Whereupon the fight was renew'd upon the shore, and they also assist'd who were in the Ships. By which means there were near two hundred Macedonians slain, and a like number taken. When the Fleet went from Antigonea they landed near Pallene to plunder the Country. That part of the Country belong'd to the Cassandrian Confines, being far the most fertile of all the Coast which they had sail'd by. There King Eumenes with twenty men of War, coming from Elea, met them, and there were five men of War besides sent from King Prusias.

By this accession of fresh strength the Prætor was encouraged to attack Cassandrea; which was built by King Cassander in the very Streights, that join the Pallenean Territories to the rest of Macedonia, being enclosed on the one side with the Toronaick, and on the other

X x x x x

XI.

with

with the Macedonian Sea. For the Land on which it stands runs into the Sea like a Tongue; nor runs it out any less in length than the Mountain Athos in height, being opposite to the Region of Magnesia, with its two unequal Promontories; the bigger of which is called Pofideum, and the lesser Canastrum. They began to attack in several parts, and in several parties. The Roman at a place called Clyre, drew a Line of Fortification (with Pallisadoes also before it to hinder the Enemies approach) from the Torona to the Macedonian Sea. On the other side there is the Euripus; and there Eumenes made his attack. The Roman had a great deal of trouble to fill the Ditch that Perseus had lately made. Concerning which, when the Prætor ask'd (because the heaps did not appear) where the Earth was thrown that came out of that Ditch, they shew'd him the Arches of the Wall which were not made of the same thickness with the old Wall, but built with one single row of Bricks. He therefore advis'd with his Officers how to break through the Wall, and force his way into the City: and consider'd that by this means he might deceive them, viz. if he pretended to scale the Walls at another place, and thereby, putting them into a tumult, should bring all the besieged to the defence of that place. There were in the Garison of Cassandrea, besides a considerable Company of young men of the Town, eight hundred Agrians, and two thousand Illyrians from Peneſte, sent thither by Pluratus, being both of them a Warlike sort of people. These men being upon the defensive part, whilst the Romans strove with all their might to get upon the Walls, in a moment of time the Arches being broken through, laid the City wide open. Now had they who broke through the Wall been arm'd, they might immediately have taken the Town. When the Souldiers heard that this work was finish'd, they presently set up a joyful shout, resolving to get into the City some at one place, and some at another.

XII. The Enemy at first stood in admiration, what the meaning should be of that sudden shout. But when the Governours of the Garison, Pytho and Philip, heard that the City was laid open, they, being of opinion, that that would turn to their advantage, that made the first attack upon their Enemies, fall'd out with a stout body of Agrians and Illyrians; and put the Romans to flight, who ran together from several parts (being call'd to advance their Ensigns into the City) all discompos'd and out of order: and push'd them to the Trench, into which they forced them to tumble in heaps one over another. There were nigh six hundred at that time slain, and almost all, that were taken between the Wall and the Trench, wounded. Thus the Prætor himself, being extremely dilheartned, even by his own attempt, became more slack in other new designs; nor had even Eumenes, who attackt the Enemy at once by Sea and Land too, any very good success. Wherefore they both thought fit, after they had secur'd their Watches, so that no relief might be let into the Town out of Macedonia (since open force had not prevailed) to attempt the Walls with Works. Which whilst they were about to prepare, ten of the Kings Barks were sent from Thessalonica with choice Auxiliaries, that were Gauls; who, seeing the Enemies Ships standing off in the Sea, themselves in the night, when 'twas very dark, failed one by one, as near the shore as they could, and enter'd the City. The report of this new relief forced the Romans and the King too [Eumenes] to quit the Siege; and so they, doubling the Cape, arriv'd with the Fleet at Torone. But as soon as they began to attack that place also, finding that it was defended by a strong body of men, they thought 'twas in vain to make any farther attempt, and went to Demetrias. Where when upon their approach, they saw the Walls all cover'd over with Souldiers, they failed by with their Fleet to Iolcus; resolving, when they had wasted the Country thereabout, to return and besiege Demetrias.

XIII. At this time too the Consul, lest he should be guilty of sitting down idle in an Enemies Country, sent M. Popilius with five thousand men to attack the City of Melibœa, which is situate at the foot of the Mountain Ossa, on that side, which lies toward Thessaly, and stands very opportunely above Demetrias. The first arrival of the Enemy put the Inhabitants of the place into some consternation: but when they had recover'd themselves from the fright, they ran several wayes to the Gates and the Walls, where they suspected the Foe would make their approaches: whereby they presently cut off all the Enemies hopes, that they might be taken upon the first effort. Thereupon preparation was made for a Siege, and all works in order to it taken in hand. When Perseus heard, that not only Melibœa was attempted by the Consuls Army, but that the Navy also stood at Iolcus, with design from thence to attack Demetrias, he sent Euphranor, one of his Captains with two thousand choice men to Melibœa; commanding him, that if he rais'd the Siege of the Romans from before Melibœa, he should get privately into Demetrias, before they decamp'd from Iolcus to that City. When those that besieged Melibœa saw him on a sudden upon the Hills, they left their works in great confusion, but first set them on fire; and so they retreated from Melibœa. Euphranor, having rais'd the Siege from before one City, march'd straight to Demetrias. Nor did the Inhabitants of that place then believe, that they could defend their Walls only, but their Country also from devallation; for they made sallies out upon the stragling Pillagers, and wounded many of the Enemies. Notwithstanding the Prætor and the King rode about the Walls, to view the situation of the City, and see if they might attempt tempt it either by works or force on any side. There was a report, that conditions of Peace were treated of between Eumenes and Perseus, by Cydus, a Cretan, and Antimachus, who at that time was Governour of Demetrias: but this is unquestionable, that they retreated from Demetrias. Eumenes failed to the Consul; and having congratulated his prosperous entrance into Macedonia, went away to Pergamus in his own Kingdom. Marcus Figulus the Prætor, having sent part of the Fleet to Winter at Sciathus, went with the rest of the Ships to Oreum in Eubœa; supposing that City to be the most commodious for sending of Provisions to the Armies, that were in Macedonia and Thessaly. There are very different accounts concerning King Eumenes. If you believe Valerius Antias, he says, that he neither assist'd the Prætor, though he often sent for him by Letters; nor went with the Consuls good liking into Asia: but took it ill, that he had not the liberty to lodge in the same Camp; and that he could not be induced to leave behind him even those Gallick Troops, which he had brought thither with him. That his Brother Attalus not only staid with the Consul, but also, that he was very faithful to him all along, and did mighty service in the War.

XIV. Whilst the War continu'd in Macedonia, there came Embassadors from a petit King of the Gauls beyond the Alpes (his name, 'tis said, was Balanos, but of what Nation he was is not mention'd) to Rome; who promised aid toward the carrying on of the Macedonian War. For which the Senate return'd [him] their thanks, and sent him several Presents: viz. a gold Chain of two pound weight, and several golden Goblets of four pound weight, with a trapped Horse and Arms for an Horseman. After the Gauls, the Pamphylian Embassadors brought into the Senate House a golden Crown made out of twenty thousand Philippeans [pieces of Gold, like Jacobus's]; and desiring, that they might have leave to lay that Present up in the Temple of Jupiter Optimus Maximus, and likewise to sacrifice in the Capitol, they were permitted; besides that they received a very kind Answer to their Petition for renewing the Alliance [between them and Rome], and had each of them a Present sent them of two thousand pounds of brass. Then the Embassadors from King Prusias, and, soon after from the Romans, who discourse very differently concerning the same thing, had their Audience: both of which Embassies treated about concluding of a Peace with King Perseus. Prusias came with a Petition, rather than a demand, professing, that he had to that day been for the Romans, and, as long as the War continu'd, would be. But since Embassadors came from Perseus to him about making an end of the War with the Romans, and that he had promised them, to intercede with the Senate on their behalf, he begg'd of them, that if they could be perswaded to lay aside their animosity, they would let him have the honour of being thought a Peace-maker. Thus said the Kings Embassadors. The Rhodians, having proudly reckon'd up what kindnesses they had done the Roman People, and arrogated the greater share of the Victory over King Antiochus to themselves, added; That when there was Peace between the Macedonians and the Romans, their Alliance began with King Perseus; but that they broke off with him against their wills, and for no other reason that he gave them, but only because the Romans would needs have them bear a part with them in the War. Of which War they had now felt the many inconveniences for three years together; for the Sea being so block'd up with Ships, that all commerce was obstructed, their Island was reduced to extrem want, and they had lost not only their customs but their trading too. Wherefore, since they could no longer endure it, they had sent other Embassadors into Macedonia to Perseus, to declare unto him, that the Rhodians thought fit, he should conclude a Peace with the Romans, and that they were sent to Rome with the same message. That the Rhodians would consider what to do against those, who should be the cause, why the War was not made an end of. I am sure that these words cannot even at this day be read or heard without indignation; and thence we may imagine how much those Senators were concern'd, that were by when they were spoken.

XV. Claudius says, They received no answer: but that there was only an act of Senate read over, whereby the Roman People ordain'd, that the Carians and Lycians should be free States; and that there were Letters dispatch'd to both those Nations, to let them know what the Senate had declared. That when he heard this, the principal Embassador, whose swelling Speech the Senate House just before could hardly contain, fell down in a swoon. Others say their Answer was, That the Roman People were well assured from good authority, that the Rhodians held private correspondence with King Perseus against their Commonwealth, not only in the beginning of this War; but, if it had been a doubt before, the words of their Embassadors just then had made it evident: and that for the most part fraud, though at first it be somewhat more cautious, detects it self. That the Rhodians by their Messengers, which they send all over the World, would make themselves Arbitrators of War and Peace. That the Romans would take up and lay down their Arms according to the will and pleasure of the Gods. But now they were not like to have the Gods, but the Rhodians for witnesses of their Leagues. Must they, forsooth, be so far obey'd, and the Roman Armies drawn out of Macedonia? That they would see what was best for them to do; and that they knew, what the Rhodians were like to see. For no doubt but the Roman People, when they had conquer'd Perseus, which they hoped would be in a very short time, would see, that every City should be rewarded according to their several deserts in the War. But yet there was a present of two thousand pounds of brass sent to each Embassador, which they did not receive.

XVI. Then the Letter from Q. Marcus the Consul was read, shewing, How he had pass'd the Straights into Macedonia: as also, how that there as well as from other places the Prætor had made provision provision for the Winter; and likewise that he had received from the Epirotes twenty thousand Bushels of Wheat, and ten of Barley: to the end that, for that Corn their Embassadors might have the value in money at Rome. That the Soldiers ought to have Cloths sent them from Rome: that they had need of almost two hundred Horses, especially Numidians, and that they had no plenty of any thing in those parts. Upon which there was an Order of Senate made that all those things should be done according as the Consuls Letter had directed. C. Sulpicius the Prætor bargain'd for the making of six thousand Gowns, and thirty thousand Tunicks, with Horses, to be carry'd into Macedonia, and distributed according to the Consuls pleasure, and paid the Epirotes their money for the Corn. He also introduced Onesimus, Son of Pytho, a noble Macedonian into the Senate. He had always advised the King to Peace, and admonish'd him, that, as his Father Philip had always used, to the last day of his life, to read over the League which he had made with the Romans twice every day, he would take the same course, and do so, if not every day, at least very often. But seeing he could not deter him from War, he began first of all to withdraw himself for several reasons; that he might not have any hand in those things, which he did not approve of; till at last, when he saw himself suspected, and sometimes accus'd even of Treason too, he fled away to the Roman Army; in which he was of great use to the Consul. Now when he, being brought into the Senate, had given them an account of these things, the Senate order'd him to be enrolled among their Allies: that he should have a place at publick Shows, and an Entertainment provided for him: two hundred Acres of the Tarentine Lands, which belong'd to the publick, allotted him, and an House bought for him at Tarentum; the care of all which was committed to C. Decimius the Prætor. The Censors survey'd the people upon the Ides of December more severely than before; at which time many Knights had their Horses taken from them: among whom P. Rutilius was one, who when he was Tribune of the People had brought very violent accusations against them: yea he was turn'd out of his Tribe, and utterly disfranchis'd. And whereas by order of Senate the Questors gave them half the Revenues of that year to erect publick works; Tib. Sempronius, out of that money that was allotted to him, bought the House of P. Africanus, behind the old one, near the Statue of [the God] Fortumnus, with the Butchery, and the contiguous Shops, for the publick use, where he caus'd a stately House to be built, which was afterward called Basilica Sempronia, [Sempronius's Palace.]

X x x x 2

XVII.

The year was now going out, and therefore by reason chiefly of their concern for the Macedonian War, people were deliberating, whom they should chose Consuls for that year, at last to put an end to that War. Whereupon there was an Order of Senate made, that Cn. Servilius should come as soon as possibly he could to hold the Assembly. Sulpicius the Prætor sent this Order of Senate to the Consul; from whom he receiv'd a Letter, which after a few dayes he read in the Senate; signifying that he would come before the day appointed. Accordingly the Consul made hast, and the Assembly was holden on the day that was appointed. There were created for Consuls L. Æmilius Paulus (a second time) in the seventeenth year after he had been first Consul, and C. Licinius Crassus. The next day the Prætors were chosen, viz. Cn. Babius Tamphilus, L. Anicius Gallus, Cn. Octavius, P. Fonteius Balbus, M. Æbutius Helva, and C. Papirius Carbo. Now the care they had of the Macedonian War spur'd them on to do all things with the greater expedition. Wherefore when they were chosen they were order'd immediately to cast Lots for their Provinces; that it might be known which Consul should have Macedonia, and which Prætor the Fleet: so that thereby they might be able to consider of, and prepare what was necessary for the War; and likewise to consult the Senate, if any need there were of consultation. That they should celebrate the Latine Holy days as soon as they enter'd into their office, provided that no other religious rites were first to be perform'd: and that the Consul, who was to go into Macedonia, should not be detained. After these Decrees were passed, the Consuls had Italy and Macedonia assign'd to them, and the Prætors (besides the two jurisdictions in the City) the Fleet, Spain, Sicily and Sardinia for their Provinces. Consul Æmilius happen'd to have Macedonia, and Licinius, Italy. Of the Prætors, Cn. Babius had the City, L. Anicius the Foreign jurisdiction (and whether else the Senate should think fit to send him) Cn. Octavius the Fleet, P. Fonteius Spain, M. Æbutius Sicily, and C. Papirius Sardinia.

XVIII.

Now all people presently saw, that L. Æmilius would manage that War slothfully; not only because he was another sort of a man, but also, because his mind was day and night intent upon those things only, that concern'd that War. Now therefore the first thing that he desired of the Senate, was, That they would send Embassadors into Macedonia to view the Armies and the Fleet, and bring certain word back, what was lacking either in the Land, or the Sea Forces. And furthermore, That they should inquire into the Kings Forces as much as they could, as also what part of Macedonia was in our hands, and what part under Perseus. Whether the Romans were incamped within the Streights, or whether they had already pass'd all those narrow places, and were come into the Plains. Who were our faithful Allies; who doubtful or sickle in their Friendship, according to the several turns of Fortune, and who our certain Enemies. What quantity of provisions they had, and whence they were brought by Land, and whence by Shipping. What had been done that Summer both by Sea and Land; for when he was well certified certified of these things, he thought he might take true measures for the time to come. The Senate gave Orders to Cn. Servilius the Consul, that he should send into Macedonia what men L. Æmilius thought fit. The Embassadors went two dayes after, whose names were Cn. Domitius Anobarbus, A. Licinius Nervus, and L. Babius. 'Twas reported, that it rained stones twice at the end of that Year, in the Roman, and, at the same time, in the Veian Territories: for which there was ordained a Sacrifice of nine dayes continuance. Of the Priests there dyed that year P. Quintilius Varus, Mars's Flamen [Chief Priest] and M. Claudius Marcellus, the Decemvir, in whose place they chose Cn. Octavius. And now, when their magnificence increas'd, 'twas observ'd, that, at the Games in the Circus, set forth by P. Cornelius Scipio Nasica, and P. Lentulus the Curule Ædiles, there were sixty three Panthers, with forty Bears and Elephants publicly shewn.

XIX.

L. Æmilius Paulus, and C. Licinius being made Consuls, and entering upon their office on the fifteenth of March, in the beginning of the ensuing year, when the Senate was in expectation, especially what the Consul would report to them concerning Macedonia, which was his Province, Paulus said, He had nothing to make report of, since the Embassadors were not yet return'd. But that the Embassadors were now at Brundisium, and had been twice in their Voyage driven into Dyrrhachium. That when he knew, what was necessary first to be known, he would inform them of it; and that would be within a few dayes. And that nothing might stop his Journey, he (he said) had appointed the Latine Holy Days to be celebrated from the last of March. That when the Sacrifices were rightly perform'd, he and Cn. Octavius would set out, as soon as the Senate thought good. That C. Licinius, his Colleague would take care, in his absence, that if there were any necessity for providing or sending any thing material for the carrying on of that War, it should be provided or sent. That in the mean time the Embassies of Foreign Nations might have their Audience. When the Sacrifice was rightly perform'd, the Alexandrian Embassadors from Ptolemy and Cleopatra were first call'd in; who coming into the Senate-House in fordid Cloths, with their beards and hair very long, and branches of Olive in their hands, fell down upon the ground; and their Speech was more abject and pitiful than their appearance. [For they said,] Antiochus, King of Syria, who had been an Hostage at Rome under a specious pretence of restoring the elder Ptolemy to his Kingdom, waging War with his younger Brother, who at that time was in possession of Alexandria, had not only been victorious in a Sea-fight at Pelusium, but likewise having got over the Nile by help of a Bridge, that he rais'd all on a sudden, with his Army, put Alexandria it self into a consternation by a Siege, nor did he seem to be far from being Master of that most opulent Kingdom. The Embassadors complaining of these things desired the Senate, that they would assist that Kingdom and the Sovereigns of it, who were Friends to the Empire: That such were the deserts of the Roman People from Antiochus, and such their authority with all Kings and Nations, that, if they sent Embassadors, to tell him, the Senate was not well pleased, that he should make War against Princes that were their Allies, he would immediately retreat from the Walls of Alexandria, and carry his Army away into Syria. Which if they deferred to do, that Ptolemy and Cleopatra, being forced out of their Country, would in a short time come to Rome, to the shame of the Roman People, in that they had not at all assisted them in their utmost extremity. The Senate being concern'd at the Petition of the Alexandrians, sent C. Popillius Lenas, C. Decimius, and C. Hostilius, Embassadors, to make an end of the War between the two Kings; and order'd them to go first to Antiochus, and then to Ptolemy, and tell them, that, unless they desisted from making War, whoever was the occasion of its continuance, him they would not look upon as a Friend, nor an Ally.

XX.

These Embassadors went within three dayes along with the Alexandrian Embassadors, and then the Embassadors came who were so much expected out of Macedonia all the last five dayes after the Ides of March [called Quinquatria, which was a Festival to Minerva,] that had it not been late before they came into Town, the Consuls had immediately called a Senate. The next day there was a Senate, and the Embassadors had their Audience: who brought word; that the Army was led into Macedonia through pathless Woods, with greater hazard than advantage. That the King was in possession of Pieria, whither he was gone: that their Camps were so nigh, one to the other, that they were divided by nothing but the River Enipeus which was between them: and that the King neither gave the Romans any opportunity to fight, nor had our men force enough to constrain him. That the rough Winter also interrupted their affairs. That the Soldiers were kept idle, and had not any more Corn than would serve them six dayes. That 'twas reported the Macedonians were thirty thousand strong. That, if Ap. Claudius had a good Army about Lynchidum, he might give the King some diversion by a doubtful War: but that now both Appius and all the Forces he had with him were in extrem danger: unless either a compleat Army were sent thither, or they brought thence. That they went from the Camp to the Fleet; where they heard, that part of their Naval Allies were taken off by Diseases; and part of them (especially those that came from Sicily) gone home; so that the Ships wanted men: and that those, who were still there, had neither receiv'd any pay, nor had any Cloths. That Eumenes and his Fleet, like Ships driven thither by the Wind, both came and went away without any cause: nor did they think that King to be a constant, or a true Friend. But as they spoke all things doubtfully of Eumenes, so they said, that Attalus was extraordinary constant and faithful.

When

XXI. When then the Embassadors had had their Audience, then L. Æmilius said, he would make report concerning the War. And thereupon the Senate decreed, that for the eight Legions the Consuls and the people should create an equal number of Tribunes: but order'd, that no man should be created that year, save those, who had born some honourable office. And then, that, of all the Tribunes, L. Æmilius should chuse whom he pleased, to command the Legions that were to go for Macedonia; and that, when the solemnity of the Latine Holy Dayes was over, L. Æmilius the Consul, and Cn. Octavius, who happen'd to have the Fleet, should go into that Province. There was added to these a third person, which was L. Anicius, the Prætor, whose jurisdiction was among Foreigners. Him they thought fit to succeed Ap. Claudius in the Province of Illyricum, about Lychnidum. The care of the Levy was impos'd upon C. Licinius the Consul: who was order'd to raise seven thousand Roman Citizens, and two hundred Horse; and to draw off from the Latine Allies seven thousand Foot, and four hundred Horse: as also, to send word to Cn. Servilius, who was Governour of the Province of Gaul, that he should raise six hundred Horse. This Army he was commanded to send into Macedonia, to his Collegue, as soon as he could: but that there should not be above two Legions in that Province; which should be fill'd up, so as that there should be six thousand Foot, and three hundred Horse in each of them. That the rest of the Foot and Horse should be dispos'd of into the several Garisons. That such as were not fit for service, should be disbanded. There were likewise ten thousand Foot required of the Allies, and eight hundred Horse; which Forces were also given to Anicius, besides the two Legions, that he was order'd to carry into Macedonia, consisting of five thousand two hundred Foot, and three hundred Horse; and for the Navy there were raised five thousand Seamen. Licinius the Consul being order'd to govern the Province with two Legions, added thereunto of the Allies ten thousand Foot, and six hundred Horse.

XXII. When the acts of Senate were pass'd, the Consul, L. Æmilius, went out of the Senate-House into the Assembly of the people, and made a Speech to this effect: Romans, I observe, that you have done me a greater honour, since Macedonia is fallen to my share, than either when I was saluted Consul, or when I enter'd upon my Office; and that for no other reason, than that you have thought it no degradation to the majesty of the Roman People, that I should put an end to the War in Macedonia, which hath been so long protracted. The Gods too, I hope, have favour'd this design, and will assist me in the management of it. But these things I must partly suppose, and partly hope for: though this I dare boldly affirm, that I will do my utmost endeavour, not to frustrate your hopes concerning me: All necessaries for this War the Senate hath already decreed, and (seeing they are pleas'd, that I should go immediately, who am as willing and ready to obey their commands as they to impose them) my Collegue, C. Licinius, a person of great worth, will as industriously provide them, as though he himself were to manage this War. What I shall write to the Senate or to you, pray believe: and do not, by your credulity, entertain rumours, for which you have no good authority. For even at this time I have observ'd; it hath been a common infirmity among you, especially since the beginning of this War, that no man slight a vulgar report so much as not to be discouraged at it. There are in all Companies, and at all Feasts (forsooth) those, that lead Armies into Macedonia; know, where the Camp should be pitch'd; what places should be made Garisons of; when, and at what pass we ought to enter Macedonia; where our Store-Houses ought to be built; what way, either by Land or Sea, our provisions should be brought; when we ought to engage the Enemy, and when to lie still. Nor do they only tell us, how we may do better than ordinary, but also, whatsoever is done otherwise than they directed, they make as it were an actual accusation against the Consul. Now these things [Romans] are a great obstruction to men that are to manage such great affairs. For all men cannot be of so firm and constant resolution against false rumours, as Fabius was: who chose rather to have his own Conduct disparaged by the false rumours of the people, than to preserve his reputation, and neglect the publick business. I am not one that think Commanders ought not to be admonish'd; yea, I look upon him who does all things upon his own head, to be rather a proud than a wise man. What then remains? Why first of all Commanders ought to be admonish'd by wise men, and more especially, those that have skill and experience in military affairs: and next, by such as are concern'd upon the spot; who see the Enemy, the occasion of action, and that are partakers, as it were, of the danger in the same Ship. Wherefore if there be any man that believes, he can certainly advise me to anything which may conduce to the better management of that War, which I am now to wage; let him not deny his assistance to the Commonwealth, but come along with me into Macedonia, he shall be furnish'd by me with a Ship, Horse, Tent, and provisions too for the Voyage. But if any man be loth so to do, and prefers the ease of a City life before the toils of a Campaign, let him not steer at land. The City it self affords matter enough for Discourse; let him keep his tattle within his teeth; and know, that we'll be content with our Campaign Counsels. From this Assembly, when the Latine Holy-Dayes, that began on the last of March, and the Sacrifices were duly celebrated, the Consul and the Prætor, Cn. Octavius, went forthwith into Macedonia. 'Tis said, that the Consul was attended with a greater retinue than ordinary; and that the people did, almost certainly, forebode, that there would be an end of the Macedonian War, and that the Consuls return would be speedy, crown'd with a signal triumph.

XXIII. Whilst these things were transacted in Italy, Perseus could not perswade himself to go on on with what he had begun, in order to make Gentius, King of the Illyrians, his Friend, because he was to lay out money; but, when he heard that the Romans had enter'd the Streights, and saw that he was expos'd to the last extremity of War, he thought not fit any longer to delay the time, and therefore, having agreed by the mediation of his Embassador Hippius, for three hundred Talents of Silver, so as that Hostages should be given on both sides, he sent Pantauchus, one of his most faithful Friends and Favourites to make an end of that affair. At Medeon in the Labeatian Territories Pantauchus met the King of Illyricum: where he took of him both an Oath and Hostages. There was also an Embassador sent from Gentius, called Olympius, who required an Oath and Hostages from Perseus. With the same person were sent two others, to receive the money, viz. Parmeno and Morcus, who by Pantauchus's perswasions, who were also pitch'd upon, to go Embassadors to Rhodes along with the Macedonians. But they were charged not to go to Rhodes till they had required and taken the Oath, the Hostages, and the money; and then they might. For the Rhodians would surely be incited to War when two Kings apply'd themselves to them at the same time. And on the other hand, such a City as theirs, in which alone was united all the glory of Naval action, would leave the Romans no hopes either by Sea or Land. When the Illyrians were a coming, Perseus march'd out of his Camp, near the River Enipeus, with all his Horse, to meet them at Dium. Where all those things were perform'd that had been agreed upon, in the presence of a Body of Horse that stood all round, and whom the King had a mind to have by at the making of that League of Alliance between him and Gentius; supposing, that would put somewhat more of spirit into them. The Hostages too were given and taken before their Faces; and at the same time, the King, having sent them to Pella, where his treasure lay, that were to receive the money, he order'd those, that were to go to Rhodes with the Illyrian Embassadors, to take Shipping at Thessalonica. There at that time lay Metrodorus, who came very lately from Rhodes; and from the information of Dion and Polyarchus, two Noblemen of that City, affirm'd, that the Rhodians were ready for the War. He therefore was made chief of the Embassy, that was join'd with the Illyrians.

At the the same time there was a common message (such as the state of affairs would then admit of) sent to Eumenes and Antiochus: That a free City and a King were naturally opposite one to the other. That each of them attacked the Roman People, and, which was more unworthy, that Kings [or Sovereign Princes] were by Kings oppos'd. That Attalus was an assistant in the ruine of his Father. That by the help of Eumenes, and, in some measure, of his Father Philip too, Antiochus was oppos'd; and that now both Eumenes and Prusias were armed against him. That if the Kingdom of Macedonia were destroy'd, that of Asia would be the next: (which they, under pretence of setting the Cities at liberty, had now made partly their own) and then Syria. That Prusias was already prefer'd in honour before Eumenes, and that the Victorious Antiochus was already routed out of Egypt, which was like to have been the booty of his War. Which whilst he thought upon, he had him consider and take care, either to force the Romans to conclude a Peace with him, or to look upon, if they persisted in an unjust War, as the common Enemies of all Kings in general. The message to Antiochus was plain and open: but to Eumenes there was an Embassador sent, under pretence of redeeming the Captives; by whom there were certain things more privately transacted, which at the present made Eumenes very hateful, and much suspected by the Romans, who charg'd him with grievous though false crimes. For he was counted a Traytor, and almost an Enemy, whilst the two Kings strove by fraud and avarice to outdo one another. There was one Cydus a Cretan, one of the most intimate Friends, that Eumenes had; who had had a Conference, first at Amphipolis, with one Chimarus, his Country-man, that was a Souldier under Perseus; and next, at Demetrias once, with one Meneceutes; besides a third time, with Antimachus (all three of them were the Kings Officers) under the very Walls of the City. Eropon also, who was then sent, had been concern'd in two Embassies to the same Eumenes before that time. Which Conferences were private and the Embassy dishonourable: but what was transacted, or what the Kings agreed upon, was not known. But thus it was.

Eumenes neither favour'd Perseus's Victory, nor intended to make War against him: not so much, for that their Fathers animosities continu'd between them also, as that they had a grudge against one another themselves. The emulation between those two Kings was not so small, as that Eumenes could endure to see Perseus get so much riches and glory, as, when he had conquer'd the Romans, he was like to obtain. He likewise saw that Perseus, from the very beginning of the War, made all attempts imaginable to gain a Peace, and that the nearer terror approach'd, he was never intent, or solicitous about any thing else. That the Romans too, because the War was protracted beyond their hopes; not only their Officers, but the Senate also were very willing to make an end of so inconvenient and difficult a War. He therefore, having found the inclinations of both parties to be the same, was the more desirous to bestow his labour toward a reconciliation in that affair, which, through the toil of the stronger side, and the fear of the weaker, he believed might be of it self compos'd and made an end of. For one while he indent'd, not to assist the Romans by Sea or Land, and another while, to make a Peace with them; and ask'd a thousand and fifty Talents, not to be concern'd in the War: in both which cases he shew'd, that that he was ready not only to give them his word, but Hostages too for their security. Perseus was very ready to go about that business, as being induced by his fear, and therefore without any delay treated touching the Hostages, agreeing, that when they were received they should be sent to Creet. When they came to mention the money, there he made a stop and said, that among Kings of such renown that was a reward very dishonourable and sordid, not only to the giver, but also, much more, to the receiver. He [if he must needs do so] would rather pay the money, in hopes of a Peace with Rome, than not pay, but then he would produce it when the business was done: and in the mean time lay it up in the Temple at Samothracia. But since that Island was in his Dominions, Eumenes saw no difference between its being there, and at Pella: wherefore he did what he could, to make him pay down some part of it presently. Thus they being caught and choused one by the other, created to themselves nothing but infamy.

XXVI. Nor was this matter only omitted by Perseus through his own avarice, when he might have had his money secur'd, and either a Peace by the mediation of Eumenes, that must have been purchased even with a part of his Kingdom, or, if he had been cheated, might have discover'd his Enemy, whilst he had been loaded with the money, and thereby have made the Romans very justly his Enemies; but the Alliance of King Gentius also, which was then ready for his acceptance, together with a vast body of Gauls, who were scatter'd all over Illyricum, and then offer'd themselves, were upon the same score dismiss'd. There came ten thousand Horse, with an equal number of Foot, and they too as swift as Horses; who when the Horsemen, by turns, dismounted, took their empty Horses, and fought upon them. These men demanded, in hand; an Horseman ten pieces of gold, a Foot Souldier five, and their General a thousand. When these men were a coming, Perseus setting forth out of his Camp near Empius, to meet them with the half of his Forces, began to make Proclamation through all the Villages and Cities, which are nigh the roads, that they should get ready their provisions of Corn, Wine, and Cattle, that he might have a competent supply: whilst he himself took with him for the Nobility Horses with trappings, and Campaign Coats, carrying along with him likewise some small quantity of gold, to divide among them who were but a few; for he supposed the multitude might be allured by hopes. He arrived at the City Almana, and Encamped upon the Bank of the River Axius; when the Army of the Gauls were fate down about Desudaba in Madica, waiting for the money which they had agreed for. Thither therefore he sent Antigonus, one of his great Courtiers, to command the multitude of the Gauls to remove their Camp to Bylazor (which is a place in Paonia) and bid the Nobility come all to him. They were seventy five miles distant from the River Axius, and the Kings Camp. Now when Antigonus had carry'd this Message to them, and had also told them, what a vast plenty of all things the King had taken care to provide upon the rode for the multitude, and with what presents, of Cloths, money, and Horses, the King would meet the Nobility at their coming to him; they made Answer, that, as to those things, they should find what he would do when they came to the King; and ask'd him, concerning what they had agreed to have in hand, whether he had brought with him the gold, that was to be divided among the Foot and Horse. To which seeing there was no answer made, Claudius, their pet King, said, Go then, tell your King, that, till they receive the gold and Hostages, the Gauls will not stir a Foot from this place. Which message being brought to the King, he called a Council, in which, when it was evident, what all that were there would perswade him to; he himself, who was a better Keeper of his money, than his Kingdom, began to discourse about the perfidiousness, and barbarity of the Gauls; That he had found by the destruction of many a man heretofore, how dangerous it was to admit so great a multitude into Macedonia, for fear they should prove more grievous, though Allies than the Romans, who were Enemies. That five thousand Horse was enough; whom as they might use in the War, so also they need not fear upon the score of their number.

XXVII. It was manifest in all things, that he was loth to part with his money to the multitude, and fear'd nothing else: but seeing no body durst perswade him, though he ask'd their opinions about it, he sent Antigonus back, to tell them, that the King should not have occasion for above five thousand of their Horse; and that he slighted the rest of their multitude. Which when the Barbarians heard, the rest indeed murmur'd, being vex'd that they had been brought out of their Country to no purpose; and Clondius ask'd him again, Whether he would pay what he had agreed for, even to those five thousand? To which when he saw Antigonus made but a shuffling kind of Answer, he did the fallacious Messenger indeed no harm (a thing which he himself could hardly hope for) but march'd back to Ister, he and his men; (having pillaged all Thrace, that lay near the rode) which were a body of men, that, had they been brought over the Mountains of Perrabia into Thessaly, whilst the King late quiet by Enipeus, over against the Romans, might have not only spoiled and ravaged all the Country, so as to have robb'd the Romans of all their expectations of provisions from thence, but have sack'd the very Cities too, whilst Perseus had detain'd the Consul at Enipeus, and kept him from assisting his Allies. Yea the Romans themselves must have been concern'd at it upon their own accounts; since they, when they had lost Thessaly, from whence they had all the Forage and Provisions to maintain their Army, could neither have staid there, nor gone forward, because the Macedonian Camp was on the other side of the River. By this means therefore Perseus encouraged the Romans, and dishearten'd the Macedonians, who had long hoped he would at last answer their expectations and desires. By the same avarice he made Gentius also his Enemy. For when he had paid three hundred Talents at Pella to certain persons sent thither from Gentius, and suffer'd them to seal it up, he sent ten Talents of it to Pantauchus, and bid him give that, at present, to the King; commanding his Servants, who carry'd the rest of the money, which was sealed, with the Illyrians Seal, to go but little dayes Journeys; and, when they came to the Confines of Macedonia, to stay there, and expect Messengers from him. Gentius having received but a small part of the money, when Pantauchus was importuning him every day to commit some hostility upon the Romans, he put M. Perperna, and L. Petilius, two Embassadors, that then had happen'd to come to him, into Prison. Which Perseus hearing, thought Gentius had enter'd into an Alliance with the Romans, and therefore sent to recal them, that carry'd the money: as though his whole design had been to make himself as rich a prey as possible (when he should be vanquish'd) to the Romans. Eropon also return'd from Eumenes, but no body knew what was privately transacted between them. They themselves indeed gave out, that they treated about the Captives; of which Eumenes also, to avoid suspicion, sent the Consul word.

staid

Perseus being disappointed in his hopes, after the return of Eropon from Eumenes, sent XXVIII. Antenor and Callippus, the Admirals of his Fleet with forty Barks (to which number he added five longer Gallies) to Tenedus, as a Convoy to the Ships that were scatter'd here and there among the Cyclade Islands [in the Archipelago] and coming with Corn into Macedonia. The Ships put in at Cassandrea, and having first touch'd at the Ports, that lie under the Mountain Athos, sail'd thence with a fair Gale to Tenedus: where though several open-deck'd Gallies of Rhodes rode in that Harbour, with Endamus, their Admiral, they hail'd them very kindly, and let them pass unhurt. After which, when they found that on the other side, there were fifty Merchant-men of their own, shut in by several men of War belonging to Eumenes, and standing in the mouth of the Harbour, they, having with all speed tack'd about, and removed their Ships from the terrour of the Enemy, sent the Merchant-men, under the Convoy of ten Barks, into Macedonia; but with orders, that when they had convey'd them out of all danger, they should return to Tenedus. The ninth day after they return'd to the Fleet, which now lay at Sigeum. From thence they cross'd over to Subota, which is an Island that lies between Elea and Athos. It happen'd, that, the day after the Fleet arrived at Subota, thirty five Ships, which they call Hippagogi [Ships for carrying of Horses] coming from Elea, with Gallick Horsemen and Horses, made toward the Cape of Phana in Chios, from thence to go over into Macedonia: being sent to Attalus by Eumenes. Now when Antenor had notice from a Watch-tower, that these Ships were sailing through the main Sea, he set out from Subota, and, between the Cape of Erythrae and Chios, which is a very narrow streight, met them. Eumenes's Officers believ'd nothing less, than that the Macedonian Fleet was cruising in that Sea: and therefore supposed, one while, that they were Romans, and anon, that it was Attalus, or some sent from Attalus, out of the Roman Camp, who were bound for Pergamus. But when they came so near, as that they could plainly distinguish the form and make of their Barks, and knew by their manner of rowing, and their making up directly to them, that they were Enemies; then they were in a consternation, since they had no hopes of making any resistance, their Ships being unfit for fighting, besides that the Gauls were ready to mutiny, having been so long quiet at Sea. Thereupon part of them, that were near the Continent, swam out into Erythrae: and part of them, setting Sail got to Chios, where leaving their Horses they ran, as fast as they could, to the City. But the Barks arriving nearer to the City, and having landed their Souldiers more commodiously, the Macedonians overtook the Gauls by the way, and kill'd part of them as they fled, and part of them before the Gate of the Town, from whence they were excluded: for the Chians had shut their Gate, as being ignorant, who ran away, or who pursu'd. There were nigh eight hundred of the Gauls slain, and two hundred taken alive: the Horses were partly drown'd with the Ships: and, part of them, had their Nerves cut on the shore by the Macedonians. But Antenor order'd the same ten Barks, which he had sent before, to carry twenty very fine Horses, together with the Captives, to Thessalonica, and thence to return, as soon as possible, to the Fleet: saying, that he would stay for them at Phana. The Fleet continu'd at the City about three dayes: and thence they went on to Phana, where seeing the ten Barks return'd much sooner than they expected, they sail'd through the Aegean Sea to Delus.

XXIX. Whilst these things were transacted, the Roman Embassadors, C. Popilius, C. Decimius, and C. Hostilius, setting forth from Chalcis, when they came with three five-bank'd Gallies to Delus, found there forty Barks belonging to the Macedonians, and five five-bank'd Gallies, belonging to King Eumenes. But the Sanctity of the Temple and the Island secur'd them all: so that the Romans, Macedonians, and Eumenes's Seamen convers'd in the Temple all together, the sacred respect which they bore to the place affording them a kind of Truce. Antenor, Perseus's Admiral, when he had notice from a Watch tower, there were certain

Y y y y

Merchant-men

Merchant men before him out at Sea, himself pursu'd them with part of his Barks, and having disposed of the rest about the Cyclade Islands, either sunk all the Ships (except such as were bound for Macedonia) or rilled them at least. Popilius and Eumenes's Ships did what they could to relieve them: but the Macedonians going in the night with only two or most commonly three Barks at a time passed by unseen. About that time the Macedonian and Illyrian Embassadors came together to Rhodes, whose authority was encreased, not only by the arrival of the Barks, which cruised all over the Cyclade Islands, and the Aegean Sea, but also by the very union of the two Kings, Perseus and Gentius, and the report, that the Gauls were coming with a vast number of Foot and Horse. And now, since Dion and Polyaratus, who were on Perseus's side, had receiv'd encouragement, the Kings had not only a very kind Answer, but they two publickly declar'd, that they would put an end to the War by their authority; wherefore they would have the Kings to themselves dispose their minds toward accepting of a Peace.

XXX. It was now the beginning of the Spring, and new Officers were come into the Province. The Consul Annius into Macedonia, Octavius to the Fleet at Oreum, Anicius into Illyricum, being to make War against Gentius. His Father was Plauratus, King of the Illyrians, and his Mother Eurydica; and he had two Brothers, Plator by Father and Mothers side both, and Caravantius by the Mothers side only. He therefore left suspecting this last, by reason that his Father was ignoble, kill'd Plator; and his two Friends also, Etritus and Epicadus, very active men, that he might reign with greater security. There was a report, that he envied his Brother, who was betrothed to Etuta, the Daughter of Honunus, King of the Dardans; as designing by this marriage to engage the whole Nation of the Dardans to his interest. And this became the more likely to be true, by his marrying of the Virgin, after he had kill'd Plator. When he had remov'd all fear of his Brother, he began to be very vexatious to his Subjects; and inflamed the natural fierceness of his temper by the immoderate use of Wine. But, as I told you before, being incited to engage in the Roman War, he drew all his Forces to Lissus, which consisted of fifty thousand men. From whence, having sent his Brother with a thousand Foot, and fifty Horse, into the Country of the Cavians, either by force or fear, to subdue it; whilst he himself march'd to the City Bassania, five miles from Lissus. They were Allies of the Romans: wherefore being first try'd by Messengers that were sent to them before-hand, they chose rather to endure a Siege than surrender themselves. The Town of Durnium in the Cavian Territories very kindly received Caravantius at his coming thither; but Caravantius, another City, shut him out: and as he was plundering the Country round about, some stragling Souldiers were by a concurrence of the Country people slain. Now also Ap. Claudius, having taken in to that Army which he already had, the Buline, Apollonian and Dyrrhachian Auxiliaries, march'd out of his Winter-Quarters, and lay Encamp'd near the River Genusus: where being mightily concern'd at the League which he heard was concluded between Perseus and Gentius, and at the injury and violence offer'd to the Embassadors, resolv'd to wage a War against him. At that time Anicius the Prætor, who was at Apollonia, having heard what was done in Illyricum, and having sent a Letter before-hand to Appius, that he should stay for him at Genusus, came in three dayes himself into the Camp: where having added, to those Auxiliaries which he had, two thousand Foot, and two hundred Horse (made up of young Parthians) he made Epicadus Commander of the Foot, and Agalsus of the Horse; designing to march more especially into Illyricum, to raise the Siege from before Bassania: but he was diverted by a report concerning certain Ships, that were pillaging the Sea Coast. For there were eighty Barks, sent by Gentius (through the persuasions of Pantauchus) to pillage the Dyrrhachian and Apollonian Territories. Then the Fleet

XXXI. * * They surrender'd themselves: and so afterward did all the Cities of that Country, being the more induced thereunto by the Clemency and Justice of the Roman Prætor toward all sorts of people. From thence they came to Scodra, which had been the chief seat and cause of the War; not only, because Gentius had taken it to himself, as the Capital Garrison of his whole Kingdom, but also, because it is by far the best fortified of any place in the Labeatian Territories and very inaccessible. There are about it two Rivers, Clausala which runs by it on the East-side, and Barbana on the West, which rises out of the Labeatian Fenn. These two Rivers running into one another, discharge themselves into the River Oriundes; which, rising out of the Mountain Scodrus, and being augmented by many other Waters, disembogues it self into the Adriatick Sea. The Mountain Scodrus, which is by far the highest in all that Country, hath on the Eastside of it Dardania, to the South Macedonia, and to the West Illyricum. But though the Town were fortified, even by its own natural situation, and that the whole Nation of the Illyrians, besides the King himself, defended it; yet the Roman Prætor, seeing his first attempts had succeeded so well, and supposing that the fortune of the whole affair would be proportionable to the beginning; and that a sudden terrour might prevail upon them, set his Army in Battalia, and drew them up to the Walls. Now, if the besieged had shut their Gates, and defended their Walls and the Towers upon their Gates with armed men that might have been planted there, they had had certainly forced the Romans from the Walls before they could have done them any hurt. But they on the contrary going out of their Gates join'd Battle upon a Plain with greater courage, than they maintain'd it. For being routed and thronging together in their flight, above two hundred of them met together at the very entrance of the Gate; which caused so great a consternation in the City, that Gentius sent Deputies immediately to the Prætor, viz. Tenticus and Bellus, two Noblemen of that Country, to desire a Truce, that he might have time to deliberate concerning the state of affairs. Having three dayes given him for that purpose (the Roman Camp was about five hundred paces from the City) he took Ship, and sailed down the River Barbana, into the Labeatian Lake, as though he had sought a secret place to consult in: but, as it appear'd, was moved thereunto by a false hope, that his Brother Caravantius was coming thither with many thousands of armed men, whom he had raised out of that Country, into which he was sent. Which report proving vain, he the third day after went in the same Ship down the River to Scodra: and having sent Messengers before-hand, to get leave for him to come and speak with the Prætor, that request being granted him, he came into the Camp. Where he began his Speech with an accusation against himself for his own folly, but ran out at last into Prayers and Tears; and then falling down at the Prætors Feet, surrender'd himself up into his disposal. The Prætor, first, bad him be of good cheer, and invited him to Supper; so that he return'd into the City to his Relations, and feasted that day with the Prætor very magnificently: but after that he was committed to the keeping of C. Cassius, a Tribune of the Souldiers; nor had he scarce received of Perseus so much as the hire of a Gladiator, that is to say, not above ten Talents, to throw himself into these circumstances.

Anicius having retaken Scodra, gave order first of all, that Petillius and Perperna XXXII. the Embassadors should be sought out and brought to him: to whom when he had restored their former splendour, he sent Perperna forthwith to apprehend the Kings Friends and Relations: Who going to Medeo, a City in the Labeatian Territories, brought Eteleva his Wife, with his two Sons, Scerdiletus and Pleuratus, and Caravantius his Brother into the Camp at Scodra. Anicius having made an end of the Illyrian War within thirty days, sent Perperna to Rome with the news of his Victory: and, after some few days, King Gentius too himself, with his Mother, Wife, Children, Brother, and others of the Illyrian Nobility. The news came to Rome that this War was ended, before they heard that it was begun. At the same time that these things were transacted, Perseus also was in a great fright, not only upon the score of Amilius, the new Consul coming (who, he heard, came with great menaces against him) but of Octavius the Prætor also. Nor was he possess'd with less dread of the Roman Fleet, and the danger of the Sea Coast. At Thessalonica Eumenes and Athenagoras were the chief Commanders with a small Garrison of two thousand Shieldmen, called Cetrati. Thither he also sent Androcles, one of his Prefects or Captains, commanding him to Encamp under the very Docks. To Ania he sent a thousand Horse under the Command of Antigonus, to defend the Sea-Coast, to the end, that on what shore soever they heard the Enemies Ships were arrived, they might presently give the Country People their assistance. There were five thousand Macedonians sent to secure Pythium and Petra, under the Conduct of Histiens, Theogenes and Asilo: who being gone, he began to fortifie the Bank of the River Enipeus, which was then dry'd up and fordable. For which design that all the multitude might have leisure, the Women, who were forced to come out of the adjacent Cities, brought them Victuals into the Camp. The Souldiers were order'd

Last of all he commanded the Tankard-Bearers to follow him to the Sea, which was not XXXIII. three hundred paces off, and some of them to dig in one place, and some in another, at little distances, upon the shore. The Mountains being of a vast height gave them hopes, so much the more, because they disclosed no open Rivers, that they contain'd in them certain concealed streams, which ran into and mixt with the Sea-Waters. They had scarce taken off the very surface of the Sand, when there came forth, first, muddy and small streams, which in a little time were clear and yielded a great deal of Water, as if the Gods themselves had sent it. That also gave the General somewhat more credit and authority among his Souldiers. After this, the Souldiers being order'd to make ready their Armies, he himself went with the Tribunes, and first ranks to view the passes; where arm'd men might easily go down, and where the ascent up to the farther Bank was no wayes difficult. Having taken a due prospect of these places, he took farther care also, that all things might be done in the Army regularly, and without tumult, according to the pleasure and command of the General. In order whereunto he declared since, when the word of command was given, and all did not hear it, they, having receiv'd uncertain Orders, used to do, some of them more, and some less, than they should do (which occasion'd dissonant clamours in all places; infomuch that the Enemy knew what they were going to do before they themselves) he thought fit, that the Tribune [or Colonel] should give the word privately to the eldest Captain of the Legion; and that he, and so the rest in order, should tell the next Centurion what was convenient to be done: whether the Orders came from the Van to the Rear of the Army, or from the Rear to the Van. He likewise (which was a thing never practised before) forbade the Sentinels to carry their Shields with them when they went upon the Watch; for a Sentinel or Watchman did not go in to a Fight, so as to have occasion to use his Arms, but to Watch; that when he perceiv'd the Enemy was a coming, he might retreat and Alarm others. He likewise prohibited those that had Helmets on to stand with their Shields erect before them; and then when they were weary, leaning upon their Pile [Javelin] to stand and sleep with their head laid upon the brim of their Shield; so as that the Enemy might see them by their shining Arms at a great distance, though they saw nothing before them. He likewise alter'd the manner of their Stations. They all stood all day in their Arms, and the Horsemen with their Horses bridled. Which seeing they had done in the heat of Summer, so long, till the scorching Sun made them ready to faint, and the Enemy came many times fresh upon, when they and their Horses were quite tired, in so much that a few were able to worth a great many; he therefore order'd that so many should keep guard from Morning till Noon, and that others in the Afternoon should relieve them: by which means the Enemy could never come fresh upon them, when they were all tired.

XXXIV. Having declar'd in a publick Assembly, that thus he would have things carry'd, he afterward made an Oration, suitable to that modest Assembly. That the General only ought to take care and consult what ought to be done in the Army; sometimes by himself, and sometimes with those that he call'd to Council with him: but that those who were not called, ought not either publicly or privately to give their judgments. That a Soldier ought to take care of these three things, his body to have it in as good health, and as nimble as may be; to have his arms fit for his use, and his mind ready upon all sudden orders: and to know that the immortal Gods and his General take care for all things else. That in an Army where the Soldiers, the Consul, and the General are toss'd about by vulgar reports, there can be no safety. That he (according to the duty of a General) would take care to give them an opportunity of doing their business with success; but then they ought not to inquire into any thing that was to come: only when the signal was given, then to shew themselves Soldiers. Having given them these Precepts he dismiss'd the Assembly: the old Soldiers making an open confession, that they (as though they had been fresh, raw Fellows) never knew till that day, what was to be done in point of military Discipline. Nor did they shew by these words only, with what assent they had heard the Consuls Speech, but their actions shew'd the same. For you could see no one in the whole Camp, that, after a little while, was unemploy'd: some sharpening their Swords, others scouping their Helmets, Murrians, Shields, and Coats of Mail; whilst others were a fitting their Arms to their Bodies, and try'd the agility of their limbs when under them. Others again were brandishing their Piles, others flourishing their Swords, and looking upon the points of them: so that a man might easily perceive, that as soon as ever they had an opportunity of joining Battle with the Enemy, they would enter upon the War, so as to gain either a very famous Victory, or die a memorable death. Perseus also when he saw, that, upon the Consuls coming (it being in the beginning of the Spring too) all things were in an hurry and disturbance with the Enemy, as though a new War had been levied, removed his Camp from Phila, and pitch'd it upon the opposite Bank: whilst the General went about to view his works, and foresaw questionless where he might pass over

XXXV. Which thing encouraged the Romans, but very much terrified the Macedonians and their King. Wherefore at first he endeavour'd to suppress and stifle the report of that matter, by sending certain persons to forbid Pantauchus, who was coming from thence to come near the Camp: but now there were not only certain Boyes seen by their Friends, as they were led among the Illyrian Hostages, but likewise the more care was taken of every thing, the sooner it was divulged by the Kings Servants, they being very much given to tattle. About the same time the Rhodian Embassadors came into the Camp, with the same terms of Peace, that put the Senate into such a passion at Rome. But they were heard at the Council of War there in the Camp with much more regret and detestation. Whereupon, when others said, they ought to be turn'd headlong out of the Camp without any Answer at all, Emilius declar'd, that after fifteen dayes he would give them an Answer: In the mean time, that all people might see, how far the authority of the Rhodians, who came to impose conditions of Peace, prevailed with him, he began to consult about the method, how to mannage and carry on the War. Some, and especially the Seniors, thought it best, for him to make his attack by the Bank of Enipeus, and those Fortifications: saying, that the Macedonians could not resist such a thick body of men, who made an attack all together; they having been beaten the year before out of so many Castles, somewhat higher and stronger, [than their present Fortifications] wherein they had planted good Guards. Others thought it convenient, For Octavius to go to Theffalonica, and by pillaging the Sea Coast to divert the Kings Forces; so that when they saw another War break out upon their Rear, the King, wheeling about to defend the inner part of his Kingdom, might be forced in some measure to desert the passes over Enipeus. But to himself the Bank seemed unpassable, not only by nature, but by reason of the the works: and besides, that there were Warlike Engines planted upon it, he likewise heard, that the Enemy threw Darts with greater skill and certainty than ordinary. But the Generals mind was wholly bent another way: and therefore, having dismiss'd the Council, he sent privately for two Perræbian Merchants, called Schanus and Menophilus, men whose fidelity and prudence too he now was well acquainted with, and ask'd them, what sort of passes there were into Perræbia. To which they answering, that the wayes were good enough, but that they were beset by the Kings Guards, he began to hope, that if he surpriz'd them in the night time with a strong party, the Garrison might be destroy'd. For Darts and Arrows, and other Weapons that are to be thrown from one, were of no use in the dark, when a man could not see what he wished to hit. That Soldiers used to fight hand to hand with Swords in a throng; in which the Romans outdid all other Nations. So resolving to take these men for his Guides, he sent for Octavius the Prætor, and having told him his design, order'd him to go with the Fleet, and a thousand men to Heraclea, taking along with him ten dayes provisions: whilst he himself sent P. Scipio Nasica, and Q. Fabius Maximus his Son, with five thousand choice men to Heraclea, as though they had been to go on board the Fleet [but in reality] to pillage the Sea Coast of the inner Macedonia; which was a thing debated in the Council. They had private notice, that the provisions for the Navy were ready, lest any thing might detain them; and then the guides were order'd so to divide the journey, as that at the fourth Watch, the third day, they might attack Pythium. The next day he himself, that he might keep the King from looking after other affairs, engaged, as soon as it was day, in the midst of the River, with the Enemies Guards: and they fought on both sides in light-armour; for they could not use any heavier Arms in so uneven a place, as that Channel was. The descent of the Bank on both sides into the main Channel, was almost three hundred paces in length: and the middle space of the torrent, which was hollow'd very differently in several places, was somewhat more than a thousand paces over: in the middle of that they fought, whilst the King on the one side, and the Consul on the other, stood with their Legions upon the mounds of their Camps, looking on. The Kings men fought best with Darts and other Weapons to sling at a distance, but the Roman was more steady and secure in the mannage of a Shield, whether of the Thracian or Ligurian make. About Noon the Consul order'd his men to found a Retreat: and so the Battle was ended for that day, many men being slain on both sides. The next day at Sun rising, they, being irritated by the late fight, fell on more fiercely than before; but the Romans were wounded, not only by those with whom they were engaged, but much more by that multitude, which was posted in the several Towers, with all sorts of darting Weapons, and great stones. When they came nearer to the Bank where the Enemy stood, those things that were shot out of Engines wrought even to the hindmost of them. Having lost many more that day, the Consul drew his men off a little later than ordinary. The third day he abstain'd from fighting, and went down to the lower end of the Camp, resolving to attempt to make his way over by a mound like an Arm, that went down shelving to the Sea-side.

It was now past the Solstice of the year, and almost Noon: so that they travelled XXXVI. through a great deal of dust, and the Sun grew very hot. They were very weary and thirly, and so were like to be still more and more, now that the Noon tide was so near at hand. He therefore resolv'd not to expose them in that condition to a fresh and vigorous Enemy. But they were so desirous on both sides to fight, that the Consul was forced to use as much art to elude his own men, as to divert the Enemy. Before they were all set in Array, he prest the Tribunes of the Soldiers to make halt, and put them into Battalia; going himself about all the Ranks, and encouraging the Soldiers to the Battle. Thereupon they first with cheerfulness desired the Signal; but soon after, as the heat increased, their looks were less florid, and their Voices nothing so brisk, but some of them lean'd upon their Bucklers, and others upon their Piles. Now therefore he commanded the first Ranks to pitch their Tents, post themselves in the Front of the Camp, and put their Baggage all together. Which when the Soldiers perceived, some of them rejoiced openly, that he had not forced them to fight whilst they were tired with the toil of their Journey, and in such scorching hot weather: The Foreign Lieutenants and Captains were all about the General, among whom Attalus was one; who all approved of it, when they thought the Consul resolv'd to fight: for he had not discover'd his design of delay even to them. Wherefore upon the sudden alteration of his purpose, whereas others were silent, Nasica only among them all had the Courage to advise the Consul, Not to let an Enemy escape, by declining the fight, who had eluded former Generals. For he said, he was afraid, lest he might go away in the night; and then they must follow him with great toil and danger into the innermost parts of Macedonia; and he, like former Generals, must lead his Army stragling about through the by-ways and rough passes over the Macedonian Mountains. Wherefore he desired him by all means, whilst he had his Enemy in an open plain, to attack him, and not let slip that occasion of Victory which was then offer'd him. The Consul, who was not at all offended with the free admonition of so generous an youth, told him; Nasica! as I once had the same ardour of mind which thou now hast, so thou wilt one day have the same disposition and thoughts that I now have.

have. I have learnt by many accidents and adventures in War, when to fight, and when to refrain from it. I cannot have while now in the Field to tell thee, why 'tis better at present to sit down and be quiet: ask me my reasons for it another time; you shall content your self for this time with the authority of an old General. After which the young man held his tongue, not questioning but the Consul saw some obstacle to hinder his fighting, which did not appear to him.

XXXVII. Paulus seeing that the Camp was pitch'd, and the Baggage laid up, drew off the first Ranks of the Triarii out of the Reer, and then the Principes, whilst the Spearmen stood in the Van, to attend the Enemies Motion: and last of all the Spearmen too; taking away by degrees from the right Wing, first of all the Souldiers that belong'd to all the several Ensigns. By this means the Foot (whilst the Horse with the light-armour were placed before the Army, opposite to the Foe) were led away without any noise: nor were the Horse recall'd from their Post, before the Front of the Bullwark, and the Trench were finish'd. The King too, though he had been ready to fight without any delay that very day, was yet well enough content, that his men knew it was long of the Enemy, that the fight was put off, and therefore himself also led his Forces back into their Camp. When they had thoroughly fortified their Camp, C. Sulpicius Gallus, a Tribune of the Souldiers, belonging to the second Legion, who had been Prætor the year before, calling the Souldiers, by the Consuls permission to a publick Assembly, declared; That the next night, lest any of them might think it a portentous or ominous appearance, from the second to the fourth hour of the night, the Moon would be Eclipsed. Which, because it fell out in course of nature at set times, might be known and told before hand. Wherefore as the rising and setting of the Sun and Moon being certain, they ought not to wonder, that the Moon should be sometimes in the Full, and sometimes in the Wane: so neither ought they to take it for a Prodigy, that it should be obscured, when it was hid under the body of the earth. Accordingly the night before the Nones of September, seeing the Moon was Eclipsed at the hour foretold, the Roman Souldiers thought Gallus's understanding to be almost divine; but it startled the Macedonians, who lookt upon it as a sad Prodigy, portending the downfall and destruction of their Kingdom and Nation; nor were the Soothsayers less terrified at it: insomuch that there was a noise and an howling heard in the Macedonian, till the Moon shone out again. The next day the Armies on both sides were so eager to engage, that some of their men blamed both the King and the Consul, for having gone away without fighting. The King had his excuse ready: not only, that the Enemy had first so evidently declined the fight, and led his Forces back into his Camp: but likewise, that he had planted his Ensigns in a place to which a Phalanx [a particular body of Foot] (with a very small unevenness of the ground made all together usefess) could not approach. The Consul, besides that the day before he seem'd to have omitted the occasion of fighting, and to have given the Enemy an opportunity, if they had had a mind to go off in the night, seem'd then too to wait time under pretence of sacrificing, though the signal of Battle had been set out as soon as it was day in order to their marching forth into the Field. At last, about the third hour, when he had rightly perform'd his Sacrifice, he called a Council; and there, in discourse and unseasonable consultation, some thought he mispent that time which it was more proper to do his business in: but notwithstanding, after all their discourse, the Consul made this following Speech.

XXXVIII. P. Nalica, a generous youth, was the only person, among all that yesterday had a mind to fight, who discover'd his thoughts to me: but he was afterward so silent, that he might seem to have come over to my opinion. Some others thought it better, to blame their General behind his back, than to advise him to his face. Now therefore, P. Nalica! I'll freely give you (and those that were of the same opinion with you, though they did not declare so much) a reason why I deserr'd the fight. For I am so far from repenting of Yesterday's rest, that I believe, I preserv'd the Army by that means. For which opinion of mine lest any of you should think I have no ground, let him but consider a-while with me, if he please, how many things made for the Enemy and against us. First of all, how far they exceed us in number, there was none of you all but knew before; besides, that Yesterday you observ'd it, I am confident, more particularly, when you saw their Army set in Array. And then of our small number a fourth part of our Souldiers were left for a guard to our Baggage; which to preserve and secure we do not leave, you know, the most unactive men we have. But suppose we were all together: do we suppose this, trow ye, to be a small matter, that we are like to march out of this Camp in which we have lain this night, into the Field, to day, or at least, to Morrow, with the help of the Gods, if we think good? Is there no difference, whether you command a Souldier, that to day is neither tired with travelling, nor working, but quiet and fresh, to take up his Arms in his Tent, and lead him into the Field in his full strength, vigorous both in body and mind too; or whether you expose him to an Enemy that's entire and quiet, and comes not to the Battle after his strength hath been consumed by any other means, whilst their men are fatigued with a long march, wearied with heavy burdens, all of a muck sweat, having their Jaws parch'd up with thirst, their Mouths and Eyes fill'd with dust, and their bodies almost roasted with the Noontide Sun? Who, for Heavens sake, that's in so good a condition, as such an Enemy, though but a sluggish, and cowardly Fellow, might not conquer the stoutest man alive? When the Enemy had set their Army in Battalia at their leisure, recover'd their spirits, and stood compos'd every one in their ranks, had it not been wise work for us to have marshall'd our men all in a hurry, and engaged them in a confusion?

one

We, indeed, should have had our Army (you'll grant) all discompos'd, and out of order; but XXXIX: our Camp would have been fortified, we should have had a watering place provided, with a way to it well guarded, and all places round about secur'd; yes, I warrant you, or rather, what should we have had, besides a bare Plain to fight in? Your Ancestors lookt upon a fortified Camp, to be a Port as it were against all casualties that might befall an Army: from whence they might march to Battle, and into which, when they had been toss'd by the tempest of the fight, they might again retire. Wherefore when they had encompassed their Camp with Fortifications, they put a strong guard likewise into it: because he that was forced from his Camp, though he got the better out in the Field, was lookt upon as a person conquer'd. A Camp is a receptacle for a Conqueror, and a refuge for him that's conquer'd. How many Armies, though they have not been successful in the Battle, have notwithstanding, when they have been beaten within their Bullwark, when they saw their opportunity, sometimes in a moment after, made a sally forth, and beaten the Victorious Enemy off? This military Seat is another sort of Country to us, the Bullwark stands for the Walls of our Town, and every Souldiers Tent is his House and home. Had we sought like Vagabonds without any fixed Seat or place to harbour us, whether should we have retired, if we had won the day? But to these difficulties and hinderances of the fight, some oppose that question: What if the Enemy had march'd off that night; how much pains must we have taken to have follow'd him into the innermost parts of Macedonia? But I am sure that he would never have staid, nor have drawn his Forces out into the Field, if he had resolv'd to depart hence. For how much easier had it been for him to have gone away, when we were a great distance from him, than now, when we are just at his heels? Nor could he escape without our knowledge, either by day or by night either. But what can be more desirable to us, than to sit upon their reer in the open Fields, as they run away, whose Camp, which was secur'd by the lofty Bank of a River, and encompassed not only with a Bullwark but many Towers also, we began to attack? These were the reasons why I Yesterday deserr'd the Fight till to day. For I my self also am now inclin'd to fight; and therefore, because the way to the Foe through the River Enipeus, is stopp'd up, I have open'd another new passage, by defeating the Enemies Guards; nor will I desist, before I have put an end to this War.

After this Speech there was silence; some part of the Company being brought over to his opinion, and some of them afraid to give offence to no purpose, in that, which howsoever it were omitted, could not be recalled. But even that day they did not fight with either the Consuls, or the Kings good will. Not with the Kings, because he would not set upon the Enemy, whilst they were tired with their march the day before, and in an hurry to set their men in Battalia, who were yet in great disorder. Nor with the Consuls, because they had not yet got Wood and Forage into the new Camp, which a great part of the Souldiers were gone out to fetch from the adjacent Fields. But though neither of the Generals were willing, Fortune, which is of more force than any humane Counsels, set them together. There was a small River near the Enemies Camp, to which both the Macedonians and the Romans too went for Water, setting Guards upon both Banks, that they might do so with safety. There were two Regiments on the Roman side called the Marrucine and the Pelignian Regiments; two Troops of Samnite Horse, under the Command of M. Sergius Silius, the Lieutenant; besides another standing Guard before the Camp under Lieutenant C. Cluvius; with three Regiments more, viz. the Firmane, Vestine, and Cremonian Regiments; and two Troops of Horse, the Placentine and the Asemine. Now they lying quiet by the River, since neither side provoked the other, about the fourth hour a Beast, getting out of the hands of those that lookt after it, ran over to the farther Bank. Which Beast three Roman Souldiers follow'd through the Water, almost knee deep, whilst two Thracians strove to get it out of the midst of the River to their Bank. The Romans therefore kill'd one of them, and having got their Beast again retreated to their own Station. There was a Body of eight hundred Thracians on the Enemies side of the River: of whom some few at first, taking it very ill, that their Country-man should be slain in their sight, cross'd the River to pursue the Murderers: but soon after there went more of them, and at last, all

The majesty of the Empire, the renown of the Person, and, above all, his Age, who, though he were more than sixty years of Age, perform'd the Offices of youngmen in the chief part of the toil and danger. A Legion fill'd up that space, which was between the Shieldmen called Cetrati, and the Phalanx, so as to interrupt and disjoint the body of the Enemies. It lay to the Reer of the Cetrati, and fronted the Clypeati [another sort of Shieldmen] being called the Aglaspides [men with shining, or bright Shields.] L. Albinus was order'd to lead the second Legion, a Consuls Fellow, against the Phalanx called Leucaspis [in which the Souldiers had white Shields] which was the main body of the Enemies. Into the right Wing, in which the fight near the River was first begun, where the Elephants brought, and a Wing of the Allies: and from hence the Macedonians began first to fly. For as the force of many new inventions among men consists more in words than in the things themselves; but when you come to the experiment of them, where you are not only to Discourse, how they are to be perform'd, but to put them in Execution, they are often often found of no effect or moment at all; so the Elephants at that time were in their Army a mere name, without any use. The body of Elephants were pursu'd by the Latine Allies, who beat off the left Wing. In the middle the second Legion charging in upon them routed the Phalanx: nor was there any more manifest cause of that Victory, than that there were many Engagements in several parts of it at the same time, which first put the Phalanx into great disorder, and then quite overthrew it: though the strength thereof be close join'd, and, by reason that their Spears are held direct, very dreadful and intolerable. If you attack them here and there so as to force them to bring about their Spears, which, by reason of their length and weight, are unweildy, they are all immediately in a confusion; but if there happen any disturbance in their Flank, or Reer, they are utterly ruined. As at that time, they were forced to meet the Romans who came upon them in several Parties, by disuniting their main body in many places; and the Romans, wherever they found any void spaces, got in with their Ranks. Who, if they had charged with their whole Army upon the Front of the Phalanx, as it stood first in Battalia (as the Pelignian Regiment at the beginning of the fight, through inadvertency, happen'd to do when they engaged the Cetrati) they had stuck themselves upon their Spears, nor could have born the shock of such a close strong Body.

XLII. But as the Foot were most of them slain, except those that threw down their Arms and ran away; so the Horse went off almost entire. The first that fled was the King himself; who now, from Pydna, march'd with his sacred Wings of Horse toward Pella. Him Cotys presently follow'd, with the Odyssian Horse; and the other Wings of the Macedonians went away with entire Ranks: for the body of Foot, that lay between, in killing of whom the Conquerours were so long employ'd, made them unmindful of pursuing the Horse. The Phalanx was for a great while cut off in the Front, their Flanks and their Reer; till at last those that escaped out of the Enemies hands, flying unarm'd to the Sea, went, some of them, even into the Water, and holding up their hands to those that were in the Fleet, humbly begg'd of them to save their lives: and when they saw Boats coming from every Ship, supposing that they came to take them in, to the end that they might make Captives of them rather than kill them, they, some of them, went on swimming still farther into the Water. But seeing they were barbarously murder'd out of the Boats, all those, that could, got back by swimming to the Land, though there they fell into other more dangerous circumstances: for the Elephants, being driven by their Riders to the shore, tore and destroy'd all those that came forth. Upon this the Romans were all agreed, that there were never so many Macedonians slain in one Battle. For there were kill'd full twenty thousand men; six thousand taken Prisoners, who had fled out of the Field to Pydna, besides five thousand more, that stragled in their flight. Of the Conquerours there fell not above an hundred, and of them the far greater part Pelignians: though there were some few more wounded. Now had they begun to fight sooner, so as that the Victors might have had day-light enough to have pursu'd their Victory, their whole Forces had been destroy'd: but at this time the night coming on, not only secur'd them as they fled, but also made the Romans loth to follow them through places that they did not know.

XLIII. Perseus fled to the Pierian Wood, along the Souldiers rode, with a considerable body of Horse, and his Kingly Retinue. As soon as he came into the Wood, where there were several crofs wayes, night coming on, he, with some very few, that were most faithful to him, turn'd out of the rode. The Horse being left without a Commander, went, most of them, several wayes to their own Native Cities; though some very few march'd thence to Pella sooner than Perseus himself, because they went the ready rode. The King was vex'd almost till midnight, with terrour and the various difficulties, which he met with in his way. There were with Perseus in his Palace at Pella, Enellus, the Governour of that place, and his own Children: but on the other hand, several of his Friends, who being preserv'd, some by one means, and some by another, were got out of the Battle to Pella, though they were often sent for, would none of them come to him. He had only three Companions in his flight, viz. Evander, a Cretan, Neon, a Bvotian, and Archidamus, an Aetolian. With them, now fearing, lest they who refused to come to him, should ere long attempt some greater matter, he at the fourth Watch made his escape. There were nigh five hundred Cretans that follow'd him; who made toward Amphipolis: but he went out of Pella in the night, as making all the hast he could to get over the River Axius before day; for he supposed the Romans would pursue him no farther than that place, by reason that the passage was so difficult.

XLIV. The Consul, after he was return'd with Victory into his Camp, could not yet enjoy any true content for the care he had upon him concerning his younger Son. His name was P. Scipio, who afterward, when Carthage was destroyed, was also surnamed Africanus; being the natural issue of the Consul Paulus, but by adoption the Grandson of Africanus. He being at that time in the seventeenth year of his Age (which made his concern the greater) whilst he too eagerly pursu'd the Foe, was carry'd away in the crowd to another part of the Country: from whence when he return'd, though late, the Consul then at last, having received received his Son again safe and sound, began to relish the pleasure of so great a Victory. When the fame of this fight was come to Amphipolis, and the Women thereupon ran together into the Temple of Diana, called Tauropolis, to desire her assistance, Diodorus, the Governour of the City, fearing, lest the Thracians, of whom there were two thousand then in Garison, should in that tumult rife the City, he received, from one that he had got, to personate a Letter Carrier, a Letter in the middle of the Market-place. In which it was said, That the Roman Fleet was arriv'd at Emathia: and that the Country all about was harass'd: wherefore the Præfects of Emathia desired, that he would send them some assistance against those Robbers. Having read these lines, he exhorted the Thracians, that they would go to defend the Coast of Emathia: [saying] that they might make a great slaughter and prey of the Romans who were stragled all about the Country. And at the same time he lessen'd the report of the defeat; which if it had been true, there would more men have come one after another fresh out of the field, from which they fled. Having sent away the Thracians upon this pretence, as soon as he saw them over the River Strymon, he shut the Gates.

Perseus came the third day after the fight to Amphipolis: from whence he sent Deputies with an Herald's Mace to Paulus. In the mean time Hippias, Milo, and Pantauchus, the Kings chief Favourites, went themselves to the Consul, and surrender'd Bereæ, whither they had escaped out of the Battle, to the Romans: which other Cities also, for fear, were ready to do. The Consul, having sent Q. Fabius his Son, L. Lentulus, and Q. Metellus, with the news of his Victory and Letters to Rome, gave the Foot the plunder of the Enemies defeated Army: and to the Horse, the booty of the Country round about, so that they were not out of the Camp above two nights. He himself removed his Camp nearer to the Sea toward Pydna: where first Bereæ, and then Thessalonica, with Pella, and almost all Macedonia within two dayes was surrender'd. But the Pydneans, who were the nearest, had not yet sent their Embassadors: for the disorderly multitude and throng of several Nations together, who were forced out of the fight to run thither into one Body, obstructed the intentions and the agreement of the City; nor were their Gates only shut, but even brick'd up also. For which reason Milo and Pantauchus were sent under the Walls to talk with Solan, who was Governour of the Garison: and by him the whole multitude of the Souldiers were sent forth. The Town being surrender'd was given to the Souldiers to rife. Then Perseus having try'd his only hopes of assistance from the Bisaltæ [a people of Thrace] to whom he had in vain dispatch'd Embassadors, went forth into the publick Assembly, having his Son Philip with him; not only to encourage the Amphipolitans themselves, but also by his Exhortations to raise the spirits of the Horse and Foot, who either always follow'd him, or happen'd in their flight by chance to come to the same place. But seeing that he could not speak (though he began several times) for crying, because he himself could not do it, he told Evander the Cretan, what he would have treated of with the multitude, and so went down from the Temple. The multitude, as they were themselves very sorry, and cry'd, to see the King weep, so they despis'd Evanders Speech: yea some of them were so bold as to cry out from the midst of the Assembly; Get you hence, lest we few, that are yet alive, perish for your sakes. Their boldness stop't Evanders mouth. Then the King being retired into his House, convey'd all his Money, his Silver and his Gold into Barks, that stood upon the Strymon, and went himself also down to the River. The Thracians not daring to trust themselves in Ships, slipt home, and so did other crowds too of the same military gang. But the Cretans follow'd the hopes of money: and therefore, because there was more offence generally given, than good will gain'd, in dividing of it, there were fifty Talents laid upon the Bank for them to scramble for. After which scramble, as they got tumultuously on Board the Ships, they over-set one Bark, that lay in the mouth of the River, by getting too many of them into her at a time. That day they arriv'd at Galepsus, and the next at Samotheaca, whither they were bound: to which place, they say, there were brought two thousand Talents.

Paulus having sent Governours to all the Cities that were surrender'd, lest any injury should be done to the conquer'd now in the time of Peace: and keeping with him the Kings Herald, sent P. Nafica (not knowing of the Kings flight) with a small Party of Foot and Horse to Amphipolis: not only to ravage Sintica, but to be an obstruction to all the Kings designs. At this time Cn. Octavius took and rifed Melibæa: and at Aeginium, which Cn. Anicius was sent to attack, there were two hundred men lost at one sally which was made out of the Town, before the Aeginians knew that there was any end made of the War. The Consul setting out from Pydna came with his whole Army in two dayes to Pella: and having Encamped a mile from thence, staid there for some dayes, viewing the situation of the City on all sides, which he observ'd, was not without reason made choice of to be the Kings Seat. 'Tis situate upon an Hill, that lies to the Northwest: and about it are Fens of a vast depth, both Summer and Winter, caused by standing Lakes that are hard by. In the very Fenn it self, where it is nearest to the City, there rises as it were an Island, which stands upon the mound of a vast work, which not only bears a Wall, but likewise is not at all injur'd by the moisture of the Fenn, that runs round about it. It seems afar off to be join'd to the Wall of the City; but is divided from it by a River, over which unto it there is a Bridge: so that, if any Foreigner attack it, there is no coming to it on any side, nor, if the King shut any body up there, is there any way to escape, but by a Bridge, which is very easily guarded. In this place the Kings Treasure used to be kept, but at that time there was nothing found in it, except the three hundred Talents, which were to have been sent to King Gentius, but were afterward kept back. In the time that they lay at Pella, several Embassies, that came to congratulate [the Consuls Victory] especially out of Thessaly, had their Audience. After which having received the news, that Perseus was gone over to Samothrace, the Consul march'd from Pella, and arrived in four dayes at Amphipolis. Where all the Town coming out in throngs to meet him, made it evident to any man

Z z z z z

to

DECADE V. BOOK V.

The E P I T O M E.

6. Perseus was taken by Æmilius Paulus in Samothrace. 11, &c. When Antiochus, King of Syria, besieged Ptolemy and Cleopatra, King and Queen of Ægypt; for which reason the Senate sent Embassadors to him, to command him to desist from besieging a King who was their Ally, whereas, when the Message was deliver'd to him, he made answer, that he would consider, what to do; one of the Embassadors, viz. Popilius by name, with a rod, made a circle about the King, and bid him give his answer before he came out of it. By which rough usage he caused Antiochus to omit the War. 13. There were several Embassies from several Nations and Kings, by way of congratulation, admitted into the Senate. 20. But that of the Rhodians, because in that War they had been against the Romans, was excluded. 21. The next day, when 'twas debated, whether they should declare War against them, the Embassadors pleaded the cause of their Country in the Senate, and were dismiss'd neither as Enemies, nor as Allies. 31, &c. Macedonia reduced into the form of a Province. 35, &c. Æmilius Paulus, though the Souldiers were against it, by reason that they had too little booty, and though Servius Sulpicius Galba contradicted it, rode in triumph; and led Perseus with his three Sons before the Chariot. 40. The joy of which triumph, that it might not fall to him entire, was signaliz'd by the Funerals of his two Sons, one of which died before, and the other after his Fathers triumph. The Consuls took a Survey of the people, at which there were Poled three hundred and twelve thousand eight hundred and ten Souls. 44. Prusias, King of Bithynia, came to Rome to congratulate with the Senate upon the account of the Victory obtain'd over Macedonia: and recommended his Son Nicomedes to the Senate, before whom, the King, being full of flattery, he was the Roman Peoples Libertus [one freed from slavery.]

I. THE persons sent to carry the news of the Victory, viz. Q. Fabius, L. Lentulus, and Quintius Metellus, though they came to Rome with as much speed as possibly they could, yet found that the City was full of joy upon that score before their arrival. The fourth day after the fight with the King, whilst the Games were perform'd in the Circus, a sudden murmur of the people ran through all the shows, That there had been a Battle in Macedonia, and that the King was overcome: after which the noise increased; till at last there arose a clamour and a clapping of hands, as though they had heard certain news of the Victory. The Magistrates began to wonder, and inquired who was the Author of that sudden joy: whom since they could not find out, their mirth was soon over, as for a thing uncertain, yet the glad tidings was still fix'd in their thoughts. Which being confirm'd by the true relations of Fabius Lentulus, and Metellus, they rejoiced not only at the Victory it self, but also in the boding of their own minds. But there goes another story concerning the joy conceiv'd by the Company in the Circus, which is no less probable than this; that, upon the 22<sup>h</sup> of October, and the second day of the Roman Games, as C. Licinius the Consul was going up to see the Chariots start, a Letter Carrier, who said, he came out of Macedonia, deliver'd unto him a Laureat Letter. When the Chariots were set out, the Consul got up into his Coach; and being return'd along the Circus to the publick Boxes [where the Spectators sat] shew'd the Laureat Letter to the people. Which when they saw, the people presently grew negligent of the show, and ran down into the middle [of the Circus:] whither the Consul called the Senate, and, having read the Letter over, by authority of the Senate, before the publick Boxes, declared to the people; That L. Æmilius, his Colleague had fought a pitch'd Battle with King Perseus: that the Macedonian Army was beaten and routed: that the King, with some few of his men, made his escape: and that all the Cities of Macedonia had surrender'd themselves to the Roman People. When they had heard this, a noise arose with great clapping of hands, and most part of the Company, leaving the Games went home to carry the glad tidings to their Wives and Children. This was the thirteenth day from that on which the Battle was fought in Macedonia.

II. The next day there was a Senate held in the Senate House, supplications decreed, and an Order of Senate made; That the Consul should dismiss all them that he had list'd under him, except the ordinary Souldiers, and the Seamen: and that the disbanding of them should be deferr'd, till the Embassadors came from L. Æmilius the Consul, who had sent the Letter-Carrier before them. Upon the 26th of October, about the second hour, the Embassadors enter'd the City, and drawing along with them a vast crowd of people that met and follow'd them, where ever they went, they walked strait on into the Forum, up to the Tribunal. The Senate was then, by chance, sitting; and therefore the Consul brought the Embassadors into them. Where they were detain'd so long as to declare; what quantity of Food and Horse the King had; how many thousands of them were slain, and how many taken: with what a small loss of men so many Enemies were destroy'd; with how few the King escaped: that it was thought he would go to Samothrace; and that the Fleet was ready to pursue him. That he could not get away either by Sea or Land. They said these very words a little after, when they were brought into the publick Assembly: where, the peoples joy being renew'd, after the Consul had set forth an Edict, that all the Temples should be open'd, every man in particular went out of the Assembly to give the Gods thanks; and by that means the Temples of the immortal Gods, all over the City, were fill'd with a vast multitude, not only of men, but of Women too. The Senate being called again into the Senate-House, decreed, that supplications should be made five dayes together in all the Temples about the City, upon the score of L. Æmilius, the Consuls great and good success, and that Sacrifice should be made with the bigger sort of Victims. That the Ships, that stood ready, and were just fit for service upon the Tiber, should be taken up (to be sent into Macedonia, if the King could make any resistance) and put into the Docks: that the Seamen should have a years pay given them, and be dismiss'd, and with them all, that had sworn to be true to the Consul; as also, that all the Souldiers at Corcyra, Brundisium, upon the upper Sea, or in the Larinian Territories (for in all those places there had been Forces posted, with whom, if occasion had been, C. Licinius was to have assisted his Colleague) should be disbanded. The supplication was appointed in the Assembly of the people to begin upon the tenth of October, and with that day to continue five dayes.

till

Two Embassadors, viz. C. Licinius Nerva, and P. Decius out of Illyricum came and brought word, That the Illyrian Army was slain; that their King, Gentius, was taken, and that he and all Illyricum were now at the disposal of the Romans. Upon the account of those performances, under the Conduct and lucky success of L. Æmilius the Praetor, the Senate decreed a supplication for three days; as the Latine Holy-Days were appointed by the Consul, to be celebrated on the three days immediately preceding the Ides [i. e. the 13th] of November. Some say, That the Rhodian Embassadors, being not as yet dismiss'd, after the news of the Victory, were called into the Senate, to be jeered and laugh'd at for their foolish pride: and that there, Agisipolis, the chief of them spoke to this purpose, laying, That they were sent Embassadors from the Rhodians, to make Peace between the Romans and Perseus; seeing that War was grievous and incommodious to all Greece in general, yea a charge and a damage even to the Romans themselves. That Fortune had done very well in that, the War being ended by other means, she had given them an opportunity of congratulating with the Romans upon the score of so great a Victory. Thus said the Rhodian, to which the Senate reply'd, That the Rhodians sent that Embassy, not out of any care they took of the advantages of Greece, or any respect to the charges which the Roman People had been at, but on the behalf of Perseus. For if that had been their care, which they pretended, they ought then to have sent Embassadors, when Perseus, having brought an Army into Thessaly, besieged the Grecian Cities, some of them for two years together, and frighted the rest by threatening to make War against them. That then there was no mention made by the Rhodians of a Peace: but when they heard that the Romans, having pass'd the Streights, were got over into Macedonia, and that Perseus was within their reach, that then the Rhodians sent their Embassy, for no other reason, but to deliver Perseus out of imminent danger. That with this Answer the Embassadors were dismiss'd.

At the same time M. Marcellus, departing out of the Province of Spain, after he had taken the famous City of Marcolica, brought back into the Treasury ten pound weight of Gold, and of Silver, in Sesterces, a Million. In the mean time P. Æmilius, the Consul, being Encamped (as I told you before) at Sire in Odomantica, received a Letter from King Perseus, by the hands of three Embassadors, who were but ordinary men; upon the receipt of which he is said to have wept, to think of the frailty of mankind: that he, who, a little before, was not content with the Kingdom of Macedonia, but attacked the Dardans and Illyrians, calling in Auxiliaries from the Bastarnæ, should now, since he had lost his Army, be banish'd his Kingdom, forced into a small Island, and like a suppliant, be protected by the religious respect, born to a Temple only, and not by his own strength. But when he read these words, King Perseus to Consul Paulus sendeth greeting; his compassion was all taken off by the folly of the King, who understood not his own circumstances. Wherefore though in the other part of the Letter, the intreaties of Perseus were such as did in no wise become a King, yet that Embassy was dismiss'd without any Letter, or Answer. Perseus thereupon grew sensible, what title he, a conquer'd Prince, ought to have left out; and therefore sent another Letter, with the title of a private person; in which he desired and obtained, that certain persons might be sent to him, for him to discourse with, concerning the state and condition of his present Fortune. There were three Embassadors sent, whose names were P. Lentulus, A. Posthumus Albinus, and A. Antonius: but nothing was concluded of in that Embassy, since Perseus was resolved to retain the Name of King, and Paulus was very earnest, to have him commit himself and all that he had to the protection and mercy of the Roman People.

cluded

V. Whilst these things were transacted, Cn. Octavius with his Fleet arrived at Samothrace; who endeavouring, besides the present fright which he put him into, sometimes with threats, and sometimes with hopes to persuade him, that he would deliver himself up, was assisted in his undertaking, whether by accident or design [is not well known.] For L. Atilius, a noble youth, observing, that the Samothracians were at a publick Assembly, desired of the Magistrates, that they would permit him to speak some few words to the people. Which being permitted, he ask'd them; Have we, my good Friends of Samothrace, or truly or falsely been told, that this holy Island is all a sacred and inviolable soil? Whereupon when all the Company agreed to the acknowledg'd sanctity of the place; he demanded farther; Why then (said he) hath a murderer polluted it with the blood of King Eumenes? And since every Preface [or the solemn words] before the performance of holy rites, forbids all those, who have not pure hands, to come into the sacred place, where such religious duties are perform'd, will you suffer your Temples to be profaned with the bloody body of a Villain? Now there was a common report about all the Cities of Greece, that Evander almost kill'd King Eumenes at Delphi. Wherefore, besides that they saw themselves and the whole Island, together with the Temple in the power of the Romans, supposing, that these things were not objected against them without cause, sent Theondas, who was the chief Magistrate among them (by them stiled Rex, i. e. King) to Perseus, to tell him, That Evander the Cretan was accused of murder: and that they had old Laws, which they received by tradition from their Ancestors, concerning those, that were said to bring polluted hands within the sacred limits of their Temples. If Evander were confident of his own innocency, that he should come and make his defence: but if he durst not venture a Tryal, that he should at least no longer defile the Temple, but consult his own safety. Perseus, calling forth Evander told him, He would not by any means advise him to submit to a tryal, for he could not come off, either upon the very case it self, or by any favour he would meet with. Besides, that he was also afraid, lest if Evander were condemned, he would detect him for the author of so horrid an action. Wherefore what had he to do, but bravely to die? Evander openly refused nothing, that he proposed; but, saying, that he had rather die by poison, than by the Sword, privately contrived his escape. Which when the King heard; he, fearing, lest the anger of the Samothracians might be turn'd all against him, as though the guilty person had been by him convey'd from Justice, caused Evander to be kill'd. Which rash murder being committed, it came immediately into his mind, that he had taken that stain upon himself, which had been Evander's: for Evander had wounded King Eumenes at Delphi, and he himself had kill'd Evander at Samothrace: so that two the most sacred Temples in the World were by his instigation polluted with humane blood. But this crime was so far palliated by his bribing Theondas, that he carry'd word back to the People, that Evander kill'd himself.

VI. But by this base act, against the only Friend, which he had left; whom he himself had tried upon so many occasions, and betray'd, because he would not be a Traytor, he so far alienated the affections of all people, that every body revolted to the Romans; and forced him, who was left almost alone, to consult, how to make his escape: and therefore he sent for Oroandes, a Cretan, who knew the Coast of Thrace, because he had traded there as a Merchant, to put him on board a Bark and carry him to Cotys. There is a Port at a certain Cape belonging to Samothrace; where the Bark stood. To which place, about Sun-setting, they carry'd down all things that were necessary; and money too, as much as they could privately convey. The King himself, at midnight, with three others, that knew of his flight, went out at the back Door of the House, where he lay, into a Garden, near his Bed-Chamber, and from thence, getting with much ado over a stone Wall, came to the Sea-side. Oroandes at that very time, when the money was coming down, which was the edge of night, had set Sail, and was going for Crete. Wherefore, since he found not the Ship in the Port, Perseus, having wander'd for some time upon the shore, at last, fearing the light, which now approach'd, and not daring to return to his Lodging, lay in one side of the Temple, near an obscure Corner thereof. The Children of Noblemen among the Macedonians, who were chosen to attend upon the King, were called Pueri Regii, [the Kings Attendants.] Now that Retinuc follow'd the King in his flight, nor did they even then forsake him, till by order from Cn. Octavius, the Cryer made Proclamation, that the Kings Servants, and all other Macedonians, that were in Samothrace, if they would come over to the Romans, should save their Lives, Liberties and Estates, which they either had with them there, or had left in Macedonia. Upon which Declaration they all came over, and gave in their names to C. Postumius, Tribune of the Souldiers. Ion also of Thessalonica, deliver'd up to Cn. Octavius the Kings small Children; nor was there ever an one of them left with the King, except Philip only, who was the eldest of his Sons. Then he surrender'd himself and his Son to Octavius, accusing fortune and the Gods, in whose Temple they were, for not assisting one, that pray'd to them for it, with any aid. Whereupon he was order'd to be put into the Admirals Ship; whereinto the money, which remained, was also carry'd; and so the Fleet Fleet set Sail immediately for Amphipolis. And thence Octavius sent the King into the Camp, to the Consul, having sent a Letter before-hand, so let him know, that he had him in his custody, and was a bringing him thither to him.

Paulus supposing that to be, as it really was, an happy Victory, kill'd several Victims VII. upon the news of it, and having called a Council, in which he read the Prators Letter, sent Q. Ailius Tubero to meet the King; commanding the rest to stay in a full body at his Tent. There never was such a multitude of people at any show [as came to see this sight.] King Syphax indeed, in the memory of our Fathers, had been taken and brought into the Roman Camp; who, besides that he was not to be compared with Perseus, either upon the score of his own Fame, or that of his Country, was then also no more than an addition to the Punick, as Gentius, of the Macedonian War. But Perseus was the head and first mover of a War, nor did the renown of his Father and Grand-Father only, whose Descendant he was, render him conspicuous; but Philip also, and Great Alexander shone brightly forth, who had made the Macedonian Empire the chiefest in the whole World. Perseus came into the Camp in a mourning Garb, without any body else to Accompany him, and make him more miserable by being in the same sad condition. He could not go forward to be seen for the crowd of those that came to meet him, till the Consul had sent the Lictors, to remove the people and make a Lane to the Generals Tent. The Consul rose from his Seat, and bidding the rest sit down, went a little forward, and when the King came in, gave him his right hand; took him up when he threw himself at his Feet; and suffer'd him not to touch his Knees; but having brought him into the Tent, order'd him to sit down over against the Officers whom he had called to Council.

The first question that he ask'd him, was, what injury provoked him to undertake a War VIII. with so much malice against the Romans; whereby to bring both himself and his Kingdom into extreme danger. To which when all people expected his Answer, he only lookt upon the ground, and for a long time in silence wept: which made the Consul say to him again: If you had been young, when you came to the Crown, I should have the less admired that you were ignorant, how great a Friend or Enemy the Roman People were. But now, since you were not only engaged in the War, which your Father waged with us, but likewise remember the Peace after that, which we observed with the greatest fidelity and integrity toward him: what was your meaning to desire a War rather than Peace, with those, whose Force he had tried in War, and their fidelity in time of Peace? To which he being neither ask'd nor accused, reply'd, and then the Consul said, But notwithstanding these things, whether they have happen'd through humane frailty, chance or necessity, have a good heart: the Clemency of the Roman People which hath been experienced by many Kings and States, affords thee, not only hopes, but almost certain assurance of safety. This he said in Greek to Perseus, and afterwards in Latin to his own men: You see, said he, a notable Example of the vicissitude of humane affairs. I speak most especially to you, young men! It is therefore the best way not to carry on any proud or violent designs against any man in prosperity, nor to trust to our present condition; since 'tis uncertain, what an Evening may bring forth. He will prove himself a Man, whose mind is neither puff'd up by prosperity, nor broken, or dejected by adversity. After that dismissing the Council he committed the King to the Custody of Q. Ailius. That day Perseus was not only invited to the Consuls [Tent] to Supper, but also all other honours were paid him, that he was capable of in that condition.

IX. Then the Army was dismiss'd into their Winter-Quarters; of whom Amphipolis received the greatest part, and the neighbouring Cities the rest. Now this was the end of the War between the Romans and Perseus, after they had continu'd in Arms for four years together: as it was also the ruine of a Kingdom, that was renowned through most part of Europe, and all Asia. They reckon'd Perseus the twentieth from Curanus, who was their first King. Perseus received the Kingdom, when Q. Fulvius and L. Manlius were Consuls: was called King by the Senate, when M. Junius, and A. Manlius were Consuls; and reigned eleven years. The Fame of the Macedonians was very obscure till the time of Philip, Son of Amintas: yea, though in his time it began to encrease, yet it contain'd it self within the bounds of Europe, taking in all Greece, with part of Thrace and Illyricum. After that it diffus'd it self over into Asia; and in those thirteen years, that Alexander reign'd, it first reduced all those parts, to which the Persian Empire with its almost immense limits had extended: till at last it over-ran Arabia and India, even to the red Sea. At that time the Macedonian Empire and Name was the greatest in the World: but afterward was distracted and divided into many petit Kingdoms, whilst every one took by force what he could rap or rend for himself: so that from the highest pitch of its glory to its utter dissolution, it was a hundred and fifty years.

X. When the news of the Roman Victory was come into Asia, Antenor, who was with the Fleet of Barks at Phame, cross'd over thence to Cassandria. C. Popilius, who, at Delus, was Convoy to the Ships, that were bound for Macedonia, when he heard that the War in Macedonia was made an end of, and that the Enemies Fleet was removed from their station, himself also dismiss'd his Attick Ships, and went on for Egypt, to perform the Embassy which he had undertaken: that he might meet Antiochus, before he came to the Walls of Alexandria. As the Embassadors pass'd by Asia, and came to Loryma (which Port is somewhat somewhat more than twenty Miles from Rhodes, exactly opposite to that City) the Nobility of the Rhodians met them (for by this time the news was brought even thither also) delirious, That they would touch at Rhodes. For it concern'd the fame and the well-being of that City, that they should know all things, that either had been, or were then transacted at Rhodes; and that they should carry back an account to Rome of what they themselves found to be true, and not what they had receiv'd by common report only. The Embassadors a great while refused to do it, but at last they perswaded them, to make a little stay in their Voyage for the sake of a City, that was their Ally. When they came to Rhodes, they got them by the same intreaties to come into their publick Assembly. But the arrival of the Embassadors rather increas'd than diminished the Cities fear: for Popilius recounted all things, which every particular person, and all of them together, had hostilely said and done in that War; and, being a man of a rough disposition, enhanced the hainousness of those things, that were spoken of, by a stern look and an acculing tone: insomuch that though he had no private quarrel himself with the City, they might guess by the bitterness of one Roman Senator, how the whole Senate stood affected toward them. C. Decimius's Speech was more moderate, who, as to many of those things, that Popilius spoke to, said, the blame did not lie upon the people, but at the Doors of some few persons only, that instigated the rabble: that they, having tongues which were to be purchased for money, had made Decrees full of flattery to the King; and had sent such Embassies, as the Rhodians should always not only be ashamed, but repent of. All which things, if the people had power, would return upon the heads of those that were guilty of them. He therefore was heard with great applause, not because he lessen'd, and took off the blame from the multitude, more than that he laid the fault upon the right Authors. Wherefore when their great men answer'd the Romans, their Speeches were not by any means so grateful, who endeavour'd one way or other to solve those objections, which Popilius had made, as theirs, who assented to Decimius in his design of making the Authors suffer for their crimes. Thereupon it was presently decreed, that all those, who had said or done any thing in behalf of Perseus against the Romans, should be put to death. But, a little before the Romans came thither some persons went out of the City, and others kill'd themselves. The Embassadors, having staid at Rhodes but five dayes, went away for Alexandria. But for all that the judicial proceedings upon the Decree, that was made in their presence, went on never the slower; which perseverance in the Execution of that Law was the effect of Decimius's mildness and moderation.

XI. Whilst these things were transacted, Antiochus having in vain attempted the Walls of Alexandria was gone away, and having gotten possession of the rest of Egypt, left the elder Ptolemy at Memphis, for whom he pretended he would have gain'd the Kingdom by his own strength (only that he might attack him that got the better on't) and led his Army thence into Syria. Nor was Ptolemy ignorant of this his design; and therefore supposing, that, whilst his younger Brother was frighted by the fear of a Siege, he might be entertain'd at Alexandria by the assistance of his Sister, and the indifferency of his Brothers Friends together, ceased not to send, first to his Sister, and then to his Brother and his Friends, before he had made a Peace with them. Now that which had made Antiochus suspected was, that he, having all the rest of Egypt surrender'd to him, had left a strong Guard at Pelusium: for it appeared, that he was Master of the inlets into Egypt, so that, whenever he pleased, he could bring his Army again into it. And that such would be the issue of Ptolemy's intestine War with his Brother, that the Conquerour, being tired with fighting, would in no wise be equal, or hard enough for Antiochus. Now these things being prudently consider'd of by the elder, the younger Brother, and those of his Party, very willingly receiv'd: and his Sister assisted very much in the affair, not only by her advice, but by her intreaties also. Wherefore by their general consent, a Peace was concluded, and Alexandria retaken; nor were the very rabble against it, who, not only in the War, whilst the Siege lasted, but also after it was raised (since nothing was brought in for their relief out of Egypt) were extremely straitned for want of all kinds of provisions. Now though it were fit for Antiochus to have rejoiced at this, if he had brought his Army into Egypt, to restore him (as he speciously pretended by the Embassies that he received, and the Letters that he sent to all the Cities of Greece and Asia) yet he was so offended, that he prepared for a War with much more eagerness and malice against them both, than he had done formerly against the one. For he sent his Navy immediately to Cyprus: and himself, at the beginning of the Spring, intending for Egypt, went into Cœle Syria. About Rhinocolura he met Ptolemy's Embassadors, who giving him thanks, for that by his means their Master had recover'd his Fathers Kingdom, and desiring, that he would act like himself, and rather tell them, what he would have done, than, growing an Enemy instead of an Ally, do all by force of arms, he answered and said, that he would not either recal his Fleet, nor carry back his Army, unless Ptolemy would resign to him all Cyprus, and Pelusium, with the Country that lay about the Pelusian mouth of Nile: and withal prefix'd a day, between which, and that time, he would have an answer concerning the performance of those conditions.

XII. When the day, given for the Truce, was pass'd; whilst the Admirals and other Officers of the Syrian Fleet sailed through the mouth of Nile to Pelusium, Antiochus himself had led his his Land Forces through the deserts of Arabia into Egypt, where having received all those that dwelt between the Nile and the Arabian Gulf as far as Memphis, by surrender, together with the other Egyptians, that inhabited near the farther Bank of Nile, and the several arms of it, partly on their own accord, and partly for fear, he march'd down by small Journeys to Alexandria. At Leusine, when he was got over the River (which place is four miles from Alexandria) the Roman Embassadors met him. Whom when he, upon their first coming, had saluted, and held forth to Popilius his right hand, Popilius deliver'd unto him a Letter, and bad him, read that the first thing he did. Which when he had read over, and said, that he would consider and advise with his Friends, what he should do; Popilius, according to his usual roughness and resolution, with a rod, that he had in his hand, made a Circle about the King, and said, Before thou goest out of this Circle, give the Senate an Answer for me to carry back. The King being amazed at so violent a command, after he had paused a while, said, Well then, I'll do what the Senate thinks fit. With that Popilius held forth his right hand to the King, as to a Friend and Ally. After which, when Antiochus was gone, within a time prefix'd, out of Egypt, the Embassadors (having confirm'd, by their authority also, the concord between the two Brothers, who had yet scarce agreed upon a Peace) sailed to Cyprus: and from thence dismiss'd Antiochus's Fleet, which had now defeated the Egyptian Ships in a Sea-fight. That Embassy was very much talk'd of about all those Nations, in that thereby Egypt was undoubtedly taken away from Antiochus, who was now in possession of it, and their Fathers Kingdom restored to the race of Ptolemy. Now as the Consulship of one of the Consuls that year was renowned for a signal Victory, so the fame of the other was as obscure; because he had no opportunity of doing any considerable exploit. When at this time, first of all, he appointed a day for the Legions to Rendezvous, he did not enter the Temple with due Ceremony; and therefore the augurs, when it was referr'd to them, gave their opinions, that the day was ill appointed. When he went into Gaul he encamp'd near the Plains called Campi Macri near the Mountains Sicinina and Papirus: and after that Winter'd about the same places with the Latine Allies. The Roman Legions, because the day for the Rendezvous of the Army was not rightly appointed, staid at Rome: and the Prætors, all, except C. Papirius Carbo, who happen'd to have Sardinia; went to their several Provinces. For the Senate thought good that he should act as a Judge (for that likewise fell to his Lot) between Citizens and Foreigners at Rome.

As soon as Popilius and that Embassy, which was sent to Antiochus, return'd to Rome; they brought word, that the Controversies between the Kings were decided, and that Antiochus's Army was carry'd back out of Egypt into Syria. Afterward, there came Embassadors from those Kings: Embassadors from Antiochus, who said, that that Peace which the Senate had order'd him to make, was more grateful to their King, than any Victory whatever; and that he obey'd the commands of the Roman Embassadors, as though they had been the orders of the Gods. Then they congratulated the Victory, to which the King, if they had laid their commands upon him, would have contributed as much as in him lay. Ptolemy's Embassadors gave the Senate thanks in the name of the King and Cleopatra too, and said, That they owed more to the Senate and people of Rome, than to their Parents; yea more, than to the immortal Gods: in that, by them they had been deliver'd from a most miserable Siege, and recover'd their Fathers Kingdom, which they had almost lost. To which the Senate reply'd; That Antiochus had done well and as he ought to do, in obeying the Embassadors; and that his so doing was very grateful to the Senate and people of Rome. That, if any good or advantage had accrue'd to the Sovereigns of Egypt, Ptolemy and Cleopatra, by their means, the Senate was extremely glad of it; and would endeavour, to make them think, that the greatest security of their Kingdom should be always plac'd in the protection and honour of the Roman People. C. Papirius the Prætor had Orders to send the Embassadors Presents according to custom. After that there was a Letter brought out of Macedonia, which doubled their joy for that Victory; giving them to understand, That King Perseus was in the Consuls custody. When the Egyptian Embassadors were dismiss'd, there was a Debate between the Pisan and the Lunian Embassadors; the Pisans complaining, that they were driven out of their possessions by the Roman Colony; whilst the Lunians affirm'd, that that Land, for which they contended, was assign'd by the Triumviri to them. The Senate therefore sent five persons, viz. Q. Fabius Buteo, P. Cornelius Blasio, T. Sempronius Musca, L. Nevius Balbus, and C. Apuleius Saturninus, to inquire into and determine the case concerning their bounds. There came also one common Embassy from the three Brothers, Eumenes, Attalus, and Athenaus, to congratulate with them upon the score of their Victory. L. Manlius the Questor at the same time was sent with money to meet Magabaz, Son to King Massinissa, who was landed at Puteoli, and to bring him to Rome at the publick charge. As soon as he came thither he had admision into the Senate: where he, though an youth, spoke in such a manner, as that, what was in it self very grateful, he made by his words much more acceptable. He recounted how many Foot and Horse, how many Elephants, and how much Corn his Father had sent in the space of those four years into Macedonia: but said, That two things he was ashamed of; the one, that the Senate had by their Embassadors desired, and not commanded such things from him as were necessary for the War; and the other, that they had sent him money for his Corn. That Massinissa remembered, how his Kingdom was gain'd, increased, and multiplied by the Roman People: and that he was content to have the use of that Kingdom, as knowing, that the Dominion and right of it belongs to them that gave it him. Wherefore it was just that they should take what they thought good, without asking him, or giving money for those things that are the product of a Country which they themselves bestow'd upon him. That what the Romans left was and would be enough for Massinissa. That he came from his Father with that Message; but that, a while after, certain Horsemen overtook him, who told him that Macedonia was conquer'd, and bid him, after he had congratulated with the Senate, tell them, that his Father was so transported with joy to hear that news, that he would come to Rome, and Sacrifice, and pay his thanks to Jupiter Optimus Maximus [i.e. Jupiter, the Good and Great,] in the Capitol; which, if it were no offence, he desired the Senate would permit him to do.

XIII.

- XIV. The young Prince had this Answer; That his Father Massinissa did, what became a good and a grateful man, in adding a value and an esteem to a due kindness. That the Roman People were assisted by him in the Punick War with Courage and Fidelity, and that on the other hand he, by their assistance, gain'd his Kingdom: after which, through his own justice, he did all the offices of a Friend in the Wars against three Kings. But that it was no wonder, that such a King should rejoice at the Victory of the Roman People, who had mixt all the concerns of his fortune and Kingdom with the Roman affairs. That he should give the Gods thanks at home for the Roman Peoples Victory, and that his Son would do so for him at Rome. Moreover, that he had congratulated them sufficiently both in his own and his Fathers name. But that Massinissa should leave his Kingdom, and go out of Africa (besides that it would be an inconvenience to him) the Senate thought would not be for the advantage of the Roman People. Then Masgaba desiring, that Hanno, Son of Hamilcar, might be sent by the Carthaginians as an Hostage, in the stead of another [whose name is unknown]; the Senate made Answer, that it was not reasonable for the Roman Senate to require Hostages of the Carthaginians at the pleasure of Massinissa. The Quæstor was order'd by an Act of Senate, to buy Presents for the young Prince to the value of a hundred pounds of Silver, and attend him to Puteoli; as also, to defray all his charges, as long as he was in Italy; and to hire two Ships, in which he and his retinue might be carry'd into Africa; besides, that to all his Attendants, whether Freemen, or Slaves, there were Cloths given. Not long after, there was a Letter brought, concerning another Son of Massinissa; That he was sent by L. Paulus, after he had overcome Perseus, into Africa, with his Horsemen; but that whilst he was sailing through the Adriatick Sea, his Fleet was dispers'd, and he, with three Ships, brought sick to Brundisium. L. Scertinius, the Quæstor, was sent to him at Brundisium, with the same Presents, which, at Rome, were made to his Brother: and order'd to take care that an House

- XV. The Libertini [those whose Fathers had formerly been Slaves] were ranged into four City Tribes, all except those, that had a Son, by approbation of the Senate, above five years old. Them they order'd to be poled, where the last survey before they had been poled: and made it lawful to pole all those who had a Farm, or Farms in the Country of above thirty thousand Sesterces. Which being thus provided, Claudius said, the Censor could not take any single mans vote from him with the peoples consent, much less from a whole rank. For though he might turn him out of any particular Tribe, which was nothing else, but to make him change his Tribe, yet he could not therefore put him out of all the thirty five Tribes: that is to say, he could not take from him his freedom; and exclude him from the number of Citizens without saying where he should be poled. These things were debated between them; till at last they came to this point, that of four City Tribes, they should chose one openly in the Court of Liberty, into which they would gather all those, that had been Slaves. It happen'd to be the Esquiline Tribe, that was chosen: and therefore in that Tib. Gracchus declar'd all the Libertini should be poled. That business was a great honour to the Censors in the Senate; who not only gave Sempronius thanks, for persevering in his good undertaking, but Claudius also, who had not withstood it. There were more turn'd out of the Senate, and commanded to sell their Horses, than had been in former times: besides, that all the same persons were by both Censors put out of their Tribes and disfranchis'd: nor did any man, whom the one of them censur'd, pass unmaligned by the other. When they desired, that they might be continu'd in their office for an year and two months longer to see, that the publick buildings were in good repair, and to approve of those works which they had agreed for: Cn. Trenellius, a Tribune, because he was not chosen into the Senate, withstood it. That same year C. Cicereius dedicated a Temple in the Alban Mount, five years after he had vow'd it. L. Postumius Albinus was that year inaugurated as Flamen Martialis [i.e. Mars's Chief Priest.]

- XVI. When Q. A'ius and M. Junius the Consuls made report concerning the Provinces, the Senate thought fit, that Spain should again be made two Provinces, which in the time of the Macedonian War had been but one: and that L. Paulus and L. Anicius (the same persons) should keep Macedonia and Illyricum, till they had compos'd the disturbances which had been made in the War, and reduced the other affairs of that Kingdom to a better state, according cording to the opinion of their Embassadors. The Consuls had Pisa and Gaule decreed them, with two Legions of Foot, and four hundred Horse. The Prætors happen'd to have, Q. Cassius the City, and M. Juvencius Thalna the jurisdiction among Foreigners; Tib. Claudius Nero, Sicily, Cn. Fulvius the hither Spain, and C. Licinius Nerva the farther. A. Manlius Torquatus had Sardinia; but could not go into his Province, being detain'd by order of Senate, to hear Capital Causes. After this the Senate fate concerning several Prodigies, that were told of. The Temple of the Dii Penates [Household Gods] in Velia was burnt by Lightning, and in the Town of Minervium the two Gates, with some part of the Wall. At Anagnia it had rained Earth; and at Lanuvium there was a flame like a Torch seen in the Heavens. And at Calatia, in a publick ground, M. Valerius, a Roman Citizen brought word, that blood flowed from his Fire-hearth three days, and two nights. Upon that account chiefly, the Decemviri, being order'd to consult their Books, ordain'd a publick supplication for one day: and sacrificed fifty Goats in the Market-place. But for the other Prodigies also there was a supplication another day through all the Temples, the greater sort of Victims slain, and the City purified. After that, in honour to the immortal Gods, the Senate decreed, that, since their two greatest Enemies, Perseus, and Gentius were now overcome, and in the hands of the Roman People, together with their Countries, Macedonia and Illyricum, look what offerings were made, when Ap. Claudius and M. Sempronius were Consuls, for the Victory over King Antiochus, in all Temples, Q. Cassius and M. Juvencius should take care to have the like then made.

Then they chose Embassadors, according to whose judgment the two Generals L. Paulus and L. Anicius should compose their business; ten to go into Macedonia, and five into Illyricum. The persons named for Macedonia were A. Postumius Luscus, and C. Claudius, both Censors Fellows; C. Licinius Crassus, Colleague to Paulus in his Consulship, who at that time, being continu'd in Commission, had the Province of Gaul. To these Consular men they added Cn. Domitius Enobarbus, Ser. Cornelius Sulla, L. Junius, C. Antistius Labeo, T. Numisius of Turquinii, and A. Terentius Varro. And for Illyricum were named these that follow; viz. P. Aelius Ligus, a Consuls Fellow, C. Cicereius, Cn. Babius Tamphilus (he had been Prætor the year before, and Cicereius many years ago) P. Terentius Tusciveicanus, and P. Manlius. After which the Consuls were admonish'd by the Senate, that, since it was necessary for one of them to succeed C. Licinius, (who had been nominated for an Embassador) in Gaul, they should either agree between themselves concerning their Provinces, or call Lots for them as soon as possible: and accordingly they cast Lots. M. Junius happen'd to have Pisa (but before he went into his Province was order'd to introduce the Embassies, which came from all parts to Rome, with Congratulations [upon the score of their Victory], into the Senate) and Q. Aelius Gaul. But though such men were sent, from whose prudence they might well hope, that the Generals would do nothing misbecoming either the clemency or gravity of the Roman People, yet the main points of their Counsels were debated in the Senate also, that the Embassadors might carry all things, already begun at least from home to the Generals.

First of all, they order'd, that the Macedonians and Illyrians should be free: that all Nations might see, that the Arms of the Roman People brought not servitude upon those that were Freemen, but freedom to those that were Slaves. And also that those Nations which were already free, might know, that their liberty was secure, and would be perpetual under the Tutelage of the Roman People: and that those, who lived under Kings, might be sensible, that they were not only at present more mild and just to them, but also, if their Kings ever happen'd to wage War with the Roman People, they might believe that the issue thereof would bring Victory to the Romans, and to themselves liberty. They also thought fit to take off the Tax upon the Macedonian Metals, which was a vast Revenue, and the letting out of Country Farms. For as they could not be kept up without Publicans [those that gather'd the publick Revenues] so where the Publicans were concern'd, there either the Law was evacuated, or their Allies quite lost their liberties. Yea, that the Macedonians themselves could not exercise any such thing. For where there was such a booty among so many Officers, there would never be wanting the causes of strife and sedition. That there should not be one common Council of the whole Nation, lest the wicked vulgar might convert that liberty, which the Senate sometimes granted to wholesome moderation, into a pestilent licence. Wherefore they thought fit, that Macedonia should be divided into four Regions; so as that each might have its peculiar Council; and pay half of that Tribute, which they used to pay to the Kings, to the Roman People. The like Orders were sent into Illyricum: the rest being left to the Generals and Embassadors themselves; in which the present occasion, when they were upon the place, was likely to suggest unto them better measures.

Among the many Embassies from Kings, Nations, and States, Attalus, Brother to King Eumenes, turn'd the Eyes and thoughts of all people most upon him: for he was receiv'd and entertain'd by them, who had serv'd with him at the same time in that War, with far greater splendour than if King Eumenes himself had come in person. There were two specious pretences that brought him thither: the one, a Congratulation for that Victory, to which he himself had contributed: and the other, a complaint of a Gallick Tumult, viz. That by the Arms of Adverta [a petit King of the Gauls] their Kingdom was brought into jeopardy.

XIX.

jeopardy. He had also some private hopes of some advantages and rewards from the Senate, which with safety to his Piety [towards his Brother Eumenes] he could scarce obtain. For there were some of the Romans also, who, by their ill counsel and false suggestions, with hopes increased his desire: saying, that at Rome the general opinion concerning Attalus and Eumenes was such, as though the one were a true Friend to the Romans, and the other a faithful Ally neither to the Romans nor to Perseus. Wherefore they could hardly tell, whether what he should desire for himself, or against his Brother, were easier to be obtained of the Senate; so much they were all inclined to give him, and deny his Brother whatever he requested. Now Attalus (as it prov'd) was one of those men, who coveted all that hope had promised them [and had done so in this case] had not the prudent admonition of one Friend put (as it were) a Bridle upon his ambition, which in his prosperity was too luxuriant and unruly. For there was with him one Stratius, a Physician, who was sent by Eumenes on purpose to Rome, as a spy upon his Brothers actions, and faithfully to admonish him if he saw that he departed from his Fidelity, and Allegiance. Who coming to him, though his Ears were already possessed, and his mind under temptation, attack'd him with seasonable discourse, and made all well again, by saying, that other Kingdoms grew great by several means. But that their Kingdom being new, and founded upon no ancient bottom, depended merely upon their fraternal [or Brotherly] Concord: in that one only bore the name of King, and wore the Crown, but all the Brothers reign'd. But as for Attalus, since he was next in Age, who did not look upon him as a King? and not only for this reason, because they see him so great at present, but also, because there was no doubt, but he would e'r long come to be King, since Eumenes was so infirm and old, besides, that he had no Children (for he had not as yet acknowledg'd him, who afterward was King.) What reason therefore had he to employ force for a thing, that would e'r long be his of course? That there was also a new Tempest rais'd in the Kingdom by the Gallick tumult, which could hardly be withstood, and over power'd even by the consent and concord of their whole Family. But if to a foreign War they added a domestick Sedition, it was impossible to make any resistance: nor would he thereby do anything else but, lest his Brother should die a King, rob himself of the certain hopes of succeeding in the Throne. If it were a glorious thing, both to preserve his Brothers Kingdom, and take it from him; yet it was the more commendable of the two to preserve it, that being the effect of natural piety and affection. But indeed, since the other action was detestable, and next to Parricide, what room was there for doubt or deliberation? For, would he have part of the Kingdom, or take away all? if part, they would be both weak, when their strength was divided, and obnoxious to all injuries: if the whole, would he have his elder Brother then live a private life, or in banishment, at that Age, with that infirmity of Body, or, in fine, command him to die? Perseus's Exit indeed (that I may say nothing concerning the end of impious Brothers, deliver'd to us in Fables) seem'd very egregious, who laid down that Diadem, which he got by his Brothers Death, in the Temple at Samothrace, all prostrate at the Feet of a conquering Enemy, as though the Gods that were there present had requir'd satisfaction for his crimes. That those very men, who, not out of Friendship to him, but hatred to Eumenes, incited him to such things, would commend his Piety and Constancy, if he to the last preserv'd his Allegiance to his Brother.

XX.

This advice prevail'd most with Attalus. Wherefore when he was brought into the Senate (after he had congratulated their Victory) he discours'd of his own merits in that War, together with those of his Brother, if any such there were, telling them also of the revolt of the Gauls, which had been lately made with a great insurrection. Then he desired, that they would send Embassadors to them, by whose authority they might be aw'd so far as to lay down their Arms. Having deliver'd this Message for the advantage of the Kingdom, he desired, that he himself might have Aenus and Maronea: by which having disappointed their hopes, who thought he would accuse his Brother, and desire a division of the Kingdom, he went out of the Senate-House. There hardly ever was any man, either King or private person, who was heard with so much favour, and so general an assent of all parties: and accordingly they not only bestow'd upon him all honours and presents whilst he was at Rome, but likewise attended him in his Journey too. Among many other Embassies from Greece and Asia, the Rhodian Embassadors put the City into the greatest admiration. For whereas at first they appeared in a white Garb, as became persons that came to congratulate [a Victory,] (and if they had had fordid Cloths, they might have seem'd to have lamented the misfortune of Perseus) after the Senate, being consulted by M. Junius the Consul, whether they would give the usual respects and entertainment to those Embassadors, who then stood in the Comitium [a Court for publick Assemblies,] declared, that no rights of hospitality were to be observ'd with such people; the Consul going out of the Court (when the Rhodians, saying, that they came to congratulate their Victory, and to acquit their City of the crimes charg'd against them, desired that they might have admission into the Senate) declared, that the Romans us'd not only to be very courteous and hospitable to those that were their Allies and Friends, but also to admit them into the Senate; but that the Rhodians had not deserv'd so well in that War, as to be reckon'd in the number of Friends and Allies. When they heard this, they all fell flat upon the ground, desiring of the Consul, and all that were present, that they would not think it reasonable, that their new and false accusations should be more disadvantageous to the Rhodians, than their ancient merits, of which they themselves were Witnesses [might be a benefit to them.] And thereupon they presently put on fordid Garments, and went about to all the Noblemens Houses, with Prayers and Tears, desiring them, that they would hear their cause before they condemn'd them.

[might]

Manius Juvencius Thalna, the Prætor, whose jurisdiction was between Citizens and Foreigners, incited the people against the Rhodians, and had promulgated a petitionary Bill; That a War might be declared against the Rhodians, and that they would chose out of the Magistrates of that year, one, to be sent with the Fleet, to serve in that War; hoping that he himself might be the man. But this was oppos'd by M. Antonius, and M. Pomponius, Tribunes of the people. But indeed as the Prætor had gone a wrong way to work, against all former precedents; in that he, without having first consulted the Senate, or inform'd the Consuls, merely on his own head propos'd the Question, Whether they would will and command, that a War should be proclaimed against the Rhodians; whereas in former times the Senate had been always consulted, after which it was refer'd to the people; so had the Tribunes of the people too, since it was the custom, that no man should oppose a Law, before private persons had leave to perswade or dissuade the passing of it. For by that means it often had happen'd, that they, who had not profess'd, that they would oppose it, having consider'd the inconvenience of such a Law, were induced by the reasons of those that spoke against, to oppose it: and also, that those who came to oppose it, many times desisted, as being over-born by the authorities of those who spoke for it. Thereupon the Prætor and the Tribunes vied, which of them should act most irregularly.

XXI.

"Whether we have done amiss, is yet a doubt; but yet we suffer all punishments and ignominies already. Formerly when the Carthaginians were conquer'd; Philip, and Antiochus defeated, and we came to Rome, where we walk'd from our publick Lodgings to the Senate-House to congratulate with you (grave Fathers!) we went out of the Senate-House into the Capitol, with offerings to their Gods: but now we come from a fordid Inn, where we are hardly entertain'd for our money (being commanded to stay, almost like Enemies, without the City) in this squalid condition into the Roman Senate-House, though we are those Rhodians on whom you so lately bestow'd the Provinces of Lycia and Caria, and conferr'd the most ample rewards and honours. You make the Macedonians and Illyrians free (as we have heard) though they were Slaves, before they made War against you, not that we envy any Bodies good Fortune, but rather acknowledge the Clemency of the Roman People) and will you make the Rhodians, who did nothing but lie still all the time of this War, your Enemies instead of Allies? No certainly, Romans! you are such persons, as pretend, that their Wars are therefore successful, because they are just, nor do you boast so much in the event of them, for having got the Victory, as in the beginning; that you do not undertake them without reason. The besieging of Messina in Sicily made the Carthaginians; his attacking of Athens, endeavouring to bring all Greece into slavery, and assisting Hannibal with men and money made Philip their Enemy. Antiochus himself, being sent for by the Aetolians, their Enemies, came freely out of Asia with a Fleet into Greece: where having made himself Master of Demetrias, Chalcis, and the Streights of Thermopylae, he endeavour'd to force you from the possessions of their Empire. His opposing of their Allies, together with his killing of several pet Kings and Princes of Nations or States, were the ground of their War with Perseus. But, pray, what pretext can our misfortune have, if we must perish? I do not yet distinguish the case of the City from that of Polyaratus and Dinon, our Fellow-Citizens, and those, whom we have now brought to deliver up to you. But though all of us, who are Rhodians, were equally guilty, yet what could we be charg'd with in this War? Did we favour Perseus's Party; and, as, in the War against Antiochus and Philip, we were for you against those Kings, so now, for the King, against you? Pray, ask C. Livius, and L. Amilius Regillus, who were the Admirals of their Fleet in Asia, how we use to assist our Allies, and how ready we are to undertake the toil of War. Your Ships never engaged without us. We fought with our Fleet, once at Samus, and again in Pamphylia against General Annibal: which Victory is therefore the more glorious to us, in that, though we, at Samus, had lost a great part of our Ships, in an unfortunate Battle, and the best of our youth, we were not yet daunted even with that great overthrow, but had the Courage again to meet the Kings Fleet, as they came out of Syria: These things I have related, not to boast; (for we are not at present in such prosperous circumstances) but to let them see, how the Rhodians use to assist their Allies.

XXIII.

"After the defeat of Philip and Antiochus, we received of you most ample rewards. If Perseus had had the same Fortune, as you, through the blessing of the Gods and their own valour, now have; and we had come into Macedonia, to the victorious King, to require rewards [for our service] what, pray, could we have said? That he was assist'd by us with Money or Corn? with Land, or Sea Forces? What Garison could we have pretended to have kept? Where could we have said we had fought, either under his Officers, and by our selves? If he should have ask'd us, where we had had any Souldiers, or so much as one Ship within his Garisons; what could we have answer'd? Perhaps we

A a a a a 2

"should

"should have made just such a defence before him, as we do before you. For this we have gotten by sending Embassadors to both Parties in order to Peace, that we have the good will of neither; yea are accused and in danger on the one side. Though Perseus indeed might truly object, what you (grave Fathers!) cannot; viz. that we, in the beginning of the War, sent Embassadors to you, to promise you all things necessary for the carrying on thereof: and that we would be ready upon all occasions with Naval Arms, and all our youth, as in the former Wars. Which that we did not perform was their fault, who, for what reason we know not, despised and slighted our aids. But yet for all that we did nothing, as Enemies, nor were we wanting in the duty of good Allies, but only were by you forbid to perform our promise. What then, Rhodians? Was there nothing either done or said in their City, against their wills, wherewithal the Roman People might be justly offended? I am not here at present going to defend all that was done: I am not so mad, but to distinguish the faults of private men from the publick case. For there is no City but hath sometimes ill Citizens, and always a giddy rabble. I have heard that there have been men even among you, who by flattering the mobile have committed many enormities; as also, that common people formerly separated themselves from you, during which time the manangement of the Commonwealth was not in their power. Now if this could happen in a City so well regulated as this is, can any man wonder, that there should be some particular persons among us, who, courting the Kings Friendship corrupted our commonalty with ill counsels? and yet they prevailed no farther, than only to make us stand Neuters, when we should have fought. I will not pass by that which is the greatest crime, that's laid to the charge of our City, in this War. We sent Embassadors about a Peace to you and Perseus both at the same time: which unhappy design a furious Orator (as we afterward heard) made the most foolish thing in the World; who, we are well inform'd, spoke like C. Popilius, whom you sent to remove the two Kings, Antiochus and Ptolemy from their War. But yet that pride or folly (whether you will call it) was the same before you and Perseus both. There are customs and manners belonging to whole Cities as well as to private and single persons; and Nations too are some of them angry, others bold, others fearful, and some more prone to Wine or Women. 'Tis said, the Athenians are quick, and daring, to attempt things above their strength: but that the Lacedaemonians are dilatory, and will scarce undertake what they are almost sure to go through with. I do not deny but that all Asia produces an emptier sort of wits, and must confess also, that our language is a little too haughty and swelling, because we seem, among our Neighbour Cities, to excel in that point; though that be not so much upon the score of our own strength, as of the honours and judgments, you have confer'd and pass'd upon us. That Embassy even at that present was sufficiently chastiz'd, in being dismiss'd with so sad an Answer from you. If a little ignominy at that time be the thing that sticks upon us, sure this so miserable and humble an Embassy might be a sufficient atonement for a far more insolent Embassy than that was. Pride, in words especially, angry men hate, and prudent men laugh at; especially if it be from an inferior to his superiour; but no body ever thought it deserv'd a capital punishment. For by that means it might have been fear'd, that the Rhodians would have contemned the Romans. For some men chide even the Gods themselves with passionate words, and yet we have not heard that any man was for that ever struck with a thunderbolt.

XXIV.

"What then remains for us to excuse, if we have not done any act of hostility, but that our Embassador with his swelling words hath only offended their Ears, and not deserv'd thereby to have his and our City utterly ruined? I hear, grave Fathers! that some of you set a fine, as it were, upon our inclinations privately, in your discourses among yourselves; saying, that we favour the King, and wish'd that he might get the Victory rather than you; and therefore they think that we ought to be persecuted with a War. But some of you say, that we indeed wish'd so, but that we ought not for all that to be plagued with a War: for that it is not so provided either by the Laws or Customs of any City, that when any man wisheth the death of an Enemy, he should presently be condemned to a capital punishment, though he have done nothing to deserve it. Now to those, who free us from the penalty, though not from the crime, we give our thanks; whilst we our selves impose upon our selves this condition, that if we were all consenting to what we are accused of, and do not distinguish the will from the deed, let us all suffer. But if some of our Nobility favour'd you, and others the King; I do not desire, that those who were on the Kings side should be saved for our sakes, who stood up for you; only this I beg, that we may not perish upon your account. You your selves are not greater Enemies to those men than the City it self is; and those that knew this, many of them either ran away, or kill'd themselves. Others of them, who are by us condemn'd, shall be (grave Fathers!) at your disposal. As for the rest of the Rhodians, as we have not deserv'd any manner of reward in this War, so neither have we merited any punishment. Let the heap of our former services make up our defect of duty at this time. You have for these late years made War against three Kings: let it not be a greater "greater damage to us, that we have lain idle in one War, than an advantage, that we fought for you in two. Suppose Philip, Antiochus and Perseus to be like three Votes or Sentences. Two of them absolve us, and the third doubtful; so that it cannot be more grave and just. If they should judge us, we should be condemned. But do you judge, grave Fathers! whether Rhodes be in being or utterly destroy'd. For you, grave Fathers! do not deliberate of a War, which you may raise indeed, but cannot carry on; since ne'r a man in Rhodes will bear Arms against you. But if you will persevere in your anger, we will desire time of you, to carry home this fatal message: all that are Freemen among us; all the Men and Women in Rhodes, with all our money, will take Shipping, and leaving our possessions both publick and private, will come to Rome; and having heaped all our gold and Silver, both private and publick in the Comitium at the Gate of your Senate House, will deliver our own Bodies with those of our Wives and Children into your disposal; here to suffer, whatever you think fit. Let our City be rifled and burnt when we are far out of sight. The Romans may think the Rhodians their Enemies; but yet we too can make some judgment upon our selves too, whereby we pronounce and declare, that we never were your Enemies; nor will we ever commit an act of hostility, whatever we endure.

As soon as he had made his Speech to this effect, they all fell down again, and waving branches of Olives in their hands, like Suppliants, were at last taken up, and went out of the Court. Then the Votes began to be taken. By which it appear'd that they were the greatest Enemies to the Rhodians, who, when they had been Consuls, Prators, or Lieutenants, had been concern'd in the Macedonian War. Their greatest Friend was M. Porcius Cato, who, though he were of a rough nature, at that time shew'd himself a mild and a gentle Senator. I shall not here insert the Character of that copious Man, by relating what he said; his own Oration is extant, in the fifth Book of his Origines. The Rhodians therefore had such an Answer; that they were neither made Enemies, nor continu'd to be Allies. Philocrates and Asymedes were the two principal Embassadors: [and so] they thought fit that one part of the Embassadors should go back to Rhodes, to give an account of their Embassy, and the other part stay at Rome with Asymedes, to inform themselves of what was done there, and send intelligence home. For the present they order'd them to draw off their Prefects out of Lycia and Caria. These things being told at Rhodes, though they were in themselves very dismal, yet since the fear of a greater misfortune was removed (for they were afraid of a War) the news was very joyfull. Wherefore they presently order'd a Crown to be made to the value of twenty thousand Nobles of gold; and sent Theodotus, Admiral of their Fleet on that Embassy. But they agreed, that the Alliance of the Romans should be so desired, as that there should be no Ordinance of the people made about it, nor the request be put into writing: because by that means, unless they obtained it, their disgrace, if they were repulsed, would be the greater. Now such was the privilege of the Admiral of their Fleet only, that he might treat about that affair without any preliminary proposal of it. For they had maintain'd a Friendship for so many years in such a manner, that they did not oblige themselves to the Romans by any League of Alliance: for no other reason, but, lest they should cut off from the Kings all hopes of their assistance, if they had, either of them, occasion for it, or from themselves, of reaping any benefit by their bounty and good fortune. But at that time especially they thought good to desire an Alliance, not to secure them e'r the more from others (for they fear'd no body except the Romans) but to make them the less suspected by the Romans. About the same time the Carnians revolted from them, and the Mylassians possess'd themselves of the Towns belonging to the Eumeneses. Yet notwithstanding, their spirits were not so dejected, but that they consider'd, that if Lycia and Caria were taken from them by the Romans, the other parts would either free themselves by a revolt, or be seized by their Neighbours: that they were inclosed in a little Island, and within the shores of a barren Country, which could not by any means keep the Inhabitants of so great a City. Whereupon, sending out their young men, in all haste against the Carnians, they forced them (though they had got the Cybirates to help them) to obedience; besides, that they defeated the Mylassians and Alabandians (who, having taken away the Province of the Eumeneses, had join'd their Forces with them) about Orthosia.

Whilst these things were done there, there were other things transacted in Macedonia, and at Rome; and in the mean time L. Anicius, in Illyricum, having, as I said before, reduced King Gentius, made Gabinus Governour of Scodra, which was the Kings Seat, putting a Garrison into it; as he did Licinius, of Rhizon, and Olzinium, which were Cities very commodiously situate. Having set these persons as a guard over Illyricum, he went with the rest of his Army into Epirus: where Phanota was first surrender'd to him, and the whole multitude came out with holy Ornaments [or Diadems] to meet him. Having put a Garrison into this place he went over into Molossis; where having taken possession of all the Towns, except Passaro, Tecmo, Phyluce, and Horreum, he march'd first to Passaro. Antinous and Theodotus were the chief men in that City, and famous both for their love to Perseus, and their hatred against the Romans; being also the Authors of that Cities revolting from the Romans. These two being conscious of their own guilt, because they had no hopes of pardon, pardon, that they might be destroy'd in the common ruine of their Country, shut the Gates; advising the mobile, that they would prefer death before slavery. No man durst open his mouth against two such extraordinary great men: till at last one Theodotus, who was himself also a noble youth, seeing, that their greater fear of the Romans had overcome that of their Noblemen, ask'd them; What madness is this in you, who make your whole City an accession to the guilt of two single persons? I have often heard indeed of them, that have dy'd for their Country; but these men are the first I have heard of, who ever thought it reasonable, that their Country should perish for them. Wherefore let us open our Gates, and receive that command, which the whole World hath already received. As he said this, the multitude follow'd him; and at the same time Antinous and Theodotus sallied forth upon the first station of the Enemies; where exposing themselves to danger they were kill'd, and the City surrender'd to the Romans. He also took Tecmo by surrender, and kill'd Cephalus, through whose obstinacy that City was in like manner shut up. Nor did Phylace or Horreum either endure a Siege. Having quieted Epirus, and divided his Forces into their Winter-Quarters, through the most convenient Cities, he went himself back into Illyricum; and at Scodra, whither the five Embassadors were come from Rome, having summoned all the great men out of the several Cities, he held an Assembly. There he publickly declared, as the opinion of the Council; That the Senate and the people of Rome order'd, that the Illyrians should be free; and that he would draw the Guards out of all their Towns, Forts and Castles. That the Illyrians and Taulantians should not only be free, but also have several immunities; and so should (among the Darsaretics) the Pirustæ, the Rhizonites, and the Olcinates, because they had revolted to the Romans, whilst Gentius was yet in a prosperous condition. That they would likewise bestow their freedom and immunity upon the Daorleans; for that they, forsaking Caravantius had come with their Arms over to the Romans. That the Scodrians, Darsarcæ, Selepitanes, and other Illyrians should pay but half that Tribute, which they had formerly paid to the King. After which he divided Illyricum into three parts; making one of that which was called the Upper Illyricum, a second of all the Labeates, and the third of the Agravonites, Rhizonites, Olcinates and their Neighbours. Having thus settled Illyricum, he himself return'd to Passaro in Epirus, to his Winter Quarters.

XXV.

XXVII. Whilst these things pass'd in Illyricum, Paulus, before the coming of the ten Embassadors, sent his Son Q. Maximus, who was now come back from Rome, to pillage Eginium and Agassæ: Agassæ; for that, though they had surrender'd the City to Marcus the Consul, and of their own accord desired an Alliance with the Romans, they had again revolted to Perseus: but the crime charg'd upon the Eginians was new. For they, not believing the report concerning the Roman Victory, had committed very great hostilities upon some of the Souldiers, that went into their City. He also sent L. Postumius to rife Ænus, because they were more obstinate than their Neighbour Cities in the continu'd use of their Arms. It was now about Autumn, at the beginning of which season he design'd to go round about all Greece, and to see those things which people have heard of by common report, oftener than any body hath seen them; and therefore having made C. Sulpicius Gallus, chief Commander of his Camp, he set forth with no great Retinue (his Son Scipio and Athenæus, King Eumene's Brother being his Companions) and went through Thessaly to Delphi, to that famous Oracle; where having sacrificed to Apollo, he, being a Conquerour, design'd the Pillars at the Entrance [into the Temple;] which were already begun, and upon which they had intended to set the statues of King Perseus; for his own Statues. At Lebadia also he went into the Temple of Jupiter Trophonius: where, having seen the mouth of a Cave, into which those that make use of the Oracle go down to enquire of the Gods, he, when he had sacrificed to Jupiter and Hercynna, whose Temple is there, he went down to Chalcis to see the Euripus and Eubœa, which was an Island formerly join'd to the Continent by a Bridge. From Chalcis he went over to Aulis, three miles distant, which was heretofore a famous Harbour, renown'd upon the score of Agamemnon's Fleet that rode there, consisting of a thousand Ships; and to the Temple of Diana, where that King of Kings got the Ships a passage to Troy by sacrificing his own Daughter [Iphigenia.] From thence he came to Oropus in Attica, where the Prophet Amphilochus is worshipped for a God: and the Temple is very ancient, having very pleasant Springs and Rivulets all about it. Then he came to Athens, which was once full of many ancient and famous rarities, but hath yet many things still worth the seeing; as the Castle, several Ports and Walls that join the Piræus to the City; the Docks of great Commanders, Images of Gods and men, that are very curious in all respects as to the matter of which they are made, and the Workmanship employ'd about them.

XXVIII. Having sacrificed, in the City, to Minerva, the Guardian of the Castle, he took his leave and arrived in two days at Corinth; which at that time, before it was destroy'd, was a famous City: besides, that the Fort and the Isthmus made a great show: the Fort, for that it was vastly higher than any other building, and yet had Springs rising upon it: and the Isthmus, for that it divided with its narrow Neck, two neighbouring Seas, that beat against it, one on the East, and the other on the West-side. From thence he went to Sicyon and Argos, two famous Cities; and from them to Epidaurus, which, though it be not equal equal to them for riches and splendour, is yet very remarkable for the noble Temple of Æsculapius, which being five miles distant from the City (though now the offerings are all pull'd down, and you can see nothing, but the Tracts (as it were) of them) was then very rich in Presents, which the sick had consecrated to that god, as a fee or reward for his wholesome Medicines. From thence he went to Lacedæmon, which is memorable, not for any magnificent Works, but for its Discipline and Laws: from whence he march'd up through Megalopolis to Olympia. Where, as he saw other very great rarities, so, looking upon Jupiter, as if he had been really present there, he was startled. Wherefore, as if he had been going to sacrifice in the Capitol, he order'd a Victim to be prepared much larger than ordinary. Thus having travelled over all Greece, so as that he inquir'd into nothing, that related to any mans inclinations, either publickly or privately, lest he might by any means disturb the minds of his Allies; when he return'd to Demetrias, there met him a Company of Ætolians, all in fordid Cloths; at which when he admired and ask'd, what the matter was? they told him, that five hundred and fifty of their Nobility were kill'd by Lyciscus and Tisippus (who beset the Senate) with the assistance of Roman Souldiers, that were sent by President Babius: that others were forced into banishment; and that they, who accus'd them, were possess'd of the goods of those that were slain, as well as those that were banish'd. He therefore, commanding them to come to him at Amphipolis, himself met Cn. Octavius at Demetrias, and then, after the news came, that the ten Embassadors were now come over, omitting all other business, he went on to them at Apollonia. To which place since Perseus, who was too carelessly lookt after, came from Amphipolis (which is a dayes Journey) to meet him, he spoke very kindly to him: but, when he came into the Camp at Amphipolis, they say, he chid C. Sulpicius very severely: First, Because he suffer'd Perseus to wander so far from him through the Province: and then, for that he had so far indulg'd the Souldiers, as to let them take the Tiles of the City Walls to cover their own Winter-Tents: and gave order that the Tiles should be carry'd back, and the Houses made as whole as they were before. And as for Perseus, he and his elder Son Philip were deliver'd up to him; whom he sent to be kept in safe custody by A. Postumius: but sent for his Daughter and younger Son from Samothece to Amphipolis, where he shew'd them all the civil respect imaginable.

XXIX. He himself, when the day came, on which he had order'd the ten chiefs of several Cities to attend him at Amphipolis, and that all Letters, which were left in any place whatsoever, with all the Kings money to be brought thither; sat on the tribunal with the ten Embassadors, the whole multitude of the Macedonians standing round about them. Who though they were used to Kingly Government, yet a new sort of a tribunal was a dreadful sight to them, where there was the Licetor [or Usher] that made way, the Cryer, and the Clerk, which were all unusual objects both to their Eyes and Ears; and such as might terrify even their Allies, much more a conquer'd Enemy. When silence was now made by the Cryer, Paulus declared in Latine, what the Senates Pleasure, and what his opinion, according to the Councils advise, was: all which Cn. Octavius who was also there present) interpreted and repeated in Greek [being to this effect:] That, first of all, it was order'd, that the Macedonians should be free, having the same Cities and Lands as before; using their own Laws, creating annual Magistrates, and paying but half that Tribute to the Roman People which they paid to their Kings. Next, that Macedonia should be divided into four Regions: one of which, and that the first, should be all that Tract between the River Strymon and Nessus: to which they should add all that lay beyond Nessus to the Eastward, where Perseus had been Master of Villages, Castles, and Towns, excepting Ænus, Maronea and Abdera: and beyond Strymon, to the Westward, all Bisaltica with Heraclea, which they call Sintice. That the second Region should be all that Tract, which is encompassed by the River Strymon, except Bisaltica, Heraclea and Sintice: adding thereto, on the West-side as far as the River Axios, all that part of Pæonia, that lies near the River Axios to the Eastward. The third Region was that, which Axios encompasseth on the Eastside, and the River Pencus on the West: having on the Northside the Mountain Bora. To this part was added that Region of Pæonia, which runs from the Westward all along by the River Axios: together with Edessa and Beræa. The fourth Region, beyond the Mountain Bora, border'd on one side upon Illyricum, and on the other upon Epirus. For the chief Cities of each Region, where they should hold their Councils, he order'd, that in the first, it should be Amphipolis, in the second Thessalonica, in the third Pella, and in the fourth Pelagonia. There he order'd, that the several Councils of each Region should be called, their money brought thither, and their Magistrates chosen in those places. Then he declared, that it should not be lawful for any of them to marry, or drive bargains for Lands or Houses among themselves, without the Consines of their own Region. Nor should they make use of gold and silver: but of Iron and Brass they might. That those who paid Tribute should pay but half of what they had paid to their Kings. He also forbid them to use salt. Upon occasion of the Dardans demanding back Pæonia, for that it had been theirs, and was contiguous to their Borders; he declar'd, that he would give all those their liberty, that had been Subjects of King Perseus. And since they could not obtain Pæonia, he gave them leave to trade in Salt: commanding the third Region, to carry it to Stobi in Pæonia, where he set a certain price upon it. He likewise not only forbid them to cut down any materials for Ship- ping, but also commanded them not to suffer others so to do. He allow'd the Regions, that border'd upon the Barbarians (as they did all indeed, except the third) to keep armed guards upon their Frontiers.

XXX. These things being declared the first day of the meeting had a very different effect upon the Auditors minds. Their liberty, which was given them, beyond all expectation, encouraged them, as did the yearly Tribute also which was half taken off. But now that their Commerce was interrupted, they seemed to be so distracted from one another, as though they had been living Creatures torn limb from limb, whereof one wants the assistance of the other: so far were the very Macedonians themselves from knowing, how big Macedonia was, how easily divided, and how contemptible each part in it self was. The first part contains the Bisaltæ, a sort of very brave men (living beyond the River Nessus, and about Strymon) with many kinds of Fruits, and Metals, besides that it hath the convenience of Amphipolis, which standing in the way blocks up all the Avenues from the Eastward into Macedonia. The second Region hath in it those famous Cities, Thessalonica and Cassandria; together with Pallene, a fertile and fat Country: besides, that the Ports at Torone, and the Mountain Athos (which last they call Aeneas's Port) which lie, some of them toward the Island Eubœa, and other commodiously to the Hellepont, stand very opportunely for a Sea Trade. The third Region hath in it those remarkable Cities, Edeffa, Berea, and Pella, with the Warlike Nation of the Vettians: besides a great many Gauls and Illyrians, who are very active and diligent Husbandmen. The fourth Region is inhabited by the Eordeans, Lycestians, and Pelagonians; to which there are added Antimania, Symphalis, and Eimiotis. This is all of it a very cold Quarter; being hard to manure, and rough withal: and indeed the genius of the Inhabitants is much like the place they live in: besides, that the Neighbouring Barbarians to make them more wild, and fierce, who one while teaze them with Wars, and another while in time of Peace mix and confound their rites one with another. Thus having divided Macedonia into several Regions, he appointed how it should be govern'd all together, after he had declared that he would likewise make Laws for them.

XXXI. Then the Ætolians were called before him; in whose case, the question was, rather, which party had favour'd the Romans, and which the King; than which of them had done, or received any injury. The Murderers were acquitted; and their banishment was as much ratified to those that were forced out of their Country, as their Death was certain to those that were slain. A. Babius was the only person condemned, for that he had supply'd them with Roman Souldiers to commit murder. This issue of the Ætolians cause, through all the Nations and States of Greece, that had been on the Romans side, infused into them an intolerable pride; made all those mere Slaves, who were in the least suspected of having favour'd the Kings Party. There were three sorts of Noblemen in the several Cities: two, who by flattering, either the Romans or the Kings, advanced their own interest, though their Cities were ruined: and one, who took a middle way, contrary to both the others, defending their Laws and Liberty. These, as they were more beloved among their own Countrymen, so they were less esteemed among Foreigners. So that the Favourers of that party being proud of the Romans prosperity, were the only men at that time employ'd in all Offices and Embassies. Who, coming in great numbers out of Peloponnesus, Boetia, and from other parts of Greece, fill'd the Ears of the ten Embassadors [with complaints and suspicions, saying] that not only they, who had publickly through vanity bragg'd of their being familiars and Friends to Perseus, but many more also had privately favour'd his party. That the rest under pretence of maintaining their liberty, had done all they could, in the several Councils, against the Romans: nor could those Nations be kept to their Allegiance by any other means, than by taming the Spirits of such persons, and cherishing and confirming the authority of those who expelled no Government but that of the Romans. Upon this information, there were several persons summon'd by the Generals Letters out of Ætolia, Acarnania, Epirus, and Boetia, to follow him to Rome in order to make their defence: and two of the ten Embassadors went into Achaia, viz. C. Claudius, and Cn. Domitius, themselves to summon them by Edict. That they did for two reasons; the one, because they thought the Achaens had more spirit and resolution, than others, which would make them disobedient to their orders (as also, because, perhaps, they thought Callicrates and the rest, who were the informers against them might be in danger) and the other reason, why they would give them the Summons in Person was, that, from other Countries, they had Letters under the Princes own hands which they found among the Kings Writings; but, against the Achaens, had no Evidence at all, as having found none of their Letters. The Ætolians being dismiss'd, the Acarnanians were cited: among whom there was no other innovation made, save that Leucas was exempted from the Council of that Nation. After which, making farther inquiry, who had been either publickly or privately of the Kings Party, they extended their inquisition into Asia also: and sent Labeo to demolish Antissa in the Island of Lesbos, and from thence to bring the Antisseans over to Methymna: for that they had entertain'd Antenor the Kings Admiral, when he cruised with his Fleet about Lesbos, into their Port, and furnish'd him with provisions. There were two great men Beheaded with the Axe: Andronicus, an Ætolian, Son Son to Andronicus (for following his Father, and bearing Arms against the Romans) and Neo, a Theban, by whose advice they had enter'd into an Alliance with Perseus.

Having interposed these inquiries concerning foreign matters, they called the Macedonian Council again: in which it was declared: That, as to the State of Macedonia, they would have Senators chosen, whom the Macedonians call Synedri [such as sit together in Council;] by whose conduct and advice the Common wealth should be managed. Then the names of the Macedonian Nobility, who, they thought fit, should go before into Italy (together with all their Children, that were above fifteen years old) were read over. That at first view seem'd severe, but soon after appeared to the multitude of the Macedonians to be for their liberty. For there were named the Kings Friends and Favourites, who had been Generals of Armies, Admirals, or Governours of Garisons; and used to shew themselves Slaves to the King, but very imperious to every body else: some of them very rich, and others, who though they had not so much money, were yet equal to them in their expenses, but they all lived (as to diet) and were clothed, like Kings; though none of them had the Soul of a good Citizen, nor could endure either Laws or equitable Liberty. Wherefore all those, who had served the King in any capacity, yea even those, who had been employ'd in the meanest Embassies, were order'd to depart out of Macedonia, and go into Italy; and he that did not obey that order, was threaten'd with death. He gave Laws to Macedonia with so much care, that he seem'd to give them, not to a conquer'd Enemy, but to Allies that had very well deserv'd of him: yea, and those to such, as use could not in a long time (which is the only Corrector of Laws) and much experience find any fault with. Having made an end of his serious business, he set forth at Amphipolis, with great cost and charges, several sorts of sports and merriment, for which he had prepared a good while before; having sent certain persons into the Cities of Asia, and to the Kings, to tell them of it; and also himself given the Princes notice thereof, as he went about the Cities of Greece. For there were Artills of all sorts, who had any skill in sports, with a vast multitude of Wrestlers, and fine Horles, out of all parts of the World: besides, that Embassadors came with Victims and whatsoever else, in respect either to the Gods or Men, is usually done at great Shows in Greece: And then the matter was so order'd, that they not only admired his magnificence, but his Prudence too, in setting forth Shows, to which the Romans were then mere Strangers. There were also Entertainments provided for the several Embassies, with the same splendour and care. For 'twas reported, that he used commonly to say, it belong'd to the same person to make a Feast, and set forth Plays, who knew how to conquer in time of War.

Having shew'd them sports of all sorts, and put his brazen Shields on board his Ships, he laid all the rest of the Arms on a vast heap together, and then, having paid his Devotion to Mars, Minerva, Luna [an ancient Goddess, called therefore Mother] and the rest of the [Warlike] Gods, to whom it is an act of Religion to devote the spoils of an Enemy, the General himself set it with a torch on fire. After which the Tribunes of the Souldiers that stood round about, threw each of them more fire upon it. It was observ'd, at that meeting of Europe and Asia from all Countries, though such a vast multitude were gather'd together, partly to congratulate, and partly to see the Show, yet there was such plenty of all things, and provisions were so cheap; that the General made a great many Presents of that kind, not only to private persons, but to whole Cities; and that, not only for their present use, but for them to carry with them home. But the Show which entertain'd that multitude, that came thither, was not the Stage-Plays, the Prizes, or Horse Races, more than the Macedonian spoils, which were all expos'd to open view: as Statues, Tables, fine woven pieces [of Tissue, &c.] with Vessels of Gold, Silver, Brasse and Ivory, which were made with great care and industry in that Court; not for a present show like those wherewith the Palace at Alexandria was stuff'd, but for perpetual use. These things being put on Board the Fleet were given to Cn. Octavius to carry to Rome. Paulus having kindly dismiss'd the Embassadors, went over Strymon, and Encamped a mile off Amphipolis: from whence in five dayes he arrived at Pella. But passing by that City, he staid two days at a place which they call Speleum; in which time he sent P. Nafica, and Q. Maximus his Son, with part of his Forces to ravage the Illyrians, who had assist'd Perseus in the War: commanding them to meet him at Oricum; whilst he himself, going for Epirus, arrived in fifteen dayes at Passaro.

Anicinus's Camp was not far from that place: to whom having dispatch'd a Letter of advice, not to meddle with any thing that was done there: for the Senate had given the spoil of the Cities in Epirus, which had revolted to Perseus, to the Army: he sent Centurions privately into the several Cities, whom he order'd to say, that they came to draw off the Garisons there, that the Epirotes, as well as the Macedonians, might be free; he summon'd ten of the greatest men out of every City. To whom when he had declared, that they must bring their gold and silver forth into publick view, he sent his Troops into every City: who going into the farthest before they went into the hithermost, came to them all in one day. Then they told the Tribunes and Centurions what they had done: and in the Morning all the gold and silver was heaped together: after which, at the fourth hour, the signal was given to the Souldiers to plunder the several Cities; in which they got so great a booty, that four hundred Deniers fell to every Horseman's share, and to every Footman's two hundred; besides, that there were carry'd away as Prisoners a hundred and fifty thousand Souls. After that the Walls of the rified Cities were demolish'd: which Towns were about seventy. The booty of them all was sold, and out of that sum the Souldiers were paid. Then Paulus went down to the Seaside, to Oricum; though he had not, as he supposed, in any wife satisfied his Souldiers minds: who, as though they had been concern'd in no War in Macedonia, were very angry, that they did not share in the booty taken from the King. Finding the Forces, that he sent with Nasica, and his Son Maximus at Oricum; he put his Army on board the Ships, and went over into Italy. And after some few dayes, Anicius, having dismiss'd the Convention of the other Epirotes and Acarnanians, and order'd the Noblemen to follow him into Italy, whose causes he reserv'd to be there try'd, himself, after he had waited some time for the Ships, which the Macedonian Army had made use of, went over into Italy. Whilst these things were transacted in Macedonia and Epirus, the Embassadors, who were sent with Attalus, to make an end of the War between the Gauls and King Eumenes, arrived in Asia. At which time there was a Truce made for that Winter, so that the Gauls were gone home, and the King into his Winter-Quarters at Pergamus, where he had been sick of a grievous distemper. It was Spring before he went abroad: and they were now come to Symada, when Eumenes had muster'd all his Forces at Sardeis. There not only the Romans discours'd Solovettius, the General of the Gauls, at Symada, but Attalus also went with them: but they did not think fit, that Attalus should go into the Camp, lest they should fall into a dispute and quarrel. P. Licinius talk'd with the petit King of the Gauls, and brought word that he grew still more fierce by being intreated: in so much that it might seem very strange, that the persuasions of the Roman Embassadors should so far prevail upon those opulent Kings, Antiochus and Ptolemy, as they presently concluded a Peace, but among the Gauls should be of no moment at all.

XXXV. The Captive Kings, Perseus and Gentius, were first brought to Rome, and with their Children put into Custody: and next to them the other crowd of Captives; with all those Macedonians who were order'd to come to Rome, and the Princes of Greece. For these persons also were taken notice of; not only such as were present, but, if any of them were with the Kings, they were sent for by Letters. Paulus himself, after a few days, came up the Tiber to the City, in a Ship of the Kings of a vast Bulk, rowed with sixteen Banks of Oars, and adorn'd with the Macedonian spoils, which were not only glorious Arms, but delicate woven Work [Tissues, &c.] of the Kings; whilst the Banks of the River were fill'd with the multitude of people, that thronged out to meet him. Some few dayes after Anicius and Octavius came with their Fleet. Whereupon the Senate decreed, that they should all three triumph together: and Q. Cassius the Prætor was commanded to treat with the Tribunes of the People, by authority from the Senate, to propose it to the people, that they might be in Commission the day that they rode triumphant into the City. All mean things are free from Envy; for that most commonly strikes at the highest. There was no doubt of Anicius, or Octavius's triumphing; but Paulus, to whom those persons themselves would have blush'd to have compared themselves, was much maligned. For he had kept the Souldiers to the ancient Discipline, had given them less of the booty than they had hoped for out of such a mass of wealth as was taken from the King: for (had he indulged their covetousness) he was like to have left nothing for himself to carry into the Treasury: wherefore the whole Macedonian Army resolv'd to make but a thin appearance with their General at the Assembly for passing that Law. But Ser. Sulpicius Galba, who had been a Tribune of the Souldiers, belonging to the second Legion in Macedonia, who was privately the Generals Enemy, by cajoling them himself, and soliciting them by the mediation of the Souldiers also that belong'd to his Legion, induced them to come in a full body to give their Votes: [saying] that by that means they might be reveng'd of their impetuous and ill natur'd General, in refusing to pass a Bill, that would be prefer'd concerning his Triumph. That the Commonalty of the City would follow the judgments of the Souldiers. That he, forsooth, could not give them money; should they then give him honour? No, he ought not to hope for the fruit of good will there, where he had not deserv'd it.

XXXVI. When these men were thus prepared, T. Sempronius, a Tribune of the people, propos'd the Law in the Capitol; in which case though private men have the privilege to speak concerning the Law propos'd, yet since no body stood up to speak either for or against it; as being a thing not at all doubtful; Servilius Galba presently stept forth, and desired of the Tribune; that, seeing it was now the eighth hour of the day [i. e. two in the Afternoon] so that he had not time enough to demonstrate, why they would not consent that L. Æmilius should triumph, they might defer it till the next day, and do that business in the Morning. For he had need of a whole day to set forth that case. Whereupon when the Tribune bad him, if he had any thing to say, say it then, he protracted the matter with a long Speech, Relations and admonitions, till night; saying, that the duties of War were too severely impos'd upon the Souldiers; that there was more labour and danger join'd them, than the thing requir'd; and on the other hand, that in their rewards and honours all things were streighten'd; and that as Warfare, if they had such Generals, would be very dreadful and rugged for the Souldiers whilst they were engaged engaged to fight; so would it likewise be poor and dishonourable, after they had got the Victory. That the Macedonians were in a better condition, than the Roman Souldiers. That if they came the next in a full body to hinder the passing of that Law, the great men would see, that all the power was not in the Generals, but some in the Souldiers hands. The Souldiers being instigated by these kinds of words, the next day came in such a crowd to the Capitol, that nobody else could come to give their Votes. After the first Tribes, being called in, had rejected the Bill, the great men of the City flock'd all together into the Capitol, crying out, that it was an unworthy design; that L. Paulus, who had got a Victory in so great a War, should be deprived or robb'd of his triumph; and that Generals should be made subject to the licentiousness, and the covetousness of their Souldiers. That they were apt to offend too much through ambition in the person of one man; what then should they do, if the Souldiers were made their Generals Masters? With that they all began to revile Galba: till at last, when this tumult was over, M. Servilius, who had been Consul and Master of the Horse, desired of the Tribunes, that they might treat concerning that matter once again, and that they would permit him to speak to the people. The Tribunes, though they had withdrawn to consider of it, yet, being overcome by the authorities of the Nobility, began to Discourse the thing over afresh, and sent word back that they would recal the same Tribes, if M. Servilius and the other private persons had said, what they had a mind to say.

Then Servilius [stood up and said:] "How great a General L. Æmilius (Romans!) hath been, if you can judge by nothing else, even this one thing was enough, that, though he had in his Camp such seditious and light sort of Souldiers, so notorious, so rash, and so eloquent an Enemy, to instigate the multitude, yet he had no sedition in his Army. The same severity of command, which now they hate, kept them then in awe. So that whilst they were under the ancient Discipline, they were quiet. That Servilius Galba, if he had a mind to try his parts, and give a sample of his Eloquence by accusing L. Paulus; ought not to hinder his triumph (which, though nothing else, the Senate had judg'd to be just) but ought the next day, after he had triumph'd, when he should see him again in a private capacity, to inform against him, and condemn him according to Law: or somewhat later, when he himself had got into an Office, summon him to a Tryal such a day, and accuse him as an Enemy before the people. By which means not only L. Æmilius would have the reward of his good deeds in a triumph for the War which had so egregiously managed: and his punishment too, if he had done any thing, unworthy either of his former, or his new glory. But he, you may see, since he had no crime nor any reproach to lay open, was resolv'd to detract from his commendations. He desired a whole day, yesterday, to accuse L. Paulus; and spent four, all that was left of the day, in making of a Speech. Who was ever so guilty, as that the Vices of his whole Life might not be reckon'd up in so many hours? But in that time, what did he object, which L. Paulus, if he were to make his defence, would deny? Let any body make me two Speeches: one for the Macedonian Souldiers, and the other pure, with a judgment more entire both in respect to favour and hate, where all the Roman People sit as Judges. Then let the party accused be impleaded before a Company of Citizens. What couldst Thou, Servilius Galba! say before an Auditory of old Romans? For that Oration of thine would be all cut off: you kept guard too severely, and longer than you need to have done: you went the rounds more rigorously and diligently than you had occasion; you did more work than before, when you as General your self went about to spur the men on. You trampled the same day, on which you led your men into the Field. Nay he would not let thee be at quiet when thou hadst got the Victory; but presently drew thee out to pursue the Enemy. When he might have made thee rich with the booty, if he had divided it; he would needs carry the Kings money in triumph, and bring it into the Treasury. These things as they have some kind of sting, to stimulate the Souldiers minds, who think he hath not sufficiently gratified their licentiousness, nor their avarice; so would they not have at all prevailed with the Roman People: who though they do not rip up old stories, that they have heard from their Parents, what damage hath been receiv'd through the ambition of Generals, and what Victories have been gotten by severity of Discipline, yet, no question, they remember, what difference there was in the last Punick War between M. Minucius, Master of the Horse, and Q. Fabius Maximus the Dictator. And so might the Accuser too have known that, and then Paulus's defence had been needless. But now let us pass over to the other Speech: in which I must not now, methinks, call you Romans, but Souldiers, if that title at least may infuse into you any modesty, or abhorrence of doing injury to your General.

"And now I my self am far otherwise affected in my mind, whilst I seem to speak to an Army, than I was e'rwhiles, when I directed my Speech to a Company of ordinary Citizens. Come, what say you, Fellow Souldiers? Is there any man at Rome, except Perseus, who would not have Æmilius triumph over the Macedonians; and will not you tear in pieces with the same hands, wherewith you conquer'd the Macedonians? He, if he could, would have hinder'd you from Conquering, who denies that you shall come triumphant into the City. You are in error, Fellow Souldiers, if you think that a tri-
B b b b b 2
"umph

"umph is for the honour of the General only, and not of the Souldiers, yea, and the whole Roman People also. No; this does not concern L. Paulus only. Besides, many persons who have not obtain'd a triumph of the Senate, have yet for all that triumph'd on the Alban Mount. No man can rob L. Paulus of the glory of having made an end of the Macedonian War, more than they can C. Lutatius of the renown, which he gain'd in the first Punick War, or P. Cornelius of his honour, purchased in the second; or any of those, that triumphed after them. Nor will a triumph make L. Paulus either a greater or a lesser General. This concerns the fame of the Souldiers, and the whole Roman People more than him: First, lest it should be thought the effect of envy and ingratitude against every great and glorious Citizen; and seem to imitate the people of Athens, who malign all their best men. Your Ancestors offended sufficiently in the case of Camillus, when they laid violent hands upon him, even before he had rescued the City from the Gauls: and you likewise are guilty enough in the case of P. Africanus; that the House and seat of him, who conquer'd Africa should have been at Liternum; and his Sepulchre be at this day in the same place to be seen. We ought to blush, if L. Paulus be equal to those men in point of glory, that their injury to him should be equal. Wherefore let this infamy be first obliterated; which as it is very dishonourable in other Nations, so is also a damage to us. For who would be like Africanus or Paulus in a City, that is an Enemy and ungrateful to all good men? But suppose it were no infamy, and that we talk'd of glory only, pray what triumph brings not with it a common honour to all Romans? Are the many triumphs, over the Gauls, Spaniards and Carthaginians, call'd the Generals only, or the Roman Peoples triumphs? As there were triumphs celebrated, not only over Pyrrhus, and Annibal, but over the Epirotes and Carthaginians also; so it was not Manius Curius only, or P. Cornelius, but the Romans, that triumph'd. Indeed this properly concerns the Souldiers, who themselves having Laurels on their Heads, and each of them Presents, with which they are adorn'd, march, crying, Io Triumphe! and sing both their own and the Emperours praises quite through the City. If at any time the Souldiers are not brought out of the several Provinces to attend a triumph, they murmur; and yet at the same time, they think that they, though absent, triumph; because the Victory was obtain'd by their hands. If any man should ask you; Souldiers, why are you carry'd into Italy, and were not disbanded as soon as the Province was settled: why do you come to Rome in such a Warlike posture: why do you stay here, and do not get you gone every man to his respective home: what could you answer, but that you would seem to triumph? And indeed you, who got the Victory, ought to desire to be seen.

XXXIX.

"There were those that triumph'd lately over Philip, this mans Father, and over Antiochus; who were both possess'd of their Kingdoms at the same time: and shall not Emilius triumph over Perseus, who is taken, and brought, with his Children into our very City? If L. Paulus, when the other two are going in their Chariot up to the Capitol, adorn'd with gold and purple, should ask as a private Roman from among the crowd below; L. Anicius, and Cn. Octavius! do you think your selves or me more worthy to triumph? I am confident they would quit the Chariot, and with their own hands for shame deliver to him their badges of honour. And will you, Romans, rather have Gentius led in triumph than Perseus, or have a triumph celebrated for the accession of a War rather than for the War it self? Shall the Legions, and Naval Forces out of Illyricum march into the City with Laurels on their Heads; and the Macedonian Legions, being deny'd that honour, only stand and gaze upon the triumphs of other men? Besides, what shall we do with the spoils of so rich a booty, and so opulent a Victory? Where shall we put those so many thousand Arms, that were taken off the bodies of the Enemies? Shall they be sent back into Macedonia? How shall we dispose of the golden, marble and Ivory Statues; the inlaid Tables, the rich Tissues, so much embossed silver, so much gold, and so great a quantity of the Kings Money? Shall they be carried by night into the Treasury, as if they had been stolen? What shall we do with the greatest Sight of all? Where shall that famous and most opulent King, now taken, be shewn to the Victorious People? Most of us remember, what a concourse King Syphax caus'd, when he was taken, though he were no more than an accession to the Punick War. Shall King Perseus then, now that he is taken, with Philip and Alexander, his Sons (who are persons of such renown) be withheld from the view of the City? All peoples Eyes desire to see L. Paulus, who hath been twice Consul, and subdu'd all Greece, ride in a Chariot through the City. For this reason we made him Consul; that he might make an end of that War, which, to our great shame, was spun out for four years together: Shall we then deny him for whom even when he first happen'd to have that Province, and when he went thither, we, with presaging minds, designed a Victory and a triumph, a triumph, now he hath got that Victory; and thereby rob not only men but the Gods too of their due honour? For it concerns the Gods, and not men alone. Did not your Ancestors begin all great affairs with applications to the Gods, and make that too the end? A Consul or a Prætor, at their setting forth with their Lictors in Warlike habits, to go for any Province, or to any War, makes Vows in the Capitol: and when he returns with Victory,

"ry, after the War's over, triumphing in the Capitol, brings to the same Gods, to whom he made those Vows, the deserved presents of the Roman People: for the Victims, that go before him, are no small part of the triumph; that it may appear, the General returns to give the Gods thanks for his success in the management of the Common-wealths business: and that he offers, by the hands of one or other, all those Victims, which he causes to be carry'd in triumph. Now will you spoil all the Senates good cheer, which is not eaten, either in a private place, or a publick, that is profane, but in the Capitol (whether for the pleasure of men only, or of the Gods and men together) at the institution of Servius Galba? Shall the Gates be shut against L. Paulus's triumph? Shall Perseus, King of Macedonia, with his Children and the other crowd of Captives, together with the spoils of the Macedonians, be left about the River? Shall L. Paulus go from the Gate home, like a private person, as though he only came out of the Country? But you, Centurions, and Souldiers, hear what the Senate hath decreed concerning General Paulus, rather than what Servius Galba invents concerning him: and hear me, rather than him, say this: He hath learnt to do nothing but to prate, and that maliciously, and opprobriously too: but I have twenty three times with my Enemy, whom I challenged to the Battle: and from all those with whom I ever engaged, I brought back spoils; having a Body mark'd with honourable scars, which I received in the War: With that he, they say, shew'd his naked Skin, and told them in what War each wound was receiv'd. Which whilst he was a showing and boasting of, he by chance discover'd what should have been hid, and by that means a swelling that he had in his groin made those that stood next him laugh. Whereupon he told them; Yea, and this too that you laugh at I got by sitting whole dayes and nights on Horseback; nor am I ashamed, or do I repent of it, more than of these scars; since it never was any hinderance to me, either at home or in the Wars, but that I could very well serve the Common-wealth. I, who am an old Souldier, have often shewn this mangled body to the young Souldiers: Now let Galba shew his delicate, whole skin. Tribunes, if you please, recal the Tribes to give their Votes: *

Valerius Antias says, that the sum of gold and silver, that was taken in that War and brought to Rome, amounted to twelve Millions of [French] money: which sum no doubt is by him made a little bigger than it should be upon the score of the number of the Waggon, and the weights of gold and silver, which he hath set down according to their several kinds. They say, there was as much again spent in the late War, or consumed and lost, when he ran to Samothrace: and this was so much the more admirable; for that so much money had been heaped up within thirty years after the War of Philip with the Romans, partly out of the metals, and partly out of other Revenues. So Philip began to make with the Romans, when he was very poor, and Perseus when he was very rich. Last of all came Paulus himself in his Chariot, with a very majestic presence, not only upon the score of his comely and graceful Body, but his Age also. After his Chariot follow'd, among other famous men, his two Sons, Q. Maximus, and P. Scipio: and then the Horse in Troops, with the Regiments of Foot, each in their order. To each Footman were given a hundred Deniers; double to a Centurion, and trebble to an Horseman. Now they say, he would have given as much [as he gave the Horse] to the Foot, and proportionably to the rest, if they had not voted against his honour, or had shouted heartily for this sum when they were told of it. But Perseus was not the only Example of humane misfortunes in those dayes, who was led before the Chariot of a Victorious General in Chains through the Enemies City, but even the Conquerour Paulus too, though he shone with gold and purple. For of two Sons, whom he, (having given two away by adoption) kept at home, as the only Supporters of his name, to be the Heirs of his holy things and estate: the younger, who was about twelve years of Age, dy'd five dayes before his triumph; and the elder, who was fourteen, three dayes after: both which ought to have rode with their Father in his Chariot, in their Childrens Gowns [garded with purple, and called Prætextæ] and have design'd themselves in time to come to celebrate the like triumphs: Some few dayes after, M. Antonius Tribune of the People, having called an Assembly, after he had discours'd as other Generals used to do about his own exploits, his Speech that he made was very well worth the remembring, and becoming a Nobleman of Rome.

Romans [said he] although I suppose that you are not ignorant, both how successfully I have managed the publick affairs, and that two Thunderbolts have fallen very lately upon my House, since in so short a time you saw not only my triumph, but the Funerals of my Children also, yet, I beseech you, suffer me a little to compare my private condition, with that affection as I ought to do, with the publick felicity. Going out of Italy I set sail with the Fleet at Sun rising from Brundisium: and at the ninth hour of the day [i. e. three in the Afternoon] I, with all my Ships, arrived at Corcyra. From thence I went in five days to Delphi, where I sacrificed to Apollo for my self, my Army and Navy. From Delphi I came in five days to the Camp: where having receiv'd the Army, and alter'd some things which were great impediments to Victory, I went forward, and because the Enemies Camp was impregnable, and that I could not force the King to fight, I made a shift to get through his Garisons, beyond the strait pass near Petra: where, having forced the King to engage, I overcame him. By that means I reduced Macedonia into the hands of the Romans, and in fifteen fifteen dayes made an end of that War, which four Consuls before me managed for four years together, at such a rate, as that they left it still more grievous to the Successor. Then follow'd the Fruit, as it were, of that success; for all the Cities of Macedonia surrender'd themselves to me: the Kings Treasury came into my disposal; and the King himself, whom even the Gods themselves almost deliver'd to me, was taken in the Temple of Samothrace, together with his Children. And now my Fortune seem'd too great, even to my self, and therefore was the more to be suspected. I began to fear the dangers of the Sea in carrying over so much money as I had of the Kings, into Italy; and transporting my Victorious Army. But when all was safe landed in Italy, and I had nothing else to desire; I only wish'd, that, seeing Fortune us'd many times to tumble back from the highest pitch, my Family, rather than the Common-wealth might feel the alteration thereof. Wherefore I hope the publick is discharg'd by my so signal calamity: in that my triumph, to shew the frailty, and the vicissitude of humane state, was interposed between the two Funerals of my Children. But whereas I and Perseus are look'd upon at present as the most remarkable Examples of mans condition; He, who, himself a Captive, saw his Children led as Captives before him, hath them yet still alive: but I, who triumph'd over him, came from the Funeral of one Son, in my Chariot, out of the Capitol, to the other, who was now just expiring: nor is there any one left of all my Family, to bear the name of L. Æmilius Paulus. For the Cornelian and the Fabian Family have two by adoption (as if I had had a very numerous Issue;) and there is no body left in Paulus's House but himself. But your felicity, and the publick prosperity, comfort even in this sad condition, and under this destruction of my Family.

XL.

XLI.

XLII.

These things, said with so much life, confounded the minds of the Audience more, than if he had miserably bewailed the loss of his Children. Afterward upon the first of December, Cn. Octavius made a Naval triumph over King Perseus: which was without Captives, and without spoils. He gave to every Seaman seventy five Deniers; to the Pilots, that had been on board the Ships, double; and to the Masters of the Ships, fourfold. Then there was a Senate held; in which it was order'd, that Q. Cassius should carry King Perseus, and his Son Alexander to Alba, and there keep them; together with all the retinue, money, silver, and goods that they had. Bitis, Son to the King of Thrace, was sent with the Hostages to be kept at Carseoli: but they order'd the rest of the Captives, that were led in triumph to be put in Prison. Some few days that these things were transacted, there came Embassadors from Cotys King of Thrace, with money to redeem his Son, and the rest of the Hostages. Who being brought into the Senate made that very thing the argument of their Speech; to wit, that Cotys did not voluntarily assist Perseus, in that he was forced to give Hostages: and therefore desiring; that they would let them be redeemed at the same rate, which the Senate themselves had laid upon them, they had this answer by order of the Senate; That the people of Rome remember'd that ancient Friendship, which he had maintain'd with Cotys, and his Ancestors, together with the whole Nation of Thrace. But that the giving of Hostages was a crime, not an excuse, since Perseus, even when he was most at leisure, much less when he was engaged in a War with the Romans, was not in any wise dreadful to the Thracians. But though Cotys had prefer'd the good will of Perseus before the Friendship of the Roman People; they would consider, what was fit for them to do, more than what he deserv'd: and would send him back his Son with the other Hostages. That the Romans did not expect any return for their kindnesses, or at least chose rather to leave the receivers to set a value upon them, than demand any present reward. The Embassadors, who were nominated, to carry the Hostages into Thrace, were T. Quintius Flaminius, C. Licinius Nerva, and M. Caninius Rebilus: and the Thracians had Presents made to them, each two thousand pounds of Bras. So Bitis with the rest of the Hostages, being sent for from Carseoli, was sent with the Embassadors to his Father. The Kings Ships that were taken from the Macedonians, being of an unusual bigness, were brought on shore into the Campus Martius.

XLIII.

Now whilst the memory of the Macedonian Triumph continu'd still, not only in the minds, but also even in the Eyes of the people, L. Anicius, upon the Feast of Romulus, triumph'd over King Gentius, and the Illyrians. In which triumph all things seem'd rather like than equal, to what the people had seen before: for Anicius was inferior to Æmilius, not only in respect of his birth, but his office too, the former being a Prætor, and the latter a Consul: nor Gentius be compar'd to Perseus, the Illyrians to the Macedonians, the spoils of one to those of the other, the money taken from one King to the money taken from that, nor the Presents of one to those of the other. But as the late triumph outshone this; so it appear'd to all that well consider the person in himself, that he was in no wise to be contemned. For he had totally subdu'd, in a few dayes, the whole Nation of the Illyrians, both by Sea and Land; though they were a Warlike people, and had good places well fortified to trust to: taking the King and all the Royal Family: besides, that he carry'd in triumph many military Ensigns, with other spoils and Furniture of the Kings: of gold twenty seven, and of silver nineteen pounds, three thousand Deniers, and a hundred and twenty thousand pieces of Illyrian silver. Before his Chariot were led King Gentius, with his Wife and Children, Caravantius the Kings Brother, and some other Noblemen of Illyricum. Of the booty there was given to every common Souldier forty five Denarii; double to a Centurion, and treble to an Horseman: to the Latine Allies as much as to Citizens, Citizens, and as much to the Seamen, as to the common Souldiers. The Souldiers follow'd this triumph more cheerfully, and the General himself was celebrated with many Commendatory Songs. Antias sayes, that he made two Millions of money out of that booty, besides the gold and silver, which he carry'd into the Treasury. Which because it did not appear how such a sum could be made, I have quoted my Author for it. King Gentius with his Wife, and Children, and Brother, was carry'd to be kept at Spoletium by order of Senate; and the rest of the Captives were put in Prison at Rome: but since the Spoletians refused to take them into Custody, the Princes were carry'd to Igiturium. The rest of the booty out of Illyricum were two hundred and twenty Barks: which, being taken from King Gentius, the Senate order'd Q. Cassius to give to the Coreyreians, Apollonians, and Dyrrhacians.

The Consuls that year, having only pillaged Liguria, since the Enemies had never brought forth their Forces, did no memorable action at all, but return'd to Rome to chuse new Magistrates. Where, the first day of the Assembly, they created for Consuls, M. Claudius Marcellus, and C. Sulpicius Gallus. And the next day, for Prætors, L. Livius, L. Apuleius Saturninus, A. Licinius Nerva, P. Rutilius Calvus, P. Quintilius Varus, and M. Fonteius. To these Prætors were assigned the two City Provinces, the two Spains, Sicily and Sardinia. That year was Leap-year, and the odd day put in was the day after the Feast of the God Terminus. That year C. Claudius, the Augur, dy'd (in whose place the Augurs chose C. Quintius Flaminius) and Q. Fabius Pictor, who was Flamen Quirinalis [i. e. High-Priest of Romulus.] That year also King Prusias came to Rome with his Son Nicomedes; and making his entry into the City with a great Retinue, walk'd streight from the Gate to the Forum, and the Tribunal of Q. Cassius, the Prætor: where, amidst a great concourse of people, he said, He came to salute the Gods, that inhabited the City of Rome, the Senate and the Roman People: and to congratulate, that they overcome King Perseus and Gentius, and, had increased their Empire by conquering the Macedonians and Illyrians. Whereupon, when the Prætor told him, that, if he pleas'd, he would give him admission to the Senate that day; he desired two days time to visit the Temples of the Gods, and to see the City, with his Friends and acquaintance. L. Cornelius Scipio the Quæstor was order'd to attend him to all places, who had also been sent to meet him at Capua: and there was an House hired, to receive him and his Retinue. The third day after he went to the Senate, congratulated their Victory; put them in mind of his merits in that War; and desired, that he might have leave to pay a Vow, by sacrificing ten of the bigger sort of Victims at Rome in the Capitol, and one at Preneste to Fortune: for those Vows he had made for the sake of the Roman Peoples Victory. And that they would renew their Alliance with him. And that the Land, taken from King Antiochus, which the Gauls were possess'd of, though the Roman People had given it to no body, might be given to him. And lastly recommended to the Senate his Son Nicomedes. He was assisted by the favour of all those that had been Commanders in Macedonia. Wherefore the other things, that he desired, were granted; but as to the Land, they said, They would send Embassadors to inspect that matter. If the Land belong'd to the Roman People, and were not given to any body else, they should look upon Prusias, as a person most worthy of that Present. But if it had not belong'd to King Antiochus, it thereby appear'd not to belong to the Roman People neither: or if it were given to the Gauls, that Prusias ought to pardon them, if the Roman People would not give him any thing to prejudice another party. Besides that that could never be a grateful present to the receiver, which he knew, that he who gave it him, could take away, whenever he pleas'd. That they were glad he had brought his Son Nicomedes along with him: and that Ptolemy, King of Ægypt was a sufficient proof, with what care the Roman People lookt after the Children of Kings, who were their Friends. With this answer Prusias was dismiss'd: and order'd to be presented with gifts to the value of a hundred thousand Sesterces; fifty pounds weight of silver Vessels; besides, that they thought fit to present his Son Nicomedes also with several things to the same value as they had done to Magsaba, Son to King Massinissa: and that Victims, with other things, belonging to a Sacrifice (whether he would offer them at Rome, or at Preneste,) should be prepared for the King out of the publick stock, as they were for the Roman Magistrates. And that of the Navy, which was at Brundisium, twenty long Ships should be assign'd for his use: till he came to the Fleet, which was given him as a present. L. Cornelius Scipio was commanded, not to stir from him, but to provide all necessaries for him and his Retinue, till they were on board their Ship. They say, the King was mightily pleas'd with the kind and bounteous Entertainment, which the Roman People gave him: that he himself refus'd the Presents; but bid his Son take the gift of the Roman People. This account our Writers give of Prusias. But Polybius sayes, that that King was not worthy of so great and so majestic a Title: in that he wore a Roman Pileus [a Cap]; had his head shaved; us'd to go and meet the [Roman] Embassadors, and call himself the Libertus [i. e. a Freed man, who had been a Slave] of the Roman People. [He also sayes,] That at Rome, when he came into the Senate House, he bow'd down and kiss'd the threshold; calling the Senate the Gods that preserv'd him: with many other expressions, which were not so honourable to those that heard him, as they were usefully for him to use. Having staid about the City some thirty days, he went back for his own Kingdom.

F I N I S.

S U P P L E M E N T S

O F T H E

Several Gaps (or places wanting) in the five last Books (pretermitted by John Freinshemius, and) filled up by Monsieur John Dujatius, which (in imitation of him) we here add altogether by themselves, because we would not intermix other mens words with Livy's, yet with References to the respective Folio's to which each matter belongs.

The Beginning of the One and fortieth Book, or first of the Fifth Decade, fol. 791.

NOW had the Romans carried their victorious Arms into all the three Parts of the World. Not content to be confined to their native Italy, with their Swords they cut their way into Regions vastly remote each from other, and separated by Several Seas. All which they invaded by a continual Train of Successes, not so much checkt, as render'd more active, by some very few intervening Disasters. Spain, the most Western part of the European Continent, they had made themselves Masters of, having traversed the Gallick and Iberian Seas, and beat out the Carthaginians. Afterwards passing the Adriatick Gulph into Greece (where Europe extends furthest Eastward) they soon forced that whole Country to truckle to their Power, when once they had subdued the Macedonians, a People that formerly bid fair for the Empire of the World. Moreover beyond the Aegean Sea, so much of Asia, as lies on this side the Cliffs of Mount Taurus, was taught by Antiochus's Overthrow to revere the Majesty of Rome. As for Africa, it was already at their devotion: For what could withstand them after they had vanquish'd Carthage? In fine, there was scarce any thing altogether free from the Gripes of their Power; only the Names of Kings remained, and Nations were not called their Subjects, but their Allies and Confederates, under the shadow of which Title they enjoy'd, though not the thing it self, yet a certain resemblance of Liberty.

But still the Destinies either ow'd, or design'd somewhat greater for Rome: For that nothing might be wanting to its Sovereign Dignity and Supreme Command of the World, Fortune provided notable occasions by the supine Errours and vain Tumults of her Rival Enemies to spread her Empire, and advance her Power, especially the Vices of Perseus King of Macedonia, who usurped that Government by fraud, and managed it accordingly, his Cruelty towards his Country-men which render'd him universally hated, his unreasonable Covetousness amidst such vast Treasures, and his Lightness and Inconstancy both in taking and executing Councils, did both ruine him, and all others that might else have been able to preserve themselves as long as that Bridle of the Roman Power and Bulwark of Greece, should have continued. But by these Extravagancies, though at first he had not only the advantage of them, as to the situation of his Country, and in strength and numbers of men, and plenty of all things, but also in the Fortune of the War, yet in a very little time he brought both himself and others to destruction. For presently his Overthrow drew on the Ruine not only of his Neighbours, but even distant Nations shared in the Effects of his Calamity: The Fate of Carthage and the Acheans following that of Macedonia, and with their Disasters astonishing all other States, the yoke thenceforwards was every where to be received alike, and as well free Kingdoms as Associates, must be content to be governed as Roman Provinces. But being now to relate how all these Occurrences (not so considerable for the grandeur or difficulty of the Actions themselves, as the magnificent Enlargement of Dominion that thence accrued) did happen in their proper Series of time, it will be necessary that we look back to the Consulship of M. Junius Brutus, and A. Manlius Vulso, for so far this work had already proceeded.

In the beginning of the year, when the Consuls and Prætors were entred upon their Offices, they divided the Provinces between them by Lot; To A. Manlius Vulso one of the Consuls happen'd Gallia; To the other, M. Junius Brutus, the Ligurians; To M. Titinius Curvus the City Jurisdiction; To T. Claudius Nero that of the Foreigners; P. Atilius Ligus had Sicily; T. Aebutius Carus, Sardinia; Another M. Titinius the hithermost Spain, and T. Fonteus Capito the furthestmost; but till they should arrive there, T. Sempromius Gracchus and L. Posthumius Albinus were to continue in their Commands. Before the Consuls set out towards their Provinces, a Fire happening in the Forum, destroy'd abundance of Houses, and amongst the rest burnt the Temple of Venus down to the ground: Besides (which most of all terrified the peoples minds) the Sacred Fire in Vesta's Temple happen'd to be extinguish'd, and the Virgin that had the charge thereof was scourged by the Command of M. Aemilius Lepidus the Pontiff. To expiate these ill Omens, Supplications were held according to Custom; and to appease the Gods the Consuls offer'd the greater Sacrifices. A Survey of the City was about this time taken by M. Aemilius Lepidus and M. Fulvius Nobilior the Censors, and the number of Citizens enroll'd was two hundred seventy three thousand two hundred forty four Heads.

C c c c c

out

T. Gracchus the Proprætor stoutly carried on that War, which he had last year prosperously begun against the Celtiberians. He was yet but in the prime of his youth, and excelling all men of that Age both for prudence and industry, had himself conceived hopes of performing extraordinary Actions, and infused the same opinion into his Souldiers; therefore having Advice that the Enemy with twenty thousand men had besieged Carabis, a City in Alliance with the Romans, he hastened with all expedition to relieve it. But the Town was so straitly invested, that there seem'd no way to send them in word, that assistance was coming, till the Courage of Cominius undertook that desperate Service, who being a Captain of a Troop of Horse, put himself into Spanish Habit, and mingling himself amongst the Enemies Troopers that were abroad a foraging, with them returned into their Camp; where taking his opportunity, he rode away full speed to the City, and informed them, That Tiberius was upon his March. With which News the Townsmen being raised from the extremity of despair, to joy and confidence, made such a resolute Defence, as gave Gracchus sufficient opportunity to come up. The Enemy in the mean time, seeing they could do little good by force of Arms, betook themselves to a Stratagem, which caus'd no small confusion in the Roman Camp. Out of the several Towns which Cato a while before had all in one day caus'd to be dismantled of their Walls, a vast multitude were flock'd together as to a new City, at a place which they call'd Complega; from whence to the number of twenty thousand men, they went in the Habit of Suppliants, carrying Olive-branches in their hands, till they came within sight of the Roman Camp, where they made an halt for a little time, as if they came to beg for Peace; but on a sudden flinging away their Ensigns of petitioning, they fell to brandishing and clattering their Arms, and with an horrible Clamour rush'd in to the Camp, where all were put into a consternation both by their fury and their noise. But this Fraud of the Barbarians, Gracchus by a like Artifice eluded and beat back on their heads. For pretending to fly, he quitted the Camp; but no sooner were they got into it, and busie a plundering, but he rallies his Army, and in good earnest falls upon them, and not only slew a great part of them, but seized the City from whence they came. After this pushing on his good Fortune, he compell'd innumerable Towns, exhausted with the Calamities of War, to surrender themselves, and subdued the neighbouring Nations. Then dividing the Lands amongst the Poor, and assigning to every Nation their certain bounds, he made a League with all the Celtiberians and the People adjacent who had sided with them, whereby he brought over a considerable part of Spain to an Alliance with the Romans; and their Posterity embraced the same Treaty as a Law, which makes that seem less wonderful, which is related by Polybius, viz. That Gracchus took by Force or subverted three hundred Cities of the Celtiberians; which Possidonius thinks to be a Fiction, and that the Actions of that Expedition were augmented beyond all measure in favour of Gracchus, since neither the Extent of the Country, nor its Nature, could yield so many Cities in that dry and barren Soil. And the Spaniards, except those that border on our Seas, though they are very numerous, build and inhabit Villages rather than Cities; nor are they a few of them that lead a life almost like Savages in the Woods, troublesome to those more Civil people that dwell near them. But we must consider, that under the Name of Celtiberians were comprehended all those neighbouring Nations who were in League with them. As on the one side, the Arcvæans, Carpetans, Oretanes, and other People about the River Tagus; and on the other, side the Vascons towards the River Iberus, amongst whom he rebuilt the Town Gacchunis a perpetual Monument of his Valour and Atchievements, which place the Spaniards formerly call'd Illurcis. The same Summer L. Postuminius Governour of the farther Spain in quality of Proprætor, routed the Enemy, killing forty thousand of them, and subdued the Lusitanians and Vaccæans.

Whilst these things were doing, A. Manlius Vulso the Consul, whose Province, we told you, was the Cisalpine Gallia, seeing all that Country in a profound Peace, and no hopes for him to acquire a Triumph on either side of the Po, unless it were beyond the Alps, grew desirous to advance his Arms another way; and luckily it happen'd that some Commotions of the Islyrians and Illyrians (though they were rather predatory Excursions by Sea and Land upon Roman Allies, than warlike Invasions) invited him to pass the Bounds of Italy. Those people always enured to Robbery and Spoil were grown weary of their Peace, though they both had long since made tryal to their Cost of the Roman Puissance. The Illyrians having been weakned with several Overthrows, especially in the days of their Queen Tenta, whom Cn. Fulvius Centumalus and A. Posthumius Albinus, having attacked with Forces both by Sea and and Land, deprived of part of her Kingdom, and forced her to beg Peace upon very hard Terms, some few years before the beginning of the second Punic War. Not long after which, viz. about forty three years since, the Islyrians were defeated by the two Consuls, P. Cornelius Scipio Asina, and M. Minucius Rufus, and almost utterly subdued; but afterwards their Spirits in a new Generation being elevated, they returned to their old Trade of affronting the Romans, their new Princes in each place not restraining, but rather encouraging the insolence of their people. The Ruler of the Illyrians was Gentius the Son of Parluratus, who in the heat of his youthful blood was fond to have armed that which, &c. [as fol. 791. aforesaid.]

A Supplement of two Gaps near together at the End of the eighteenth Chapter of the same Book, fol. 799.

C. Valerius having heard of the death of his Collegue Q. Petillius, leads his Army against the Ligurians, and joining his own Troops with those who lately under the others Conduct, had driven the Enemy out of the Mountains, did so inclose and defeat them, that he abundantly sacrificed them to his Partners Ghost. Hence returning to Rome, and admitted to Audience by the Senate in the Temple of Bellona, he gave an account both of Petillius's Actions and his own, demanding a Triumph for himself, and such Honours to be done to his Collegues Memory, as the dead were capable of. A Supplication was order'd for two days, and a Triumph granted him, but upon that Legion by whom Petillius was, if not deserted, yet at least not so valiantly defended as they ought to have done, the Fathers thought fit to lay a Mark of their Displeasure, by an Order, That they should have no Pay for that year. Some few days after Valerius triumphed over the Ligurians, being drawn in a stately Chariot with four Horses through the City to the Capitol.

After this, the holding of the Assemblies for chusing Consuls and Prætors, came to be considered, touching which there happen'd no small Debate in the Senate, because C. Valerius the only surviving Consul of all the three that had been the last year, was not chosen in the beginning of the year, but subrogated in the room of Cn. Cornelius Scipio Hispanus deceased during his Magistracy. Now those that were skill'd in Religious Rites and the Common Laws of the Nation, said, That seeing both the ordinary Consuls of that year happen'd to be taken off, one by a natural Death, and the other by the Wars, the Consul substituted in the room of either of them, could not legally hold the aforesaid Assemblies. And the Pontiffs being consulted, declaring themselves to be of the same Opinion, the matter came to an Interregency. And by the Court held by the Inter-regent, there were chosen Consuls, P. Mucius Scævola, and M. Aemilius Lepidus the second time: Next day Prætors were created, viz. C. Popilius Lenas, T. Annius Læsus, C. Memmius Gallus, C. Cluvius Saxula, Sext. Cornelius Sulla, and App. Claudius Centho. Amongst whom the Provinces were thus allotted, to the Consuls the Cisalpine Gallia and Liguria, the latter to Mucius, the former to Lepidus. Of the Prætors, Cluvius had the City-Jurisdiction; Annus the Foreign; Pop. Lenas, Sicily; Memmius the higher Spain; Corn. Sulla, Sardinia; Centho the further Spain. How many and what Legions, or Forces of the Latine Allies, were assigned to each, the Ancients are silent. However it can scarce be doubted, but before they went to their respective Provinces, they did by the Senate's Order inspect the Sibylline Books, and according to the Decemvirs report command proper Sacrifices and Supplications to be made for appeasing the Gods. For at that time there happen'd a grievous Mortality of men, and a more grievous Murrain of Cattel which continued till the year following. And 'tis said, though the Lanes in the Fields, and streets in the City, were strew'd with Carcasses, even the Vultures, the most ravenous of all Birds of Prey, would not eat, nor so much as touch them; such a most loathsome stench and poisonous infection exhaled from their putrified bowels. But after all Sacred Rites due and accustomed were performed, they departed in usual State to their several Charges. And Lepidus having quickly and with little difficulty routed the Boii and other Gauls that dwelt near the Banks of the Po, and made them glad to beg for Peace, that he might keep the Ligurians, that dwelt up in the Land behind him, in subjection, and prevent their joining with those on the Sea Coasts against his Collegue, he led his Forces that way. Now on this side the Appennine, &c. [as fol. 799.]

The Supplement of what is wanting at the End of the nineteenth Chapter, fol. 799.

Which was left without Defence. And at first suspected some Stratagem, but at last entred it without any opposition, and were going to plunder it, when on a sudden being advertized by a Messenger, what imminent danger their own City was in, they thought it better to burn the Camp and all that was therein, that the Pillage might be no hinderance to their speedy March to raise that Siege. The Bastarnans seeing at once their own Tents on fire, and the Enemy ready to fall upon their backs, being thereby on the one side destitute of all Provisions and military Necessaries, which by long foraging they had there heaped up, out of 587.

Cccccc 2

Anno
U. C.

all

all the neighbouring Country; and on the other part suspecting the fidelity of Perseus who call'd them in, had their minds more busied how to run away than fight; Besides, they call'd to mind the late Calamity inflicted on their Countrymen, as by the manifest vengeance of the Gods; therefore having wasted all things thereabouts, they hastned further off to supply themselves with Victuals; they were indeed a vast multitude, but the Women and Children not fewer in number than the armed men; Thus they rambled scatteringly about, without any certain Conduct, or common resolution, but as every ones hopes or fears, their love to their Relations, or the care of their private concerns at home led them, so they endeavour'd to consult their own and their Friends safety, all agreeing in this one design (though scarce in any thing else) to get to their own respective Habitations as soon as they could. Nor did the Dardanians offer very much to pursue them, conscious to themselves that they were inferiour in numbers, and since the Enemy of their own accord were retreated out of their Country, they were content with having gain'd the point for which they took Arms, and thought it not prudential to tempt further hazard. The Bastarnians wearied with several days hard marches and great want, coming up to the River Ister which bounds their Country, were not a little joyful, both at the sight of their native soil, as also to find the River somewhat more early in the Winter than usual, so hard frozen over as promised them a safe and easy passage; but their whole Army venturing on all at once, and as it were in an heap, the multitude of people and Horses was too heavy for the Ice to bear, so that about the middle of the River it broke, swallowing them all up in a moment. Some Authors place this destruction of the Bastarnians sooner, as if upon their march out of their own Country they and their Wives and Children were thus destroyed; but this is confuted by the Dardanians Embassy to Rome, imploring aid against them, which shews they were not only pass'd the Ister, but advanc'd a good way into Thrace; nor want there some who think that Perseus mistrusting the consequences of their assistance, join'd with the Dardanians to complot their ruin, and secretly supply'd the latter with Forces. 'Tis certainly difficult to determine whether he entertain'd the news of their disaster with joy or grief, so variously was he always agitated by the different Passions of Covetousness and Hope, Fraud and Fear; For now he might count it no small advantage to be freed, not only from the payment of those rewards, with the large promises of which, he had drawn those Barbarians into Thrace; but also from all fears of danger from their revenge, which might have followed upon the refusal or non-payment thereof; Besides, he flatter'd himself, that now they were sent packing into another World, he should be able more easily to clear himself from any suspicions the Romans might have, as if he had hired those Auxiliaries against them, and so for the future enjoy a firm Peace with that mighty Nation, for he had suffer'd himself to be coaks'd by Marcus with some such vain hopes. But when he saw the storm of the War still approaching nearer him, terrified with the incredible preparations and numerous Forces of the Romans, he then began to lament the loss of so great an accession of strength, as those Bastarnians might have afforded him; and to fear, that the Dardanians perpetual Enemies to the Macedonians, now that curb was removed, would boldly make incursions into his Kingdom behind, whilst the Romans invaded it in the Front. To enable himself the better to weather out this double tempest, he too late seeks shelter in Alliances with neighbouring Princes and Nations, and yet persevered not in that necessary design with that constancy and diligence as the doubtful posture of his Affairs required. These things past in Macedonia towards the latter end of the Winter.

About this time Antiochus Son of Antiochus the Great, upon the Death of his Brother Seleucus, came to the Crown of Syria. The said Seleucus eldest Son of Antiochus, weakned with those Overthrows his Father had received, having held the Kingdom near twelve years in sloth and ease, without ennobling his Reign with any Honourable Achievements, recall'd his Brother Antiochus from Rome into Syria, sending his Son Demetrius to remain there in his stead as Hostage; But Antiochus in his return was scarce got to Athens, when Seleucus was treacherously murder'd by Heliodorus, one of his Nobles; who aim'd at the Crown, but was restrain'd by the opposition of Eumenes and Attalus, objecting, That he was altogether a stranger to the Blood Royal; And the same two Princes receiving Antiochus at his Arrival with all kind of Friendship and respect, by their interest establish'd him in the Throne. I cannot affirm, whether their officious regards towards this new King were increased by the recommendation of the people of Rome, or whether the same proceeded merely from their natural propension towards the Brothers and the Royal Family. For some write as if their good will to him might arise from some jealousies and offences arising about that time between them and the Romans. However Antiochus by this assistance taking upon him the Crown, was by his unexpected Arrival so welcome to his Subjects, that they gave him the Surname of Epiphanes [or The Illustrious] because whilst Strangers were ready to usurp the Government, he arose to assert the Rights of his Family, shining like some new bright Star to all his people; having possess'd himself not only of Syria, but other distant Regions of Asia, even beyond the Rivers Euphrates and Tigris, without any opposition; and enter'd into a strict Friendship and League with Eumenes, he then waged War with Artaxias King of Armenia, and took him Prisoner. But as the manners of absolute Monarchs, who have have no other Laws but their own pleasures and inclinations, are apt for the most part to decline and grow worse and worse, and on the other side nothing is more fickle and various than the humours and affections of the people, and especially the Syrian temper is above most others inconstant; his Subjects continued not long those dutiful regards wherewith they first welcom'd him to the Crown, but their hearts were so far alienated, that whom before they had honour'd with a surname of Admiration, they now Characterize with a nick-name of Reproach, and instead of Epiphanes call him Epimanes, that is, The Madman, instead of The Illustrious. The truth is, after those first Actions which we have recounted in the beginning of his Reign, he took up an odd new course of Life, no less unusual to, than unbecoming Kings; and acted the part rather of a private person than of a Prince, or even so much as that of any petty Magistrate; The Causes of this strange Conduct are very uncertain, whether it were to engage his own Subjects affections by these excesses of popularity, or whether he fancied he should better deserve the favour of the Romans by imitating their Customs, or whether (as 'tis most likely) it was merely a Crotchet arising from his natural lightness of mind and vanity. So it was, That frequently he would secretly and unknown to his chief Officers, get out of his Palace, and with two or three Attendants ramble up and down the City, sometimes running into the Shops of Carvers and Statuaries, or any other Mechanics, and hold a Chat with them, affecting to seem very skillful in their several Trades; sometimes he would publickly enter into Discourse without any occasion with any of the Rabble that he met in the street, now and then he would haunt the drinking Houses, and carouze stoutly with any shabby Pot-Companions. If he heard there was any where a merry meeting to be of young men, either by day or by night, away would he go, and unexpectedly surprize them, carrying along with him his Cup and his Musick, and make one amongst them, so that daunted with his unlookt for presence, many of them would flink away, others astonish'd with the novelty of the adventure sat as mute as Fishes, till time and Wine recover'd their spirits, and then they were all hail-fellow-well-met, the King not disdain-ing their poor Earthen Pots, nor their rude drunken Catches and bawdy Songs, with which, when they were got tipsy, they made the Welkin roar. He would also many times wash himself in the publick Baths, amongst the common Rabble, and distribute Gally-Pots fill'd with unguents of most excellent scent and great price, to all that wash'd near him. Afterwards he would leave off his Royal Robes, and instead thereof put on a white Gown, as he had seen those at Rome wear, who put in for Honours and Offices, and so walk about the Market-place as their Candidates were wont to do, shaking every Plebeian by the hand, and embracing him, humbly desiring their Vote to make him sometimes an Ædile, and sometimes a Prætor, and when to humour him the people by their suffrages had conferr'd upon him those Offices, then he after the Roman manner, sat on an Ivory Throne as Judge, &c. [fol. 799.]

A Supplement of the fifth defective Passage after the twentieth Chapter, fol. 800.

Now by his own Kingdom was furnish'd with Gladiators enow, who voluntarily offer'd themselves to play at Sharps for a small reward. But as this perhaps might pass well enough, so 'tis certain the Pomp of that Martial Pageantry or Mock-show of an Army, and the publick Banquet which he gave the people, though the same were exceeding rich and of incredible Expence, yet they were rendred vile, contemptible and ridiculous by his Apish Tricks and scurrilous Actions. For when he had from all parts called the most excellent Artifts to compose a rare and extraordinary Show, and had invited all the chief Persons throughout Asia and all Greece, to be partakers in the diversion of so famous an Entertainment. As for the Furniture of the Sports indeed, whether you regard the number and stately Equipage of the Men and Horses therein employ'd, all glittering with Purple and Silver, with Gold and precious Stones; or whether you respect in the Feast the exquisite and prodigal Delicacies and innumerable Dishes of all kinds, it must be acknowledged, that he far exceeded the Endeavours of all former Princes. But as to the Method and dispose of the whole Entertainment, of which he himself would needs have the sole management, it appear'd disorderly and altogether unworthy of a King. For mounted on a little sorry Gelding, he rode whippetting to and fro through the Cavalcade, sometimes without any reason, bidding these go on, and by and by those to stand still, so that the whole March was full of confusion, and had nothing in it of Gravity or Military Order. As for the publick Treat, he was there too as foolish and impertinent, for he would clap himself down by this or the other person as they sat at meat without any difference, and sometimes lye down all along on his back; then on a sudden he would start up, and run about all the Tables, and pledge those Healths that were every where drank to him. At last, their Revelling having continued till very late in the night, when many having got their load, were stagger'd away as well as they could, he was brought in by a Company of Players, rather wrapt up in Linen, than cloathed, and by and by, without any regard gard to his own Quality, the Spectators, or common modesty, as if he had been awakened by the Mulick, he jumps forth stark naked, and dancing with the Jack-puddings, put himself into such ridiculous postures, that all that were present, for very shame withdrew and departed. Thus those that from all parts were assembled at this Show, as often as they mentioned the Grandeur of the Preparations and Magnificence of the Sport, were wont greatly to admire the Wealth of the King and Kingdom; but when they reflected on the King himself, and his Deportment, they could not without astonishment think how in one and the same person there should be such a prodigious mixture of Vertues and Vices, or that so brave a lofty and Royal Mind, furnish'd with many extraordinary good Qualities, should also give entertainment to so many monstrous and most clownish Depravities. But as it would be difficult to set forth all his Freaks and extravagant Expences, so neither is it worth while; this only I think fit to add, That by observing no end nor measure in consuming, and most prodigally wasting, or rather playing the Mad-man, with the Tributes, Taxes, and almost innumerable Revenues of that vast and most flourishing Empire, he utterly exhausted both his own Exchequer, and his Subjects Purfes, and was reduced to such extremity of Poverty, as to be forced to prey upon and pillage not only prophane things, but after he had first impoverish'd Syria, and the most Eastern Countries, and then plundered Egypt of all its Riches, he could not forbear the very Temples, and those Presents which had been made and dedicated to the Gods: Among the rest, having by treachery got possession of Jerusalem, he with vast slaughter of the Citizens, ransack'd that Temple which Alexander the Great presumed not to violate, in which the Jews (a People most strictly tenacious of their Religion) worshipp'd The invisible Deity, only to be apprehended by the mind, and never spared for any cost in his service; but this ravenous Prince carried away all the Gold, Silver and Precious Utensils, which the most liberal Devotion of the people in so many years had there accumulated. After this he attempted to spoil a certain Temple either of Diana or Venus amongst the Elymaei, very highly esteemed, and fill'd with rich Offerings, and amongst the rest, certain Coats of Mail and Shields of Alexander's, richly beset with Precious Stones, were there said to be kept: But by the concurrence of the Priests and Inhabitants, he was repulsed, not without the loss of some of his Company, and so forced to fly back to Babylon, where, for grief at his ill success, he fell into a Consumption, and is believ'd to have been cut off by an untimely death, through the just vengeance of that Deity, whose Temple he had sacrilegiously offered to rife; nay, some there are who write, That he and his Army were destroyed in the very Attempt. Others relate much such like Passages touching the Death of his Father Antiochus, when he went about to plunder a most opulent Temple of Jupiter or Belus, in the same Province of Elymais. But these Foreign Transactions (a great part of which happened some years after) have taken us off longer than our manner is, from the prosecution of our Domestick Affairs; And since we are so seldom guilty in that respect, we hope this one Sally will the more easily be excused.

Anno
U. C.
578. In the end of this Year, Ti. Sempronius Gracchus the Proconsul, having overcome the Sardinians, surrendered the Government of that Island to Sex. Cornelius the Prætor, and returned to Rome for a Triumph; which, as he had most justly deserved, so the same was granted him Nemine contradicente. He is reported to have brought with him such a multitude of Prisoners, that men being wearied with the long Anclion when they were exposed to Sale under the Spear, according to custom, made it a Proverb, when they would express a dull Market, or a bad Commodity that would not go off, they would cry, Sardi venales, Here are Sardinians to be sold. Both the Consuls likewise triumphed over the Ligurians and Gauls, and, as far as we can conjecture by ancient Monuments, it was a Victory at Sea gave P. Sævola the Honour of a Triumph. But whether He or his Colleague M. Lepidus held the Comitia for the next Year, is uncertain: but the Consuls then created were Sp. Posthumius Albinus and Q. Mucius Sævola. In the Assembly for chusing Prætors, amongst the rest of the Candidates, it happened that L. Cornelius Scipio the Son of P. Africanus, and Q. Cicereius, who had been his Father's Secretary, were put up in competition; and so far it seems was this young Scipio degenerated from his Father's Vertues, and thought to have sullied the Cornelian Name, with so many filthy Vices; that Cicereius, by the Suffrages of all the Centuries, had undoubtedly been preferred before him, had not he himself amended this fault of Fortune, or mistake of the Assembly, (call it which you please) by his own modesty, which could not endure to wear an Honour snatcht from his Patron's Son: wherefore, withdrawing himself, he flung off his white Gown, renounced his Pretensions, and of a Competitor, certain of Victory, chose rather to shew himself a grateful Client, and become a Voter for his Antagonist. Thus the Honour which the people seemed not willing to grant him, Scipio, by the help of Cicereius, obtain'd, but with greater Glory to the latter in refusing, than to the former in enjoying that Dignity. The other Prætors were, C. Cassius Longinus, P. Furius Philus, L. Claudius Asellus, M. Atilius Serranus and Cn. Servilius Capio. The Consuls consulted the Senate touching the Provinces and Commonwealth, who assign'd Liguria to them both, but divided in several Regions. The dispatch of the Sacred Ceremonies, and especially the compleating of their Levies retarded their Advance very much, which I conceive may be be the cause that we find no memorable Action performed by them. The Prætors had now taken their Provinces by Lot, C. Cassius Longinus, the City Jurisdiction; L. Cornelius Scipio, had the Foreign Jurisdiction, &c. [fol. 800.] dele there, the following words [of the City].

In the 27th Chapter of this 41 Book, fol. 803. there is a small defect; all that remains in the Latine Copies being these broken Syllables— Et dam, & metas trans & caveas ferreas pe intrmitterentur: Which Marcellus Donatus thinks should be thus— Et Rhedam & metas transitus, & caveas ferreas, per quas intrmitterentur Fera. In English thus, Likewise a Flying Chariot, and Turn-pikes for the passage, and Iron Grates, through which the wild Beasts were to be let in.

In the same Chapter and Folio, there is another Mark of something wanting; but it is only the word [dicebat] in the Latine, which is suppl'd in the English; and so the Reader may be pleas'd to number that Mark among the Errata as being needful.

In the Eight and twentieth Chapter, after the word Revenues, what is wanting is supposed to be only these three words [Restor'd the Allies] brought home, &c. [as fol. 804.]

A Supplement of the first defective Passage in the 43<sup>d</sup>. Book, after the third Chapter, fol. 832.

—their Friend or Enemy; He [the said Gelussa] also intreated the Senate not to give any credit to the Carthaginians Complaints against Masinissa, assuring them that the same proceeded from no other Fountain than their inveterate hate against the Romans, and his Father's Good Will and hearty inclinations to their service; That as for his Father, his care should always be to prefer those Conditions and Terms of the League, which the Romans had prescribed, before any of his particular Advantages whatsoever; Or rather would esteem all his Advantages wrapt up and included in reverencing their Authority and obeying their Commands. That he desired nothing more passionately than peace; but either to defend his antient Patrimony, or in Gratitude to the Romans for their former favours, he was continually either by the violence, or under-hand practices of the Carthaginians, forced to take Arms; who either forgetting their former overthrows, or by the memory thereof exasperated to revenge, could not bear those few years of peace, but thereby put up with too much wealth, began to hanker after their former Empire, and first intended to breathe themselves, and make tryal of their strength upon their Neighbours, that so they might thereafter be able to shake off their Conqueror's Yoke; 'Twas with this design (continued he) that lately, when the Romans were engaged in a War with the Celtiberians, and other Spaniards infested the Coasts of Numidia, they sent Carthalo General of their Auxiliaries against us: who, under pretence of visiting the Frontiers of his Province, unexpectedly fell upon the Camp of Masinissa, which lay hard by in peace, within the bounds assign'd him by your Ambassadors, and kill'd and took Prisoners not a few of his men, and besides stirred up the Peasants of Africk to rebel, and to this very day cease not to vex our people with continual Incursions and Devastations. It concerns you therefore, Noble Senators! by your prudence and power to chastize their insolences, and to restrain these common Enemies from such like injuries, by maintaining the peace, and making good your own Gifts to an Associate King, that they may be as lasting to him, as his Fidelity shall be perpetual towards you. The Gods have bestow'd on you Empire; as for us, we shall esteem the Glory of obeying your Commands, as the Will of the Celestial Powers, equal to the most enlarged Dominion.

Then were the Carthaginian Ambassadors admitted, who lamentably remonstrated much what the same Grievances, as they had complained of last Year. And though the Particulars did not certainly appear, yet it could scarce be doubted, but Masinissa, emboldned by our friendship, had attempted many things beyond his Commission, the Senate winking thereat, as willing for Reasons of State to have the power of Carthage weakened. The Answer return'd to both was, That the Senate would shortly send Commissioners, who upon the place should examine all differences, and determine therein according to Justice and Equity, and in the mean time both Parties to forbear all Acts of Hostility. Nor was that the only reason of dispatching such Commissioners thither, but also to make an inspection into the Carthaginians present state, whose fidelity, as it was always wavering and suspected, so especially since the beginning of the Macedonian War, their minds were set upon new hopes and designs, and distracted with several Factions: For some few of the Nobles were firm to the Romans, and the Head of that Party was Hanno, surnamed by his Country-men, the Great. Others, but not very many, favoured King Masinissa, and their Leader was that Annibal whom for distinction they called Pfavis; whether some similitude of a Sparrow, or of a Galley (for the word seems to signify both) gave at first cause for that Appellation. But the far greater part were for gratifying the humours of their own Commons, and join'd with Amilcar Samias, and of the same Faction was Carthalo.

The Commissioners arriv'd not in Africk before King Masinissa had made himself Master of the Territories in Question, and then, not as Judges but Arbitrators, compos'd the Differences, without any long hearing of the Cause, with this final Award, That each Party should should retain what they were at present in possession of : But they could not without astonishment behold the City Carthage so full of Inhabitants and flourishing in Riches ; for so wonderfully, by the advantages of the place, and ingenuity and industry of the people, had it thriv'd in twenty years space, that there were not the least tokens left of the calamities of the former Wars, or that hard Siege they had sustained.

About the time these Commissioners Embark'd for Africa, the Comitia were held at Rome, and Hostilius Mancinus, and Attilius Serranus chosen Consuls for the ensuing year. After which were created Prætors Q. Menius, M. Recius, and L. Hortensius, for their Names are Recorded, but who the rest were is not certainly express'd in any Authors extant ; The Province of Macedonia was allotted to Hostilius the Consul, and Italy to Hortensius ; The City Jurisdiction fell to Recius, that of Foreigners to Menius, The Navy and Guard of the Sea Coast to Hortensius. If we may guess from the Consuls of the following years, (who rarely arriv'd at that Honour, before they had serv'd a Prætorship) there are two that may not improbably be thought to have been Prætors this year, viz. Q. Aulus Pater, and T. Manlius Torquatus, the former coming to be Consul the third year after with M. Junius, the latter the fifth year after, with C. n. Octavius, as appears by the Registry of the Consuls kept in the Capitol ; and, perhaps, the sixth Prætor of this year might be Q. Hostilius Tubulus, for the year following, he was the third person join'd in Commission with C. Popillius Lænas, (who had been Consul) and C. Decimius (who had serv'd as Prætor) when they were sent into Egypt to compose the War between Antiochus King of Syria, and the Ptolomies ; now it can scarce be believ'd, That he should be employ'd in so Honourable an Embassy, and with persons of that quality, if he had not already serv'd some Office of State ; and these three 'tis probable might manage the Provinces of Sicily, Sardinia and Spain.

In the mean time P. Licinius Crassus, the last years Consul, of whose unsuccessful Skirmishes with Perfers, we have spoken before, Quarter'd some part of the Winter in Thessaly, but longer in Boeotia ; nor did he afterwards perform any thing memorable, unless we should reckon amongst his famous Exploits, the taking of some Towns, whilst King Perfers was absent far off in Macedonia, and plundering them outrageously, and yet not content therewith, selling the Inhabitants for Slaves. Nor were the Cities on the Sea-Coast any better treated by C. Lucretius the Proprætor, and the rest of the Captains of the Fleet, who committed many outrages on their own Allies ; which injuries being afterwards complain'd off, the Senate reliev'd them as far as they could, and particularly the Coroneans, whom Crassus had sold for Slaves, were by a Decree restored to their Liberties.

Corys seeing part of his Territories possess'd by the Troops of Eumenes, and Atlesbes a neighbouring petty King, and that he was unable to beat them out, especially since the Dardanians threaten'd him on the other Quarter, ceased not to implore and importune Perfers for assistance according to the Treaty between them ; who judging it not for his interest to abandon Corys, who almost alone had openly taken the Macedonians part, got together some Squadrons of Horse out of the next Garrisons, and part of a Phalanx [or Battalion of Foot] with whom he routed the Enemy, and restored the small principality call'd Maætenes to its former Lord ; Thence turning his Arms against the Dardanians, he not only restrain'd their Incursions, but coming upon their Army when they suspected no Enemy near, slew ten thousand, and forc'd the rest to fly over the Mountains, plentifully returning the terrour they had brought into Thrace upon their own Country, by laying wast their Fields, and destroying divers of their Towns, and so led back his Souldiers loaden with booty home to Macedonia ; his longer stay in those parts being hindred by Intelligence, that the Romans were hovering on the Sea-Coasts, and threaten'd the Frontiers of Thessaly and Illyricum.

About this time, viz. whilst P. Licinius Crassus, and C. Cassius Longinus were Consuls, we find in the Annals of Cassinius, that a certain Girl, under her Parents tuition, was turn'd into a Boy, and by that change of Sex, being esteem'd a Monster, was by the Order of the Soothsayers, carried into and left in a desert Island.

M. Junius Pennus the Prætor, sailing over into his Province, the hithermost Spain, with a supply of eight thousand Foot and four hundred and fifty Horse ; found all things amongst the Celiberians and the other Nations allied with them, put into confusion by the Arts, or rather Furies of one particular man, named Olonicus (or Salondicus as some call him) who had infligated them to an Insurrection, with assurances of certain Victory ; who for being a Fellow endued with no less Craft than boldness, he took upon him to act as a kind of Prophet, and brandishing a silver Spear (which he pretended was sent him from Heaven) he so fill'd the heads of the Barbarians with his Whimsies, that by his persuasions they took Arms in greater multitudes than ever before ; of which the Prætor having advice, before he march'd against them, made it his business to engage the minds of the rest of the Provinces by all sorts of kindness and bounty, to continue faithful and peaceable. Then passing into the Borders of Celiberia encamped close by the Enemy, who then calling to mind their past overthrows began to tremble, which Salondicus perceiving, and that they did not sufficiently confide in his Oracles, he undertook an Enterprize worthy of that rashness and celestial assistance which he had hitherto boasted of ; which was to imitate the example example of Mucius Scaevola, and kill the Roman General in his own Tent, conceiving the thing easy to be done, and which if it succeeded, there would then be nothing more easy than to destroy the Army, being but as a Trunk without an Head, and by the Miracle of such an event confirming his Prophecies, he should be sure to acquire the highest Authority amongst his Countrymen ; The truth is, amongst so many Spaniards mixt amongst the Romans and serving them as Auxiliaries, (so that neither his Habit, nor Arms, nor Language, was like to be taken notice of), he had some reason to hope, that he might without much difficulty get into their Camp, and even up as far as the Prætors Pavilion, so taking with him a Companion as desperate as himself, towards night he makes towards the Roman Camp, and got to Junius's Tent without being question'd, but attempting to enter, one of the Guards run him through with a Javelin, and his Comrade likewise paid his Life for his Folly, both whose Heads, Junius caused to be stuck upon Spears, and to be delivered to certain Prisoners he had lately taken, commanding them to carry the same to their Countrymens Army, which when they came into the Camp, they caused such a consternation, &c. [fol. 832.]

The Supplement of the second defective Passage in the forty third Book, to be inserted at the End of that Book, fol. 840.

To lay out any money upon a thing of the greatest moment to him to all intents and purposes ; which neglect caus'd both his own and Gentius's ruine. Whilst by these Successes, the Roman Empire was augmented, the Fortunes of private persons were also increased, especially by the Macedonian Spoils ; and as their Wealth, so their Profuseness and Luxury grew every day greater and more extravagant, which gave occasion for a new Law. For as the Female Sex seem'd most obnoxious to this disease of superfluous Expences, having less opportunity to commit more grievous Crimes, so it was thought fit to provide, That there should not be too great a conflix of the Cities wealth into their slippery hands. To which purpose Q. Vocconius Saxa Aricinus a Tribune of the Commons, as if he design'd to shew himself no less severe a Censor to the Women, than Claudius and Gracchus had been to the Men ; promulgated an Ordinance of the Commons, whereby it was provided, That no person who since the Censorship of Q. Fulvius and A. Posthumius, that is, within five years last past, had been rank'd in the first Classis of Citizens for wealth, should by his Will make any Maid or Woman his Heir ; and those were to be reckon'd amongst the richer sort, and placed in the first Class, whose Patrimony amounted to one hundred thousand Asses and upwards. The Women quickly took the Alarm, and were not wanting to make all the interest they had in the World to ward off this threaten'd Blow ; and they had Advocates, who with very plausible Reasons defended their Cause. Therefore as the Matrons one and twenty years ago, when L. Valerius Flaccus and M. Porcius Cato were Consuls, stiffly oppos'd the Oppian Law, and stickled for their Mundus Muliebris, or the Privileges of their Dressing-boxes, and Honour of their fine Cloaths and Ornaments, so no less did they now bestir themselves to prevent the passing of this Law, which more nearly concern'd them ; for against the other, only the study of appearing neat and fine, had made them mutiny ; but against this they were excited both by Covetousness, and the desire of adorning themselves as they list, and spending as much as they pleas'd, each no small Argument to a Womans Reason : Nor can we easily determine which was of greater weight, since 'tis a Moot-point not yet resolv'd, whether their Beauty or their Money be most charming, or if the one do not please the men, as much as the other can do themselves ? Both the Nobles and Commons were bandied into opposite Factions about this business, and every one according to his Capacity, Understanding, or Interest, did either favour or decry the Bill. Some affirm'd, That the publick Liberty was therein concern'd, to undermine which they began with this small Essay, but succeeding therein, they would drive the wedge still further, and by degrees utterly subvert the Roman Freedoms : For what for the future would be left free, if that most ample Power of Bequeathing ones own Estate as one pleases, granted by the twelve Tables to all as private and domestick Legislators in their particular Fortunes, and for so many Ages observ'd inviolate, shall now by a new and special Law be taken away ? How strange a thing is it to treat them as Foreigners, and make them incapable of common Right, who have the same common Household Gods, the same Children, the same Sacred Rites in common with their Husbands ? If you are grown weary of the female Sex, or think the Commonwealth can subsist without them : 'twere better send them far away into solitary Deserts, and condemn them to perpetual Banishment ; 'twill sure look like a most unjust and unworthy proceeding, That all the while the Commonwealth was poor, we should allow the Ladies their share of its Goods, but strip them thereof now the State is become rich. Nor is this Sex only serviceable to help us to get Children and rock Cradles, or cool our amorous heats with divertive dalliance, but many times in Examples of Virtues, for noble Deeds and prudent Counsels, they do far exceed us men ; nay with these Estates of theirs, which are now, forsooth, become the ornaments of our Envy, 'tis well known they have supported the tottering State when it was almost quite overthrown with the violence of Annibal's Arms, and by a seasonable Supply from their liberal Purfes raised it again to its pristine strength and glory. To work the more commiseration were added the peculiar toils of that Sex, and the perils of Child-bearing, to them no less formidable than the hazards of War to men; nor was it forgot, that to this Sex was committed the keeping of the Eternal Vestal Fire, on which the Fate of the Roman Empire depended.

But all these Arguments were blown away by the breath of Marcus Cato, a man constant to the same opinion in his old Age, as he had maintain'd in the vigour of his youth; whose Oration on this occasion may be read in the fifth Book of Originals, the substance of which will be enough to be recited here. He was then in the sixty fifth year of his Age, yet with a loud Voice and strong Lungs, he remonstrated, That in vain were that distinction observ'd, from the very Infancy of the Commonwealth, between Agnati and Cognati, Kindred of the Fathers, and of the Mothers side; if the condition of Males and Females must be all alike; That it was far from the true intent and meaning of the twelve Tables to allow Women the whole Inheritance; but for the keeping up the name and honour of Families, every ones Sons in the first place were to be his Heirs, and for want of such Issue, then those next of his Blood; all which is according to natural right. Nor was the power granted to Fathers of Families to bequeath their Estates as they thought fit, design'd for this purpose, That being blinded with the inticements and flatteries of Women, they should transfer all their Estates into strange and new Families, and ruin their own; but rather to enable them the better to preserve and relieve their own Family, by leaving the Inheritance to their Sons, and competent Portions to their Daughters. But still care should be taken to make Women esteem Chastity, sparingness and obedience to be their best Dowry. To what purpose did our Ancestors so scrupulously provide, that they should be always held under the tutelage either of their Parents, Brethren, or next of Blood, if they shall be suffer'd to abuse vast Estates, and by the help thereof break through all the Obligations of the Laws and restraints of modesty? In fine, so strongly did he inveigh against female weakness, and so lively paint out their excesses, when Mistresses of large Fortunes, that he extorted a general consent; especially when he urg'd, That 'twas the custom of these rich and haughty Dames, upon their Marriage, to make an Agreement and bring such a considerable Portion to their Husbands, but reserve a greater share at their own dispose, than they would vouchsafe to afford them; which reserv'd money they would afterwards, at the Husbands request, lend him, or some part thereof; but upon the least falling out, they would set one of their own Servants, (reserv'd likewise, that the Husband had nothing to do with him) who should perpetually haunt and dun him no less importunately than if he were a strange Debtor, which was such an insolence as ought not to be endured. And therefore in indignation against that practice, all agreed to pass the said Law as Voconius had propos'd it.

The Supplement of the first defective passage in the forty fourth Book, at the end of the thirtieth Chapter, fol. 854.

Then the Fleet was conducted by the Prætor to Pantanchus, to defend the Confederate Cities from injuries. This Fleet was excellently Equipp'd and furnish'd with all necessaries, and besides the former Forces, had on Board, five thousand Mariners, for so many we told you before, were lately rais'd for the service of this present Illyrian War; but the Enemy scarce gave them opportunity to come to a full Engagement; For what could those Pirates, only enur'd to Rapine, dare or be able to do against such a well-appointed Fleet? which almost as soon as they saw, affrighted them, and made them by the lightness of their Vessels endeavour to secure themselves in a disorderly flight; some few of the foremost and heavier Ships, were presently, at the first on-set, partly sunk, and partly taken, and so yielded us a cheap and easy Victory; nor was that enough, but Anicius pursued those that thought to have escap'd, and coming up with a great number of them lying close amongst the Islands near the Continent, he with promises of Quarter, induc'd them to yield, and presently all the Islands that were subject to Gentius at first sight did likewise surrender themselves, &c. [As fol. 854.]

The Supplement of the second defective passage of the forty fourth Book, after the thirty second Chapter, fol. 855.

The Souldiers were order'd to get timber out of the next Woods to fortify the Rampier, with which the Camp with incredible labour and no less expedition, was round about encircled, which Perseus also fortified with Ballions, and military Engines dispos'd in all places convenient, whereby he thought himself secure against all the Roman Force, and that he might hold them in play, till wearied and weakned with the difficulties of so long a Siege, they might at length desist from the attempt. But Paulus Æmilius, by how much he saw the Macedonian strength to be the greater, and how carefully and cautiously they had provided for, and manag'd their affairs, so much the more diligent was he to leave no stone unturn'd, nor in any thing be wanting to elude their Arts by his own skill, and removing all obstacles, effect effect the work. His Camp was plentifully supply'd with Provisions out of Thessaly, that lay just at his back; but they were much straitned for Water; for by the unusual drought, the River near hand was dry'd up; nor were there any Springs, or but very few, and those muddy, not yielding near enough Water to supply so great a multitude; so that his men daily perisht for thirst, and his Horses died as fast for the same reason. The Consul therefore sent some to search all about the Hill Olympus (near the foot whereof he lay encamp'd) if they could discover any Springs, but they bringing backward, that all was as dry as a Rock; he would not for all that despair, but having in person diligently survey'd the situation and nature of the place, he at last commanded the Sutlers and Tankard-Bearers to follow him to the Sea, &c. [as fol. 855.]

The Supplement of the third defective passage in the forty fourth Book at the end of the thirty fourth Chapter, fol. 856.

— and foresaw questionless where he might pass over, then that having reduc'd the Discipline of his Camp to the antient severity, he made the Romans exercise themselves in daily decursions, and all kind of military toils, and in fine omitting nothing that belong'd to the care or duty of an Excellent General, Perseus, I say, seeing Paulus do all this, found that in such apparent danger, he must use no delays, for he had not now to deal with such as Licinius Histilius, or Marcus, but with an old experienc'd Commander, active, vigilant and inflam'd only with the desire of Victory and Glory, and who by various representations of Battel acted amongst his own men in jest, was preparing for a fight in earnest, which must needs determine the Fate of the War; Therefore he also resolv'd to encourage his Souldiers as much as he could, to instruct them in military Exercises, to add new works to those he had cast up already, and fortify his Camp with more Machines and Engines one above another; But whilst they were thus busy on either side, unexpected Intelligence arriv'd from Illyricum, That King Gentius was routed by Anicius the Prætor, and he himself and all his Family Prisoners to the Romans, and his whole Country in their power. Which thing encouraged, &c. [as fol. 856.]

The Supplement of the fourth defective Passage of the 44th Book, at the End of the 35th Chapter, fol. 857.

— [shelving to the Sea side; Perseus minding only what was before his eyes, was intent to repulse the Enemy on that side, and void of all other care. In the mean time, P. Nasica, with his selected Party, was come towards the Sea, as far as Heracleum, as if he designed with a Fleet to attack the Enemies Camp; but there, ordering his Souldiers to refresh themselves, he waited for the Approach of Night, and communicated the Consul's real Orders to the Centurions, and pursuant thereunto, as soon as it grew dusky, turning his March towards the Mountain, silently led his Troops to Pythium: where arriving, after almost three days hard March through rugged Ways, up Hill and down Hill, he found it necessary to refresh his weary Men with a Nights sleep. But of the Cretans (who to the Number of two hundred attended Scipio in this Expedition) a certain Fellow (as they are naturally a treacherous people) understanding what the design was, had got away during their March, and fled to Perseus, acquainting him (who suspected no such matter) where his danger lay. This surpriz'd and astonish'd the King, who could not quit his Camp, and with all his Forces advance to meet Nasica; for then he should leave the Frontiers open for Æmilius to pierce into the Bowels of his Kingdom: therefore he dispatcht Milo, one of his Chief Favourites, with two thousand Macedonians and ten thousand Auxiliaries, with all expedition to seize the Passes, and hinder the Romans coming that way; Polybius relates, That these caught our Forces napping, and fell upon them asleep in their Tents; but Nasica writes, That there was a sharp and doubtful Skirmish at a Pass on the Brow of an Hill; and that amongst other Accidents a Thracian made at him with his Sword, whom he thrust through with a Javelin, and that after a long Dispute the Macedonians gave ground, and Milo himself, flinging away his Arms, was glad to take his Heels; after which the Romans pursuing them, had an easy descent into the Plains without any opposition. In this posture of Affairs Perseus was at a loss what to do; for there he could not remain with safety, his Camp on that side being unfortified: And there seem'd but two ways left, either to retreat to Pydna, and expect the Enemy under the Walls of that City, where he might with less hazard venture a Battel; or else to disperse his Army into Garrisons, to defend the chief Cities, and retain his Subjects in Obedience, and carrying in thither all Corn, Cattel and Fruit, lay the whole Country waste before the Enemy; who then, what for scarcity of Provisions, and what with the Macedonians continual Incurfions, would not be able long to subsist. Neither of these Courses wanted its danger, but the last, besides that it was a work of time, and by dividing the Forces, would, as it were, reduce the whole strength of the Kingdom to nothing, leaving

D d d d d 2

leaving the Frontiers naked, all Parts would immediately be fill'd with terrour, Fire and Sword, and all kind of desolation, and the Country-men seeing themselves utterly abandoned would for ever be alienated in their affections and Duty; therefore most of his Friends rather advis'd the first method, to keep his Army together for a Battel; for it would not be only more glorious, but safer too, with all the Force he could make, to confront the Enemy before they had proceeded too far, and if opportunity offer'd it self, to put it to a push: for certainly his People, when they were to fight for all that was dear to them, either Sacred or Civil, for their Children and for their Wives, under the conduct, and in the presence of their King, exposing himself in the same common danger, (than which there cannot possibly be a stronger or more sacred incitement to make men fight courageously) would not be wanting on their parts, but bravely repulse the Enemy. The King, though he were very loth to venture his whole Stake at one Throw, yet prevail'd with by these Reasons, prepares for a Battel; and having removed to Pydna, assigns to each of his Commanders his proper Post and Charge, and that all things should be in readiness to fight when there was occasion. The Country was an open Champaign, fit for Horse-service, and able to receive not only a competent Body of heavy-armed Foot, but rising in some places with continued Hills, was convenient for Archers and other light harness'd Souldiers, whence they might make their Excursions and retreat again in safety. Two Rivers (the Inhabitants call one Aso, and the other Leucus) did rather divide than water the Fields, their Channells were then so narrow, and scarce any Stream in them; yet they seem'd to be of some use, since the passing them must needs delay the Romans at least for a while in the Carriere of their Attack. In the mean, Emilius finding the Passage into the Enemies Country opened by Scipio, joins Forces with him, and so with Banners display'd marches to rights towards the Enemy: but when he saw them so advantageously posted, and every way prepared to give him Battel, he thought fit to pause a while, and consider every thing that could promise a Victory, or seem'd likely to deny or hinder it; And when he had seriously weigh'd the whole, then to take his measures accordingly. It was now past the Solstice of the Year, &c. [as fol. 857.]

The Supplement of the fifth defective Passage in the forty fourth Book at the End of the fortieth Chapter, fol. 859.

At last All, and with the Guard, the next Troops on each side rashly run on. Thus the Fight began in the River: Yet there are some Authors who write, That by Paulus's Command an Horse having his Bridle pulled off, was drove over to the Enemies Bank, and some Souldiers sent after to bring him back, that so the Enemies might begin the Skirmish. For when the first Sacrifices were killed, there appeared no promising tokens, but afterwards the bowels of the other Beasts were right; whereupon the Soothsayers gave Judgment, That Victory was portended to the Romans defending themselves, but not if they were the Aggressors, and fell first upon the Enemy. The Souldiers on either side rushing out to help their Fellows without any Order or Command, there was in very little time a pretty smart Skirmish begun, upon the noise of which Emilius coming forth of his Tent, and seeing it was neither ealie nor safe to recal or stop the blind fury of those that were engaged, thought it best to make use of this Heat, and turn Chance into an Opportunity: Therefore riding through the several Ranks, he exhorted and encouraged them no less with his countenance and hand, than with words, to play the Men for the Honour of the Roman Name. Then P. Scipio Nasica, sent before to discover the posture of the Enemy, brought word, That Perseus was advancing with his whole Army drawn up in Battalia, consisting chiefly of four Battalions. First the Thracians led the Van, people of a fierce look, tall and great bodies, protected with bright Iron Shields held in their left hands; their Thighs were arm'd with Iron, a short black Souldiers Cloak over both shoulders, with their right hands they ever and anon rattled and brandish'd short Spears or two-edged Swords of vast weight. Next after the Thracians followed the Mercenaries, being for the most part Targeteers, but in different Habit and Arms, according to their respective Nations, and amongst them were some Peonians. The third Brigade consisted of choice Macedonians, one Phalanx of Youth, richly array'd in Coats of Mail gilt with Gold, and red Cloaks, and were called Leucaspides from their Shields which were white and glistering with Silver. The old beaten Troops closed the Rear, called Chalcaspides or Aglaaspides from their bright brazen Shields. All the Fields glitter'd with their gallant Armour, and the neighbouring Mountains echo'd back and redoubled their shouts as they were hastening and encouraging each other to Battel. Nor did the Consul delay, but advances up to the Front of his Army, and begins the Charge. The Targeteers were not able to stand long before the Latine Associates; but when the Macedonian Phalanx and main strength of their Army came to engage, there was a new face of the Battle, and a most dreadful Spectacle to behold: For joining together their Shields, they made as it were a Rampier in the Front, and over them pushing with their long Spears, they without any danger to themselves, wounded and ran the Romans through; for not only their Bucklers were pierced with the strong sharp points of the Enemies Weapons, pons, but their Swords stood them in no stead, by reason of the length of the Macedonian Spears, for they could not reach their Shields, much less their bodies. This unequal Combat somewhat startled the Consul, yet he with a lofty and chearful countenance, riding up and down, both his head and body unarm'd, added not a little life and Courage to his Souldiers; inflamed with which, a Centurion of the Regiment of Pelignians (they say his Name was Salio) snatching up the Standard of that Regiment, flung it amongst the thickest of the Enemies: Then followed a most furious Dispute, the rest of the Pelignians on the one side endeavouring to recover it, and prevent the dishonour of losing their Banner, and the Macedonians as eager to keep it. The former went about to cut to pieces the Macedonian long Spears with their Swords, or to put them by with one of their hands, but then the latter holding them firmly with both their hands, would with such a force push at them as they rush'd blindly on, that neither their Bucklers, nor their Head-pieces, nor their Coats of Mail could secure them from being either killed or wounded; so that the first Ranks of Pelignians being routed, the rest gave ground; but whilst they were retreating to the Hill (which the Natives call Olocrus) Emilius meets them, and for rage and indignation tearing his Robe of State, commands them to stand their ground, and doubt not for all this success; for he had observed, That this close Body of the Enemy, though it seem'd jointed and rivetted together, yet was not able always to keep its Order; but what appear'd so firm and impenetrable, either by want of room, or unequal ground, or a brisk Charge, might in some place or other be disorder'd and fall to pieces; so that whilst some that endeavour'd to get the upper ground are necessarily though willingly separated from those below, or the nimbler from the slower, or some marching on from others that stand still, or those that press upon the Enemy, from others that have been repell'd, in these or the like Cases; there were now and then gaps left open, and therefore he charges all the Captains to watch for such an opportunity, and to charge at several places, in distinct Bands, but all to mind, that if there were any where hope of Entrance, presently there to give a general Charge, and casting themselves into a wedglike figure, force their way; for if once they could but disorder the Enemy, they were certain of Victory. These Orders of the Consul were punctually executed, and whilst they skirmish'd in small Parties, or as it were Man to Man, the Macedonians short Bucklers, and small Rapiers, were nothing comparable to the Romans more stout and substantial Arms, nor were they so well skill'd in managing their Weapons, nor had so much Courage and Resolution; for being drawn out of their old Posture and Order, and separated, you might pierce them in the sides or their backs at your pleasure. Here M. Porcius Cato, the Son of the Censor, and Emilius's Son in Law, perform'd a bold and memorable Exploit; in the Conflict, fighting very eagerly, his Sword happen'd to drop out of his hand, and so he lost it, but yet resolv'd to lose his Life too, rather than the Enemy should enjoy any thing that was his; finding out therefore several of the stoutest of his Friends, he with them, through all the Weapons of the Enemy forc'd his way to the place where the Fight was fiercest, and then hurl'd himself amongst the thickest Croul, and with great slaughter, beat them off round about, and in the void space, found his Sword lying on the ground, which he took up and carried off to the amazement both of his own side and the Enemy. Things being thus order'd the Consul in person leads on the first Legion into the Battel, who most chearfully followed him, encouraged by The Majesty, &c. [as fol. 859.]

The Supplement of the sixth defective passage of the forty fourth Book, at the end of the said Book, fol. 862.

— made it evident to any man, That the King by his ill Conduct, Injustice and Rapines, had lost the affections of his Subjects, who rather hated than lov'd or pittied him. Paulus as soon as he was entred Amphipolis order'd a Sacrifice to be made to return thanks to the Gods for so signal a Victory; who testified their acceptance of his devotion by a Prodigy, for the heap of Wood prepared on the Altar was set on fire by Lightning from Heaven, by which lucky token Jove did not only seem to approve of the Victors Vows and Prayers, but himself did as it were consecrate the worship and honour paid to his own Divinity. Thence the Consul follow'd Nasica whom he had sent before to plunder the Country, and march'd to Odontia, the next City in those parts under the Hill Orbelus, and on the Frontiers both of the Dardanians and Thracians; that he might leave no shadow of an Enemy behind him, nor any place untoucht with his Victorious Arms; and from thence removing to Siree, he kept there a standing Camp for some time.

A Supplement

A Supplement of the first defective passage in the forty fifth Book, at the end of the fourteenth Chapter, fol. 868.

And order'd to take care that an House should be provided for King Mesagines, and his Retinue, and that nothing should be wanting either for recovery of his health, or his respective treatment and accommodation, to have his Table nobly furnish'd, and provide him Shipping as soon as he was well, to transport him into Africk.

About this time the Tribunes of the Commons indicted and condemn'd the Tres viri Nocturni [or three Night-Magistrates appointed to prevent and extinguish Fires] M. Milvius, Cn. Lollius and L. Sextilius, because when a great Fire happen'd in the street call'd Via Sacra, they neglected their duty, and came not time enough to give the necessary Orders. After which the Comitia were held, and Q. Aulus Patrus, and M. Junius Pennus chosen Consuls. The Prætors were Q. Cassius Longinus, M. Juventius Thalna, Ti. Claudius Nero, A. Manlius Torquatus, Cn. Fulvius Gillo, and C. Licinius Nerva.

The same year Ti. Sempronius Gracchus, and Claudius Pulcher, exercis'd the Censorship with great severity, but interrupted by the Interposition of the Tribunes. In other things those two Censors agreed well enough, but not in calling over the Libertini, [or Sons of such as had once been Servants, but afterwards made free] Gracchus would have them reduc'd all into one Tribe, lest that numerous scum of the Commons, dispers'd through many Tribes, should carry too great a sway in all Elections; But this device Claudius oppos'd, and would have nothing alter'd in this matter from the antient manner; for both by Servius Tullius the King, and again by C. Flaminius and L. Æmilius when they were Censors, The Libertini [those whose Fathers had formerly been Slaves] were ranged, &c. [as fol. 868.]

The Supplement of the second defective passage in the forty fifth Book, at the end of the twenty first Chapter, fol. 871.

Which of them should act most irregularly; The Tribunes by their opposition would have put off the Prætors halt until the Arrival of the General Æmilius, but the matter it self seem'd not capable of so long a delay, and Thalna urging still a War against Rhodes, as he was haranguing to the people on that subject, Antonius pluckt him from the Rostra, and gave the Rhodian Embassadors a day of Audience before the people. After the Senates Answer to the former Embassadour Agæsiopolis, was sent back to Rhodes, the Rhodians dispatcht two several Embassies to Rome, the chief of the one was Philocrates, of the other Astymedes, with whom was joined Philophon. The people referr'd them to the Senate for Audience, where being introduc'd by M. Junius the Consul, Astymedes in the habit and language of a Suppliant, made a Speech to the Fathers to this effect, You may, most Noble and Reverend Senators! easily judge what a wretched and deplorable condition we poor Rhodians are in, if you shall but vouchsafe to compare the antient and flourishing state of our affairs, with this present Calamity which we are fallen into by your Order; but, if we may be allow'd to speak the very truth, more through others false Informations and Calumnies, than any fault of ours, or at least any offence administred by our publick state, however some few private persons may have misbehav'd themselves. Nor is it a small surprize to us, That we who with all fidelity to the people of Rome, have so long maintain'd and flourish'd under an Alliance with you, an Alliance confirm'd no less by your own favours and benefits bestow'd upon us, than by our good Offices and constant obedience, whereof we were wont to boast above all other Nations; are now charg'd as guilty of having most lewdly violated that Alliance; Whether we have done amiss, &c. [as fol. 871.]

The Supplement of the last defect of the forty fifth Book, after the thirty ninth Chapter, fol. 881.

— To give their Votes; I myself, Souldiers! will go down, and follow all of you; when you go to give your Suffrages, that I may see and know their Faces, who out of an inbred baseness, and ingratitude towards their General, are the Ring-Leaders of the rest; and who in War would have their Commanders humour and flatter, or perhaps obey them forsooth, rather be themselves subject to the just and necessary Commands of their Superiours. This smart Oration made such impressions on all the Citizens, and especially on the Military, that by the unanimous Votes of the rest of the Tribes a Triumph was decreed, which if ever any Man, Paulus certainly had merited by his gallant Victory.

The Order and Splendour of which Triumph, if you respect either the Grandeur of the conquer'd King who therein was led Captive, or the rare shew of Images, Pictures and representative Figures, or the abundance of Money brought home, did certainly for its Greatness

Greatness and Magnificence far excel all that were ever acted before. The people on Scaffolds built round both the Circus's and Forum's like Theatres, sat in white Gowns to behold it. The Temples all stood open wide, and adorn'd with Garlands more than usual, whence a most redolent smell and vast exhalations of burnt Frankincense and other rich Odours perfum'd all the Air, and the streets were clean swept, and the Rabble kept out of them by Guards of Souldiers. Three whole days were scarce enough for this glorious Sight. The first day exhibited the Standards and Colours taken, and the Tables and Pictures which filled two hundred Chariots, such abundance of most excellent Works had those Cities of Macedonia and the neighbouring Greeks which our men had ransackt. The next day the Money was carried along, and the Kings Treasure, together with vast quantities of Arms of Iron or Brasses very bright and neat. They were placed in innumerable Waggons as it were carelessly in heaps, but yet indeed order'd with wonderful Art, here Head-pieces upon Shields, or Greaves and Iron Boots upon Coats of Mail and Breast-plates: There Thracian Bucklers mixt with Cretan Targets; nor wanted there painted Quivers and bunches of Arrows sticking in them. There too you might have seen Bridles with golden Bits and silken Reins, naked Swords lying upon sharp-pointed Javelins and Spears, made a terrible fragor and clashing against each others Edges as they were carried along. Then there were above seven hundred and fifty Chests of Money ready coin'd born by the hands of three thousand strong lusty Fellows. In each Chest there was said to be three Talents, a good Load for four Porters. Others carried silver Bowls and Horns tipt, and vast Goblets more than could be number'd, all engraven with admirable Art. The third day brought forth the Prisoners. First with Trumpets sounding were led along one hundred and twenty fat Oxen; with their Horns gilt, and Fillets and Garlands; which Sacrifices were led by young men that had their Garments truss'd up with embroider'd Girdles, accompanied with Boys that carried gold and silver Chargers to be us'd about the Sacrifice. Then came the Presents to Jupiter, viz. seventy seven Vessels full of Gold Coin of the same weight with those before-mentioned, and golden Goblets to the value of ten Talents beset with precious Stones, which Paulus had caused to be made and thus adorn'd for this occasion. After which was carried the Regalia of the ancient Kings being golden Vessels of old fashion'd Work, which Perseus was wont to use at solemn Feasts; next succeeded his Chariot loaded with his rich Armour, whereunto was added his Crown. At a little distance followed the Kings Children attended with a Troop of their Nurses, Tutors and Servants, all miserably lifting up their hands to the Spectators, and by their Example teaching the Children in suppliant manner to implore the Clemency of the Conquerours. There were two Sons, and one Daughter, so much the more deserving pity, as, by reason of their tender Age, they were less sensible from what an height of Grandeur the iniquity of Fortune had tumbled them into this extremity of misery: Then came Butius the Son of King Corys; but that which above all the rest of the Show drew the Eyes of the Romans, was Perseus himself in Mourning Habit, and Slippers after the Grecian Fashion, but so ghastly and astonish'd, that he left it a doubt, whether grief wholly posses'd his heart, or (which was more calamitous) whether being distracted with the excess of his Misfortunes, he was grown altogether insensible of what he suffer'd. A vast Company of his Nobles, Favourites and Guards ever and anon looking upon him, with sighs and tears bewailed his Fortune much more passionately than their own. 'Tis reported, That he had begg'd of Paulus to be excus'd from this publick shame and disgrace; but was deluded with this doubtful Answer, That he already was and should for the future find he was in a Gentlemans hands and disposal. But as this unfortunate Prince prefer'd the hope of any kind of Life before a generous Death, and chose rather to have himself reckon'd amongst part of the Booty, than to rescue himself and the honour of his being taken from the Conquerour, he seems to have deserv'd this harsh usage. After him there were carried in state forty several Golden Crowns, which had been presented to Paulus by the several Cities of Greece, when their Embassadors came to congratulate his Victory, last of all to compleat the Glory of the Day, appear'd Æmilius himself in Triumphant Robes, mounted on a magnificent Chariot, and holding a Laurel-Branch in his right hand, on each side sat his two Sons Q. Fabius, and P. Scipio, whom he had had Companions of his toil, and assistants in his Victory. After him, went the Lieutenant Generals, Colonels and Souldiers, all Crown'd with Laurel, and singing Io Pæani! and their Generals Praises, intermixt (according to the Custom) with Joques and smart Reflections now and then upon him; Valerius Antias says, &c. [as fol. 881.]

Fasti Consulares,

O R,

A Chronological Catalogue (according to the Marble Records of the Capitol, illustrated by Sigonius) of all the chief Magistrates of Rome successively, wherein the Triumphs and Ovations of each are noted, with the Letters Tr. and O. And also divers of the most remarkable Occurrences are briefly intimated in the years when they happen'd.

AS touching the time of the Building of Rome, though Authors vary, yet the most common opinion seems to be, That the Foundation thereof was begun the 21 of Apr. in the first year of the seventh Olympiad; In the year of the World 3212. being about the fourth year of the Reign of Abaz King of Judah, and 750. years before our Blessed Saviours Incarnation. Therefore though in the following Chronology we reckon the years [ab Urbe Condita] from the Building of the City Rome; yet if you add the same to 3212. the product gives you the year of the World; Or if you subtract it, from 750. the remainder shews how many years before Christ, any person bore Office, or accident happen'd.

Anni
U. C.

The first Government of Rome was by Kings.

Years.

- |      |   |     |
|------|---|-----|
| 1.   | Romulus the Founder and first King of Rome Reigned —————  | 37. |
|      | He Triumph'd thrice, first over the Cæniains, then over the Camerines, and lastly over the Fidenates, and Veians, and from his Example all other Triumphs (though afterwards more splendid) were practis'd. After his Death, the Romans were about a year before they chose another King, under certain Magistrates call'd Inter-Regents, that rul'd by turns five days apiece. |     |
| 38.  | The Inter-Regents.  |     |
| 39.  | Numa Pompilius the Son of Pomponius being chosen the second King, Reigned —————   | 1.  |
|      | He was a Stranger, and for the Fame of his Piety and Vertue call'd out of Cures, a City of the Sabines, to accept the Government. He employ'd his whole Reign in settling Religious Ceremonies, and brought the year to twelve Months, which before were but ten.   | 43. |
| 82.  | Tullus Hostilius chosen the third King, Tr. 3. and Reign'd —————  | 32. |
|      | Alba destroy'd, and the Inhabitants carried to Rome.  |     |
| 114. | Ancus Martius (Numa's Grandson by his Daughter) Created the Fourth King, Tr. 2. and Reign'd —————   | 24. |
|      | He built Ostia at the mouth of Tiber, sixteen miles from Rome.  |     |
| 138. | L. Tarquinius Priscus the fifth King Tr. 3. Reign'd —————   | 38. |
|      | He was the Son of Demaratus a Corinthian, came a stranger to Rome, and was by Ancus left Guardian to his Children, whom (upon their Fathers Death) he sent out of Town a Hunting, and in the mean time by an insinuating Speech prevail'd with the Nobles and People to chuse him King. And was the first that Triumph'd in a Chariot.  |     |
| 176. | Servius Tullius the Sixth King, Tr. 3. and Reign'd —————  | 44. |
|      | He was supposed to have been the Son of a Bondswoman (whence call'd Servius) but being bred in King Tarquin's Court, and married to his Daughter, when Tarquin was kill'd by the procurement of Ancus's Sons, he by the Intigation of Tanaquil his Mother-in-Law assumes the Crown, being the first King that took upon him the Government before he was Elected.               |     |
|      | He also first numbred and rated the people, and divided them into Classes and Centuries,  |     |

Centuries, according to their Estates. And at his first Lustrum, or survey, enroll'd fourscore thousand Romans. Years.

- He also made three such Lustrums, Surveys or Purifyings of the people afterwards.
219. L. Tarquinius surnamed Superbus [or the Proud] the seventh and last King of the Romans, Tr. 2. reigned ————— 25.
- He was the Son (or rather Grandson) of the other King Tarquin, and having killed Severus Tullius, usurpt the Kingdom by Force, without any colour of Choice, which he no less tyrannically administr'd; but upon the Rape committed on Lucretia (the Wife of one of his Kinsmen L. Tarquinius Collatinus) by his Son Sextus, he and all his Family were expelled, together with all Kingly Government there, in the 244. year of the City.

Kings being thus excluded, the Romans conferr'd their Sovereign Government upon two Magistrates called Consuls, annually chosen in a general Assembly of the several Centuries, who were wont at first to be both of Patrician Rank [or Nobles] and had all the Insignia, Badges and Power of Royalty (bating the Name) between them, and that both of them had not the Rods and Lictors carried before them (lest the people should be frighted, and say, That instead of one Tyrant they had now got two) but each in his turn: However this their Original Grandeur was much abated in process of time, as will appear.

C O N S U L S.

244. L. Junius Brutus, who being slain in a Battel, in his room was created Sp. Lucretius Tricipitinus, and he dying, —————
- L. Tarquinius Collatinus, who being obliged to surrender because he was of Kin to King Tarquin (though very active and most concern'd in his Expulsion)
- M. Horatius Pulvillus supplied his place. P. Valerius surnamed Poplicola succeeded and triumph'd.

Thus there were five Consuls at Rome in the space of this first year. A Law was preferr'd by Valerius, That in all Cases an Appeal should lye from the Consuls to the People, whereby the Consular Power was much retrencht, whence he got his Surname of Poplicola, or the Peoples Friend.

245. P. Valerius Poplicola the second time. T. Lucretius Tricipitinus held the fifth Lustrum.

King Porfena besieges Rome.

- |                                       |                                       |
|---------------------------------------|---------------------------------------|
| 246. P. Valerius Poplicola III.       | M. Horatius Pulvillus II.             |
| 247. Sp. Lartius Flavius.             | T. Herminius Aquilinus.               |
| 248. M. Valerius Volusi F. Tr. II.    | Q. Posthumius Tubertus Tr.            |
| 249. P. Valerius Poplicola IV. Tr.    | T. Lucretius Tricipitinus II.         |
| 250. P. Posthumius Tubertus II.       | Agripp. Menenius Lanatus Tr.          |
| He was the first that had an Ovation. |                                       |
| 251. Opiter Virginus Tricoftus.       | Sp. Cassius Viscellinus.              |
| 252. Posthumius Cominius Auruncus.    | T. Lartius Flavius.                   |
| 253. Servius Sulpicius Camerinus.     | M. Tullius Longus dyed in his Office. |
| 254. P. Veturius Geminus.             | T. Aebutius Elva.                     |
| 255. T. Lartius Flavius II.           | Q. Clodius Siculus.                   |

The first Dictator.

T. Lartius Flavius created both for appeasing a Sedition at home, and to manage dangerous Wars abroad.

Sp. Cassius Viscellinus his Master of the Horfe. [For the Nature of both these new Offices see the Explanatory Index.]

- |                                    |                                     |
|------------------------------------|-------------------------------------|
| 256. A. Sempronius Atratinus.      | M. Minucius Augurinus.              |
| 257. A. Posthumius Albus.          | T. Virginus Tricoftus Cælimontanus. |
| Banisht King Tarquin dies at Cumæ. |                                     |
| Eeeee                              |                                     |

The

Anni
U. C.

The second Dictator.

A. Posthumius Tr. chosen to manage the Wars against the young Tarquins and their Adherents, whom he defeating at the Lake Regillus, he was thence call'd Regillensis.

T. Aebutius Elva his Master of Horse.

258. M. Claudius Sabinus Regillensis. P. Servilius Priscus.

This Claudius was the top of the Claudian Kindred, who in the 250. year of the City came from Regillus a City of the Sabines to Rome, and was admitted amongst the Patricians, and was Grandfather to Claudius the Decemvir.

259. A. Virginus Tricoftus. T. Veturius Cicurinus.

The Third Dictator.

M. Valerius, Voluf F. Tr.

He in this honour gain'd the Title of Maximus.

Q. Servilius Priscus his Master of Horse.

260. Sp. Cassius Viscellinus II. Postumus Cominius Auruncus II.
He held the seventh Lustrum.

Now the Commons first obtain'd to chuse themselves Tribunes.

And the Agrarian Law for dividing the new conquer'd Lands amongst the people began to be disputed.

261. T. Geganius Macerinus. P. Minucius Augurinus.
262. A. Sempronius Atratinus II. M. Minucius Augurinus II.
263. Q. Sulpicius Camerinus Cornutus. Sp. Lartius Flavius II.
264. C. Julius Julius. P. Pinarius Rufus Mamercinus;
Both these and the Consuls of the year before are omitted by Livy.

265. Sp. Nautius Rutulus. Sex. Furius Fusus.
266. T. Sicinius Sabinus Tr. C. Aquilius Fuscus Ov.
267. Sp. Cassius Viscellinus III. Tr. Proculus Virginus Tricoftus.
268. Q. Fabius Vibulanus. Servius Cornelius Maluginensis,
269. L. Amylius Mamercus. K. Fabius Vibulanus.
270. M. Fabius Vibulanus. L. Valerius Potitus.
271. Q. Fabius Vibulanus II. C. Julius Julius.
272. K. Fabius Vibulanus II. Sp. Furius Fusus.
273. M. Fabius Vibulanus II. Cn. Manlius Cincinnatus, slain in Battel.
274. K. Fabius Vibulanus III. T. Virginus Tricoftus.

Three hundred and six Gentlemen of the Fabian Family slain in the War against the Veians, which that single Family undertook to manage.

275. L. Aemilius Mamercus II. C. Servilius Ahala, dying in his Office, is succeeded by
C. Cornelius Lentulus.

276. C. Horatius Pulvillus. T. Menenius Lanatus.
277. A. Virginus Rutulus. Sp. Servilius Structus.
278. C. Nautius Rutulus. P. Valerius Poplicola Tr.
279. L. Furius Medullinus. A. Manlius Vulfo Ov. He held the eighth
Lustrum.
280. L. Aemilius Mamercus III. Vopisc. Julius Julius.
281. P. Furius Fusus. L. Pinarius Rufus.
282. T. Quintius Capitolinus Barbatas. Ap. Claudius Sabinus.
283. L. Valerius Potitus II. Ti. Aemilius Mamercinus.
284. A. Virginus Caelimontanus. T. Numicius Priscus.
285. T. Quintius Capit. Barbatas II. Tr. Q. Servilius Priscus.
286. Ti. Aemilius Mamercinus II. Q. Fabius Vibulanus.
287. Sp. Postumius Albus Regill. Q. Servilius Priscus II.

T. Quint.

Book III.

Anni
U. C.

288. T. Quint. Capitol. Barb. III. He held the Q. Fabius Vibulanus II. ninth Lustrum.
289. A. Posthumius Albus Regill. Sp. Furius Medullinus.
290. P. Servilius Priscus. L. Aebutius Elva dies in his Office.
291. L. Lucretius Tricipitinus Tr. T. Veturius Geminus Ov.
292. P. Voluppius Gallus Ser. Sulpicius Camerinus.
293. P. Valerius Popl. II. who being slain in the Battel against the Bondslaves, who this year (under the Conduct of Ap. Herdonius the Sabine) had seized the Capitol, in his room was elected Q. Quintus Cincinnatus.
294. Q. Fabius Vibulanus III. L. Cornelius Maluginensis.
295. L. Minucius Augurinus, who being forced to resign by the Dictator, Q. Fabius Vibulanus came in his stead. G. Nautius Rutulus II.

The fourth Dictator.

L. Quintus Cincinnatus.
L. Tarquinius Flaccus Master of the Horse.

296. Q. Minucius Augurinus. C. Horatius Pulvillus.
297. M. Valerius Maximus. Sp. Virginus Caelimontanus.
298. T. Romilius Vaticanus. C. Veturius Cicurinus.
299. Sp. Tarpeius Capitolinus. A. Aterius Fontinalis.

Ambassadors sent to Greece to bring to Rome a Transcript of their Laws.

300. P. Horatius Trigemini. Sext. Quintilius Varus.
301. Pub. Sextius Capitolinus. T. Menenius Lanatus.
302. Ap. Claudius Crassinus. T. Genucius Augurinus.

The before mentioned Ambassadors being returned from Greece, these two Consuls resigned their Office, and the Charge of the Commonwealth was intrusted with a select Committee of Ten persons with Consular Authority, and not only so, but also without any Liberty of Appeal from them, for the space of one year, to the end they might in that time draw up what Laws they should think good for the Publick.

302. The Decemvirs of the first Year, all Patricians.

App. Claudius Crassinus Regill. Sp. Posth. Albus Regill.
T. Genucius Augurinus. Ser. Sulpicius Camerinus.
Sp. Veturius Crassus. P. Sextius Capitolinus.
C. Julius Julius. T. Romilius Rocus Vaticanus.
A. Manlius Vulfo. P. Horatius Trigemini.

303. The Decemvirs of the second Year, partly Commoners.

Ap. Claudius Crassinus II. Q. Fabius Vibulanus.
M. Cornelius Maluginensis. M. Rabuleius.
L. Minucius Augurinus. Q. Petilius.
T. Antonius Merenda. K. Duilius.
M. Sergius. Sp. Oppius Cornicen.

304. Of these the Commoners were Petilius, Duilius and Oppius.
The same Decemviri by force continue themselves in the same Office, without any Election of the people; But at last, a tumult arising by reason of Ap. Claudius's endeavouring to seize a Commoners Daughter as a Bondslave to satisfy his Lust, they are forc'd to give up their Offices, and then in their stead were made

CON-

Anni
U. C.

CONSULS again

- |      |                                 |                                   |         |
|------|---------------------------------|-----------------------------------|---------|
| 304. | L. Valerius Poplic. potitus Tr. | M. Horatius Barbatu Tr.           |         |
| 305. | Lar. Herminius.                 | T. Virginus Caelimont. Tricoſtus. |         |
| 306. | M. Geganius Macerinus.          | C. Julius Julius.                 |         |
| 307. | T. Quinctius Capitolinus IV.    | Agr. Furius Fufus.                |         |
| 308. | M. Genucius Augurinus.          | C. Curtius.                       | Bo. IV. |

The Commons tugging to have one Consul chosen out of their rank, at last obtain that fix Tribunes Military, three Patricians, and three Commoners instead of Consuls should be chosen for a year, but only three were actually Elected, and all Patricians, whose Names were as follows.

Tribunes Military.

309. A. Sempronius Atratinus: T. Clælius Siculus; and L. Atilius Longus.
But these being Created, without the due Ceremonies as the Augurs pretended, were forc'd after three months time to resign, and then were Elected

CONSULS again

- |      |                               |                                |
|------|-------------------------------|--------------------------------|
| 309. | L. Papirius Mugillanus.       | L. Sempronius Atratinus.       |
| 310. | M. Geganius Macerinus II. Tr. | T. Quinctius Capit. Barbat. 5. |

Now were Created the first Censors whose Office at first was for five years.

- |      |                              |   |
|------|------------------------------|---|
|      | L. Papirius Mugillanus.      | L. Sempronius Atratinus. He held theeleventh Lustrum. |
| 311. | M. Fabius Vibulanus.         | Postumus Æbutius Elva.                                    |
| 312. | C. Furius Pacilus.           | M. Papirius Crassus.                                      |
| 313. | Proculus Geganius Macerinus. | L. Menenius Lanatus.                                      |
| 314. | T. Quinctius Capitolinus VI. | Agr. Menenius Lanatus.                                    |

The fifth Dictator.

L. Quinctius Cincinnatus II. for quieting a Sedition.
C. Servilius Ahala his Master of the Horse.
And now Tribunes Military, with the full Authority that Consuls had, but more in number were chosen, viz.

315. Mam. Æmilius Mamercinus, L. Quinctius Cincinnatus, and L. Julius Julius.

But the Year following CONSULS again.

- |      |                            |  |
|------|----------------------------|--|
| 316. | M. Geganius Macerinus III. | L. Sergius, who in this Honour obtain'dthe Surname of Fidenas. |
|------|----------------------------|--|

The sixth Dictator.

M. Æmilius Mamercinus Tr.
L. Quinctius Cincinnatus his Master of the Horse.

- |      |                            |                        |
|------|----------------------------|------------------------|
| 317. | M. Cornelius Maluginensis. | L. Papirius Crassus.   |
| 318. | C. Julius Julius II.       | L. Virginus Tricoſtus. |

The seventh Dictator.

Q. Servilius Priscus.
Postumus Æbutius Elva Cornicer, Master of the Horse.

CEN-

Anni
U. C.

CENSORS.

- |      |                       |  |
|------|-----------------------|--|
|      | G. Furius Fufus.      | M. Geganius Macerinus. He held thetwelfth Lustrum. |
| 319. | C. Julius Julius III. | L. Virginus Tricoſtus II.                              |

The eighth Dictator.

Mam. Æmilius Mamercinus II.
A. Postumius Tubertus M. E.

The Censors to continue in their Office but a Year and an half, hence forwards.

Tribunes Military with Consular Power, the third time.

- |      |                      |  |
|------|----------------------|--|
| 320. | M. Fabius Vibulanus. | M. Fostius Lavinator, andL. Sergius Fidenas. |
|------|----------------------|--|

Tribunes Military with Consular Power, the fourth time.

- |      |                       |  |
|------|-----------------------|--|
| 321. | L. Pinarius Mamercus, | L. Furius Medullinus, andSp. Postumius Albus Regill. |
|------|-----------------------|--|

CONSULS.

- |      |                              |                  |
|------|------------------------------|------------------|
| 322. | T. Quinctius Pennus Cincinn. | C. Julius Mento. |
|------|------------------------------|------------------|

The ninth Dictator.

A. Postumius Tr.
L. Julius Vopiscus, M. E.

- |      |                                  |                                |
|------|----------------------------------|--------------------------------|
| 323. | L. Papirius Crassus II.          | L. Julius Julius.              |
| 324. | L. Sergius Fidenas II.           | Hostus Lucretius Tricipitinus. |
| 325. | T. Quinctius Cincinnatus Pennus. | A. Cornelius Cossus Tr.        |
| 326. | C. Servilius Structus Ahala.     | L. Papirius Mugillan. II.      |

Tribunes Military with Consular Power, the fifth time.

- |      |                              |                      |
|------|------------------------------|----------------------|
| 327. | T. Quinctius Pennus Cincinn. | C. Furius Pacilus.   |
|      | M. Postumius Albus.          | A. Cornelius Cossus. |

The tenth Dictator.

M. Æmilius Mamercinus III. Tr.
A. Cornelius Cossus, M. E.

Tribunes Military with Consular Power, the sixth time.

- |      |                              |                       |
|------|------------------------------|-----------------------|
| 328. | A. Sempronius Atratinus.     | L. Furius Medullinus. |
|      | L. Quinctius Cincinnatus II. | L. Horatius Barbatu.  |

Tribunes Military with Consular Power, the seventh time.

- |      |                        |                      |
|------|------------------------|----------------------|
| 329. | Ap. Claudius Crassus.  | Sp. Nantius Rutilus. |
|      | L. Sergius Fidenas II. | Sext. Julius Julius. |

CONSULS again.

- |      |                          |                      |
|------|--------------------------|----------------------|
| 330. | C. Sempronius Atratinus. | Q. Fabius Vibulanus. |
|------|--------------------------|----------------------|

Ffffff

Tribunes

Anni
U. C.

Tribunes Military with Consular Power, the eighth time.

331. L. Manlius Capitolinus, Q. Antonius Merenda, C. Papirius Mugillanus, L. Servilius Structus.

CONSULS.

332. T. Quintius Capitolinus O. N. Fabius Vibulanus.

Tribunes Military with Consular Power, the ninth time.

333. T. Quintius Pennus II. M. Manlius Capitolinus.
L. Furius Medullinus III. A. Sempronius Atratinus II.

Tribunes Military with Consular Power, the tenth time.

334. Agrippa Menenius Lanatus, Sp. Nantius Rutilus,
P. Lucretius Tricipitinus, C. Servilius Axilla.

Tribunes Military with Consular Power, the eleventh time.

335. M. Papirius Mugillanus, C. Servilius Axilla II. and L. Sergius Fidenas III.

The eleventh Dictator.

Q. Servilius Priscus Fidenas.
C. ——— Axilla M. E.

CENSORS.

L. Papirius Crassus * * * * * held the fourteenth Lustrum.

Tribunes Military with Consular Power, the twelfth time.

336. L. Lucretius Tricipitinus II. Sp. Veturius Crassus.
Agrippa Menenius Lanatus II. L. Servilius Structus II.

Tribunes Military with Consular Power, the thirteenth time.

337. A. Sempronius Atratinus III. M. Papirius Mugillanus II.
Q. Fabius Vibulanus, Sp. Nantius Rutilus II.

Tribunes Military with Consular Power, the fourteenth time.

338. P. Cornelius Cossus, Quintilius Cincinnatus.
C. Valerius Potitus, N. Fabius Vibulanus.

Tribunes Military with Consular Power, the fifteenth time.

339. Q. Fabius Vibulanus II. Cn. Cornelius Cossus.
P. Postumius Albinus Regill. L. Valerius Potitus.

CONSULS.

340. M. Cornelius Cossus, L. Furius Medullinus.
341. Q. Fabius Ambustus, C. Furius Pacilus.
342. M. Papirius Mugillanus, C. Nantius Rutilus.
343. M. Aemilius Mamercinus, C. Valerius Potitus Ov.
344. Cn. Cornelius Cossus, L. Furius Medullinus II.

Tribunes

Anni
U. C.

Tribunes Military with Consular Power, the sixteenth time.

345. C. Julius Julius, P. Cornel. Cossus, and
C. Servilius Ahala.

The twelfth Dictator.

P. Cornelius Cossus.
C. Servilius Ahala M. E.

Tribunes Military with Consular Power, the seventeenth time.

346. C. Valerius Potitus, C. Servilius Ahala II.
L. Furius Medullinus, N. Fabius Vibulanus II.

Tribunes Military with Consular Power, the eighteenth time.

347. P. Cornelius Cossus, L. Valerius Potitus II.
Cn. Cornelius Cossus, N. Fabius Ambustus.

The City Aneur taken, and the Roman Soldiers first allow'd Pay.

Tribunes Military with Consular Power, the nineteenth time.

348. C. Julius Julius II. M. Aemilius Mamercinus.
T. Quintius Capitolinus, L. Furius Medullinus.
Q. Quintilius Cincinnatus, A. Manlius Vulso.

Tribunes Military with Consular Power, the twentieth time.

349. P. Cornelius Maluginensis, Sp. Nantius Rutilus III.
Cn. Cornelius Cossus II, C. Valerius Potitus III.
K. Fabius Ambustus, M. Sergius Fidenas.

Tribunes Military with Consular Power, the one and twentieth time.

350. M. Aemilius Mamercinus II. M. Furius Fusus.
Ap. Claudius Crassinus, L. Julius Julius.
M. Quintilius Varus, L. Valerius Potitus III.

CENSORS.

M. Furius Camillus, M. Postumius Albinus. He held the sixteenth Lustrum.

Tribunes Military with Consular Power, the two and twentieth time.

351. C. Servilius Ahala III. Q. Sulpicius Camerinus.
Q. Servilius Priscus, A. Manlius Vulso II.
L. Virginus Tricostus, M. Sergius Fidenas II.

Tribunes Military with Consular Power, the three and twentieth time.

352. L. Valerius Potitus IV. L. Julius Julius.
M. Furius Camillus, M. Aemilius Mamercinus III.
C. Cornelius Cossus II, K. Fabius Ambustus II.

Tribunes Military with Consular Power, the four and twentieth time.

353. P. Licinius Calvus, M. Melius Capitolinus.
P. Menius, L. Furius Medullinus.
T. Titinius, L. Publius Philo.

This P. Licinius Calvus was the first Commoner that was chosen to the Dignity of a Military Tribune, though the Erection of that Office was principally design'd for bringing in Commoners to have a share in the Government.

Tribunes

Ann
U. C.

Tribunes Military with Consular Power, the five and twentieth time.

354. M. Pomponius.
C. Duilius.
Cn. Genucius Augurinus.

L. Atilius Longus.
M. Veturius Crassus Cicurinus.
Volero Publilius Philo.

Tribunes Military with Consular Power, the six and twentieth time.

355. L. Valerius Potitus V.
M. Valerius Maximus.
M. Furius Camillus II.

L. Furius Medullinus III.
Q. Servilius Priscus II.
Q. Sulpicius Camerinus II.

Tribunes Military with Consular Power, the twenty seventh time.

356. L. Julius Iulus II.
L. Sergius Fidenas.
P. Cornelius Maluginensis II.

F. Furius Medullinus IV.
A. Postumius Albinus Regill.
A. Manlius Capitolinus III.

Tribunes Military with Consular Power, the twenty eighth time.

357. P. Licinius Calvus.
Cn. Genucius Augurinus II.
L. Atilius Longus II.

L. Titinius II.
P. Menius II.
P. Melius Capitolinus II.

The thirteenth Dictator.

M. Furius Camillus Tr.
P. Cornelius Scipio M. E.

The rich City Veii taken by Camillus by undermining.

Tribunes Military with Consular Power, the twenty ninth time.

358. P. Cornelius Cossus.
M. Valerius Maximus II.
L. Furius Medullinus V.

P. Cornelius Scipio.
K. Fabius Ambustus III.
Q. Servilius Priscus III.

Tribunes Military with Consular Power, the thirtieth time.

359. M. Furius Camillus III.
C. Aemilius Mamercinus.
Sp. Postumius Albinus Regill.

L. Furius Medullinus VI.
L. Valerius Poplicola.
P. Cornelius Scipio II.

Camillus whips back the Traiterous Faliscan Schoolmaster.

CONSULS again after fifteen Years Intermision.

360. L. Lucretius Flavius.
361. L. Valerius Potitus Tr.

Serv. Sulpicius Camerinus.
M. Manlius Capitolinus O.

CENSORS.

C. Julius Iulus. Who dying in his Office, there was chosen in his stead Cornelius Maluginensis.

L. Papirius Cursor. He held the seventeenth Lustrum.

Tribunes Military with Consular Power, the thirty first time.

362. L. Lucretius Flavius.
M. Aemilius Mamercinus.
Agrippa Furius Fusus.

Serv. Sulpicius Rufus.
L. Furius Medullinus VII.
C. Aemilius Mamercinus II.

Furius Camillus banisht about dividing the Veian spoils.

Tribunes

Ann
U. C.

Tribunes Military with Consular Power, the thirty second time.

363. Q. Fabius Ambustus.
K. Fabius Ambustus.
C. Fabius Ambustus.

Q. Sulpicius Longus.
Q. Servilius Priscus Fiden. IV.
Ser. Cornelius Maluginensis.

The Gauls take and burn Rome.

The fourteenth Dictator.

M. Furius Camillus II. Tr.
Being recall'd from Banishment to this Honour.

L. Valerius Potitus M. E.

Tribunes Military with Consular Power, the thirty third time.

364. L. Valerius Poplicola II.
P. Cornelius.
L. Aemilius Mamercinus.

L. Virginius Tricoftus.
A. Manlius Capitolinus.
L. Postumius Regill. Albinus.

The fifteenth Dictator.

M. Furius Camillus III. Tr.
C. Servilius Ahala M. E.

Tribunes Military with Consular Power, the thirty fourth time.

365. T. Quinctius Cincinnatus.

Q. Servilius Priscus Fidenas V.

L. Julius Iulus.
L. Lucretius Tricipitinus.

L. Aquilius Corvus.
Ser. Sulpicius Rufus.

Bo. VI.

Tribunes Military with Consular Power, the thirty fifth time.

366. L. Papirius Cursor.
L. Aemilius Mamercinus II.
L. Valerius Poplicola III.

C. Sergius Fidenas.
L. Menenius Lanatus.
C. Cornelius.

Tribunes Military with Consular Power, the thirty sixth time.

367. M. Furius Camillus III.
Q. Servilius Priscus Fiden. VI.
L. Horatius Pulvillus.

Serv. Cornelius Maluginensis II.
L. Quinctius Cincinnatus.
P. Valerius Poplicola Potitus.

Tribunes Military with Consular Power, the thirty seventh time.

368. A. Manlius Capitol. II.
P. Cornelius.
L. Papirius Cursor II.

T. Quinctius Capitolinus.
L. Quinctius Capitolinus.
C. Sergius Fidenas II.

The sixteenth Dictator.

A Cornelius Cossus Tr.
Q. Quinctius Capitolinus M. E.

Tribunes Military with Consular Power, the thirty eighth time.

369. Serv. Cornelius Maluginensis III.
M. Furius Camillus V.
C. Papirius Crassus.

P. Valerius Potitus Poplic. II.
Serv. Sulpicius Rufus II.
T. Quinctius Cincinnatus II.

M. Manlius for aspiring to be King, thrown Headlong from the Rock Tarpeia.
G g g g g
Tribunes

Anni
U. C.Tribunes Military with Consular Power, the thirty ninth time.

370. L. Valerius Popl. IV. L. Lucretius Tricipitinus II.
 A. Manlius Capitolinus III. L. Aemilius Mamercinus III.
 Ser. Sulpicius Rufus III. M. Trebonius Flavius.

Tribunes Military with Consular Power, the fortieth time.

371. Sp. Papirius Crassus. Q. Servilius Priscus Fidenas.
 L. Papirius Crassus. C. Sulpicius Peticus.
 Ser. Cornelius Maluginensis IV. L. Aemilius Mamercinus IV.

Tribunes Military with Consular Power, the forty first time.

372. M. Furius Camillus VI. L. Furius Medullinus.
 A. Postumius Albinus Regill. L. Postumius Albinus Regillensis.
 L. Lucretius Tricipitinus III. M. Fabius Ambustus.

Tribunes Military with Consular Power, the forty second time.

373. L. Valerius Poplicola V. L. Menenius Lanatus II.
 P. Valerius Potitus Popl. III. L. Papirius Cursor.
 S. Sergius Fidenas III. Ser. Cornelius Malugin. V.

CENSORS.

C. Sulpicius Camerinus resign'd upon the Sp. Postumius Albinus Reg. dyed in his Death of his Partner. Office.

The seventeenth Dictator.

T. Quinctius Cincinnatus Tr.
 A. Sempronius Atratinus M. E.

Tribunes Military with Consular Power, the forty third time.

374. P. Manlius Capitolinus. L. Albinus.
 C. Manlius Capitolinus. L. Julius Julius.
 C. Sextilius. L. Antistius.

Tribunes Military with Consular Power, the forty fourth time.

375. Sp. Furius Medullinus. M. Horatius Pulvillus.
 Q. Servilius Priscus Fidenas II. C. Licinius Calvus.
 P. Cloelius Siculus. L. Geganius.

CENSORS.

Sp. Servilius Priscus. Q. Cloelius Siculus. He held the nineteenth Lustrum.

Tribunes Military with Consular Power, the forty fifth time.

376. L. Aemilius Mamercinus V. Ser. Sulpicius Rufus II.
 P. Valerius Potitus Popl. IV. L. Quinctius Cincinnatus II.
 C. Veturius Crassus Cicurinus. C. Quinctius Cincinnatus.

All these were Patricians.

C. Licinius Stolo, and L. Sextius, two of the Tribunes of the Commons, having proposed three Laws in favour of the Commons against the power of the Patrici-ans, and not being able to get the same pass'd (by reason of the interposition of some of their Fellow Tribunes, whom the Nobles had made of their Party) would suffer no Curule Magistrates to be created, nor any Elections to be held but Aediles and Tribunes both of the Commons; so that for five Years there were neither Consuls,

Anni
U. C.

Consuls, nor Tribunes Military, but only Tribunes of the Commons, and they fill the same Men, viz.

Tribunes of the Commons without Curule Magistrates.

- 377 }
 378 } C. Licinius Calvus. C. Sextius Sextinus Lateran.
 379 }
 380 }
 381 }

Tribunes Military with Consular Power, the forty sixth time.

382. L. Flurius Medullinus II. P. Valerius Potitus Poplica V.
 A. Manlius Capitolinus. Ser. Sulpicius III.
 C. Valerius Potitus. Ser. Cornelius Maluginensis VI.

Tribunes Military with Consular Power, the forty seventh time.

383. Q. Servilius Priscus Fidenas III. M. Cornelius Maluginensis.
 C. Veturius Crassus Cicurinus II. Q. Quinctius Cincinnatus.
 A. Cornelius Cossus. M. Fabius Ambustus.

Tribunes Military with Consular Power, the forty eighth time.

384. T. Quinctius Capitol. Ser. Servilius Structus.
 Ser. Cornelius Maluginensis VII. L. Papirius Crassus.
 Ser. Sulpicius Prætextat. IV. L. Papirius Crassus Cicurinus.

The eighteenth Dictator.

M. Furius Camillus IV.
 L. Aemilius Mamercinus M. E.
 Who Relinquishing their Offices, in their room were Created

The nineteenth Dictator.

385. P. Manlius Capitolinus.
 C. Licinius Calvus M. E.
 This was the first Commoner that obtain'd to be made Master of the Horse.
 So that this Year there were no Curule Magistrates, besides Dictators.

Tribunes Military with Consular Power, the forty ninth time.

386. A. Cornelius Crassus II. L. Veturius Crassus Cicurinus II.
 M. Cornelius Malugin II. P. Valerius Potitus Poplic. IV.
 M. Geganius Macerinus. P. Manlius Capitolinus II.

The twentieth Dictator.

M. Furius Camillus V. Tr.
 Q. Quinctius Cincinnatus Capitolinus M. E.

Henceforwards the Government return'd into Consular hands, but a Commoner was capable of being one of them.

387. L. Aemilius Mamercinus. L. Sextius Sextin. Lateran. The first Bo. VII.
 Commoner that ever was Consul.

In compensation for the Nobles yielding that one Commoner might be chosen Consul, the Commons were content, That there should be a new Magistrate Erected, called Prætor of the City, who should be a Patrician. As also that two Curule Aediles should be Elected, and both out of the Nobility.

CEN-

Anni
U. C.

CENSORS the First.

388. Postumius Regill. Albinus. C. Sulpicius Petitus.
L. Genucius Aventinensis. Q. Servilius Ahala.

A great Plague at Rome, whereof dyed one Censor, one Curule Ædile, and three Tribunes of the people; and (amongst others) M. Furius Camillus, being above eighty years of Age.

389. C. Sulpicius Peticus Tr. C. Licinius Calvus.
 390. L. Aemilius Mamercinus II. Cn. Genucius Aventin.

The twenty first Dictator.

L. Manlius Capitolinus Imperiosus.
L. Pinarius Natta M. E.

This was the first time a Dictator was Created for the Ceremony of driving of a Nail.

CENSORS.

- M. Fabius Ambustus.* L. Furius Medullinus. He held the 391. Q. Servilius Ahala II. L. Genucius Aventinensis II.
L. Genucius Aventinensis II.

M. Curtius throws himself into the Gulph, for opening of the Earth in the Forum at Rome.

The twenty second Dictator.

Ap. Claudius Crassinus Regillensis O.
L. Cornelius Scipio M. E.

392. C. Licinius Calvus II. C. Sulpicius Peticus II.

The twenty third Dictator.

Q. Quinctius Barbatulus Capitolinus Crispinus Tr.
Serv. Cornelius Maluginensis M. E.

393. M. Fabius Ambustus O. C. Petilius Libo Visolus Tr.

The twenty fourth Dictator.

C. Servilius Ahala.
T. Quinctius Barbatulus Capitolinus M. E.

394. M. Popilius Lenas. Cn. Manlius Capitolinus.
 395. C. Fabius Ambustus. C. Plantius Proculus Tr.

The twenty fifth Dictator.

C. Sulpicius Peticus Tr.
M. Valerius Poplicola M. E.

396. C. Marcus Rutilus Tr. Cn. Manlius Capitolinus Imperiosus II.
 397. M. Fabius Ambustus II. M. Popilius Lenas II.

The

Anni
U. C.

The twenty sixth Dictator.

C. Martius Rutilus [the first Commoner that ever had that Dignity.] Tr.
C. Plantius Proculus M. E.

398. C. Sulpicius Peticus III. M. Valerius Poplicola.
 399. M. Fabius Ambustus III. Tr. T. Quinctius Barbatulus.
 400. C. Sulpicius Peticus IV. M. Valerius Poplicola II.

The twenty seventh Dictator.

T. Manlius Imperiosus Torquatus Tr.
A. Cornelius Cossus Arvina M. E.

401. P. Valerius Poplicola. C. Marcus Rutilus II.

The twenty eighth Dictator.

C. Julius Julius.
L. Aemilius Mamercinus M. E.

402. C. Sulpicius Peticus V. T. Quinctius Pennus Cincinnatus.

The twenty ninth Dictator [for holding the Comitia.]

M. Fabius Ambustus.
Q. Servilius Ahala M. E.

CENSORS.

- Cn. Manlius Capitol. Imperiosus.* C. Marcus Rutilus. He held the twenty 403. M. Popilius Lenas II. Tr. L. Cornelius Scipio.
 second Lustrum, and was the first Commoner that ever had that Office.

The thirtieth Dictator [for holding the Comitia.]

L. Furius Camillus.
P. Cornelius Scipio M. E.

404. L. Furius Camillus. P. Claudius Crassinus Regillensis.

M. Valerius fights hand to hand with a mighty Gaul, and being assisted by a Raven, kills him, whence he was call'd Corvus.

The thirty first Dictator [for holding the Comitia.]

T. Manlius Imperiosus Torquatus II.
A. Cornelius Cossus Arvina II. M. E.

405. M. Popilius Lenas IV. M. Valerius Corvus, being then but twenty three years of Age.

The thirty second Dictator [for holding the Comitia.]
His Name not known.

406. C. Plantius Venno. T. Manlius Imperiosus Torquatus.
 407. M. Valerius Corvus II. Tr. C. Petilius Libo Visolus.
 408. M. Fabius Dorso. Serv. Sulpicius Camerinus.

The thirty third Dictator.

L. Furius Camillus II.
Cn. Manlius Capitolinus Imperiosus M. E.

409. C. Marcus Rutilus III. T. Manlius Imperiosus Torquat. II.
 H h h h h

The

Anni
U. C.

The thirty fourth Dictator [for holding the Latine Holy-Days.]

P. Valerius Poplicola.
Q. Fabius Ambustus M. E.

410. M. Valerius Corvus III. Tr. A. Cornelius Cossus Arvin. Tr.

The Capuans freely surrender their City to the Romans to be protected against the Samnites. And so began the Samnite War.

411. Q. Servilius Ahala. C. Marcius Rutilus IV.

The thirty fifth Dictator.

M. Valerius Corvus.
L. Aemilius Mamercinus Privernas II. M. E.412. L. Aemilius Mamercinus Priv.
413. T. Manlius Imperiosus Torquatus III. Tr. C. Plautius Venno II.
Who beheaded his Son for fighting P. Decius Mus. Who devoted himself Bo. VIII.
(though with success) against his Order for his Army.

The thirty sixth Dictator.

L. Papirius Crassus [who was also Prætor.]
L. Papirius Cursor M. E.

414. T. Aemilius Mamercinus. Q. Publilius Philo Tr.

The thirty seventh Dictator.

Q. Publilius Philo.
D. Junius Brutus Scæva M. E.415. L. Furius Camillus Tr. C. Menius Tr.
416. C. Sulpicius Longus. P. Aulus Petus.

The thirty eighth Dictator.

C. Claudius Crassinus Regillensis.
P. Claudius Hortator M. E.
But being unduly created they resign'd.417. L. Papirius Crassus. K. Duilius.
418. M. Valerius Corvus IV. Tr. M. Atilius Regulus.

The thirty ninth Dictator [for holding the Comitia.]

L. Aemilius Mamercinus.
Q. Publilius Philo M. E.

419. Ti. Veturius Calvinus. Sp. Postumius Albinus.

The fortieth Dictator.

P. Cornelius Rufinus.
M. Antonius M. E.
Unduly created they resign.

420. This Year was without Consuls [tis thought by reason of the raging Pestilence.]

421. A. Cornelius Cossus Arvina II. Cn. Domitius Calvinus.

The

Anni
U. C.

The forty first Dictator.

M. Papirius Crassius.
P. Valerius Poplicola M. E.

CENSORS

422. Q. Publilius Philo. Sp. Postumius Albinus.
L. Valerius Potitus Flaccus. M. Claudius Marcellus.

The forty second Dictator [for driving the Nail.]

Cn. Quinctilius Varus.
L. Valerius Potitus Flaccus M. E.423. L. Papirius Crassus II. L. Plautius Venno.
424. L. Aemilius Mamercinus II. Tr. C. Plautius Decianus Tr.
425. P. Cornelius Scapula. P. Plautius Proculus.
426. L. Cornelius Lentulus. Q. Publilius Philo II. Tr.

The forty third Dictator [for holding the Comitia.]

M. Claudius Marcellus.
Sp. Postumius Albinus M. E.
Unduly made, they resign'd.427. L. Papirius Cursor. C. Petilius Libo Volsus II.
Roman Debtors freed from Bondage, and henceforth their Goods only, and not their Bodies, liable to their Creditors.

428. L. Furius Camillus II. D. Junius Brutus Scæva.

The forty fourth Dictator.

L. Papirius Cursor Tr.
Q. Fabius Maximus Rullianus M. E.
Who being forc'd by the Dictator to resign (because he fought against his Order, for which he endeavour'd to put him to Death) in his place was chosen L. Papirius Crassus M. E.

429. This Year there was only the Dictator and Master of the Horse, without Consuls.

430. C. Sulpicius Longus II. Q. Aulus Corretanus.
431. Q. Fabius Max. Rullian. Tr. L. Fulvius Curvus Tr.

The forty fifth Dictator [for holding the Roman Games.]

A. Cornelius Cossus Arvina.
M. Fabius Ambustus M. E.432. T. Veturius Calvinus II. Sp. Postumius Albinus II.
The Romans shamefully worsted at Caudinum, by the Samnites.

Bo. IX.

The forty sixth Dictator [for holding the Comitia.]

Q. Fabius Ambustus.
P. Aemilius Petus.
But being unduly created, resign'd, and in their room came

The forty seventh Dictator.

M. Aemilius Papus.
L. Valerius Flaccus M. E.433. L. Papirius Cursor II. Q. Publilius Philo III.
The Samnites beaten, and made pass under the Gallows.

The

Anni
V. C.

The forty eighth Dictator.

C. Manius.
M. Fostius Flaccinator M. E.

The forty ninth Dictator.

L. Cornelius Lentulus.
L. Papirius Cursor II. M. E.

The fiftieth Dictator.

T. Manlius Torquatus III.
L. Papirius Cursor III. M. E.

434. L. Papirius Cursor III. Tr. Q. Aulus Cerretanus II.
He was Contemporary with Alexander the Great, and thought as brave a Commander as he.
435. L. Plautius Venno. M. Fostius Flaccinator.

CENSORS.

- L. Papirius Crassus. C. Manius. He held the twenty fifth Lustrum.
436. Q. Aemilius Barbula. C. Junius Bubulus Brutus.
437. Sp. Nautius Rutilus. M. Popilius Lenas.

The fifty first Dictator.

L. Aemilius Mamercus Privern. II.
L. Fulvius Curvus M. E.

438. L. Papirius Cursor IV. Q. Publilius Philo IV.

The fifty second Dictator.

Q. Fabius Maximus Rullian. Tr.
Q. Aulus Cerretan M. E. who being slain, C. Fabius Ambustus came in his place.

439. M. Patilius Libo. C. Sulpicius Longus III. Tr.

The fifty third Dictator.

C. Manius II.
M. Fostius Flaccinator M. E.

440. L. Papirius Cursor V. C. Junius Bubulus Brutus II.

The fifty fourth Dictator.

C. Patilius Libo Visolus.
M. Libo * * * M. E.

441. M. Valerius Maximus Tr. P. Decius Mus.

The fifty fifth Dictator.

C. Sulpicius Longus.
C. Junius Bibulus Brutus.

CENSORS.

- Ap. Claudius Cacus. C. Plautius, who in this Office gain'd
He held the twenty sixth Lustrum. the Name of Venox.

C. Junius

Anni
V. C.

442. C. Junius Bibulus Brutus III. Tr. Q. Aemilius Barbula II. Tr.
443. Q. Fabius Maximus II. C. Marcus Rutilus.

The fifty sixth Dictator.

L. Papirius Cursor II. Tr.
C. Junius Bubulus Brutus M. E.

444. This Year the Dictator and Master of the Horse govern'd without Consuls.

445. P. Decius Mus II. Q. Fabius Maximus III.
446. Ap. Claudius Cacus. L. Volturnus Flamma volens.

CENSORS.

- M. Valerius Maximus. C. Jun. Bubulc. Brutus.
447. Q. Marcus Tremulus Tr. He held the twenty seventh Lustrum.
P. Cornelius Arviva.

The fifty seventh Dictator.

P. Cornelius Scipio Barbatus.
P. Decius Mus M. E.

448. L. Postumius Magellus. T. Minucius Augurinus. Who being kill'd in Battel, in his room came
449. P. Sempronius Sophus Tr. M. Fulvius Corvus Tr.
P. Sulpicius Saverrio Tr.

CENSORS.

- Q. Fabius Maximus. P. Decius Mus.
450. Ser. Cornelius Lentulus. He held the twenty eighth Lustrum.
451. M. Livius Dentor. L. Genucius Aventinensis.
M. Aemilius Paulus.

Bo. X

The fifty eighth Dictator.

C. Junius Bibulc. Brutus II. Tr.
M. Titinius M. E.

The fifty ninth Dictator.

Q. Fabius Maximus II.
M. Aemilius Paulus M. E.

452. This Year there were no Consuls, but Affairs were manag'd by the Dictators and Masters of the Horse.

The sixtieth Dictator.

M. Valerius Corvus II. Tr.
P. Sempronius Sophus M. E.

453. Q. Apuleius Pansa. M. Valerius Corvus V.

Augurs first made out of the Commons.

454. M. Fulvius Patinus Tr. T. Manlius Torquatus. Who dying, in his place came
M. Valerius Corvus VI.

I i i i i

CEN.

Anni
U. C.

CENSORS.

P. Sempronius Sophus.

P. Sulpicius Saverrio. He held the twenty ninth Lustrum.

455. L. Cornelius Scipio.

C. Fulvius Max. Centumalus.

456. Q. Fabius Maximus IV.

Q. Decius Mus III.

He refused this Honour because of his Age, and cited a Law, that none ought to bear the same Office twice in ten Years. But the people would not excuse him.

457. Ap. Claudius Cæcus II.

L. Volturnius Flamma II.

458. Q. Fabius Maximus V. Tr. III.

P. Decius Mus IV. Who devoted himself.

459. L. Postumius Magellus Tr.

M. Atilius Regulus Tr.

CENSORS.

P. Cornelius Arvina.

C. Marcins Rutilus, Lustr. 30.

460. L. Papirius Cursor Tr.

Sp. Carvilius Maximus Tr.

THE Fasti Consulares,

OR

Chronological Catalogue of the Roman Magistrates, &c. belonging to Livy's Second Decade, supply'd by Freinshemius, containing seventy four Years.

CONSULS.

461. Q. Fabius Maximus Gurgæ Tr.

D. Junius Brutus Sævus

Book I.

His Father acted with him as his Lieutenant.

462. L. Postumius Megellus III.

C. Junius Brutus Bibulus.

The God Æsculapius brought to Rome.

463. P. Cornelius Rufinus Tr.

M. Curius Dentatus Tr. Tr. C.

464. M. Valerius Corvinus.

Q. Cædicius Noëlus.

The Tresviri Capiteles first Instituted

CENSORS.

M. Curius Dentatus.

Two hundred seventy three thousand Heads Enroll'd.

L. Papirius Cursor.

He held the thirty first Lustrum.

465. Q. Marcins Tremulus II.

P. Cornelius Arvina II.

466. M. Claudius Marcellus.

S. Nautius Rutilus.

467. M. Valerius Potitus.

C. Atilius Patus.

The

Anni
U. C.

The sixty first Dictator [for appeasing a Sedition.]

Q. Hortensius who died in his Office.

His Master of the Horse not known.

He made a Law, That the Plebisita, or Ordinances of the Commons should bind all the people.

468. C. Claudius Canina.

M. Aemilius Lepidus.

469. C. Servilius Tucca.

L. Cæcilius Dentor. Who being slain in a Battel, in his room was furrogated
Manius Curius Dentatus II.

470. P. Cornelius Max. Dolabella Tr.

Cn. Domitius Calvinus.

Book II.

471. C. Fabricius Luscinus Tr.

Q. Aemilius Papus.

The Tarentine War.

472. L. Aemilius Barbula Tr.

Q. Martius Philippus Tr.

King Pyrrhus comes into Italy.

473. P. Valerius Levinus.

Ti. Coruncanius Nepos Tr.

CENSORS.

Q. Fabius Max. Gurgæ.

Cn. Domitius Calvinus.

Bo. III

Who held the thirty second Lustrum, and was the first Commoner that ever did it.

474. P. Sulpicius Saverrio.

P. Decius Mus, slain in Battel.

475. C. Fabricius Luscinus II. Tr.

Q. Aemilius Papus II.

476. P. Cornelius Rufinus II.

C. Junius Brutus Bubule. II. Tr.

Bo. IV.

477. Q. Fabius Max. Gurgæ II. Tr.

C. Genucius Clepsina.

The sixty second Dictator.

P. Corn. Rufinus.

His Master of the Horse not known.

478. M. Curius Dentatus II. Tr.

L. Cornelius Lentulus Tr.

479. Ser. Cornelius Merenda.

M. Curius Dentatus III.

480. C. Fabius Dorso Licinus.

C. Claudius Canina II. Tr.

481. L. Papirius Cursor II. Tr.

Sp. Carvilius Max. II. Tr.

They put an end both to the Samnite and Tarentine Wars

CENSORS.

M. Curius Dentatus.

L. Papirius Cursor.

He held the thirty third Lustrum.

King Pyrrhus kill'd by a Woman.

482. C. Quinctilius Claudus.

L. Genucius Clepsina.

Bo V.

483. C. Genucius Clepsina II.

Cn. Cornelius Blasio Tr.

CENSORS.

Ti. Coruncanius.

* * * * * the thirty fourth Lustrum.

The Romans first coin Silver.

484. C. Fabius Pictor.

Q. Ogulnius Gallus.

485. P. Sempronius Sophus Tr.

Ap. Claudius Rufus Tr.

486. M. Atilius Regulus Tr.

L. Julius Libo Tr.

487. Q. Fabius Pictor. Tr. Tr.

D. Junius Pera Tr. Tr.

488. Q. Fabius Max. Gurgæ III.

L. Mamilius Vitulus.

CEN-

Anni
U. C.

CENSORS.

C. Cornelius Blasio.

C. Marcus Rutilus II.
He held the thirty fifth Lustrum.The first Punic War begins.

489. Ap. Claudius Caudex.

M. Fulvius Flaccus.

Bo. VI.

The cruel sport of the Gladiators first began by the Bruti in honour of their Fathers Funeral.

490. M. Valerius Max. Tr.

M. Otacilius Crassus.

A Clock first seen at Rome.

The sixty third Dictator [for driving the Nail.]

Cn. Fulvius Max. Centumalus.
Q. Marcus Philippus M. E.

491. L. Postumius Megellus.

Q. Aemilius Virgulus.

492. L. Valerius Flaccus.

T. Otacilius Crassus.

493. Cn. Cornelius Scipio Asina.

C. Duilius Tr. Being the first that Cele- Bo. VII.
brated a Naval Triumph.

494. L. Cornelius Scipio Tr.

C. Aquilius Florus Tr.

495. A. Atilius Callatinus Tr.

C. Sulpicius Paterculus Tr.

Annibal the Elder beaten at Sea, is Crucified by his own Men.

CENSORS.

C. Duilius.

L. Cornelius Scipio.

496. C. Atilius Regulus Tr.

He held the thirty sixth Lustrum.
Cn. Cornelius Blasio II.The sixty fourth Dictator [for celebrating the Latine Holy-Days.]

Q. Ogulnius Gallus.

M. Latorius Plancianus M. E.

497. L. Manlius Vulso Longus.

Q. Ceditius died in his Office, which was supply'd by
M. Atilius Regulus.Regulus takes sixty three Carthaginian Ships, and sinks thirty.

498. Ser. Fulvius Patin. Nobilior Tr.

M. Aemilius Paulus Tr.

Bo. VIII.

Regulus taken by the Carthaginians.

499. Cn. Corn. Scipio Asina II. Tr.

A. Atilius Galatinus II.

500. Cn. Servilius Capio.

C. Sempronius Blasus Tr.

CENSORS.

D. Junius Pera.

L. Postumius Megill. died in his Office.

501. C. Aurelius Cotta Tr.

P. Servilius Geminus.

CENSORS.

M. Valerius Max. Messal.

P. Sempronius Sophus.

502. L. Caecilius Metellus Tr.

He held the thirty seventh Lustrum.
C. Furius Pacilus.

503. C. Atilius Regulus II.

L. Manlius Vulso II.

Elephants

Anni
U. C.

Elephants first taken and sent to Rome.

Regulus sent to Rome, dissuades a Peace, and is return'd to Carthage.

504. P. Claudius Pulcher.

L. Junius Pullus.

Bo. IX

M. Claudius Glicia, who had been a Scrivener made Dictator, but forc'd to relinq; In whose place was created

The sixty fifth Dictator.

A. Atilius Calatinus.

L. Caecilius Metellus M. E.

505. C. Aurelius Cotta II.

P. Servilius Geminus II.

506. L. Caecilius Metellus II.

N. Fabius Buteo.

CENSORS.

A. Atilius Calatinus.

A. Manlius Torquat. Attic.

He held the thirty eighth Lustrum.The number now Enroll'd was but two hundred fifty one thousand two hundred twenty two, the Wars had destroy'd so many.

507. M. Otacilius Crassus II.

M. Fabius Licinus.

The sixty sixth Dictator [for holding the Comitia.]

Ti. Coruncanius Nepos.

M. Fulvius Flaccus M. E.

508. M. Fabius Buteo.

C. Atilius Bulbus.

509. A. Manlius Torquat. Attic.

C. Sempronius Blasus II.

510. C. Fundanius Fundulus.

C. Sulpicius Gallus.

511. C. Lutatius Catulus Tr.

A. Postumius Albinus.

The end of the first Punic War, having continued almost twenty four Years.

512. A. Manlius Torquat. Attic. II. Tr.

Q. Lutatius Cerco Tr.

A great Fire at Rome.

CENSORS.

C. Aurelius Cotta.

N. Fabius Buteo.

Bo. X.

He held the thirty ninth Lustrum.

513. C. Claudius Centho.

M. Sempronius Tuditanus.

514. C. Mamilius Turrinus.

Q. Valerius Falto.

515. Ti. Sempronius Gracchus.

P. Valerius Falto.

516. L. Cornelius Lentul. Caudinus Tr.

Q. Fulvius Flaccus.

517. P. Cornel. Lentul. Caudin.

C. Licinius Varus.

CENSORS.

L. Corn. Lent. Caudin.

Q. Lutatius Cerco died in his Office.

518. T. Manlius Torquatus.

C. Atilius Bulbus II.

519. L. Postumius Albinus.

Sp. Carvilius Maximus Tr.

CENSORS.

C. Atilius Bulbus.

A. Postumius Albinus.

He held the fortieth Lustrum.

The Temple of Janus is shut, which it had not been since K. Numa's Days.

K k k k k

Q. Fa.

Anni
U. C.

520. Q. Fabius Max. Verrucos. Tr. M. Pomponius Matho Tr.
 521. M. Aemilius Lepidus. M. Publicius Malleolus.
 522. M. Pomponius Matho II. C. Papirius Mafso Tr.

Sp. Carvilius Ruga divorc'd his Wife, the first Precedent of that kind in Rome.

The sixty seventh Dictator [for holding the Comitia.]

C. Duilius.
 C. Aurelius Cotta M. E.

CENSORS.

T. Manlius Torquatus. Q. Fulvius Flaccus.
 Being unduly made they resign'd.

523. M. Aemilius Barbula. M. Junius Pera.

CENSORS.

- Q. Fabius Max. Verrucos. M. Sempronius Tuditanus
 Held the forty first Lustrum.
 524. L. Postumius Albinus II. Cn. Fulvius Centumalus Tr.
 525. Sp. Carvilius Maximus II. Q. Fabius Max. Verruc. II.
 526. P. Valerius Flaccus. M. Atilius Regulus.

The number of Prætors doubled.

527. M. Valerius Messalla. L. Apustius Fullo.

War with the Cisalpine Gauls.

528. L. Aemilius Papus Tr. C. Atilius Regulus kill'd in a Battel with the Gauls, who yet were routed, and forty thousand of them slain.

CENSORS.

- C. Claudius Centho. M. Junius Pera.
 Held the forty second Lustrum.
 529. T. Manlius Torquatus. Q. Fulvius Flaccus II.

The sixty eighth Dictator [for holding the Comitia.]

L. Cæcilius Metellus.
 N. Fabius Buteo M. E.

530. C. Flaminius Nepos Tr. P. Furius Philus Tr.
 531. Cn. Cornelius Scipio Calvus. M. Clandius Marcellus Tr.
 532. P. Cornelius Scipio Asina Tr. M. Minucius Rufus.

The sixty ninth Dictator.

Q. Fabius Max. Verrucos.
 C. Flaminius Nepos M. E.

533. L. Veturius Philo. C. Lutatius Catulus.

CENSORS.

- L. Aemilius Papus. C. Flaminius. He held the 43. Lustrum.
 The Illyrick War begins. The number was 270213.
 534. M. Livius Salinator. L. Aemilius Paulus.

THE

THE Fasti Confulares,

O R.

Chronology, relating to the Third Decade of Livy's
 History, containing eighteen Years.

CONSULS.

Anni
U. C.

535. P. Cornelius Scipio. Ti. Sempronius Longus. Book I.

The second Punick War begins, Annibal passes the Alps into Italy, and routs the Romans at Ticinus and Trebia.

536. C. Flaminius II. slain in a Battel at Thra- Cn. Servilius Geminus. Book II.
 symenus, in whose room was chosen
 M. Atilius Regulus.

The seventieth Dictator.

Q. Fabius Max. Verrucos.
 M. Minucius Rufus M. E.

The Authority and Command of these two was afterwards by a special Order of the people made equal.

The seventy first Dictator.

L. Veturius Philo.
 M. Pomponius Matho M. E.

537. C. Terentius Varro. L. Aemilius Paulus slain in Battel at the Bo. III.
 Battel of Cannæ, where the Romans lost above forty thousand men.

The seventy second Dictator.

M. Junius Pera.
 Ti. Sempronius Gracchus M. E.

The seventy third Dictator.

N. Fabius Buteo chosen for filling up the Senate, without any Master of Horse.

538. L. Postumius Albinus III. Ti. Sempronius Gracchus.
 Before he entred on the Office, he was slain, in his place came
 M. Claudius Marcellus II.
 But he being unduly chosen, at last was Elected

- Q. Fabius Max. Verrucos. III. M. Claudius Marcellus III. O. Bo. IV.
 539. Q. Fabius Max. Verrucos. IV.

CEN-

Anni
U. C.

CENSORS.

540. M. Atilius Regulus resign'd.
Q. Fabius Maximus, P. Furius Philus died in his Office.
Ti. Sempronius Gracchus II. Bo. V.

The seventy fourth Dictator [for holding the Comitia.]

C. Claudius Centho.
Q. Fulvius Flaccus M. E.

541. Sp. Claudius Pulcher.
542. P. Sulpicius Galba Max.
543. M. Valerius Levinus.
Q. Fulvius Flaccus III.
Cn. Fulvius Centumalus.
M. Claudius Marcellus IV. Bo. VI.

The seventy fifth Dictator [for holding the Comitia.]

Q. Fulvius Flaccus.
P. Licinius Crassus Dives M. E. Bo. VII.

CENSORS.

544. L. Veturius Philo died in his Office.
Q. Fabius Max. Verruc. V. P. Licinius Crassus Dives renounc'd.
Q. Fulvius Flaccus IV.

CENSORS.

- M. Cornelius Cethegus*.
P. Sempronius Tuditanus held the forty fourth Lustrum.
Neither of these had been Consuls.
545. M. Claudius Marcellus V. T. Quinctius Crispinus.
Both slain in Battel.

The seventy sixth Dictator.

T. Manlius Torquatus.
C. Servilius M. E.

546. C. Claudius Nero Tr. M. Livius Salinator Tr. Bo. VIII.

The seventy seventh Dictator [for holding the Comitia.]

M. Livius Salinator.
Q. Cecilius Metellus M. E.

547. Q. Cecilius Metellus.
548. P. Cornelius Scipio, afterwards Africa-
nus. L. Veturius Philo.
P. Licinius Crassus Dives. Bo. IX.

The seventy eighth Dictator [for holding the Comitia.]

Q. Cecilius Metellus.
L. Veturius Philo M. E.

549. M. Cornelius Cethegus. P. Sempronius Tuditanus.

CENSORS.

- M. Livius Salinator*.
550. Cn. Servilius Cæpio. C. Claudius Nero held the forty fifth Lustrum.
C. Servilius. Bo. X.

The

Anni
U. C.

The seventy ninth Dictator [for holding the Comitia.]

P. Sulpicius Galba Max.
M. Servilius Pulex Geminus M. E.

551. T. Claudius Nero. M. Servilius Pulex Geminus.

The eightieth Dictator [for holding the Comitia.]

C. Servilius.
P. Ailius Patus M. E.

552. Cn. Cornelius Lentulus Tr. P. Ailius Patus.

The end of the second Punick War.

THE Fasti Consulares,For the Fourth Decade of Livy's History, containing twenty two Years.

553. P. Sulpicius Galba Max. II. C. Aurelius Cotta. Book I.
The Macedonian War.

554. L. Cornelius Lentulus. P. Vellius Tappulus. Book II.

CENSORS.

- P. Cornelius Scipio* Afric. P. Ailius Patus held the forty sixth Lustrum.
555. T. Quinctius Flaminius.
556. C. Cornelius Cethegus Tr. Sex. Ailius Patus Catus. Bo. III.
557. L. Furius Purpureo. Q. Minucius Rufus Tr.
M. Claudius Marcellus.

Peace granted to King Philip of Macedon.

558. M. Porcius Cato. L. Valerius Flaccus. Bo. IV.

M. Helvius Blasio the Proconsul has an Ovation.
Q. Minucius Thermus the Proconsul Tr.

559. P. Cornelius Scipio Afr. II. Ti. Sempronius Longus.

CENSORS.

- Sex. Ailius Patus Catus*. C. Cornel Cethegus held the forty seventh Lustrum.

M. Porcius Cato Proconsul Tr.
T. Quinctius Flaminius Proconsul Tr.

L. I I I I I

L. Cor-

Anni
U. C.

560. L. Cornelius Merula.
561. L. Quinctius Flaminius.
562. M. Acilius Glabrio.
- Q. Minucius Thermus.
Cn. Domitius Ahenobarbus.
P. Cornelius Scipio Nasica Tr.
- Bo. V.
Bo. VI.

The War with King Antiochus.
M. Fulvius Nobilior Proconsul O.

563. L. Cornelius Scipio, afterwards call'd C. Laelius Nepos.
Asiaticus.
- Bo. VII.

M. Acilius Glabrio Proconsul Tr.

564. Cn. Manlius Vulso.
M. Fulvius Nobilior.
- Bo. VIII.

CENSORS.

- T. Quinctius Flaminius.
M. Claudius Marcellus held the forty eighth Lustrum.

L. Aemilius Regillus Proconsul Tr.
L. Cornelius Scipio Asiaticus Proconsul Tr.
Q. Fabius Labeo Proconsul Tr.

565. C. Livius Salinator.
M. Valerius Messalla.
- Scipio Africanus banisht himself from Rome, being accused.
- Bo. IX.

566. M. Aemilius Lepidus.
C. Flaminius Nepos.
- M. Fulvius Nobilior Proconsul Tr.
Cn. Manlius Vulso Proconsul Tr.

567. Sp. Postumius Albinus.
568. Ap. Claudius Pulcher.
- Q. Marcius Philippus.
M. Sempronius Tuditanus.

L. Manlius Acidin, Fulvian, Proconsul O.

569. P. Claudius Pulcher.
L. Porcius Licinus.

CENSORS.

- L. Valerius Flaccus.
M. Porcius Cato held the forty ninth Lustrum.

C. Calpurnius Piso Proconsul Tr.
L. Quinctius Crispinus Proconsul Tr.

570. Q. Fabius Labeo.
M. Claudius Marcellus.
- Annibal poisons himself. Scipio Africanus dies in banishment.
- Bo. X.

571. L. Aemilius Paulus.
Cn. Babius Tamphilus.

A. Terentius Varro Proconsul O.

572. P. Cornelius Cethegus.
M. Babius Tamphilus.

The Books of Numa Pompilius found and burnt.

L. Aemilius Paulus Proconsul Tr.

573. A. Postumius Albinus.
C. Calpurnius Piso died in his Office, and in his room was subrogated Q. Fulvius Flaccus.

P. Cor-

Anni
U. C.

P. Cornelius Cethegus Proconsul Tr.
M. Babius Tamphilus Proconsul Tr.
Q. Fulvius Flaccus Proconsul Tr.

574. L. Manlius Acid. Fulvian.
Q. Fulvius Flaccus Tr.

CENSORS.

- M. Aemilius Lepidus.
M. Fulvius Nobilior held the fiftieth Lustrum.

THE Fasti Consulares,

For that Part of Livy's Fifth Decade that is Extant, containing fourteen Years.

575. M. Junius Brutus.
A. Manlius Vulso.
- T. Sempronius Gracchus Proconsul Tr.
L. Postumius Albinus Proconsul Tr.
- Book I.

576. C. Claudius Pulcher Tr.
577. Cn. Cornelius Scipio Hispalus. He dying, in his place was choien C. Valerius Levinus.
578. P. Mutius Scævola Tr.
- Ti. Sempronius Gracchus.
Q. Petilius Spurinus kill'd in Battel, after he had subrogated to himself a Colleague.
M. Aemilius Lepidus II.

Ti. Sempronius Gracchus Proconsul Tr.
C. Valerius Levinus Proconsul Tr.

579. Sp. Postumius Albin. Paululus.
M. Mucius Scævola.

CENSORS.

- M. Fulvius Flaccus.
A. Postumius Albinus held the fifty first Lustrum.

App. Claudius Centho Proconsul O.

580. L. Postumius Albinus.
581. C. Popilius Lenus.
- M. Popilius Lenat.
P. Atilius Ligus.
- Book II.

The first that were both Commoners.

C. Cicereius Proconsul Tr.

582. P. Licinius Assus.
583. A. Hostilius Mancinus.
- C. Cassius Longinus.
A. Atilius Serranus.
- Bo. III.

War with King Perseus.

584. Q. Marcius Philippus II.
C. Servilius Capio.
- Bo. IV.

CEN-

Anni
V. C.

CENSORS.

C. Claudius Pulcher.

Ti. Sempronius Gracchus held the fifty second Lustrum.

585. L. Aemilius Paulus II. Tr.

C. Licinius Crassus.

Bo. V.

586. Q. Ailius Pater.

M. Junius Pennus.

Cn. Octavius Proconsul Tr.

L. Anicius Gallus Proconsul Tr.

587. C. Sulpicius Gallus Tr.

M. Claudius Marcellus Tr.

588. T. Manlius Torquatus.

Cn. Octavius Tr.

THE

THE EXPLANATORY INDEX.

Though in our Translation we have occasionally interpreted several of the peculiar Terms of Offices, Laws, and Usages refer'd into by our Historian; yet for the fuller Satisfaction of the English Reader, we think it not amiss to add this brief Alphabetical Catalogue, which may both enlighten him as to the understanding of Livy in several places; as also give a more general insight into the Policy, Customs and Government of the Romans.

A. Commonly stands for Aulus, a frequent Forename amongst the Romans. Concerning which, we will here (once for all) advertize the Reader, That the Romans had for the most part Three Names; the first was called Prænomen or the Forename, answering to the Christian Name among us; the second was Nomen, the proper Name of their Family; and the third, Cognomen a Surname added upon some particular occasion, or for the better distinguishing them from others of the same Family: As L. Tarquinius Priscus, because he was the first King of that Name; L. Tarquinius Superbus, because of his Insolence and Cruelty. Of Forenames common to the Romans there were about thirty; all which were generally written short, only with one, two, or at the most three Letters, as follows in this Table.

Agr. Agrippa.	Mam. Mamercus.	Ser. Servius.
Ap. Appius.	Man. Manius.	Sex. Sextus.
A. Aulus.	M. Marcus.	Sp. Spurius.
Cæ. Cæso.	N. Numerius.	Ti. Tiberius.
C. Caius.	Op. Opiter.	T. Titus.
Cn. Cnaus.	Post. Posthumus.	Tul. Tullus.
D. Decimus.	Pr. Proculus.	V. Vibus.
H. Hostus.	P. Publius.	Vol. Volero.
L. Lucius.	Q. Quintus.	Vop. Vopiscus.

Besides these, there were also some Foreign Forenames sometimes used by the Romans, as An. Ancus, Ar. Aruns, Lar, Lucunno, Meius, Numa, Petro, Pompo, Sertor, Tullus, Turnus, and Volusus: And in process of time many of these Forenames came to be Surnames, as in M. Aemilius Mamercus, C. Plautius Proculus, &c.

Ædiles were Magistrates so called ab Ædibus curandis, because part of their Office was to look after the repair of the Temples and publick Buildings of the City. They were of two sorts: 1. Ædiles of the Commons, which were the most ancient, being instituted A. V. C. 240. at the same time when Tribunes of the Commons were first obtained, to whom these Ædiles were to be Assistants, and by their permission to determine Controversies; to look after those that held more Land than they ought to do by Law; to accuse such Matrons as lived scandalously; to chastize excessive Usurers and Extortioners; to restrain Tippling-houses and Gaming; to fine persons for lewd and uncivil words or actions; to see that the publick and private Edifices were kept in repair; that the common Sewers were cleaned, and the Aquæducts or Conduits in good order; to correct false Weights and Measures; to provide Bread-Corn and Oyl in time of dearth, and see that the same were not hoarded up, nor the Market forestall'd, as also to take care that necessary Provisions were sent to the Army, and especially to have the Custody of all the Plebiscita, or Ordinances of the Commons which were repositied in the Temple of Ceres. 2. Ædiles Curules were so called from the Sella Curulis or Ivory Chair in which they sat, and were wont to be carried into the Senate. They began in the year of the City 387. for when, after a great Sedition of the Commons, the matters were accommodated between them and the Patricians, the Senate had order'd that on that account, as a Thanksgiving to the Gods, the great Games should be celebrated, and the Ædiles of the Commons refused that work; divers of the young Patricians cry'd out, They would freely perform that Service to the Gods, and thereupon the Senate order'd, That the Dictator should propose a Law for chusing two Ædiles out of the Nobles, which was done accordingly. Their Office was to hold the Sacred and Solemn Games, and look after the Repairs of the Temples, Theatres, Gates, Walls, and all publick Buildings. Which Games they celebrated at their own Charge, and therefore to decline an Ædileship was lookt upon as Covetousness; but most Patricians were fond of the place, because it was the first first

M m m m m

first step to greater Honours as the Consulship, &c. 'Tis said there was either a Law, or at least a Custom, That no Roman should write any thing, but he must go to these Curule Aediles, and obtain their Leave, which they granted or refused according to the Authors parts and capacity, but this is to be understood only of Comedies or Stage-plays which were publicly to be acted; but especially they had Jurisdiction to determine Controversies about frauds in buying and selling upon the Action called Redhibitory, whereby such as put off any corrupt or sophisticated Ware, or sold a Servant or Horse that was not found, were obliged to take them again. These Magistrates, as well as those of the Commons, were Sacrosancti, that is, their persons were inviolable. And though at first none but Patricians might be advanced to this Office, yet in time Commoners also did attain thereunto.

Aerarii were such as being Citizens of Rome, were by the Censors (for some misdeemeanour) depriv'd of giving their Voices in their Century or Tribe; but yet still were bound to pay Scot and Lot, all kind of Tribute with the rest of their Fellow-Citizens, and to serve in the Wars at their own proper Charges, and therefore were so called ab Aere, Brass-money, either because Aera pendebant, or Aera non merebant, they pay Money without enjoying like Privileges with others, and receiv'd no pay when others did.

Agrarian Laws [so called ab Agro, a Field or place of Tillage] were Laws preferred by the Tribunes of the Commons, as well for dividing of Lands conquer'd and taken from the Enemies, amongst the Commons, (which the Nobles were apt to ingross to themselves) as also to restrain the Nobles from having or possessing above such a quantity of Land.

Ambitus was an inordinate desire of being in some Office of State, and the using of indirect means to obtain it, against which the Romans provided divers Laws with severe Penalties.

Annales were brief Memorials, Chronicles or Commentaries, containing the Names of Consuls every year, and all memorable Occurrences happening therein, which the High-Priests, called Pontifices Maximi, were to collect and commit to Writing in Tables, and set them up in their Houses to be seen; and hence (not from their bulk) they are sometimes called Annales Maximi.

Appia Via, a notable High-way from Rome as far as Capua, so called, because the same was laid out and made in manner of a Causeway by App. Claudius, and afterwards by Julius Caesar and Trajan: it was extended to Brindis in Calabria.

Aruspices, Auspices and Augures: These were three several sorts of Soothsayers or Cunning-men amongst the Romans, who by distinct ways did all pretend to divine and preface or foretell the success of matters future. The Aruspices by viewing the Entrails of Beasts, and therefore were so called ab aras inspiciendo, from beholding the Altars. As the Auspices took their name quasi Avispices, Bird-viewers, because they foretold things by beholding the flight of Birds. And thirdly, The Augures were so named ab avium garritu, from the Chirping or Chattering of the Birds, by which (rather than by their flying) these Gentlemen resolved all Questions. But the latter word Augur is often used Synecdochically for all kinds of Divining, whether by observing the Entrails of Beasts, the flying, screeching and chattering of Birds, or Thunder and Lightning in the Heavens, or marking the rebounding of Crums cast unto Birds, which was called Tripudium. The College of Augurs was first established by Romulus, there being then but three Persons therein, one for each Tribe; but Servius Tullius the sixth King, when he divided the City into four local Tribes or Quarters, added a fourth Augur, all elected out of the Patricii, but afterwards five more chosen out of the Commons were added. The manner how the Augur made his Observations was thus, He sat upon a Castle, or Tower, the Air being fair and clear, in his Soothsaying Robe called Lana, holding a crooked Staff in his hand (called Litum) his head cover'd, and his face towards the East: being thus placed, he quarter'd out with his crooked Staff, the Heavens into certain Regions which he called Templa, being to take notice in which of these Regions the Birds should appear, then he killed a Sacrifice, offered Prayers, after which he watcht for the tokens, which if lucky, he encouraged the business; but if unlucky, then he did obnunciare or gainsay it, shewing that the matter proposed was not pleasing to the Gods. Birds appearing on the left hand were commonly accounted lucky, because the Givers right hand in bestowing a benefit is opposite to the Receivers right. The Augur that did divine by the Crums cast to Chickens in a Coop was called Pullarius, or the Chicken-Prophet. When he would know the pleasure of the Gods in any matter, he was wont early in the morning to repair to the place where the Chickens were kept, where silence being commanded, and the Coop open'd, they cast Crums of Bread to them. Now if the Chickens either came slowly or not at all to the Bread, or if they walkt up and down by it, not touching it, then was it a token that the matter was displeasing to the Gods, and would have an ill end; but if the Chickens did hastily leap out of the Coop, and eat so greedily that some fell out of their mouths, and redounded on the ground, then the Cunning-man pronounced success in the matter proposed, and this was called Tripudium Solistimum. The Aruspices Craft lay in observing, whether the Beast that was to be sacrificed came to the Altar willingly, or dyed without much struggling or bellowing, at one blow or many; whether any unlucky object were seen or heard whilst they were sacrificing; sacrificing; whether the Bowels, and especially the Liver, were fair and natural; for if they appear'd of an ill colour, dried up, ulcerous, impossibly humated, or the like, it was an ill Omen. As commonly they would begin no Action of moment inauspicato, that is, without the Counsel of some of these Augurs, so especially the same was requisite in Assemblies for choosing of Magistrates and making of Laws; but not to all alike. For though the Divination taken from observing the Heavens, that is, Thunder, Lightning, and the like, were admitted at all the three sorts of Comitia or Assemblies of the People; yet the flight of Birds, and observing the Chickens Crums were appropriate to the Comitia Curiata and Centuriata only. The General of an Army being elected with these Ceremonies, was said to wage the War in that Province with his own Auspices, and all his inferior Officers and Souldiers were said to fight under his Auspices; and therefore the Name of Imperator or Lord General was never given to any Lieutenant General, or the like, nor any Triumph allow'd him for any Victory, though obtain'd by him when the General was sick or absent; for still the matter was achiev'd by his Auspices, not their own.

As or Affis is usually taken in Livy for a piece of Roman Money or Coin in Brass that at first weigh'd a pound or twelve ounces, and so we have in several places translated it, as fol. 71. you find mentioned 3000 l. which is not to be understood of pounds Sterling, but of so many Affes. King Servius was the first that coin'd or stampt Brass-money (for they had no Silver coin'd, till after they had vanquish't King Pyrrhus about the year of the City 485.) The Denarius of Silver when first coin'd was in value equal to ten of these Affes; but in the first Punic War, the Commonwealth being straitned for Money, it was order'd that Affes should be stamp't that were but of one sixth part of the old weight, that is to say, two ounces: And afterwards they reduc'd them to one ounce, and reckon'd one Silver Denarius equal to sixteen Affes. Hence the old Affes were called Æs grave, Money of full weight; but however it alter'd in weight, it is reputed always to have gone for three farthings or thereabouts of our money.

Auspicia or Auspices. See before Aruspices.

Balista, so called ἡ τοῦ βάλαντος from darting or casting out any thing, termed also sometimes Catapulta from the Greek word Pelte a Dart, was an Engine used by the Romans in besieging of Cities, somewhat like our Cross-bow for its use, but much bigger, with which they used to shoot Darts (and some Authors say Stones too, upon occasion) against their Enemies on the Wall at a great distance. It is thus described by Marcellinus, lib. 23. cap. 3. Between two planks (saith he) there is set in a frame and fast joined a large strong Iron reaching out in length like a good great Rule, out of the round body whereof (which is artificially wrought) there lieth forth further a four-square Beam, made hollow with a direct passage in manner of a narrow Trough, tyed fast with many Cords of Sinews twisted one within the other, and thereunto are joined two wooden Screws, near unto one of which stands the Ballistarius [he that plays the Engine] and puts into the hollow passage of the Beam a wooden Shaft with a big head fastened on it. This done on both sides, two lusty young men do bend the Engine by turning about certain Wheels; and when the top of the head is drawn to the uttermost end of the Cords, the Shaft hurried out of the Balista, by the inward force thereof flies out of sight with mighty violence. Those Engines were employ'd also in the Defence of Places besieged: For so we read, That when the Capitol was besieged by the Gauls, the Romans wanting Sinews for making or repairing these Engines, the Matrons supplied them, by cutting off their hair, which served instead of Sinews, in Honour of which there was afterwards a Temple erected to Venus Calva, Venus the Bald.

Basilica, so called from the Greek word Basileus, which signifies not only a King but a Judge, were stately upper Buildings at Rome, supported with Piazza's, under which the people walkt: the use of these Halls above was principally for the Judges to sit in and determine Causes, and in their absence the Merchants met there; and therefore as one part of them was furnish't with Benches and Bars like Law-Courts, so other sides had Shops for the better sorts of Wares.

Bellona the Goddess of War, whose Temple stood before the Gate Carmentalis, near which there was a Column called Bellica; from which the Romans latterward were wont to lance a Dart or Javelin towards those parts where they intended to make War; whereas in former times they sent their Heralds to the very Confines of their Enemies to perform that Ceremony.

Bigati were the Roman Denarii, having the stamp of a Chariot drawn with two Horses called Bigæ.

Calends was amongst the Romans the first day of every Month, so named à Calando to Call; because the petty Pontiff in old time was wont then to call the People to the Court Calabra, and there to pronounce to them how many Nones there were in that Month. For the Romans divided their Months into Calends, Nones, and Ides, and some Months had two Nones more than others, which difference and their manner of Counting is intimated in these memorial Rhymes:

Each Month's first day we do its Calends call.
 In March, May, July and October fall
 Six following Nones, the rest but four in all.
 But every Month eight Ides doth thence take in;
 Which done, th' account from next Calends begin.

That is, as the first day of every Month is called the Calends of that Month, so the 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, & 7. of those four Months, March, &c. were called the Nones of that Month, but in all other Months the Nones contained but the 2, 3, 4, & 5. days; so that for Example the fifth day of January was called Nona Januarii, but the seventh day of March the Nones of March, and the second of March was the sixth Nones (for they always reckon'd backward so) but the second of January the fourth Nones. After the Nones followed the Ides which contained eight days in every Month, so that the 15. day of March (or any of those four Months) was called Idus Martii, but the 13. of January, and consequently as the 8. of March is its eighth Ide, so the eighth Ide of January is January the sixth. After the Ides were past, they always reckon'd the number of the days backwards from the next Month following, as the 14. of January was the 19. Calends of Febr. the 15. the 18. Calends of Febr. &c.

Campus Martius was a Field without the Walls of Rome; so called, because it was dedicated to Mars, and employ'd as a place to exercise the Youth in Feats of Arms, being given to the People of Rome by Caia Tarratia a Vestal Virgin, or (as others affirm) by Mucia Laurentia a noble Harlot, King Tarquin the Proud converted it to his own use, and sowed Corn there, which upon his Expulsion was thrown into the River Tiber, as having grown on a place Sacred, and the Field restored to its ancient use. Here at first were the Kings and Magistrates chosen, and in after-times the Comitia Centuriata were constantly holden. It was beautified with abundance of Statues, and was all along the place where the Roman Youth learned their Martial Exercises, as Wrestling, Fencing, Vaulting, and the like.

Candidati, Candidates were those that put in, and stood in Election for Dignities of Magistracy; so called, because such did then wear whiter and brighter Gowns than ordinary, that they might be the more conspicuous, and better discern'd afar off in the Crowd.

Cataphracti were those Souldiers, as well Horse as Foot, that were arm'd at all points, or (as we say) Cap-a-pe, with compleat Harness.

Catapulti. See before Balista.

Census was a Review, Polling, or Valuation of all mens Names, Qualities and Estates. It was first instituted by Servius Tullius, who (somewhat like our William the Conquerour in his Doomday Book) caused a general Account to be taken upon Record of every Citizens Estate throughout Rome, together with their Age. And according to their Estates and Age he divided all the Romans into six Ranks or Classes. The first of those worth (as to the value of our money, about) 200 l. or upwards; the second 140 l. or upwards; the third not under 100 l. the fourth not less than 40 l. the fifth of such as were worth above 25 l. the sixth of all others whose Estates amounted not to so much as the last Summ, who were only registred amongst the Citizens, but paid little or nothing towards Subsidies, and therefore were oft-times called Proletarii a prole edenda, as if all the good they did the Publick were their getting of Children. And each of these Classes were subdivided into several Centuries, as we shall have occasion to shew by and by in the word Comitia. This general View was regularly taken every five years, and at the end thereof Sacrifices were offer'd to purge, cleanse, or make Atonement for all the People, which was called Lustrum, and thence the word Lustrum is used for the space of five years, though sometimes by means of Wars abroad, or Dissentions at home, it was not held so often. After the Kings ejected, the Consuls were to perform it; but they being otherwise busied, and there having no Cense or Lustrum been held for seventeen years together, in the year of the City 310. it was thought fit to institute particular Magistrates for that work, which therefore were called Censors, who were two Persons eminent for their Vertue and Authority, at first Patricians, and for the most part such as had already born the Office of Consuls: To whom, besides making the said Survey of the People and purging them, was also committed the Inspection into the Lives and Manners of all persons whatsoever, and to brand any one that deserv'd it, with Disgrace, as by turning out a Senator, taking away from a Knight his Horse and Ring, and make Commoners Erarii, whence they were called Magistri Morum, the Masters of Manners. There lay no Appeal from them, nor was it usual for any man to serve this Office (which was reckon'd amongst the greater Magistracies) twice. At first they were ordain'd for five years, but Anno V.C. 319. Mamercinus the Dictator reduc'd it to a year and an half, and in the year 402. this Office was first communicated with the Commons.

Centuries and Centuriata. See Comitia.

Centum-viri, the Hundred-men, were certain Commissioners chosen, three out of each Tribe, so that properly there were an hundred and five of them, but in round reckoning they were taken for and were called an Hundred. Their business was to be appointed by the People or Decemviri, to be Judges and decide Controversies. They were sometimes called Reperatores (being especially concern'd in Actions of Reclamation and judgment upon the Court Hæstia Centumvialis, because they had always a Speaker chosen out of the Tribes).

Circus, a place in Rome between the Palatine and Aventine Hills, where Games and Shows were wont to be exhibited to the People, first erected by King Numa, who built it with Galleries round, whence it was called Circus, because there in it the People sat to behold the running of the great Horses, the chariots, and the Games, Fire-works, &c. the Seats being able to contain an hundred and fifty thousand people. This was called Circus Maximus to distinguish it from some other lesser places of the same name afterwards erected.

Cohors, a Cohort. See Legion.

Comitia, there is nothing more frequent in Livy, and indeed all the Ancients, than mention of Comitia, and the Acts therein done, and not without reason. For Comitia consisted and was transacted the main part of their Policy and Civil Government. We must therefore crave leave to be the more copious in the Explanation thereof.

Comitia (so called a Coeundo or Comendo (as the Ancients speak) from coming together) were general Conventions of the People to give their Suffrages or Voices in some manner, as the Choice of Magistrates, the passing of a Law, or the like: and were of three sorts, Comitia Tributa, Centuriata, and Tributa.

The Comitia Tributa were the most ancient, being instituted by Romulus; for he dividing the Multitude into three parts, which therefore he called Tribus, Thirds, subdivided each Tribe into ten parts, which he called Curie (which we may English Parishes; for as each of these thirty Curie were a distinct Body, so they had their several Holy Rites and distinct Sacred Houses appointed for them to meet at for celebrating the same: And a proper Priest called Curio, because he was to officiate for his Curia; and over all the thirty Curio's, was an Aedile called Curio Maximus.) Into one of these Curie every Roman that dwelt in the City was cur'd, and this at first comprehended all the Tribes, that is to say, all the Romans, and therefore in the Assemblies of these Parishes, which were called Comitia Tributa, in old time pass'd the Elections of Kings and other Magistrates, Judgment in Capital Cases, and Laws. But afterwards the Republick increasing, and many neighbouring People overcome in War, being Enfranchized and made free Denizens by the Names of several rural Tribes, the Tribes were increased (in time) from three to thirty five, and comprehended not only those within the Walls of Rome, but multitudes in the Country too: whereas the Curie were not increased in number; nor extended further than the City, (only if any of those Out-Freemen came to inhabit at Rome, he must be entered in some Tribe, and quitting his Country's Sacred Rites, conform to those of the Parish he liv'd in) so that now the Curie being but a part of the Citizens, the Jurisdiction of their Assembly was retrencht, and chiefly us'd either for Adoptions which were there transacted, or else in making Laws to confirm or confer military Command on certain Magistrates, as Dictators, Consuls, Prætors and Consuls already chosen in the other Comitia; for though there they had a Civil Authority conferr'd upon them, yet they had not, nor were to exercise military Command, as administering the Oath to their Souldiers, mustering their Army, or fighting an Enemy, till they had obtain'd a special Law empowering them therein from these Comitia Tributa: Which also were wont to confirm Wills, and to choose certain Priests, and especially the Curio Maximus, for the lesser Curio's were elected in their particular Parishes. These Comitia Tributa were held in the large Common Hall of Justice, which from their Meeting was called Comitium, being part of the Forum Romanum, and were always Auspicata, that is, performed with the Solemnity of observing the Birds, and also with the Approbation of the Senate, not held on any certain day or time of the year, but whenever occasion requir'd. The Members of the Comitia Tributa gave their Voices man by man in their respective Tribes, and that which the major part of the Tribes agreed upon, was the Resolution of the whole Assembly; so that altho as sixteen Tribes had given their Suffrages for or against a thing, the matter was at an end, for then they were sure of the Majority.

Of the Comitia Centuriata.

The before-mentioned Comitia Tributa dispatcht all Affairs referr'd to the general Vote of the People, in such manner as you have heard, from the days of Romulus till the time of King Servius Tullius, who (as intimated before in the word census) finding an inconvenience in that Method, because the poorest Citizens (who are always the more numerous) having an equal Power of Voting with the richest, were like to carry all things as they would have it: He therefore establisht a new Method; for having rang'd all the people, not only within the Walls of Rome, but abroad also that were free Denizens, into six Classes, according to their Estates subdivided each Class into Centuries, yet not equally so many Centuries in each, but so the richest Class the most Centuries (for by Centuries was not understood just an hundred men, but a particular Rank more or less) so that the first Class contain'd more Centuries than all the other five put together, for that (reckoning the Knights or Equites) had ninety eight Centuries; the second (counting the Workmen and all) but twenty two Centuries; the third twenty; the fourth twenty two with the Trumpeters, Drummers, &c. the fifth thirty Centuries, and all the last Class (worth less than 25 l. a man) were thrown into one single Century, and by consequence had but one single Vote. For as the Comitia Centuriata was the general Assembly of these Centuries, so that which most Centuries agreed upon, carried it. Now the first, that is, the richest Class, being called first to give their Votes, if they all agreed, 'tis plain they carried what they list, for the meaner Citizens had not Centuries enow (though never so much superiour in numbers of particular men) to balance them. To remedy this in some measure, it was afterwards agreed, that Lots should be cast which Centuries should vote first, and that which voted first of all, was called the Prerogative Century, and the rest jure vocatæ. The matters transacted in these Comitia Centuriata were of three sorts. 1. Chusing of greater Magistrates, viz. Consuls, Prætors, Proconsuls, Tribunes military with Consular Power, and the Decemviri for drawing up of Laws. 2. Passing of Laws, for generally all Laws that were propounded by a Senatorian Magistrate were here established, and thereby the Leges Centuriatæ were differenced from the Plebiscita; and particularly this Assembly resolved upon any War that was thought by the Senate fit to be undertaken. 3. The same did pass Judgment in Cases of Treason, or the like grand Offence against the State. The place where this Assembly met was in the Campus Martius without the City, where at first the Custom was, that all the Centuries should appear in Arms; but this being thought of dangerous consequence to leave the City naked, they left it off, and appointed a Flag to be hung out on the Mount Janiculum, and a competent Guard to be placed there; and as soon as that Flag was taken down, the Assembly was dissolv'd.

N n n n n

was

Of the Comitia Tributa.

This Assembly was first brought up by the Tribunes of the People, and particularly by Volero Publilius, Anno U. C. 282. establishing a Law, that all Plebeian Magistrates should be chosen that way, which was, that all the Free Romans should give their Votes according to their Tribes, and the Suffrages of the most Tribes to stand good; thus as in the Curiata Comitia none could Vote but Inhabitants of Rome, and in the Centuriata the rich men had always the advantage for the reasons before-mentioned. In these Comitia Tributa there was no respect of either of those Qualifications, but all Romans in or out of the City, poor or rich, might have Voices. The matters they dealt in were the chusing of the lesser Magistrates, as Tribunes of the Commons, Plebeian Ædiles, and Ædiles Curule, the Triumviri Capitales, &c. and of Priests, the Pontifex Maximus; also the making of those Laws called Plebiscita or Ordinances of the Commons, which at first bound only themselves, but afterwards all Romans whatsoever particularly, the Power of making of Peace (for declaring War lay in the Centuriata) of granting of Triumphs, and granting to Foreigners the Freedom of the City, was in this Assembly: As also Judgments of Misdemeanours, for which they might impose what Mulcts or Fines they pleased; but as for Cases of Life and Death, they were tryed elsewhere. This Assembly was not tyed to any one place within or without the City, nor had they need of any Augural Ceremonies, unless it should happen to thunder or lighten whilst they were met, and then they must all depart. Sometimes they were called together in the Campus Martius, sometimes in the Comitium, sometimes in the Capitol, sometimes in the Flaminian Meadows, and sometimes in the Flaminian Circus, (a place in the City given by one of that Name for publick Plays and Shows) The common time of holding these Comitia Tributa for creating ordinary Magistrates was the latter end of July or beginning of August; for the Tribunes and Ædiles of the Commons were chosen some time before the Consuls, and after them the Curule Ædiles, Questors, &c. But it is to be noted, That neither Children under seventeen years of Age, nor Old people above sixty were allowed to have Voices in any of these Assemblies. And so much for Comitia. The manner of their Voting shall be declared in the word Suffrages.

Conscript Fathers. See Senators.

Consuls, were two Persons yearly chosen, who after the expulsion of Kings, had the Supreme place and Authority amongst any ordinary Magistrates of the Romans; to which none could be admitted, unless he were above forty two years of Age, and usually were persons eminent for their Prudence and Valour, who had gradually passed through the Offices of Questors, Ædiles and Prætors; nor could any be chosen thereunto unless he were present, nor regularly until the second year after he had served Prætor, as none could be Prætor till two years after he had been Ædile: They were first both Patricians; but in the year of the City 387. one Commoner was admitted, and in the year 381. both were Commoners, but usually they were one Patrician and one Commoner. Their Insignia or Badges of Authority were first to have twelve Lictors marching before them where-ever they went, that is to say, before one of them one month, and before the other the next, and and he of the two had this Honour first, either because he had more Children than the other, or was elder, or was first chosen; secondly, they rode in Ivory Chairs; and thirdly, they wore certain peculiar Gowns to distinguish them, which from the great embroidered Works, were called Trabes. The Romans as at first they dated all their Deeds and Transactions from the Building of Rome, so afterwards (omitting that) their manner of Dating was by subscribing the Names of the Consuls when such a thing was done: But if one or both Consuls dyed in their year, and others were surrogated in their places, yet the whole year was dated by the Name of the first elected Consuls, and those only who had actually served the Office of Consuls, were called Viri Consulares, Consular Men; out of whom (upon occasion) were elected Dictators, Magistri Equitum, and Censors.

Corone, Crowns or Chaplets, were frequently as Badges of Honour for performing some signal Service; and they were of several sorts, according to the Quality of the Person and Nature of the Service, as Corona Triumphalis which at first was made of Laurel, but afterwards of Gold, and was sent by the Senate unto the Lord General to adorn his Triumph. Corona Obsidionalis, a Wreath made of Cuich Grass, presented by those that were besieged or encompassed by the Enemy, to that General that relieved them, and therefore it was to be made of Grass that grew in the very same place wherein they were so shut up and endangered. Corona Civica was made of Oak, and bestow'd on him that in a dangerous Battel saved the life of a Fellow-Citizen: But Masurius saith, That it was then wont to be given, when he that saved a Citizen had at the same time killed an Enemy, nor was during the whole Fight repulld from that place, for otherwise (saith he) the Right of a Civic Crown was not granted him; yet Tiberius Cæsar being consulted, whether a person ought to have it, who had saved a Citizen in a certain Battel, and slain two Enemies, but had not retain'd the ground on which he did it, but the same was gain'd by the Enemy? resolved the Case, That he should have a Civic Crown, because it appeared, that he had saved a Citizen in a place so disadvantageous, that it could not be maintain'd by fighting never so valiantly. L. Gellius, one that had been Censor, gave his Opinion in the Senate, That Tully when he was Consul, ought to be presented with this sort of Crown in the Name of the whole Commonwealth, as having saved it from ruine by discovering and crushing Cataline's Conspiracy; for the same was given not only to him that saved a Citizen, but likewise to him that killed the first Enemy that mounted the Walls: But in the case of preserving a Citizen, the party saved must acknowledge it, for no Witnesses would be admitted, and it must be a Citizen, for if it were one of the Allies (though a King) that was preserved, he that did it was allowed no such Honour, which was not small; for he that had once a Civic Crown conferr'd upon him, might wear it ever after, and when he came into the Theatre it was the Custom for all the People and Senators themselves to rise up and salute him; and he was allow'd to sit there next to the Senators, and both himself, his Father and his Grandfather were thenceforth discharged of all publick Services. Corona Muralis resembled the Battlements of Walls, for it was given by the General to him that first scaled the Walls and mounted over in the Assault of Cities. Corona Castrensis or Vallaris in its form resembled a Rampier, being bestow'd on him that first broke into the Enemies Camp; Corona Navalis had the Portraiture of Stems or Beaks of Ships, and belong'd to him that in an Engagement at Sea first boarded the Enemy. As for the Corona Ovalis, see Ovation.

Curia and Curio. See before in Comitia.

Decemviri signifies a Committee of Ten men, Magistrates or Officers appointed for some certain purpose, as Decemviri Legibus scribendis were ten persons chosen with Supreme Authority for a years time to draw up Laws. Decemviri Sacrorum were a kind of Priests who had the custody and perusal of the Fatal or Prophetick Books of Sibylla, and from thence gave directions what means and Sacrifices were to be used for expiating of Prodigies. Decemviri Stitibus judicandis (that is, super Lites) were ten Judges, assistant to the Prætor or Lord Chief Justice, who either might judicare, give Judgment themselves, or else Judicium dare, appoint others from amongst the Centumviri to hear and determine Causes.

Dictator, was an extraordinary Magistrate chosen by the Romans on some very urgent occasion, as when they labour'd under more dangerous Wars abroad, or some eminent Difficulties at home. He was created but for six months, and many times, if he had settled the business he was created for, would voluntarily resign his Office before that time. Whilst he continued in his Office he had all the twenty four Lictors to attend him, and the Power of all other Magistrates was as it were superseded, (except that of the Tribunes of the People.) His Authority was absolute as to War or Peace: No Appeal lay from him to the People, whence he was called Magister Populi, the Master of the People: He had Power of Life and Death over any Roman, and might without any formal hearing of the Cause or consulting the People, determine in any matter whatsoever as he list; only he was never to appear on Horse-back, but when he was marching to a War; nor could he take any Money out of the Treasury without a Decree of the Senate or Ordinance of the People: He was not chosen in any Comitia, nor by the Senate, but by one of the Consuls. And as the first Dictator T. Lartius created Anno Urbis 255. behaving himself in this Sovereign Power with with so much modesty, that after he had finish'd the Latine War, and elected new Consuls, he freely resign'd his Office, having not caused any one Citizen to be put to death, banish'd or outrageously fined, so all his Successors in that Office for about four hundred years observ'd the like Moderation, not one of them abusing his Authority until the time of Sylla, and afterwards of Julius Caesar, who against the Laws, made himself perpetual Dictator. But although Dictators were first and principally chose in great fireights, yet in time they were made upon smaller occasions, as to perform the religious Ceremony of driving a Nail into a certain place of Jupiter's Temple over against that of Mercure, which they thought in a time of Pestilence or Sedition, would appease the Anger of the Gods; to celebrate the Latine Holy-days, or Roman Games, or hold the Comitia for Elections of Magistrates, when the Consuls that ought to hold the same were absent in the Wars, and could not be conveniently recall'd. None could be nominated Dictator but one that had serv'd the Office of Consul, and at first he was always a Patrician, but in time Commoners did also obtain it: the first of that Rank that held it was C. Marius Rutilus, A. U. C. 397. The Dictator always chose his Lieutenant, who was called Magister Equitum, the General or Master of the Horse, who had the Command in the Dictator's absence, but yet was to act nothing against his Order, as appears by the Examples of Q. Fabius and M. Minucius, who for fighting against the Dictator's Command in his absence, were like to have been executed, and very hardly escap'd. This Office was most times conferr'd upon them that had been Consuls.

Duumviri, Magistrates two in number of several sorts, as Duumviri Capitales, Judges of Life and Death, from whom an Appeal lay to the People; Duumviri Navales, two Commissioners of the Navy; Duumviri Sacrorum, two Patricians ordain'd first for keeping of Sibylla's Books, dedicating of Temples, &c. which were increased first to five and afterwards to ten. See Decemviri.

Equestris Ordo, the Equestrian Order was next to the Senatorian, and above the Plebeian, it consisted of Knights or Gentlemen called Equites in Latine (not only for serving in the Wars on Horse-back, for so did the ordinary Troopers, and were also called Equites, but yet had nothing to do with this Order, but also) because when they were muster'd by the Censors, or elected into that Order, they receiv'd an Horse from them which was called Equus Publicus, because they had an allowance from the State to keep him as well in Peace as War. They also had a Ring given them, by which they were distinguish'd from the Populace, for none but of the Senatorian or Equestrian degree might wear a gold Ring. From the Senators the Equestrians were distinguish'd by the former wearing the Laticlavium or a Robe besudded with flourishings of Purple Silk in manner of broad Nail-heads, whereas the latter wore Angusticlavium, a Garment that differ'd from the other only in this, that the Purple Studs, wherewith it was embroider'd, were narrower. The Estate requisite to qualify a Person of this Order was, that he must be worth four hundred thousand Sesterces, [that is, of our money about 30000 l.] Which Estate, if he had consumed, or committed any misdemeanour for which the Censors took away his publick Horse, and forbad him the use of his Ring, then he was lookt upon as degraded, and no longer a Gentleman, but one of the Populace.

Epulones were certain Priests whose Office was to prepare and set forth the solemn Feast for Jupiter and other Gods, called Epulum; of whom there were first three, and afterwards seven, called Triumviri and Septemviri Epulones.

Faciales were Heralds or Officers at Arms, whose business was to perform the Ceremonies of denouncing of War, and making Peace or Leagues; the principal of them, who was as their Dean, was called Pater Patratus, and He, Plutarch says, ought to be a man that both had Children of his own, and his Father living.

Fasti is used sometimes for Festi Dies or Holy-days, and in this sense Ovid intitled those Books of his, Fasti, wherein he sets down the ordinary Feasts of every Month. At other times it signifies Law-days, whereon the Prator was allow'd to administer Justice, and try Causes: But besides it is put for certain Books or Registries, wherein the Names of the Chief Magistrates of the Romans were every year recorded. And hence the Fasti Consulares before recited.

Flamines were Roman Priests, so called of Filamen, a Fillet of woollen Yarn they wore about their Heads: three of them were Patricians, and called the greater Flamens, viz. Dialis for the Service of Jupiter; Martialis the Priest of Mars, and Quirinalis that look after the Worship of Romulus after he was deified; twelve more were Commoners deputed to the Rites of minor Deities, and the meanest of them attended the Service of Pomona the Goddess of Apples.

Fors Fortuna was that Goddess Fortune in Rome, whose Temple stood beyond the Tiber, worshipt of such idle people as follow'd no Trade nor Calling, but lived wholly on their Rents, who were especially obliged to her, because she came unlookt for, undeserved. Besides which there was Fortis Fortuna, honour'd for her Power in Battel; Fortuna Mulieris that was propipropitious to the Women, Seia Fortuna, fought unto for the kind and seasonable ripening of Corn and Fruit, &c.

Forum (a ferendo, from bringing of Wares or Causes thither) signifies either a Market, and then commonly with some Epithet to signify of what kind, as Forum Boarium, the Beast-Market, Forum olitorium, the Herb Market, &c. Or else for the common Hall or place where people assemble for pleading of Causes, and having Justice administred; but most times used for that great and most notable part of Rome reaching from the Foot of the Capitol to the bottom of the Palatine Hill; built round with stately Edifices; here were the Basilice, and the Comitium, here were also the Rostra or common Pleading place, where they made Orations to the People; Saturn's Sanctuary, wherein was kept the Romans Exchequer or Treasury. There were also other Forums afterwards built, as Forum Julium, Augustus's Forum, Trajan's Forum, which we may english magnificent Squares, with Statues in the middle of them, and other rarities.

H. S. This Character stands for a certain silver Coin of the Romans called Sestertius, not compounded of two L. signifying two, but mistaken for two L. signifying duas Libras, two pounds, and the S. for Semis half; for the Sestertius contained two Asles (which were at first two pounds of brass, as is mentioned before) and an half, and was in value of our money three half pence farthing half farthing; a thousand of these Sestertii do make one Sestertium in the Neuter Gender.

Laws of the Romans were never made but when propos'd by some Magistrate, and agreed upon by the People, in some of their respective Comitia; The only Magistrates that had power to propose Laws, were Consuls, Prators, the Dictator, the Inter-regent, and the Tribunes of the Commons; If any of these Magistrates thought fit to prefer a new Law, he first drew it up, wherein he took the advice of some Lawyer, and some would have the approbation of the whole Senate, though that was often omitted; then was the intended Law publickly hung out, or expos'd, in the Market place, for the space of twenty seven dayes, that is, for three Market dayes, which was call'd the Promulgation of a Law, being designed that in the mean time all the people might consult of the conveniency thereof, and every one have free liberty to admonish him that prefer'd it, of any just reason, either to amend it, or wholly surcease the proposal; after the third Market day (for unless it were upon an extraordinary occasion, no Assembly might be called upon a Market day, because of the Country Folks business, they also having most times a right of Suffraging) the Magistrate did Convoke the people to that place where the Law was proper to be propos'd; there the Town Clerk or Notary reading the Law, the common Cryer Proclaimed it, which done, he that promulgated it, made an Oration of the reasonableness thereof, perswading the people to pass it, which usually was seconded by his Friends, as also others that disliked it, would make Speeches to shew its ill conveniencies, which Harangues being ended, an Urn or Pitcher was brought to certain Priests there present, into which was cast the names of the Tribes, or Centuries, or Curie (according as it was prefer'd in the respective Comitia) and that Tribe, Century, or Curie, whose name was first drawn, did first give their Votes, by the majority of which, the Law was either pass'd or rejected; if approved, then it was inscribed (as a Record) in Tables of brass, and hung up in their Market place and Doors of their Temples for publick notice. Each Law was commonly called, known, or cited by the name of that Magistrate who first prefer'd it, as Lex Valeria is the Law propos'd by the Consul P. Valerius Poplicola; and so of the rest.

Legio, a Legion, so call'd ab eligendo, because they were choice select men; the number in Romulus's time was three thousand Foot and three hundred Horse; but afterwards it was increased and various, sometimes four thousand, or four thousand two hundred, or five thousand, nay sometimes six thousand foot, and now and then four hundred Horse, and sometimes but two hundred. The Romans seldom (unless on extraordinary occasions) enroll'd above four Legions (besides Auxiliaries) into an Army; and this was call'd a Consular Army. The Legion was divided into Foot and Horse (being commonly a hundred Horse for every thousand Foot.) The Foot were divided into ten Cohorts, each Cohort into three Maniples, each Manipule into two Centuries, and each Century into ten Contubernia.

Magister Equitum. See Dictator.

Nones. See Calends.

Ovation was a petty or lesser sort of Triumph, allow'd to those whose Victories were over Enemies of a meaner rank, as rebellious Slaves, or Pyrates, or gotten with little hazard or bloodshed, and therefore the General then wore a Myrtle Crown, not Laurel, went on foot through the City, and in a plain purple Gown, and sacrific'd only a Sheep (whereas he that Triumpht offer'd a Bull) and therefore it is thought to be call'd Ovatio ab Ove, from a Sheep, or else because the Souldiers following him redoubled the sound of O, O, whereas in Triumphs, they cry'd out, Io Triumphe! Q o o o o o Patres

Patres and Patricians. The Roman Senators were usually called Patres from their Age and Gravity, yet neither were all Patricians Senators, nor all Senators (especially in latter times) Patricians; but the first Institution is referr'd to Romulus who divided his People into two sorts. Those that were well descended, and had Estates and Children he called Patricians, the rest Plebeians. To the first he committed Offices and Magistracies: To the second not; particularly out of the Patricians he chose his hundred Counsellors of State call'd Senators, to which he afterwards added another hundred, and Tarquinius Priscus made them up three hundred, and so they continued, whose posterity were call'd Patricii, or Nobles; yet it must be understood, that there were many Patricians besides Senators, and in time Plebeians were admitted into the Senate, yet still they had respect to their Pedigrees, and by reason of the Envy between these two Ranks, many Dissentions and Seditions happen'd amongst the Romans, nor could the one intermarry with the other until the year of the City 309.

Prætors were one of the greater sort of Magistrates of Rome; for the Consuls, who at first exerted Civil Judicature, being not able sufficiently to perform it, by reason of their military Employments, it was in the year of the City 386. thought fit to create a particular Magistrate for administering Justice; but in process of time multiplicity of Causes arising out of the Country, it was found necessary to add him a Partner: And thenceforth one was call'd the City, the other the Country-Prætor; and sometimes they were Generals in the Field, as well as the Consuls.

Prætexta Toga, a Gown or Robe of Honour allowed but to six sorts of people, viz. First, The Children of the Patricii till seventeen years of Age. Secondly, All Senators upon Festival days. Thirdly, The Wardens or Overseers of certain publick Plays or Games. Fourthly, All Magistrates as well in the City of Rome as Colonies and other Towns Corporate, and all Masters of Confraternities or Companies. Fifthly, All Priests, and amongst them the Augurs. Lastly, Those that triumpht; and this differed from the rest, in being embroider'd with Gold and Damask.

Quæstors took their Name à querendo pecuniam, inquiring after money, being the publick Treasurers to receive and issue out the City-money.

Quirites, the Name appropriated to the Citizens of Rome, and so they loved to be call'd within the City; but in the Camp, if the General gave them that term, it was taken for a great disgrace unto Souldiers and men of Arms.

Rostra was a goodly fair Edifice in the Forum Romanum that stood next to the Comitium, in manner of a Cathedral Church, in which was an Orator's Pulpit, adorned with the gilded Stems of many Ships, which the Romans took from the people of Antium in a memorable Fight at Sea; and from those Ships-beaks called in Latine Rostra, this place took its Name.

Sella Curulis, a Seat or Chair of State, which was one of the chief Ornaments of Magistrates at Rome, belonging first to the Kings, and afterwards during the Free-State used by Dictators, Consuls, Proconsuls, Prætors and Proprætors, Censors and Ædiles (I mean those Ædiles call'd Curules, to distinguish them from the Plebeian Ædiles) and last of all by the Emperours in the time of the Monarchy. On this Seat they usually sat not only in the Senate-House when they consulted or gave Audience, or when they beheld the publick Games and Plays, and rode either in Triumph or otherwise through the streets, but also at home within their private Houses, and wheresoever else they pleased. And this Badge or Ensign of Honour they had not only during their Magistracy but afterwards, and were thence call'd Curule Senators or Magistrates (for the rest who had not attained to those Dignities they named Pedanei, because they went on foot to the Senate and other places. This Chair was called Curulis, either from Curvus a Chariot, for that they sat thereupon within their Chariots, or else quasi curva, because it was made crooked or curb-wise like our folding Chairs.

Senators were so called quasi Senes from their Age, because at the first Institution they were persons of considerable Age, though afterwards young men were frequently admitted. Romulus first establish'd the number of them an hundred; but afterwards either he, or (as some Authors say) Tarquinius Priscus added another hundred, and that Brutus added the last hundred and made them up three hundred, at which time they began to be call'd Patres conscripti. The value of a Senator's Estate was to be eight hundred thousand Sesterces, which is above 6000 l. of our money. None were ordinarily admitted into the place of a Senator under twenty five years of Age. Every solemn Meeting of these Senators was called Senatus, and the Chair-man or Speaker (who could be no other than such an one as had been either Consul or Censor) was call'd Princeps Senatus, their Decree or Vote was call'd Senatus Consultum, and is many times written only with these two Letters S. C. They gave their Votes sometimes by departing down from their Benches, and dividing them-themselves into sides, and if the major part were easie to be discerned, they rested there, and such a thing was said to be decreed per discessionem, by going apart; but if both Companies were almost equal, then did they proceed to give their Voices, and that which pass'd so was said to be decreed per singulorum sententias exquisitas. This Office of Senator was not Annual, but for their Lives, only in cases of misdemeanour the Censor might turn them out, which was done by his leaving out their Names when he call'd over the List of the House. If any Senator were absent without a lawful Excuse, he was fined; yet was not their sitting constant, but summon'd occasionally by the Magistrates. The Tribunes of the Commons had power intercedere, that is, to put a stop to or quash any Act of the Senators.

Sibylls Books, the story of them is thus. There came one day a strange Woman to King Tarquin the proud, offering nine Books full of the Sibylline Oracles, to be sold, who thinking she askt too much, refused to buy them, whereupon she burnt six of them before his face, and then askt him as much for the remaining three as for all the nine. This startled the King, and consulting with his Augurs, they found by their Art that he had refused some special favour sent from the Gods, and by all means advis'd him to buy the rest, which he did; and for the safe keeping of them, two Officers at first and afterwards ten were chosen, the Books being laid up under ground in the Capitol in a Stone-Chest, where they remained till the burning of the Capitol, when L. Scipio and C. Nerva were Consuls, and then they perished; yet afterwards several of the Sibylline Prophecies were gathered together from divers parts, Embassadors being sent for that purpose, for there went ten of these famous Sibylls who dwelt at several places, but these Books seem probably to have been the Works of Sibylla Cumana; and the use of them was thus: If there happen'd any astonishing Prodigy, Mortality or great streight that they were in, then did the Decemviri consult these Books (for no body else might look into them) where they found or pretended to find what it was which offended the Gods, and by what means they might be pacified.

Suffrages, the peoples Votes given pro or con in any Assembly, which at first were given by word of mouth, but a great inconvenience was found in that way, because the poorer sort were forced to Vote as the rich would have them, or else they would be their Enemies, therefore a course was invented, that every one should Vote freely, and none know who in particular it was that Voted for or against him. Which was thus: In the Field of Mars where the Comitia Centuriata were held (in which most Affairs of moment were transacted) there was a place at first rail'd like a Sheep-pen, and therefore call'd Ovilia or Septa, but afterwards it was built very stately with Marble-stone in Walks and Galleries, and also with a Tribunal or Seat of Justice, and here the people most times met to give their Suffrages for Election of Magistrates. Now the means of ascending up unto these Ovilia was not by Stairs, but by many things like Bridges (though over the dry Land) made or laid there only for that time, one for every Tribe or Century. At the lower end of these Bridges stood certain Officers call'd Diribitores, Distributors, who gave to every one of the Members of each Tribe little Tables of Wood, wherein if it were Election for Magistrates, the Names of the Candidates were severally written; but if it were touching a Law, then they had but two Tables, in one of which were written these two great Letters V. R. signifying uti rogatus, Be it as you would have it, whereby they consented to the Law propos'd; in the other a great Roman A. standing for the word Antiquo, I like the old Laws that we have already, whereby they rejected the new Law then preferr'd. At the other end of the Bridge were placed certain little Chests or Coffers into which each of the Suffragers cast in which Table he had a mind to. Which after they were all pass'd, were taken out and counted by some Officers for that purpose, and that of which there was most, was the sense of the Tribe or Century, and the most Centuries was the Vote of the whole Assembly.

Signa was the general Name of all the Ensigns in the Field, but Aquila, the Eagle, more particularly was the main Standard to a whole Legion: For upon the top of a Spear was reared and fastened the Portraiture in Silver of an Eagle at full Relief, and the same sometimes was gilded, standing upon a Base or Pedestal of the same Metal. The other Ensigns, as well of Cohorts (which were Bands of about five hundred men usually) as of Centuries (that is, Companies of an hundred) were more especially called Vexilla, and had the figures of Minotaurs, Horses, Dragons, Wolves, &c. according to every Commanders fancy, but with the Name of the Century, Cohort and Legion to which they belonged.

Tribunes of the Commons were certain Magistrates whose Office was to be Protectors of the Commons. They were first instituted after a long Sedition between the Commonalty and Nobility, in the year of the City 260. by the Law call'd Lex Sacrata, the Sacred Law, because confirm'd by the general Oath of the people. At first they were but five in number, but in the year 297. increased to ten. Their persons were Sacrofancti not to be violated either by word or deed. They had a negative Voice or Power of Inhibition call'd Intercession, whereby they might stop the proceedings of the Senate or Consuls, or any other Magistrates (except the Dictator) which they did by one or more of them coming in person, and pronouncing aloud this word Veto, or Vetamus, I (or, We) forbid what you are are about, and then they could not go on any further. And as they had this Power against others, so also amongst themselves, any one could stop the proceedings of his Fellows, of which the Senate made good Advantage, drawing some of them usually to their side. These Tribunes preferr'd such Laws as they thought expedient for the Commons in the Comitia Tributa, which were call'd Plebiscita. Acts of the Senate were sent to them to peruse, and if they approved them, they subscribed a great Roman T. They could not be elected to this Office until they were above thirty years of Age. Their Houses stood open night and day as a common Refuge or place of Succour to all that would come, neither was it lawful for them to be out of the City one whole day throughout the year. The word Tribune properly signifies a Colonel or Commander of a thousand men, and because the first Protectors of the Commons that were chosen, were all five such Officers of the Army, therefore they still retain'd the Name of Tribunes, adding thereto, of the Commons, to distinguish them from ordinary Tribunes Military. There were also Tribunes Military with Consular Authority who ruled the Commonwealth divers years instead of Consuls, and indeed were in effect the same, bating only the Name and the Number.

Triumph, a Solemnity in Honour of such chief Commanders as had won some notable Victory, wherein they rode into the City in all the State imaginable; but none was to have this Honour, if he had not slain at least five thousand Enemies in one Battel, and not lost near so many of his own Souldiers. And that the Senate might have a true Account of both, it was provided, That they should be punisht that made false Returns of their own loss, or the Enemies. Nor was a Triumph granted for recovering any Territory, but only in cases whereby the Empire was enlarged, and if the Commander did never such Exploits, if he were not in Magistracy he could claim no Triumph; and for that reason it was, that neither P. Scipio for recovering Spain, nor Marcellus for taking Syracuse, did triumph. He that had once triumpht might always after come to the publick Shows crown'd with Laurel. And when they dyed, after their bodies were burnt without the City, their Bones and Ashes might be brought in and repositd within the City, which others might not be.

THE

THE TABLE.

The first Number in Roman Letters directs to the Book, the second in Figures to the Chapter; and where there are several Figures, they are all Chapters of the Book next before cited. For Persons, you must look under the Letter of their Proper Name (that is, the Name of their Family) not in that of their Forename or Surname; as for Q. Fabius Maximus, in the Letter F, not Q, or M.

A.

A Aberites their Complaint to the Senate, and Liberties restored xliii. 4.
Abydenes besiegd by K. Philip xxxi. 16. In a rage destroy themselves 17.
Acarnanians invaded by the Ætolians, and their memorable Engagement to fight and dye for their Country xxvi. 25. Two of their young men ignorantly entering into the Temple of Ceres at Athens, are put to death xxxi. 14. They surrender themselves to the Romans xxxiii. 17.
Acheims revolt xxxii. 23. Invaded by Nabis xxxv. 25. They declare War against the Lacedemonians xxxviii. 32.
M. Acilius Glabrio the Consul manages the War against Antiochus in Europe xxxvi. 2. What Forces he had 14. His Speech to his Souldiers 17. Overcomes Antiochus 19. Triumphs xxxvii. 46.
Adversity makes men religious v. 51. Shews the secret Affections of Allies xlii. 63. To bear Adversity with courage, and prosperity with moderation, is the Character of a Roman xlii. 62.
Ædiles, whoever offers violence to them, is to dye iii. 55. They cause the Laws of the twelve Tables to be engraved in Brass 57. They are to take care that none but Roman Gods be worship't iv. 30. Two Patricians created to that Office call'd Curule Ædiles vii. 1.
Ageris the Nymph with whom Numa consulted i. 19. 21.
P. Aelius the first Commoner that was Questor iv. 54. And Augur x. 9.
Egypt, the Riches thereof divided between Philip and Antiochus xxxi. 14.
L. Æmilius the Consul overcomes the Volscians ii. 42.
Mam. Æmilius made Dictator iv. 16. Triumphs 20. Is Dictator again, and abridges the Censors Office to a year and an half 24.

For which by the Censors he is disfranchised ibid. yet is soon after created Dictator once more 31. His Speech to the people 32.

L. Æmilius Paulus his Speech to the people before he went to the Lacedemonian War xlii. 22. To his Souldiers 34. To Nasica 36. His modesty in receiving King Philip xlv. 7. He weeps considering the uncertainty of humane things 8. His Triumph 40. And in the last Supplement, his two Sons dye ibid. His Oration to the people 41.

Aeneas the Son of Anchises and Venus, the reasons why the Greeks gave him Quarter when they took Troy i. 1. Comes into Italy, builds Lavinium, and calls both the old Inhabitants and his Trojans Latines, ibid.

Æquians, War with them iii. 4. They and the Volscians routed iv. 29.

Æmus the Mountain described xl. 21.

Æsculapius the God in the form of a Snake brought to Rome xi. 14.

Ætna and its flames xxvi. 29.

Ætolians, Speeches made in their Assembly xxxi. 29. They excite Antiochus, Philip and Nabis against the Romans xxxv. 12. Defeated and cut to pieces 36. Obtain Peace and the Articles xxxviii. 2.

Agrarian Law for distributing publick Lands taken from Enemies, amongst the Commons first set on foot by Cassius the Consul, who after he was out of his Office, on suspicion of aiming at Royalty, was put to death by his own Fathers order ii. 41. The Agrarian Law promulgated by the Tribunes v. 12.

Agrirentum betray'd, by Mutines, to the Romans xxvi. 29.

Alba demolished, and all the Inhabitants brought to Rome i. 29.

Alban Lake, its prodigious swelling without any apparent cause v. 13.

L. Albinus his piety towards the Vestal Virgins,
P P P P P

The Table.

gins taking them up into his Cart, and letting his Wife and Children go on foot v. 40.

Alexander King of Epirus slain, and by his Death verifies the Oracle viii. 24.

Alexander the Great compar'd with Papirius Censor ix. 17.

Allia, the Romans defeated by the Gauls at that River v. 37.

Alorcius his Speech to the Saguntines xxi. 13.

Alps how difficult to pass xxi. 23. In the Winter shut up xxvii. 38.

Altar built by Annibal, on which was inscribed an Account of his Exploits xxviii. 45.

Amilcar the Father of Annibal counted a second Mars xxi. i.

Amilcar the Son of Bomilcar xxiii. 49.

Amilcar the Son of Gisgo xxi. 51.

Amulius deposes his elder Brother Numitor i. 3. is beheaded 5.

Andronicus beheaded for taking up Arms with his Father against the Romans xlv. 31.

Annales the Family of the Vilii so called for preferring a Law, establishing how many years old each person must be that pretended to any Office xl. 43.

Annibal, at nine years old, takes an Oath to be an Enemy to the Romans xxi. i. His Character 4. Besieges Saguntum who were allied to the Romans 6. Takes that City the chief persons having first burnt themselves and their treasure 14. His Speech to his Souldiers in their Winter Quarters 21. His Vision inviting him into Italy 22. He passes the River Rhodie 27. His Speech to his men loth to pass the Alps 30. His difficult march over the Alps 33. He softens the Rocks with Fire and Vinegar 37. The number of his Forces 38. He shews his Souldiers a prize first, and then makes a Speech to them before they fought 43. Routs the Romans at Trebia 54. Like to be destroy'd passing the Appennine 58. He loses one of his Eyes passing through the Fens xxii. 2. Defeats the Romans at Thrasymenus, and where the Consul Flaminius is slain 6. Routs the Romans at Cannæ, where forty thousand of them were kill'd 46. Neglects to march from thence to Rome, and is told, That he knew how to gain, but not to improve a Victory, 51. He is worsted by Marcellus at Nola xxiii. 16. Debauches his Army by Wintering in Capua 18. He besieges Sempronius in Cumes, and is beaten off 37. He carries Ships over Land at Tarentum xxv. 10. Defeats Fulvius 21. Attempts to relieve Capua, but is beaten off with loss xxvi. 6. Resolves to march to Rome 7. Grievously harasses the Country 8. Views Rome in person 10. Draws up in Battalia twice, but is prevented from fighting by Tempests 11. The ground on which he lay, sold at a full price, Ibidem. Whereupon he Retreats, Ibidem. He uses Marcellus's Signet but in vain xxvii. 3. Is deceived in the time of his Brother Asdrubal's passage over the Alps 41. Beaten in Lucania by Claudius Nero 44. His words when he saw the Head of his Brother Asdrubal 53. He was as admirable in adversity as prosperity, and why xxviii. 12. Is beaten near Croton by P. Sempronius xxix. 36. Sent for home to defend Carthage xxx. 9. His words on that occasion, and departure accordingly 20. Arrives in Africk 25. Desires a Parley with Scipio 29. His Speech to Scipio 30. Scipio's Answer 31. Is totally defeated by Scipio, twenty thousand of his men slain, and almost as many taken 35. Returns beaten to Carthage thirty six years after he went from thence Ibidem. He laughs at the tears of his Countrymen, and gives the reason 44. He is hated at Carthage, and why xxxiii. 48. Accused by the Romans of conspiring with King Antiochus 49. Flies from Carthage in a Lawyers habit Ibidem. Entertain'd at Tyre as his Grandmother Country, and thence comes to King Antiochus at Ephesus 51. His reasons to move King Antiochus to a War in Italy xxxiv. 60. Being in disgrace with Antiochus, clears himself xxxv. 19. He forewarns Antiochus that the Romans would invade Asia xxxvi. 41. Discourse between him and P. Scipio xxxv. 14. After the defeat of Antiochus flies to King Prusias, and being like to be delivered up to the Romans, poisons himself xxxix. 51.

L. Amius a Latine, Prator of Setia, his Oration at home against the Romans viii. 4. His Speech in the Roman Senate 5.

Antium a very rich City yielded to the Romans ii. 63, & 65. A Colony sent thither viii. 14.

Antiochus the Great, prepares to come into Europe xxxiii. 40. Is Shipwrackt 43. Supposed to poison his own Son xxxv. 15. Is sent for to deliver Greece, and decide the Controversy between the Ætolians and Romans 33. Lands in Greece 43. His Speech 44. War declar'd against him by the Romans xxxvi. i. Falls in Love with and Marries a mean Gentlewoman of Chalcis, and himself and Army grow debauched ii. Is totally routed 19. His Fleet worsted 44. Releases P. Scipio's Son gratis xxxvii. 37. Routed by Scipio at Magnesia, and above fifty thousand slain 43. His Embassadours Speech for Peace, and the Terms demanded by the Romans 45. The Articles of Peace between him and the Romans xxxviii. 38.

Antiochus Epiphanes sends Embassadors to Rome xlii. 6. His odd manners and humours xli. 20. And in the Supplement of the fourth and fifth defective passage. Popilius draws a Circle about him with his Wand, and demands his Answer before he stirr'd out of it xlv. 12.

Antipater made Governour of Asia xxxviii. 16. Is taken xlii. 66.

Anxur

The Table.

Anxur taken iv. 59. A Colony sent thither viii. 21.

Apollonian Embassadors being affronted, those that did it, (though Noblemen and Magistrates) are sent Prisoners thither, but freely return'd xv. 13.

Apollo for eight days together is honour'd v. 13. A golden Goblet sent him to Delfos 25.

Appeal to be allowed from any Magistrate to the people ii. 8. No man should offer to make any Magistrate without liberty of Appeal; if he did, it should be lawful to kill him iii. 55.

Appulians a League with them viii. 25.

Archimedes defends Syracuse by his wonderful Engines xxiv. 34. Is kill'd, and how xxv. 32.

Argos famous for the death of King Pyrrhus xxxi. 7. The Inhabitants pillaged by the Wife of Nabis the Tyrant xxxii. 40.

Aricia and Ardea submitting their Controversie touching a parcel of Land to the Arbitrement of the Romans, they adjudged it to themselves from them both iii. 72.

Aristenus Prator of the Achaïans his Speech xxxii. 21.

Arms, though consecrated, taken down from the Temples, and made use of in necessity xxii. 57. xxiv. 21.

Aspos taken by Q. Fabius xxiv. 46.

Asdrubal takes upon him the Command of Spain xxi. 22. Is commanded to march into Italy, and join Annibal xxiii. 27. Worst'd by the Scipio's 29. His passage over the Alps quicker than Annibal's, and the reasons xxvii. 41. He is slain with fifty six thousand Carthaginians near Senna xxvii. 51.

Asdrubal Hædus his Speech for a Peace to the Senate xxx. 40.

Aseanius the Son of Aeneas builds Alba Longa i. 3.

Asia, a passage for the Romans thither open'd by Euменes xxxvii. 33. The Cities of Asia yield themselves to P. Scipio; The humors of the people of Asia xxxviii. 17. xxxix. 6.

Astapa the horrid Tragedy acted there xxviii. 22. Astronomy how useful in War xlv. 37.

Asylum or Sanctuary made by the Romans i. 8.

Athenians foolishly draw a War upon themselves xxxi. 14. Are besieged by Philip 24. Eloquence highly priz'd by them 44. Their Edicts against K. Philip, ibid.

Atinius a mean person is commanded by a Vision to deliver a Message to the Consul, and for not doing it, his Son is struck dead, and himself lame, whereupon he does the Errand, and is hearkned unto ii. 36.

Attalus a King of Asia desires aid of the Romans against Antiochus xxxii. 8. Sends a Crown of Gold to Rome 27. He dyes, and his Character xxx. 21.

Aventine Hill, whence so call'd i. 3.

Augurs increased in number, and Commoners made capable of that Office x. 6. The Oration of P. Decius Mus on that occasion 7.

B.

Bacchanalia, or horrid Debaucheries committed in Night. Conventicles under pretence of Religion, discovered and severely punished xxxix. 8. to 19.

Badius a Campanian challenges his old Host T. Quintius Crispinus, and is kill'd by him xxv. 18.

Cn. Babius Tamphilus with all his Army circumvented by the Gauls xxxii. 7.

M. Babius Tamphilus the first that triumpht having managed no War xl. 38.

Barchine Faction at Carthage, what xxi. 2. xxx. 42. The Barchine Family xxiii. 12. Excellent Warriours xxviii. 12.

Bastarnians a noble Nation xl. 5. They are almost wholly destroy'd xli. Supplement 4.

Bellona invoc'd by Ap. Claudius x. 19.

Bituriges, a people that had the greatest Empire of all the Gauls v. 34.

Blasius of Salapia by a bold trick saves himself when accused before Annibal xxvi. 38.

Boii, a Nation of the Gauls most impatient of any Fatigues xxxiii. 36. They are defeated near Modena xxxv. 5. P. Cornelius kills twenty eight thousand of them xxxvi. 38.

Bononia, a Colony planted there xxxvii. 57.

Books of Religion to be brought into the Prator xxv. 1. Those of Numa Pompilius seven in Greek and seven in Latine found and burnt xl. 29.

Bondmen under Gracchus at Beneventum rout Hanno xxiv. 14.

Brachyllas the Prator of the Bœotians murder'd, and the strange discovery thereof xxxiii. 30.

Brennus the Gaul routs the Romans at the River Allia v. 36. For 1000 l. of Gold agrees to raise the Siege of the Capitol; but whilst he imposes false weights and wrangles, Camillus comes upon his back, and beats him off 48, 49.

Brutus. See Junius.

C.

Cacus his cunning Theft discovered i. 7.

Q. Cecilius Metellus his Speech to reconcile the old Heats between two Persons chosen Censors xl. 46.

Ceremonies, the neglect of them is dangerous to the State xxii. 9.

Cere, that Town entertains and harbours the Vestals and their Gods when the Gauls sackt Rome v. 40.

Cales a City of the Sidicins taken, and a Colony planted there viii. 16.

Callicrates his Speech to the Acheans, dissuading them from joining with King Persus against the Romans xli. 23. Destroy'd by Persus xlii. 13.

Calavins

The Table.

Calavius by a Stratagem saves the Senators of Capua from the fury of the Rabble xxiii. 2.
Camillus. See Furius.
Camillus Martius, whence so called ii. 5. The first Censuror or Survey of the people held there iv. 22.
Campanians, a people naturally proud ix. 16. They beg aid of the Romans, and yield wholly to them vii. 30, & 31. Had hopes of gaining the Dominion of all Italy xxiii. 6. Their cruelty towards the Romans 7. They are suppress'd by Gracchus 35. Their negligence xxv. 13.
Canna, the Battel there wherein the Romans lost forty thousand men xxii. 46. Which makes many of the Roman Allies to fall off 61. Those that escap'd there are sent in the nature of banisht persons into Sicily xxv. 5.
L. Cantilius one of the Pontiffs Clerks, debauching Floronia a Vestal, is scourg'd to Death xxii. 57.
C. Canuleius prefers a Law for the Intermariage of Commoners with Patricians iv. 1. His Speech against the Consuls 3.
Capua, whence so called vi. 37. The Romans in Garrison there conspire to seize it to their own use vii. 10. A Conspiracy there discovered ix. 26. How debauched a place it was xxiii. 4. They make a Peace with Annibal, and barbarously murder divers Romans 7. Thinking to surprize Cumes, are routed 35. By their negligence not only lose Corn provided for them by Hanno, but occasion the loss of his Camp xxv. 13, & 14. Is besieged by the Romans 20. Stronger in Horse than in Foot xxvi. 4. Is surrendred after the chief men had poison'd themselves 14. The rest of its Senators executed 15. The common people sold for Slaves 16. A Conspiracy at Capua detected xxvii. 3. A great part of their Land sold xxviii. 46.
Capitol whence so called i. 55. Besieg'd by the Gauls v. 42.
Carthaginians strike up a League with the Romans, and present them with a Golden Crown vii. 27, 37. The War between them and the Romans (call'd the first Punic War) begun, and the grounds there of xvi. 23, 24. Embassadors to Carthage, and the Carthaginians Answer xxi. 18. The terror they were in on the Romans first landing in Africk xxix. 3. They attack the Roman Fleet xxx. 10. Beg Peace of Scipio 16. Are variously affected upon Annibals return 24. The Terms of Peace 37. Their Embassadors have Audience of the Senate 42. The Peace finally ratified 44. They promise the Romans Corn in the War against Antiochus xxxvi. 4. Contend with Masiniissa xl. 17.
New Carthage where situate xxvi. 43. is taken by Scipio 44.
Carthalo a noble Carthaginian beheaded xxviii. 18.
Caslinum besieg'd, and the people eat Mice,

Leather, &c. but at last surrender to Annibal xxiii. 19. Recovered by the Romans xxiv. 19.
Castulo a Town in Spain, revolts to the Carthaginians xxiv. 41. Is regain'd by Scipio xxviii. 20.
Caudium the Romans Defeat and dishonourable Treaty there ix. 4.
Celtiberians perfidiousness xxv. 33. Terms of Peace offered them xxxiv. 19. They are routed xxxix. 21. C. Calpurnius Piso Triumphs over them 42. They in vast numbers set upon Q. Fulvius Flaccus xl. 30. But are overcome 32. Their strange simplicity 47.
Censorship, the nature of that Office, when first erected, iv. 8. Reduced from five years to a year and a half, by Mamercus the Dictator, who for the same, after he was out of his Office, was plagu'd by the Censors 24. C. Marcus Rutilius, the first Commoner in that Office vii. 22. That one Censor should necessarily be a Commoner viii. 12. P. Cornelius Rufinus turn'd out of the Senate by the Censors because he had ten pounds worth of Plate xiv. 31. Censors brand each other xxix. 37. Three Censors Created, of whom never an one used the Curule Chair xxxiv. 44. A remarkable Censorship xli. 27. A grievous contention about this Office xxxix. 40.
M. Centenius Penula a Centurion intrusted with an Army, which is cut to pieces by Annibal xxv. 19.
Cephalus Prince of the Epirotes xliii. 18. xlv. 26.
Chalcis surpriz'd and destroy'd by the Romans xxxi. 23.
Civil Law repos'd in the Archives of the Pontiffs is divulg'd by C. Flavius the Scribe ix. 46.
Croisimarus a petty King of the Gauls slain in Battel xxiv. 42.
App. Claudius flies to Rome from the Sabines, and is made a Patrician ii. 16. His Son made Consul, and an inveterate Enemy to the Commons 56. Created Decemvir iii. 33. His wicked attempt on the Daughter of Virginius 44. He kills himself 56.
App. Claudius Crassus a Tribune Military, his Speech against the Tribunes of the Commons vi. 40. He continues his Censorship beyond the time and the Speeches thereupon ix. 33, 34. Makes a Speech against a Peace with Pyrrhus xiii. 32. transports an Army into Sicily, and beats Hiero xvi. 34.
Claudia Quinta her suspected Chastity vindicated by Miracle xxix. 14.
Claudius Asellus his Duel with Fabellius xxiii. 47.
Claudius Nero wheadled by Asdrubal in Spain xxvi. 17. Is created Consul with M. Livius xxvii. 37. Comes up with Annibal near Venusia, leaves his Camp there, and unknown to Annibal, with the Flower of his his Army halts to Asdrubal 42, 43. His Speech to his Souldiers touching this design 45. Having conquer'd Asdrubal, he returns the sixth day to Annibal, and causes Asdrubals Head to be presented to him 50, 51.

The Table.

C. Claudius Marcellus routs Hanno and Epidicydes xxv. 40. His Answer to the Sicilians Complaint xxvi. 30. Is accused by C. Publ. Bibulus, but acquitted and made Consul xxvii. 20, 21. Enters upon his fifth Consulship 22. Is slain and buried by Annibal 28.
Clelia with other Virgins delivered as Hostages to King Porfenna, makes her Escape by swimming over the Tiber ii. 13.
Cleomenes the first Tyrant of Lacedemon xxxiv. 26.
Cleopatra Queen of Egypt xxxvii. 3.
Colonies, the Names of those that declared all they had to be at the Romans Service xxvii. 10. They ought to bear the same Affection and Reverence to the Mother-City, as Children to their Parents 11. The Decree of the Senate against the twelve Colonies that refused to find Souldiers xxix. 15.
Colophonians how situated 26. Freedom granted them xxxviii. 39.
Concord, a Temple dedicated to it ix. 46. Its Excellency x. 22, 24.
Commons, a Law prefer'd, That what they establish in their Tribes, should bind all the people iii. 55. viii. 12. xi. 26.
Consuls when first created ii. 1. Their Power transfer'd to the Decemvirs iii. 33. Made again after the Decemvirs turn'd out 54. Are forc'd by the Tribunes to obey the Senate iv. 26. A Consul only can nominate a Dictator 31. Consuls again after fifteen years cessation v. 29. That one of them should be a Commoner vi. 35. L. Sextius the first Commoner that ever was made Consul 42. Consulship restored to the Patricians after the Commoners had shar'd it eleven years vii. 18. but the Commoners regain it 21.
Cook, anciently that Trade practis'd only by Slaves, when it came first into esteem at Rome xxxix. 6.
Coriolanus offending the Commons, is banisht, and retreats to the Volsci ii. 35. Is by them made General against the Romans 40. But by the intreaties of his Mother and Wife retreats ibid.
A. Cornelius Cossus kills the King of the Veii, and gains the opima spolia iv. 19. His Speech to the mutinous Souldiers vi. 12. Against M. Manlius 15.
Cn. Cornelius Scipio sent into Spain xxi. 32. Defeats the Punic Armies xxiii. 49. Is wounded xxiv. 42. He is routed and killed xxv. 36.
P. Cornelius Scipio (the Father) his Speech before he fought with Annibal xxi. 40. He comes into Spain, and joins his Brother xxii. 22. He is slain xxv. 34.
P. Cornelius Scipio the Son being very young, sweats, and makes others swear not to desert their Country xxii. 53. A Person of wonderful Vertue, and thought to be of Divine Descent xxvi. 19. Is sent into Spain after the loss of his Father and Uncle 18. His Speech to his Souldiers 41. He takes new Carthage 43. Another Speech of his ibid. His Civilities to the Hostages 49. His Liberality 50. Takes Asdrubals Camp, and is stiled King by the Spaniards, but contemns and refuses that Title xxvii. 20. Drives the Carthaginians clear out of Spain in the thirteenth year after the War begun xxviii. 16. Goes over with two Gallies into Africk to Syphax, where he sups with Asdrubal 18. He is chosen Consul, and answers the Speech made by Fabius Max. against his going into Africk 43. Raises three hundred Horse very handsomely in Sicily xxix. 1. Is accused in his absence by Fabius in the Senate 22. His Prayer when he set Sail for Africk 27. His Conference with, and answers to Annibal's Speech xxx. 31. He totally defeats Annibal 33. Returns to Rome, and triumphs 45. Is made Censor xxxii. 7. Goes as Lieutenant to his Brother Lucius into Asia xxxvii. 1. His Son taken by Antiochus, and released gratis 34, 37. Is accused by the Tribunes xxxviii. 50. He retreats to Liternum, where he dyes and is buried 52, 53. To whom his Daughters were married 57.

P. Cornelius Scipio Nasica, Cn. F. adjudg'd the best man in all the City xxix. 14. His successes in Spain xxxv. 1. Triumphs over the Boii xxxvi. 40. His Oration in defence of his Kinsmen Africanus and Asiatius xxxviii. 58.
Corfica subdued by C. Cicereius xlii. 7.
M. Curtius on Horse-back throws himself into the Gulph vii. 6.
Cybele, Embassadors sent to fetch her Image from Greece, and the occasion xxix. 11.
Cynus, an eloquent Embassadour from Pyrrhus, almost perswades the Romans to a Peace with his Master xiii. 31, 32. Tells Pyrrhus Rome lookt like a Temple, and all its Senators as so many Kings 35.

D.

Dearth of Provision ii. 34.
Debtors, a great Tumult on their Account, but appeased by Menenius Agrippa's Parable of the Belly and the Members ii. 32. Their Bodies not to be liable to their Creditors, and on what occasion viii. 28. xi. 24. Debts to be paid in three years vi. 35. A way found out to discharge Debts vii. 21.
Decemvirs for making of Laws created with an absolute Power without Appeal iii. 32, 33. Banisht and their Goods forfeited 58.
P. Decius a Colonel with a small Party by seizing an Hill, saves the whole Roman Army, and marches safe through the Enemies Camp
 Q q q q q q

The Table.

Camp vii. 34. His Speeches to the Centurions and Souldiers 35. His Rewards 37.
P. Decius Mus (the Father) devotes himself to the Infernal Gods, and the Ceremony thereof viii. 9. His Son P. Decius does the like x. 28.
Delphos situate in the middle of the World xxxviii. 48. Delphick Oracles xxii. 57. xxii. 11. xxix. 11.
Demetrius, Philip's youngest (but legitimate) Son, accused by Perseus the eldest (but natural Son) Speeches on that occasion xl. 8. to 15. Is privately murder'd 24. The same discover'd and punish'd 55.
Deserters, three hundred and twenty flung headlong from the Tarpeian Rock xxiv. 20.
Diana, a Temple built to her at Rome, and a notable Cheat put upon a Sabin that came to sacrifice an Heifer to her i. 45.
Dictator, who was the first, not certain ii. 18. No Appeal from him 29. Named by a Tribune Military iv. 32. The first Commoner in that Office vii. 17. Cannot be chosen out of Italy xxvii. 5.
Diophanes beats off Seleucus from the City Pergamus, where King Attalus was besieg'd xxxvii. 21.

E.

Earthquake of thirty eight days continuance xxxv. 40.
Eclipse of the Moon foretold to the Souldiers, that they might not be afraid xlv. 37.
Edict, that none keep a Roman in Chains ii. 24.
Egeria the Goddess i. 19.
Egnatius the Sannites General stirs them up to War against the Romans x. 19. Is killed 29.
Elephants taken from Pyrrhus, the first that ever were seen at Rome xiv. 34. First used by the Romans xxxi. 36.
Q. Ennius his Saying of Q. Fabius Max. xxx. 26.
Epulones Triumviri first made xxxiii. 44.
Events can neither justly approve nor condemn Councils, but are the Masters of Fools xxii. 39. xxx. 30.
Evander reigned more by Authority than Power, and was the first that taught the Latines Letters i. 7.
Eumenes Son of Attalus, King of Pergamus, his Speech in the Senate when he was required to demand his own Reward for his Services against Antiochus xxxvii. 53. The Rhodian Embassadour's Speech at the same time in relation to him 54. The Senate's Decree in that case 55.
Euripus does not ebb and flow seven times a day xxviii. 6.
Excellence obnoxious to Envy 59.
Examples should make us wise xxxii. 21.
Execration of the Athenians against K. Philip xxxi. 44.
Exile a capital punishment amongst the Romans xxvi. 3.

F.

Fabii, that Family undertake the War against the Veians on their particular account, and three hundred and six of them (all Gentlemen) are at once slain, but one Lad of that Name being left ii. 50.
Fabie the Emulation of the two Sisters vi. 34.
Cæso Fabius the Consul supports the Commonwealth, which his Colleague would have betray'd ii. 43.
M. Fabius the Brother of Cæso refuses a Triumph, and why 47.
C. Fabius Dorso his strange Adventure through the whole Army of the Gauls to sacrifice v. 46.
M. Fabius Ambustus, the story of his two Daughters vi. 34.
M. Fabius the Pontifex Maximus devotes himself for his Country v. 41.
Q. Fabius being Master of the Horse, fights with success in the absence of Papirius the Dictator, who going to punish him for it, he appeals to the people, and makes an Oration against the Cruelty of the Dictator viii. 33. He is created Consul 38. and Interregent ix. 7. His Consulship is continued 41. Being Censor, he casts all the Rabble into four Tribes by themselves, by which he gain'd the Sirname of Maximus ix. 46. A Controversie between him and his Colleague P. Decius x. 24. Dyed so mean in Estate, that money was given by the people to his Son Fabius Gurgus wherewith to make a Feast according to the custom on such occasions xiii. 28.
Q. Fabius Gurgus routed by the Sannites xi. 1. His Father's Speech begging pardon for him in the Senate 5. He by his Father's help routs the Sannites, and triumphs 10.
Q. Fabius Maximus the Dictator created by the people xxii. 8. Fears not the force, but subtilty of Annibal 12. His delays are condemn'd both in the City and his own Army 15. He sells his Farm which Annibal had spared, and with the money pays the Ransom of the Prisoners 23. relieves Minucius (who would needs be made equal with him in Authority) when like to be cut off by the Enemy 26. Who thereupon salutes him by the Title of Father 30. His Speech to L. Æmilius the Consul, not rashly to hazard a Battel 39. His Advice after the Defeat at Canne 55. His Speech for chusing able Consuls in a time of imminent danger xxiv. 7. Is created Consul the fourth time 9. Goes as Lieutenant to his Son to Suessula; and his Son makes him alight, and come to him on foot 44. He is President of the Senate xxvii. 11. He takes Tarentum, and saith he would leave them their angry Gods 18. His Joque upon M. Livius 27. His Speech against P. Scipio's going into Africk xxviii. 40. Another against Pleminius and Scipio xxix

The Table.

19. His Death and Character xxx. 26.
Fabricius his Answer to Pyrrhus, tempting him with money xiii. 20. The Elephant could not fight him 26. Having but two pieces of Plate in all the World, refuses the Sannites money 28. The Senate raises Portions for his Daughters ibid.
Faith neglected, humane Society is destroy'd vi. 41.
Falerian Boys betray'd by their Schoolmaster, are restor'd and whip the Traitor home v. 27.
Faliscan Priests with flaming Torches and Periwigs of Snakes fright the Romans vii. 17.
Famine very sore at Rome, so that many drown themselves in the Tiber iv. 12. 'Tis the only thing which Nature suffers not to be overcome v. 48. The most grievous of all punishments that can befall man xxiii. 19.
Father himself commands his Sons to be executed ii. 5. viii. 7.
Feretrius, why Jupiter so called i. 10.
Fidenates vanquish'd i. 14. Their City taken iv. 22.
Fire at Rome by Treachery xxvi. 27.
Flamens instituted by Numa i. 20.
C. Flavius the Scribe (whose Father had been a Bondman, is made Ædile of State, and publishes the Civil Law, which before was kept close in the Chappel of the Pontiffs ix. 46.
C. Flaminius resolves to enter on his Consulship in his Province, not in the City, whence he is said to wage War against the Gods xxi. 63. His fierceness and impiety xxii. 1, &c. He is kill'd 6.
Friendship should be immortal, Animosities mortal xl. 46. What it is that violates it between States xxxiv. 32.
Cn. Fulvius the Proconsul kill'd at Herdonea xxvii. 1.
M. Fulvius the Consul his Speech to the Souldiers concerning the Gallo-Gracians xxxviii. 17. He is accused of outrage and sacrilege 43. His Speech when his Triumph was like to be put off xxxix. 4. Tib. Gracchus his Speech on the same occasion, whereby Fulvius obtain'd his Triumph 5.
Q. Fulvius Flaccus accused of Sacrilege, in taking the Tiles from Juno's Temple to be used in a Temple he was building to Fortune, and is forc'd to carry them back xlii. 3. He hangs himself 28.
L. Furius, the Consul his Speech to the people ii. 54.
C. Furius Camillus, the Dictator, restores the Consulship to the Patricians vii. 24.
M. Furius Camillus a Tribune Military with Consular Power v. 1. Made Dictator 19. A person very religious 50. Is banish'd 53. His Speech to the Ardeans 44. Recall'd from banishment by a Decree of the Senate, and created Dictator in his absence 46. Beats off the Gauls and Triumphs 49. His Speech against the Tribunes that would have deserted Rome, and gone to dwell at

G.

Gabii obey King Tarquin the proud i. 54.
The Gabine Tuck, what, and why so call'd v. 46. viii. 9. x. 7.
Gallo-Gracians a War against them xxxviii. 13. [by a mistake Printed 23.] The fight naked 21. They send Agents to beg Peace 27. The Articles 40. Cn. Manlius Vulso triumphs over them xxxix. 6.
Games vowed in War celebrated iv. 35. The Games in honour of Apollo, their original ix. 12. The Capitoline Games instituted by Camillus v. 31. The great Games vii. 11. Their beginning vii. 2.
Gauls, their advance to Rome foretold by a Voice v. 32. They came first into Italy for love of the good Wine 33. Their passage over the Alps 34. They boast that they carried Right in their Arms, and that valiant men have a Title to all things 36. They are provok'd against the Romans by their Embassadors fighting for the Clusians, which Embassadors they demand to be delivered up, but are denied, ibid. They take Rome 39. Murder the Senators as they sat in State 41. They burn Rome 42. Besiege the Capitol 43. Routed by Camillus 46. They are defeated by Q. Servilius Ahala, the Dictator vii. 2. They are more than men at the first Charge, and less than Women afterwards x. 28. The Gaul-Senones cut to pieces the Roman Embassadors xii. 1. Are routed, and the whole Nation almost extinct 4. The Gauls slay L. Postumius the Consul by a stratagem xxiii. 24. Gauls turn'd out of Italy xxxix. 54.
Geese preserve the Capitol v. 47.
Generals, several in one War prejudicial iv. 31. Three famous ones die all in a year xxxix. 50.
Gentius King of the Illyrians taken xlv. 3. brought to Rome 35.
T. Genucius Tribune of the Commons, that preferr'd the Agrarian Law, is murdered 11. 54.
Gladiators first introduced xvi. 42.
Gods, none but Roman to be worshipp'd and they in no new manner iv. 30.
Government is most secure where Subjects obey willingly, and with delight viii. 13.
T. Gracchus betray'd into an Ambush by a Lucanian, and cut off xxv. 16.
Greek, Learn'd by the Roman Youth ix. 36.
Greece proclaim'd to be at Liberty by Quintus the Roman General xxxiii. 34.

The Table.

H.

Hanno being betray'd, withdraws his Garrison from Messina, and for the same is Crucified by his Country-men xvi. 28. Hanno a Carthaginian Senator, his Speech against Annibal xxi. 10. Another Speech of his after the Victory at Canna xxiii. 12. Hanno one of the Carthaginian Generals of that name taken, and sent to Rome xxviii. 2, & 40. Heraclea the Daughter of King Hiero, with her two Daughters, most barbarously slain xxiv. 26. Hercules kills Ceryon i. 7. Whether or no he passed the Alps v. 34. A mighty Image erected to him in the Capitol ix. 44. Annibal pays his Vows to him at Cales xxi. 21. M. Acilius sacrifices to him on Mount Oeta xxxvi. 30. App. Herdonius a Sabine, with a Rabble of Slaves and Exiles, seizes the Capitol iii. 15. is kill'd 18. Turnus Herdonius inveighing against King Tarquin Superbus. He is taken on a false Accusation, and put to Death i. 50. Herennius Pontius his prudent advice, but rejected, and the ill consequences thereof ix. 3. Hernies makes mighty preparations for War, and kill L. Genucius the Commoner Consul vii. 6. Are overcome 8. Take Arms again, but subdued by Q. Martius Tremulus, are receiv'd into protection ix. 42, 43. Hegisilochus his prudence for his Country xlii. 45. Hersilia the Wife of Romulus i. 11. Hetrurians skillfull in interpreting the Portents of Prodigies i. 56. v. 15. x. 13. Threescore thousand of them kill'd and taken vi. 37. Hiero King of Sicily his Character xvi. 11. nourish'd by Bees 12. His Speech to the Roman Embassadors as he was besieging Messina 30. He makes Peace with the Romans 44, 45. His Embassadors Speech and kindness to the Romans after their Defeat at Thrasymenus xxii. 37. Helps them to pay their Army xxiii. 21. His Death and last words xxiv. 4. Hieronymus (Hiero's Grandson) succeeds xxiv. 4. Behaves himself Tyrannically 5. Revolts from the Romans and joins with Annibal 6. Is Assassinated 7. Historians when false are execrable xvi. 39. Histriones whence Players were so called vii. 2. Histrans attack the Roman Camp xli. 2. They are overcome and forc'd to give Hostages 9. C. Claudius Pulcher Triumphs over them 13. Hispala Fecenia, a Curtesan, discovers the Villany of the Bacchanalian Conventicles xxxix. 10. Her reward 19. Honest things give place to those that are profitable, in cases of extremity xxiii. 14.

Honour, its distinct degrees i. 31. x. 6. xxii. 26. The Romans would not defraud those of Honour that were worthy of it xxvii. 10. A Temple to Honour and Vertue, its Dedication is opposed by the Pontiffs, and why? 25. The Horatii 3. Roman Brothers engage in a Combat with the Curiatii three Alban Brothers, on condition that the Nation of the Conquerors should rule over the other i. 25. The latter being all kill'd, and two of the former, the surviving Victor kills his own Sister because she lamented for one of the Curiatii that was her Sweet-heart, for which he was condemn'd, but freed by the people 26. Horatius Cocles alone withstands an Army, and swims in Armour over the Tiber ii. 10. M. Horatius Barbatus inveighs against the Decemvirs iii. 56. His Speech to his Soldiers 62. Hestia at the mouth of Tiber built i. 33. Hosilia the Wife of C. Calpurnius the Consul condemn'd for poisoning of him xl. 37. Hostages offering to escape are put to Death xxv. 7. Tullus Hostilius chosen King of Rome i. 22. He causes Metius the Alban General to be pull'd to pieces 28. Reported to be destroy'd with Lightning 31. Humane bodies, Annibal reported to have taught his Souldiers to feed thereon xxiii. 5. Humane Sacrifices used at Rome xii. 57.

I.

Ianus's Temple built, and its use, and how often shut i. 19. Illiturgians, Men, Women and Children put to the Sword xxviii. 20. Inter-regnum the first occasion of the word after the Death of King Romulus, and how the Government was manag'd then i. 17. Informers rewarded that discovered a Plot to restore King Tarquin ii. 5. Other Informers likewise rewarded xxii. 32. xxvi. 27. Indibilis the King, his Speech to Scipio xxviii. 19. Revolts from the Romans 31. Judges ought not to turn the Controversies brought before them to their own profit iii. 55. Those that offer violence to them, were to forfeit their Heads, ibid. Julian Family whence derived i. 3. C. Junius Bubulcus Consul ix. 20. again 28. the third time 30. Dictator and Triumphs over the Aequians x. 1, 2. L. Junius Brutus, his ingenuity and concealment thereof, goes with the Tarquins to Delphos, kisses his Mother, viz. the Earth i. 56. He is the chief in expelling Tarquin, and the name of Kings from Rome 59. Made the first Consul 60. He swears the people never to admit of any more Kings ii. 1, 2. Puts to Death his own Sons 5. Is kill'd in Battel 6.

The Table.

Juno Regina now devoutly her Image was carried from Vei to Rome v. 22. Island a new one appear'd in the Sea near Sicily xxxix. 55.

L.

Labour, and pleasure naturally succeed each other v. 4. Labour by custom is made easie xxxv. 35. Lacedemon disunited, and the Discipline of Lycurgus (after seven hundred years use) abolisht xxxviii. 34. C. Laelius hath a gold Crown and thirty Oxen given him by P. Scipio xxvi. 39, 48. Lands at Hippo in Africa xxix. 3. Plunders the Country, and returns 4. Carries Syphax and the other Prisoners to Rome xxx. 16. Laelius his fierce contention with App. Claudius the Consul ii. 56. Land, no man to hold above five hundred Acres vi. 35. Lands assigned in satisfaction to such as had contributed to the publick xxxi. 13. Larentia the Wife of Enfufulus and Romulus's Nurse, was a common Prostitute, and therefore called Lupa, a she-Wolf i. 4. T. Lartius the first Dictator ii. 18. Latines, the Trojans that came into Italy called so as well as the ancient Inhabitants ii. 5. The Latines and Volsicans overcame vi. 32. Peace is granted them upon their request vii. 12. They contrive again to war with the Romans viii. 3. but are overcome, and yield themselves to Tarquinius the Consul 10, 11. Latine Holy-days v. 17, 19. xxi. 63. xxii. 1. xxxviii. 44. Latine Language, upon the request of the Cumans leave is given them to speak Latine, and use it in their Records and Proceedings at Law xl. 42. Laws are the only thing that can unite a multitude into one body i. 8. They are deaf and inexorable ii. 3. Laws of the ten Tables first promulgated iii. 34. Two more Tables added 37. Which twelve Tables are the Fountain of all publick and private Justice ibid. The said Laws of the twelve Tribes are order'd to be engraven in Brass, and publicly expos'd 57. Plebeian Laws iii. 31. Laws Royal vi. 1. Sacred Laws iii. 32. Laws must be obeyed iv. 14. even by the highest Persons xxxviii. 50. None anciently durst accommodate the Interpretation of a Law or an Oath to his own private fancy or advantage iii. 20. The manner of examining of Laws publickly 34. Of Laws some are mutable, some immutable xxxiv. 6. Particular Laws for creating a Dictator ii. 18. That no Magistrate should be made without Appeal iii. 55. The same confirm'd x. 9. The Sacred Law made in the Holy Mount, and sworn to by all the people ii. 33. iii. 32. iv. 26. A Law that whoever should offer violence to the Tribunes of the Commons, the Aediles, Judges, or Decemvirs, his head should be lacer'd to Jupiter iii. 55. That what the Commons ordain'd in their Tribes should bind all the people of Rome, ibid. That the people should have power to chuse a Consul either out of the Patricians or Commons at their pleasure iv. 1. That one of the Consuls should be a Commoner vi. 35. That none should wear garments white than ordinary when he put in for any Office ix. 25. A Law recited, That none should be chosen again to the Consulship within the space of ten years after he served it x. 13. A Law, That Commoners and Patricians might intermarry, pass'd after great opposition iv. 1, 5. A Law against Bribery and ill practices to get into Offices prefer'd by C. Petilius vii. 15. That none should have above ten Acres of Land vii. 16. That no Senator should keep any Ship or Vessel above such a Burthen xxiv. 63. The Oppian Law against the Womens Finery xxxiv. 1. The same is abrogated in the twentieth year after it was made 8. The Vetranian Law against leaving Estates above such a value to Women xliii. Supplement the second. Lecliternium, the first that was celebrated at Rome v. 13. Legions ten muster'd, each consisting of four thousand two hundred Foot, and three hundred Horse vii. 25. The Romans employ eighteen Legions xxiv. 11. Three and twenty Legions at once xxvi. 2. Legions of six thousand two hundred Foot, and three hundred Horse xxix. 24. L. Lentulus his Speech at Caudium, persuading to yield to the Samnites Terms ix. 4. Letters forged xxiv. 31. Those of Asdrubal to Annibal intercepted xxvi. 43. Leucas, a Colony of the Corinthians, after a gallant Defence taken xxxiii. 17. Liberty too greedily affected, falls into slavery iii. 37. C. Licinius the first Tribune of the Commons, who chuse him three Collegues ii. 33. C. Licinius Stolo a Commoner, prefers a Law (design'd to restrain the Patricians wealth) that no man should possess above five hundred Acres of Land vi. 35. He is the first Commoner that ever was Magister Equitum 39. and x. 8. He is made Tribune of the Commons ten times vi. 42. Consul vii. 2. Is condemn'd upon his own Law, as holding more Land than it allow'd 16. C. Licinius Calvus the first Commoner that was made Military Tribune with Consular Power v. 12. vii. 37. P. Licinius Crassus made Magister Equitum xxvii. 5. Censor 8. Praetor 21. His Expedition against the Bruttii 46. He is Pontifex Maximus, and most skilful in the Pontifician Laws xxx. i. Lictors instituted i. 18. Their Number and Quality ii. 55. iii. 36. They went with the Consuls to the Wars x. 25.

R r r r r Liguria

The Table.

Liguria design'd by Fate long to exercise the Romans in Military Discipline xxxix. 1. Forty thousand Ligurians transplanted xl. 38.
Sp. Lignstinus a Souldier his Speech, recounting his many Services xlii. 34.
Livius a Poet the first that made a Play of one continued Plot vii. 2. He makes Verses to be sung by twenty seven Virgins to appease the Gods xxvii. 37. M. Livius after several years retreat chosen Consul 36. Why he was surnamed Salinator xxix. 37.
Locusts, vast swarms of them about Capua xxx. 2. The like in Apulia xlii. 10.
Longa Alba built i. 3.
Locri surrendred to the Carthaginians xxiv. i. Regain'd by Scipio xxix. 7. The complaint of their Embassadors against Q. Picminius 18.
Luceria, a Colony sent thither ix. 26.
Lucretia found spinning amongst her Maids i. 57. Ravish'd by Tarquin, kills her self 58.
Lust cast both Kings and Decemvirs out of the supreme Government of Rome ii. 44.
C. Lutatius puts an end to the first Punic War xxviii. 38. He is freed from slavery after he had been a Prisoner to the Enemy sixteen years, by Cn. Servilius xxx. 19.
Luxury first advanc'd at Rome by the Army returning from the Conquest of Asia xxxix. 6.
Lycortas Prætor of the Achaens, his Speech touching the Lacedemonians xxxix. 36.
Lycurgus his Discipline abolisht after seven hundred years continuance xxxviii. 34.

M.

Macedonian War the Causes thereof at first with King Philip xxxi. 1. Afterwards with K. Perseus xxxix. 23. The Macedonian Empire, how and by whom it increas'd xlv. 9. The Bones of the Macedonians kill'd about Cynoscephalas gather'd together, and that action misinterpreted xxxvi. 8. The end of the Macedonian War, and of that Monarchy, by the taking of Perseus Prisoner xlv. 9.
Magistrates within five dayes after they entered upon their Office, were to take an Oath to observe the Laws xxxi. 50. No Plebeian Magistrate was created with the solemnity of the Auspices, vi. 41. If Magistrates act unjustly as soon as out of their Office, they may be call'd to account iii. 31. Grand Magistrates ought to continue but a short time in their places iv. 24. No man ought to officiate two places of Magistracy in one Year vii. 42.
Majesty without Power is nothing safe ii. 55.
Magius a Noble Capuan, firm to the Romans, delivered to Annibal, but escapes to King Protony xxiii. 10.
Mago relates the Victory at Canna to the Senate of Carthage, and shews Bushels of Roman Knights Rings xxiii. 11, 12. Is routed in Spain xxviii. 2. Is commanded to sail with the Fleet he had at Cales into Italy 36. Takes Genoa 46. Is wounded and dies xxx. 18, 19.

Maharbal the Son of Himilco, perswades Annibal to march to rights to Rome, after his Victory at Canna, and tells him, He knew how to get, but not to use a Victory xxii. 51.
Mandonius a petty King of Spain, his Wife begs Scipio to take care of the young Ladies xxvi. 49. He revolts xxviii. 31. Is routed and dies 33. Delivered up to the Romans xxix. 3.
L. Manlius whence called Imperiosus vii. 4. Accused of Cruelty towards his Son. Which the Son T. Manlius hearing off, threatens to kill the Prætor, and makes him desist from the accusation 5.
M. Manlius beats the Gauls from the Capitol, thence call'd Capitolinus v. 47. He grows seditious vi. 2. Sent to Jail 16. His Crimes related, and he is thrown headlong from the Tarpeian Rock 20.
T. Manlius (the Son of L.) fights a Duel with a Gaul, and over-coming, and taking away a Chain from him, is surnamed Torquatus vii. 10. His Piety to his Father (related before) 5. His Speech to his Son when he Sentenc'd him to be Executed for fighting, though successfully, against his Commands viii. 7. The youth of Rome hated him ever after 12. He dies by a fall from his Horse x. 11.
Cn. Manlius wages War in Gallo-Græcia xxxviii. 12. His Speech to his Souldiers 17. He is accused as having begun that War without Orders 45. His Speech on that occasion 47. His Triumph xxxix. 6.
M. Marcellus encounters Annibal xxiii. 44. Is created the third time Consul in his absence xxiv. He weeps beholding Syracuse xxv. 24. Grieves for Archimedes being kill'd, and shews kindness to his Relations 32. Returns to Rome, but is allow'd only an Ovation not a Triumph xxvi. 21. Is accused by the Syracusians 30. His Answer 31. He is acquitted 32. Marcellus fights with Annibal and pursues him xxvii. 2. Is slain by an Ambuscade 29.
Anc. Martius Grandson of Numa Created King i. 32.
C. Marcus Coriolanus his Valour ii. 33. Is an Enemy to the Tribunes Power, who accuse him, his Speech on that occasion, being banisht in his absence, he retreats to the Volsians 34, 35. By whom he is made General against the Romans 39. But by the tears of his Wife and Mother withdraws his Army, and oppress'd by Envy for the same, is thought to have been made away 40.
C. Marcus Rutilus the first Commoner that was Dictator vii. 17. And the first Consul 21.

L. Mar-

The Table.

L. Marcus a Roman Knight retrieves the Roman affairs in Spain after the two Scipio's were slain xxv. 37. His Speech to the Souldiers 38. Takes two Carthaginian Camps in one night 39. The Senate offended because in his Letters he stiled himself Pro-Prætor xxvi. 2.
Q. Marcus the Roman Embassadors Speech to King Perseus xlii. 40. He attacks Thesalonica xlii. 10.
Q. Marcus Tremulus the Consul, triumphs over the Hernies, and has a Statue erected on Horseback ix. 43.
Marriage of the Commoners with Patricians, a Law propos'd for it; The Consuls Speech against it, and Cornelius his Speech for it iv. 1, 2, 3. The same is pass'd 6.
Mars himself in person supposed to assist the Romans xii. 6.
Masaniassa the Son of King Gala xxiv. 49. At first an Ally with the Carthaginians xxv. 34. His Speech to Scipio, with whom he enters into League xxviii. 35. The History of his various Fortunes in his youth xxix. from 29, to 34. He falls in love with Sophoniba, the Wife of King Syphax xxx. 12. For which being reprov'd by Scipio, he sends her a Cup of Poison, which she willingly drinks 14, 15. His Embassadors have Audience in the Senate 17. Has several Towns added to his Paternal Kingdom 44. Has Presents sent him by the Romans xxxi. 11. Obtains by their Judgment the Territories in dispute between him and the Carthaginians xl. 34.
Matrons bring all their Gold and Ornaments into the publick Treasury v. 25. When they first had Orations in their praise after they were dead v. 50. Condemn'd for Poisoning viii. 18. For Incontinency x. 31. Those that were Patricians contend with those that were Commoners x. 25. They confidently come abroad to get the Oppian Law repeal'd xxxiv. 1.
Ag. Menenius his Speech to the people in a Session, of the Belly and the Members ii. 32. He dies so poor that he left not enough to bury him 33.
Sp. Melius by distributing Corn amongst the people in a great Dearth, aims at being King, and is kill'd iv. 13.
Mercenary Souldiers first employed by the Romans xxiv. 49.
Q. Metellus his Speech for Scipio xxix. 20.
Metellus a great Rebel in Numidia 30.
Meno's Speech to the Roman Embassadors on the behalf of Antiochus xxxv. 16.
Mind it is that sins, not the Body i. 59.
Ill Ministers do a Prince no less prejudice than his own faults xiv. 2.
Minutia a Vestal Nun buried alive for Incontinency viii. 15.
L. Minucius the Consul is besieged with his Army iii. 26. By order of the Dictator he resigns his Office 29. Is created Consul again iv. 13. And rewarded with the Statue of a Bullock gilded with gold, and why 16.

Money contributed by private men in a time of necessity, repaid by the State xxix. 16.
Mons sacer the Commons withdraw thither, and obtain the Law call'd Sacred, for establishing Tribunes to be their Protectors ii. 32.
C. Mucius Scaevola attempts King Porfena, but mistaking his Secretary for him, burns his own hand in the Kings presence, who thereupon both frees him and makes Peace with the Romans ii. 12, 13.
The Multitude is generally like their Ruler v. 28.
Mutines revolts and betrays Agrirentum to the Romans xxvi. 39.

N.

Nabis the Tyrant of Lacedæmon his Cruelty to the Argives xxxi. 25. His Speech to Quintius xxxiv. 31. Articles of Peace between them 35 40. He is kill'd by the Treachery of Aleximenes the Aetolian xxxv. 35. Who for it is kill'd by the Lacedæmonians 36.
Nail, the Ceremony of driving it to appease the Gods in a time of Plague, and no less Magistrate than a Dictator chosen for that purpose vii. 3.
Naples, the sight of its Walls makes Annibal refrain from attacking it xxiii. 1.
Acc. Navius the Soothsayer cuts asunder a Whet-stone with a Razor i. 36.
Nature is the most powerful of all things xxxvii. 54.
Naval Fight its description xxxviii. 30. The Naval Triumph of Octavius over Perseus xlv. 42.
M. Navius the Accuser of Scipio Africanus xxxviii. 56.
Necessity the last and greatest Weapon iv. 28. and must be obey'd ix. 4. The Form of the Decree of the Senate in any extreme Necessity iii. 4.
Nobles their pride towards the Commons ix. 46. By their Ambition, Law and Right subverted x. 36.
Nola taken ix. 28. Attempted in vain by Annibal xxiii. 16.
Numa Pompilius chosen King i. 18. Pretends Converse with the Goddess Egeria to make his Laws more venerable 19. He reigns thirty four years 21.
Numitor i. 56.
Nuceria taken by Annibal xxiii. 15.
Nuts, the people of Capilinum live upon them in a Siege xxiii. 19.
Numidians good at Horse-Service, but nothing on Foot xxiv. 48. Extremely lascivious above other Nations xxix. 23.

O.

OAK Sacred to Shepherds i. 10.
Opima Spolia what iv. 20. xxiii. 46.
Opinion though vain, is often of great consequence xxxiv. 12.

Oppis

The Table.

Oppia a Vestal Nun Executed ii. 42.
Sp. Oppius one of the Tyrannical Decemvirs accused, and makes away himself in Prison iii. 58.
Oreum in Eubœa taken xxviii. 6.
Oreigin in Spain taken by P. Scipio 3.
Ortiagon a petty King of the Gauls xxxviii. 19. His Wife being taken Prisoner, and ravish'd by the Centurion that had the keeping of her, cuts off his Head, and getting her Liberty, presents it to her Husband 24.

P.

Pacuvius Calavius saves the Senate of Capua from the fury of the people by an ingenious contrivance xxiii. 2.
Paleness and Fear, Temples vow'd to them by King Tullus i. 27.
Paleopolis that City rendred it self viii. 25, 26.
Palms when first given to Conquerors x. 47.
Pannick fear at Rome 37.
Pausistratus the Rhodian Admiral whedled by Polyxemidas, and kill'd in a Sea fight xxxvii. 11.
L. Papirius Cursor being Dictator, endeavours to put to Death Q. Fabius Maximus Rullianus his Master of Horse for fighting against his order viii. 32. Fabius his Speech to the Souldiers, Papirius his Speech on the same occasion 37. His Character ix. 16. compar'd with Alexander the Great, ibid. His Speech to his Souldiers x. 39. His Victory over the Samnites, and strange vow 42.
L. Papirius the Usurer his Lust and Cruelty viii. 28.
Parley between Annibal and Scipio xxx. 30.
Patricians whence so called i. 8. First admitted to be Tribunes of the Commons iii. 65. A Patrician might not dwell in the Capitol or Castle vi. 20.
Peace when equal, will be observed, but never long kept where hard conditions are imposed viii. 21. Scipio makes a Peace with Carthage and the Terms xxx. 37.
People their Decrees could not be infring'd or repeal'd by the Senate iv. 7. The Majesty of the people greater than that of the Consul ii. 7. The people had in all things the supream power viii. 34.
Perseus the Son of King Philip quarrels with his Brother Demetrius, and accuses him of Parricide to his Father, and causes him to be murder'd xl. 5. 8. &c. His wicked contrivance discovered 55. He succeeds his Father 56. And desires of the Romans the Title of King 58. His Character xli. 20. King Eumens complains that Perseus attempted to assassinate him xlii. 15. Perseus endeavours to poison Roman Captains and Embassadors 17. He joins in League with Centius King of the Illyrians xlii. 23. He is wholly defeated 42. Surrenders himself and his Son xlv. 7.
Petelia after a desperate defence taken by Hi-milco xxiii. 30.
Philip King of Macedon sends Embassadors to Annibal, who as they went deceived the Romans, but in their return are taken xxiii. 33, 34. Sends others 39. His Debaucheries xxvii. 33. The beginning of the Romans War with King Philip was in the year of the City 544. xxxi. 5. He was a Prince not used to hear Truths 18. Besieges Athens, but is repulsed 24. Worsted in an Horse-Skirmish, and retreats 38. Surprized by an Ambuscade xxxi. 11. He was too much given to Raillery 34. He is totally routed at Cyncephale by T. Quintius xxxiii. 10. And the same day his General Androstenes by the Acheans at Corinth 14. He submits to any Terms, and gains a Truce 13. and afterwards a Peace 26. The Terms 32. He is still malecontent with the Romans xxxix. 23, 24. Differences between him and others settled before Roman Embassadors, as Judges who determine the same to his satisfaction 25. His Speech on that occasion 27. His Adventure to the top of Mount Fiamus, and why xl. 21, 22. King Philip dies of grief, and against his will Perseus succeeds 56.
Philopemen the great General of the Acheans his Character and Exploits xxxv. 28, 29, 30. Is taken by the Messenians xxxix. 49. Poison'd by them, but his Death reveng'd 50.
Piety, a Temple erected thereunto xl. 34.
L. Pinarius secures his Roman Garrison in the City Enna by cutting off the Inhabitants xxiv. 39.
Plague at Rome, and extraordinary Prayers on that occasion i. 31. iii. 6, 32. iv. 7. v. 13. vi. 21. vii. 1, 27. viii. 17. x. 47. Is allay'd by the Dictators driving a Nail vii. 3.
Plays first acted to appease the Gods vii. 2.
Q. Pleminius Governour of Locris his Cruelty, Outrage and Sacrilege xxix. 9. Being in Prison for the same, he causes Rome to be set on fire in hopes to escape, but is prevented and put to death xxxiv. 44.
Poisoning, one hundred and seventy Matrons practising it, and being accused, poison themselves viii. 18.
Polyenus of Syracuse his prudent Speech xxiv. 22.
To the River is greater and more violent than the Rhone xxiii. 43.
Poverty of divers great and excellent men, as P. Valerius the Consul ii. 16. Menenius Agrippa 33. L. Quintius Cincinnatus iii. 26.
M. Popilius Lenas routs the Gauls vii. 24. Though a Commoner he is four times chosen Consul 26.
C. Popilius Lenas sent Embassador to Antiochus Epiphanes draws a Circle about him, and requires an Answer before he went out of it xlv. 12. His Cruelty to the Rhodesians 10.
M. Portius Cato his Speech for the Oppian Law xxxiv. 1. Goes into Spain 8. His Speech to to the Tribunes and Prætor 13. He triumphs over Spain 45. He is an Enemy to Scipio Africanus, and makes a Speech against him about Antiochus money xxxviii. 54. His mighty Character xxxix. 40. Is made Censor, and how he behav'd himself in that Office 41.

The Table.

Porfena comes up to Rome, but is kept from entering it by Horatius Cocles ii. 10. Yet besieges it till Mucius comes to kill him, &c. 12.
Postumia a Vestal Virgin tryed for her Life, because she went too fine iv. 44.
M. Postumius Regillensis a Tribune Military, ston'd to Death by his own Souldiers iv. 50.
Sp. Postumius the Consul his Speech after his shameful Treaty at Caudium, perswading the Romans not to stand to it, but yield up himself, and all others concern'd in it to the Enemy ix. 8. He is surrendred accordingly, but the Samnites would not receive him 10, 11.
Sp. Postumius one of the Embassadors sent to Athens to bring thence Solons Laws iii. 31.
L. Postumius Megillus holding the Comitia as Inter-regent, declares himself Consul xi. 11. Sets the Souldiers to work in his Farm, and for the same is condemn'd and fined 18.
L. Postumius the Consul slain by the Gauls by a stratagem xxiii. 24.
Potitii twelve Families of them extinct in one year ix. 11.
Prayer-day to the Gods, and Prisoners released on that occasion v. 13. Five dayes publick Prayer appointed for Annibal's departure (after sixteen years) out of Italy xxx. 21. In Prayers the Heart ought to go along with the words xl. 46.
Preneftians defeated at Allia vi. 29.
Prætor first created vii. 1. The first Commoner that held that Office was Q. Publius Philo viii. 15.
Prisoners that would list themselves Souldiers discharged xxiii. 14.
Private ends always have and always will obstruct publick Councils ii. 30.
Privernum retaken, and its Inhabitants, by the brave Answer of one of their Embassadors made Free Denizens of Rome viii. 21.
J. Proculus affirms, Romulus appears to him as from Heaven i. 16.
Proconsul the first that enjoy'd that Office viii. 23.
Prodigies, Livies Apology for inserting so many xliii. 13.

Particular Prodigies.

IT rains Stones i. 31. A Voice heard that the Gauls were coming v. 32. Earth on fire xv. 5. Sea burns, and Statues sweat Blood xxiii. 31. It rain'd Chalk, A Bullock spoke, and a Child in its Mothers Belly spoke, A Woman turn'd into a Man xxiv. 10. A Pig with an humane Face xxvii. 4. A Fountain ran Blood, An Oxe spoke, and it rain'd Milk 13. It rain'd stones again, and an Infant was born as big as a Child of four years old, which was an Hermaphrodite, and therefore was drown'd 39. A Pig with two Heads, Two Suns seen, an Oxe spoke, and the Vestal fire out xxviii. 11. Two Suns seen xxix. 14. It rain'd stones xxxv. 9. An Oxe spoke these words, Roma cave tibi 21. A Mule brought forth xxxvi. 3. A Stone fell from Heaven xli. 9. An Heifer spoke, and it rain'd blood xliii. 13.

Prusias King Bithynia, though courted by Antiochus, joins with the Romans xxxvii. 25. His sneaking Flattery to the Romans xlv. 41.
Protomy King of Egypt sends Embassadors to the Romans xiv. 38. Implores the Romans aid against Antiochus Epiphanes xliii. 19.
Publicans make a Riot xxv. 3, 4. Wherever they came they render the Laws vain, or the Allies Slaves xlv. 18.
Pudicitia Patricia, a Chappel erected thereunto, and another to Pudicitia Plebeia x. 23.
Punick War the first, when begun, and the grounds thereof xvi. 23, 24. The second Punick War begins to be treated of, xxi. 1. The second Punick War when ended xxx. 44.
Puteoli withstands Annibal xxiv. 13.
Pyrrhus King of Epirus encouraged to War against the Romans, by the equivocating Oracle xii. 17. Releases Prisoners without ransom xiii. 29. His Speech against the vanity of devoting ones self 37. His Battel with the Romans at Asculum 40. Departs out of Italy into Sicily xiv. 1. Growing cruel disoblige the Sicilians 17. Returns from thence into Italy 20. Robs the Temple of Proserpina, but is Shipwrackt, and the money cast back on the shore 24. He is utterly routed 31. Retires home out of Italy 37. He is kill'd at Argos by a Woman 44.
Pythagoras falsely supposed to be King Numa's Tutor, but indeed lived a hundred years after him i. 18.

Q.

Quæstors doubled, and to be chosen out of the Commons as well as the Patricians iv. 43. First made of Commoners 54.
Cn. Quintilius made Dictator viii. 18.
L. Quintius Cincinnatus created Consul iii. 12. His Speech against the Tribunes 19. Would not suffer himself to be made Consul again against the Law 21. Is call'd from work in his Field, to the Dictatorship, beats the Enemy, Triumphs, and in sixteen days returns to his Plow 26.
Cæso Quintius, a great Stickler against the Commons, accused and forc'd to run away to the undoing of his Father that was his his Bail, being the first that ever gave public security iii. 13.

The Table.

Quintius Capitolinus his Speech against the Seditions and Factious, between the Nobles and Commons iii. 63.

T. Quintius chosen Commander by a Company of mutinous Souldiers, and by his means they make their Peace vii. 39, 40.

T. Quintius Flaminius Consul xxxii. 7. Goes to Cerinth 40. His Speech to the Cities of Greece xxxiv. 22. He is called their Saviour and Deliverer 31. He Triumphs three dayes 52.

Quirites, why the Romans so call'd i. 13.

R.

Remus. See Romulus.
Rev sacrificulus, what his Office was, and when first created ii. 2.

Rhea silvia made a Vestal Nun, Fathers her Children on the God Mars i. 4.

Rhegines are massacred by Jubellius xii. 32.

Romulus and Remus suckled by a She-Wolf i. 4. They kill King Amulius their Uncle, and are owned by their Father Numiter 5.

They build Rome, and Romulus kills his Brother Remus, and calls the City by his own name 7. Establishes a hundred Senators

8. Has a Lifeguard of a hundred Horse 15. Is lost in a storm, and made a God 16. He reign'd thirty seven years 21.

Rome almost deserted in the quarrel between the Commons and the Decemvirs iii. 52.

Burnt by the Gauls v. 42. Rebuilt vi. 4.

Disburthen'd of Foreigners xxxix. 3.

Romans not only undertook, but ended their Wars with Justice xxx. 16. To bear adversity with Courage, and prosperity with moderation, is the property of a Roman xlii. 62.

Rufinus the Consul takes Croton xiv. 7.

S.

Sabine Women seized by the Romans i. 8.

Sabines and Romans fight, but united by the Womens means i. 9, 10. Horatius the Consul fights with the Sabines iii. 63.

Sabines made free Denizons of Rome, but without Votes xi. 21.

Sacred Spring, what, and the manner of vowing it xxii. 10.

Sacrifices which foreign Princes came from afar to perform at Rome or in Italy, the Charges thereof shall be born by the Publick xlv. 45. Sacrifices of the Samnites sprinkled with the blood of men as well as Beasts x. 30.

*Sacred*ledge punisht xlii. 28.

Saguntum besieged by Annibal xxi. 6. They burn all their Gold and Silver 14. The City is taken 15. Recovered by the Romans xxiv. 42. Their Embassador's Speech xxviii. 39.

Salapia and the Punic Garrison therein surrendered to Marcellus xxvi. 38. The Inhabitants clude the fraud of Annibal xxvii. 28.

*P. Saloni*us beseeches the Senators not to prefer their own Honour before the Concord of the City vii. 41.

Samnites, the War with them began vii. 29.

Thirty thousand of them slain 36. A Peace with them vii. 2. They coop up the Roman Army at Caudium, and force them to surrender their Arms, and pass under the Gallows ix. 3, 6. They are routed, and themselves forced to undergo the same ignominy at Luceria 15. Thirty thousand more of them kill'd and taken 27. They appear in extraordinary brave Arms, yet are routed again 40. The War with them continued fifty four years xi. 19. Their Embassy to Annibal xxiii. 42.

Samothrace an Island sacred xlv. 5.

Samus taken after four months Siege xxxviii. 29.

Satricum taken from the Romans vi. 9. Recovered ix. 16.

Schoolmaster betraying his Boys to Camillus, order'd to be whipt back by his Scholars v. 27.

Seamen to be provided by private persons xxiv. 11.

Sedition the Bane of Cities ii. 44. Seditions between the Commons and Senate ii. 27. v. 10.

Senate and Senators, Senate of an hundred established by Romulus i. 8. One hundred more added by Tarquinius Priscus 35. Senators do duty on the Walls as common Souldiers iii. 6. The Senate to pass Laws, and the People in Comitia Centuriata to ratifie them viii. 12. Senate supplied with new Members, and how xxiii. 23.

Senators first sit by themselves at Plays xxxiv. 54. Senate lookt upon as an Assembly of so many Kings ix. 17. Four-score Senators slain at Canna xxii. 49.

Servants seize the Capitol iii. 15. Plot to fire the City iv. 45. A Servant discovers another design of firing the City xxvi. 27. Eight thousand Servants lifted for Souldiers xxii. 57. More lifted xxxiv. 6.

Cn. Servilius the Consul recovers his Father and Uncle out of slavery after they had been Prisoners sixteen years xxx. 19.

C. Servilius Ahala his Speech to the Tribunes v. 9.

M. Servilius his Speech in favour of Emilius xlv. 37.

L. Sextius the first Commoner that ever was Consul vi. 42.

Sextilia a Vestal buried alive xiv. 39.

Scipio. See Cornelius.

Ships, when the Romans began first seriously to apply themselves to provide Ships for War xxvii. 15.

Sicily formerly joined to Italy xvi. 20. Its description 22. The Sicilian War between the Romans and Carthaginians xxiv. 36. xxv. 40. Sicily wholly in the Romans hands xxvi. 39.

Signal

The Table.

Signal of Battel, what ix. 14.

Silanus routs Mago, and takes Hanno xxviii. 2.

Silvius the Grandson of Aeneas, whence to called i. 3.

Similitude of Manners easily conciliates Friendship i. 46.

Slaves endeavouring to set free the Carthaginian Hostages, detected and punisht, and Rewards to the Discoverers xxxii. 26.

Society's greatest Band, is common Utility xxxv. 7.

Souldiers first order'd to have Pay iv. 60. A Souldier hath only three things to mind xlv. 34.

Solon, Embassadours sent to Athens to transcribe his Laws iii. 31.

Soothsayer falsifies the tokens, and hath a Judgment shewed upon him x. 40.

Sophonisba, Syphax's Wife, her Speech to *Masini*ssa after he had taken her and her Husband Prisoners xxx. 12. Is married to *Masini*ssa, and poison'd 15.

Spain, though the first Province on the Continent that the Romans entred into, was the last that was totally subdued xxviii. 12.

Sparta was without Walls eight hundred years xxxiv. 38.

Speeches, [though many of them are referr'd unto under the Names of those that made them, yet we shall here mention several of the most remarkable ones.]

Particular Speeches.

The Speech of Veturia to her Son Coriolanus ii. 40. Of Publius Valerius Poplicola to the Tribunes and People iii. 17. Of T. Quintius Cincinnatus against the Tribunes iii. 19.

Of Horatius Barbatus against the Decemvirs iii. 39. Of Scipio against App. Claudius iii. 45. The seditious Speech of *Masini*ssa to the Commons vi. 18. Of M. Valerius to the mutinous Souldiers, and the Answer of T. Quintius vii. 40. Of T. Manlius to his Son before he sentenced him to death viii. 7.

The Speech of Hanno in the Carthaginian Senate to maintain the League with the Romans xxi. 10. Of Alercus the Spaniard persuading the Saguntines to accept the Conditions offer'd by Annibal 13. Of Annibal to his Spanish Souldiers 21. To his Souldiers disheartned at the sight of the Alps 31. Of M. Cornelius Scipio to his Souldiers before he encountred Annibal at Ticinus 40. Annibal's Speech to his men at the same time 43.

The Speech of Minucius to the Souldiers out of Envy to Q. Fabius xxii. 14. Of M. Matilius a Tribune against the same Fabius 25. Speeches of Minucius after Fabius had preserved him and his Army 29, 30. Of Fabius Maximus advising Emilius Paulus the Consul going against Annibal 38. Of M. Junius to the Senate for redeeming the Prisoners taken at Canna 59. Of Man- lius Torquatus against redeeming them 60.

The Speech of Pacuvius Calavius the Capuan about giving up the Senate to the Rabble xxiii. 3. The sneaking Speech of Varro the Consul to the Campanians, after the Defeat at Canna 5. Hanno's Oration in the Senate of Carthage, against the Barchine Faction, after the Victory at Canna 12. Of the Samnites to Annibal 42. Of Marcellus to his men going to fight Annibal 45. Annibal's at the same time ibid.

The Speech of Q. Fabius Max. for the choice of able Magistrates xxiv. 8. Of Tib. Sempronius Gracchus to his Souldiers that were Servants, promising them liberty if they fought bravely 14. Heraclea her lamentable Speech to the Syracusians 26. Of L. Pinaris Governour of Ennea, to his Souldiers 38.

The Speech of the Agents employ'd by the Souldiers that escap'd at Canna, desiring some end of their service xxv. 6. Of Marcus to the Reliques of the defeated Armies in Spain 38.

The Speech of *C. Sempronius Bla*sius, accusing Cn. Fulvius as guilty of the loss of his Army xxvi. 2. Of Vibius in the Senate of Capua, inviting them to poison themselves 13. Of *M. Valerius Le*vinus to the Aetolians, to join them in Alliance with the Romans 24. Of Marcellus in Answer to the Complaints of the Syracusians 31. Of Levinus the Consul advising the Senators every one to bring in his own money to the publick use 36. Of Scipio to his Souldiers on his first Arrival in Spain, after his Father and Uncle kill'd 41.

A smart reprimand of Marcellus to his Souldiers xxvii. 13. The Speech of Indibilis the Spaniard, when he revolted to the Romans 17. Of C. Claudius Nero going to meet Asdrubal before he join'd Annibal 45.

The Speech of *Scipio Afric*anus to his seditious Souldiers xxviii. 27. Of the Saguntines returning thanks to the Romans 39. Of Fabius Max. in the Senate against Scipio 40. Of Scipio against Fabius 43. Of the Locrians complaining of the Outrages of Pleminius xxix. 17.

The Speech of Syphax when taken Prisoner to Scipio xxx. 13. Of Scipio to *Masini*ssa about Sophonisba 14. Of Annibal to Scipio at their interview in Africk 30. Scipio's Answer 31. Of the Carthaginian Embassadors begging Peace 42. Of Annibal in the Senate of Carthage about the terms of Peace 44.

The Speech of P. Sulpicius Galba the Consul to the people about undertaking the Macedonian War xxxi. 7. Of the Macedonian Embassador in the Aetolian Council against the Romans 29. Of the Athenian Embassador in the same Council against King Philip for the Romans 30. Of the Roman Embassador in the same Council against

The Table.

gainst Philip 31. Of Ariston the Achaean Prætor in the Achaian Council for the Romans against Philip xxxii. 20, 21. Of T. Quintius the Prætor to King Philip 33. Of Alexander the Ætolian to the same King; ibid. The Kings Answer 34. Of T. Quintius in the Council of the Ætolians xxxiii. 12. Of M. Porcius Cato for the Oppian Law against Womens Luxury xxxiv. 2. Of M. Valerius against that Law 5. Of Ariston the Achaean Prætor against the Ætolians 24. Of Nabis the Tyrant excusing himself to T. Quintius 31. Quintius's Answer 31. Of Annibal excusing himself to Antiochus xxxv. 19. Of Annibal delivering his opinion concerning a War before Antiochus xxxvi. 7. T. Quintius in the Achaian Council dissuading the Arbians from desiring of Zant 32. The Speech and Answer of Scipio Africanus to the Embassy of Antiochus after the Battle xxxvii. 55. Of Eumenes in the Senate of Rome 52. Of the Rhodians in the same place 54. Of Cn. Manlius to his Soldiers, being to fight in Gallo-Græcia xxxviii. 14, 17. Of Emilius Paulus in the Senate, accusing Manlius for waging War in Gallo-Græcia unjustly 45. Manlius his Answer 47. Of P. Nasica to the people in behalf of L. Scipio, when accused of converting Antiochus's money to his own use 58. Of Postumius Albinus the Consul to the people about suppressing the Bacchanalia xxxix. 15. Of Appius in the Achaian Council touching the Lacedæmonians 35. Of King Philip being to hear the mutual Accusations of his two Sons one against the other xl. 8. Of Perseus charging his Brother Demetrius with Parricide 9. Demetrius his Answer 12. Of L. Cæcilius Metellus in the Campus Martius, to compose the old feuds betwixt two persons chosen Censors 46. The Speech of Callicrates in the Achaian Council, perswading a League with the Romans xli. 23. Of Arco at the same time in favour of Perseus 24. Of Eumenes in the Roman Senate against Perseus xlii. 11, 12. Of the Carthaginians complaining of Masanissa 23. Of Sp. Ligustinus an old Soldier 34. Of Q. Marcus to King Perseus concerning the Causes of the War 40. The King's Answer 41. Of King Perseus to the Macedonians 52. Of L. Emilius Paulus setting out to the Macedonian War xlii. 22. Another Speech of his in the Camp to P. Nasica shewing why he declined to fight the Enemy 38. Of Stratius a Physician to Attalus, perswading him to Peace with Eumenes xlv. 19. Of the Rhodian Embassadors begging pardon of the Roman Senate [See the Supplement of the second defective passage of the forty fifth Book, and the twenty first Chapter of the same Book.] Of M. Servilius to the People for the Triumph of L. Emilius Paulus Ch. 37. [and the Supplement] Of Emi- lius after his Triumph, upon the loss of his Sons 41. Speeches for and against the Voconian Law [See the Supplement of the second defective passage in the forty third Book.] Spye taken at Rome, his hands cut off xxii. 33. Stator, why Jupiter so called i. 12. Statue, whose first set up in the Forum viii. 13. Stratagem, a notable one of T. Quintius ii. 64. Of C. Sulpicius the Dictator vii. 14. Of Annibal xxii. 17. Of the Gauls xxiii. 24. Superstition, mens minds labour therewith generally when their bodies are afflicted with diseases iv. 30. People are for the most part superstitious after any late Disaster vi. 5. Swear, one man allowed to swear for another xxxi. 50. Syphax entertains at once both Scipio and Asdrubal at Supper, and makes a League with the Romans xxviii. 18. Marries Asdrubal's Daughter, joins with the Carthaginians, sends to Scipio to forbear invading Africa xxix. 23. Taken Prisoner xxx. 12. Syracuse, the strange Commotions and Cruelties there after the Murder of King Hieronymus xxiv. 21, &c. Besieged by the Romans 33. Taken xxv. 23.

T.

Tables, two added to the former ten Tables of Laws iii. 37. Tanaquil a Woman skill'd in Cælestial Predigies, her story i. 34. Tarpeia a Virgin that betray'd the Capitol, but was kill'd for her reward i. 11. Tarquinius Priscus comes to Rome i. 34. After the Death of King Ancus he makes a Speech to the people 35. And is chosen King, and vanquishes the Sabines 37. Is kill'd by means of Ancus's Sons 40. Tarquin the Proud begins his Reign, his Tyranny i. 47. Destroys Turnus the Latine by a stratagem 52. Sends his younger Son Sextus to trepan the Gabii 53. Whom he instructs by a dumb sign, topping off the Heads of the highest Poppies 54. Is expell'd Rome by reason of his Sons ravishing of Lucretia 60. Retreats to Tusculum ii. 15. Dies at Cume 21. Tarquinius Sacrifice 307. Romans vii. 15. That Cruelty is reveng'd 19. Tarentines begin a War with the Romans in a drunken fit xii. 7. Their City taken xiv. 45. Tarentum betray'd to Annibal, all but the Castle xxv. 9. Romans relieve the Castle 15. Tarentum retaken by the Romans xxvii. 23. Temple, one Temple cannot be erected to two Gods, and the reason xxvii. 27. Tenth, not only of the Pillage, but of the City and Fields taken, paid to Apollo v. 25.

Theoxena

The Table.

V.

Theoxena kills her self, and her Sisters Children, when sent for by King Philip xl. 4. Thurines revolt to Annibal xxv. 15. Tiber the River antiently call'd Albula, and why the name chang'd i. 3. Timætheis chief of the Lyparensian Pirates, his Justice and Devotion in conveying the Roman Embassadors (when they had been taken) with their Presents to Delphos v. 28. Treachery handsomely rewarded by the Sabines i. 11. Tribunes of the Commons first chosen ii. 33. augmented to the number of ten iii. 30. Their persons inviolable 55. Patricians, even those that had been Consuls, chosen Tribunes of the Commons 65. Tribunes threaten to jail a Consul iv. 16. The like to Tribunes Military v. 9. They force a Dictator to resign vii. 3. Tribunes Military with Sovereign Authority iii. 51. Three Tribunes Military with Consular Authority chosen iv. 6. Continued but three Months 7. Made eight in number v. 1. Discontinued five years vi. 35. Triumph when first by Order of the people, without the Approbation of the Senate iii. 63. The first over any Transmarine people xvi. 38. The first time celebrated when there had been no War xl. 38. Triumvirs for dividing of Lands first Created iii. 1. Triumviri Capitales, or Judges Criminal erected xi. 22. Tullus Hostilius chosen King i. 22. He causes Metius the Alban General to be pull'd to pieces 28. Reported to be destroy'd with Lightning 31. Tunis taken by Scipio xxx. 9.

W.

WAR declared by the people not by the Senate iv. 30. Winter, the Roman Army first kept out all the Winter v. 2. Speeches pro and con on that occasion 3. White Horses first used in Triumph v. 23. Women, a quarrel between the Noblemens and Commoners Wives x. 23. Their merits to the Roman State recounted xxxiv. 5. A Woman that has once lost her modesty has nothing left her that is valuable i. 58. A Woman that thinks her self equal with her Husband, will quickly be his Superiour xxxiv. 3. Wrestling first practiz'd at Rome xxxix. 22.

Z.

Zant the Isle delivered up to the Romans xxxvi. 32.

F I N I S.

T t t t t

ERRATA

ERRATA.

Book I. Chap. 2. line 9. For too great a security to their Neighbours read too great for the security of their Neighbours. Ch. 4. line 1. For But original, read But the original. And line the 12. For Picus read Ficus. Ch. 16. line 18. For O the Romans, read O ye Romans. Ch. 34. line 2. For which the Tarquinius, read which at Tarquinius. Chap. 36. line 11. For All read Art. Ch. 44. line 8. For Crowns read Heads. Ch. 46. Read the end of that Chapter thus, Aruns Tarquinius and Tullia the younger being both almost at the same time taken out of the way, and by their Death leaving each House empty and free for a new match, Lucius and the elder Tullia intermarried not only with Servius's allowance, but approbation too. Ch. 51. line 8. For in one night read in the night. Ch. 53. line 3. After the word Volsci, add which continued. Ch. 54. l. 20. For walking without read walking about. Book II. Ch. 2. l. 56. For prosecuted read preserved. Ch. 9. line 10, 11. read thus, Porcena imagining that it would be a great honour to the Tuscans, for him to be King of Rome, as well as of the Etrurians, came to Rome, &c. Ch. 24. line 3, 4. For made an impression read made a quite contrary impression. Ch. 28. line 2. For mighty read mighty meetings. Book III. Ch. 25. line the last save one, For they totally read they had totally. Ch. 51. line the last save one, For they would read they would not lay down. Ch. 61. line 3. For they did fight, read they did not fight. Ch. 65. line 21. For ten read two years. Book IV. Ch. 12. l. 15. For Foreign read Foreign war. Book V. Ch. 8. line the first, read The year following. Ch. 22. Read the beginning thus, The next day the Dictator sold the Freeman, and though that were the only money reserv'd for the Exchequer, yet the common people grumbled at it, and as for what booty they got, they said they had no reason to thank either the General, or the Senate, but only the good Licinian Family that procured for them that popular Decree. Ch. 24. l. 21. For was it not fit read was it fit. And line 24. For *and T. Sici-*nius read *and follow T. Sici-*nius. Book VII. Ch. 6. line 38. read by consent of the Patricians. Book IX. Ch. 1. line 1. For Claudian read Caudine. Book XXV. Ch. 12. in the last line save one of the first Verses, For Beasts of prey read Beasts, a prey. Book XXVII. Ch. 5. line 39. For Dictator read Consul. Ch. 40. l. 14. For Annibal read Asdrubal. Ch. 53. l. 3. read All the road as far as the Bridge Milvius. Book XXIX. Ch. 10. line 17. Instead of That for a greater read That a far greater. Ch. 23. line 21. For he should rely read he should not rely. Ch. 29. Is not markt, but should begin at these words, And they having had a Battel with the Carthaginian Cavalry. Book XXXIX. Ch. 5. line 4. For and becoming read unbecoming. Book XL. Ch. 37. line 1. For not after read not long after. Book XLIV. Ch. 18. line 1. Instead of would manage read would not manage.